The drawing-room was, perhaps, a very unattractive room to outsiders, but to Miss Letty each shabby bit of furniture, each piece of cross-stitch, and each faded screen, represented some tender memory which she would not have parted with for any of the best old oak or delicate brocade.

She came into the room now with a little weariness in her step, which, however, passed off in an instant as she caught sight of a slim girlish figure curled up in the arm-chair.

"Why, Lady Dolly, my dear," she said joyfully, "how sweet of you to come! When did you get home?"

The girl had caught her round the waist, and was kissing her eagerly and impetuously.

"Darling Miss Letty, we only got home last night;

"Well, and what has been going on in this paradise of a place? Who is married and who has died since last March?" continued her ladyship imperiously.

Miss Fontaine had taught her the guitar in very early days, and from the moment of their first acquaintance their liking had strengthened into an but of course I have come to see you at once, to bring you a little present from the sunny south." And she flung a handsome mantilla of Spanish lace round Miss Letty's shoulders. "There, you look perfectly delicious in it, absolutely adorable!" she cried ecstatically, as Miss Fontaine grew almost incoherent in her delighted thanks.

"Well done! well done!"—p. 463.

Lady Dolly Manton was one of those girls who, if not exactly beautiful, yet strike you with a sense of satisfaction which mere personal beauty will never give. She had fluffy golden hair and eyes of a deep tender blue; and if her nose was not absolutely perfect in shape, yet you were quite certain when you looked at her, that it was the most fascinating little retroussé nose in the world, and that her smile woke the most adorable dimples in her face.

She wore a dark blue riding-habit, which fitted her pretty figure like a glove, and Miss Letty's eyes fell upon her with a tenderness that made one aware that the softest place in her heart was given to Dolly Manton.

affection which the Misses Hawke thought one of the most ridiculous affairs in the world.

But then they had angled for Lady Dolly's friendship, and had angled in vain.

"Poor old Mr. Porter at the Lodge is dead; yes, and old Elias Vine; and Maggie Holloway is married," said Miss Lettice meditatively. "But that is all. Oh, yes; but I did hear a piece of news to-day: King's Haven is let at last."

"Yes, I know," said Lady Dolly quickly. "Sir Anthony Vesey was with us a good deal in Switzerland."

Miss Fontaine gave a swift glance at her. There was a tender touch of colour in the girl's cheek that could not be mistaken, and the little old maid felt a sudden stab at her heart, which left a dull pain when it had died away.

She got up and went over to where the girl sat, and kissed her tenderly on her forehead.

"It is very sweet to have you back again," she said;

"and it will be nice for you to have Sir Anthony so near the Castle."

She would give him up to her without a murmur, and be humbly thankful that her old sweetheart had won the heart of a girl so lovable as Lady Dolly.

"Yes, won't it?" said the girl absently, and after a minute or two she departed, promising to come again very soon. And Miss Lettice watched her ride away on her chestnut mare with a mist of tears in her grey eyes, which prevented her from seeing the dainty figure very clearly.

"There is no fool like an old fool," she said to herself, as she sat in the twilight, waiting for Anne to bring in the lamp.

"And as for caring for Sir Anthony now that he is rich and great, it is absolutely absurd. I—I really think that I must be in my second childhood."

But the miniature that hung round her neck by a shabby piece of cord could have told that night of a few bitter tears shed over its handsome face.

"She will never know or suspect anything," sobbed poor Miss Lettice; "but I cannot give this up to her; it must be laid on my dead heart in my coffin."

CHAPTER II.

THE new master of King's Haven arrived in a day or two, with all his belongings, and Miss Lettice saw him for the first time the next Sunday in church.

He was sitting in the Castle pew, next to Lady Dolly, who looked more radiant than usual in a forget-me-not blue gown, with a fantastic hat on her graceful little head.

Miss Lettice shrank into a seat out of sight, behind a pillar.

The Hawkes were in front of her, and between every verse of the hymn she could see the displeased glances that the girls cast on Lady Dolly. It was some time before she dared to look at Sir Anthony, for her eyes were strangely dim; and when she did, she could scarcely recognise in the elderly bronzed man the stripling from whom she had parted twenty years ago.

But there was still the old gesture as he threw back his handsome crisply curled head. And the well-knit figure, though it was fuller and broader than of old, was wonderfully young and active.

No, after all he had changed very little; and Miss Letty, after a long glance, turned away her head and pulled down her veil. She was so altered, so old and faded, while he was in the very prime of life, ready to love and to be loved.

When service was over, she hurried out of the door into the churchyard, and away down the path, but Lady Dolly was too quick for her, and she heard the girl's pattering footsteps coming after her.

"Stop, stop, Miss Lettice! Anyone would think that it was a winter's day, or that you were walking for a wager!" cried Lady Dolly in her sweet treble.

Miss Fontaine turned, and found herself facing the whole Seabright party—Lady Dolly laughing and bright, Lord Seabright with his usual jovial manner, and his—

"Well, Miss Fontaine! Delighted to see you again; and you are really looking well—such a bright colour. Well done, well done!"

"Miss Fontaine, this is Sir Anthony Vesey," said Lady Dolly, with a little wave of her hand towards the upright figure.

Sir Anthony made a quick step forward, and took off his hat.

"Lettice Fontaine," he said, with a wondering look of astonishment; but the old maid did not look at him; she could not bear to see the surprised disappointment that she knew was written on his face.

"How do you do?" she said simply, holding out a tremulous hand—"Sir Anthony and I are old acquaintances, Lady Dolly, though we have not met for years."

And that was all, for Sir Anthony, chilled by the coldness of her greeting, fell back a pace or two with Lady Dolly, and Miss Fontaine found herself walking with Lord Seabright, and conversing on mangold-wurzels and prize heifers, with an air of great assurance.

When they paused at her little cottage gate, Sir Anthony took her hand in his, and looked keenly into her face.

"You will allow me to come and see you, Miss Fontaine?" he said, a little sadly.

"Certainly, if Lady Dolly will bring you," was her answer; and no one, seeing her quiet little figure in its trim black silk gown, passing leisurely up the box-bordered path, could have guessed the tumult that was raging within her soul.

Lady Dolly brought him down to the cottage the next day, and they talked of old times, she nervously keeping the conversation from touching on any tender topics, and he growing sterner and colder as the visit drew to a close.

She watched his manner towards Lady Dolly. It was very gentle and tender, and when his eyes fell upon her sweet face, it was with an expression of such affection as left no room in Miss Fontaine's heart for doubt as to his own feelings.

When they rose to go, Miss Letty's kiss and whispered blessing to the girl came from a heart laden with humble love and self-sacrifice; and if Lady Dolly was surprised at the warmth of her farewell, she said nothing.

Later on in the evening, Miss Fontaine felt that her little room was very stuffy, and that if she did not get out into the fresh air she would suffocate. So, slipping on her Quaker-like little bonnet, she passed out through the sleeping fields into the little fir copse that bordered the Castle grounds. The moon was full, and the shadows that the twisted branches cast upon the turf were weird in the extreme.

There was a heavy scent of clover in the air, and up in the highest fir-tree a sleeping wood-pigeon was crooning softly in its nest. It was only when Miss Lettice had entered the wood that she became aware that she was not alone: that two other figures were standing with their backs to her, very close together.

She staggered against a tree, laying hold of a supporting branch with a hand that trembled piteously.

For they were Lady Dolly and Sir Anthony, and she was crying, with her head on his shoulder, and his arm was round her slender figure.

"Don't cry, my dear, my dear!" he was saying. "I cannot bear to see your tears."

And stooping towards her, he touched the waves of her bright hair with his lips.

Through the night air there came towards them the faint sigh as of a dumb spirit in pain, and they started apart.

But it was only the pigeons, Lady Dolly said, with a little nervous laugh; and no one suspected that Miss Fontaine, with a breaking heart, was creeping homewards through the dappled grass and yellowing corn, to watch for the breaking day through the long hours of the night with wide, sleepless eyes.

It was mad folly on her part to remember the past, she moaned to herself; but since his lips had last touched hers in their mute farewell, it seemed to rend her very soul asunder to watch him kiss another woman. Next day was the Dorcas Meeting; and though she felt very tired, Miss Fontaine pocketed her thimble and went up to the Vicarage.

There were just the same little assembly of people as had been there the week before, and evidently some interesting topic of conversation was on the tapis.

"I think," said Florrie Hawke, with a toss of her elegant head, "that, after all, it's a very poor match for Lady Dolly Manton, for he's years older than she, and not so extraordinarily rich."

"Oh, well, he's tidily off," said her sister. "But I never could see the attraction of Lady Dolly: no one could call her pretty."

"Oh, but so fascinating!" put in Miss Broadhurst, with a little sigh; "her very manner is so—so delicious!"

She paused and blushed, then took up her work hastily, conscious of the finely developed stares of Florrie and Amy Hawke.

Like all plain women, Amelia Broadhurst had her ideal, and in this instance Lady Dolly was the object of her silent worship.

Miss Lettice thanked her with a look for her championship; and though her thin cheeks grew a shade whiter, no one noticed her in the interest of the animated conversation that ensued.

"I hear that the wedding will be in six weeks' time," said Mrs. Broadhurst. "I wonder if they will do anything for the village in the way of coals or beef? Really, I almost hope not; for when Lord Henry came of age all the doles were given to the most undeserving people, and the vicar was never consulted at all."

"I hope they will give a party or a fete," said Florrie Hawke; "and I suppose we shall all have to give her a wedding present? What an awful bore! I am sure that we are hard up enough already."

"Oh, we must do that, my love," put in Mrs. Hawke. "The wedding is sure to be in the Morning Post, with the list of presents, and it will look so odd if our name is not down."

Miss Lettice's heart smote her sadly.

What could she give Lady Dolly for a wedding present? She was too poor to buy anything worthy of her friend, and the thought tormented her for the rest of the afternoon.

When she reached home again, she began to turn over the few treasures that were left to her, in the vain hope of finding something that she could give to the girl she loved.

In a little case, in the remotest depth of her writing-table, lay the only ornament of any value that remained to her from her young days: it was a tiny diamond swallow, with a ruby heart in its mouth.

Miss Lettice took the glittering brooch from its case, and sat looking at it in a brown study.

How well she remembered the day that her father had given it to her.

He had been very lucky over a speculation in some mining shares—the same mine that, in the end, proved his ruin; and she recalled the very look on his handsome face as he had tossed the trinket into her lap with a laugh and a kiss, bidding her pin her bonnet-strings with it on Sunday.

She never wore it now, and it looked as bright and new as on the very day when she had first received it. So she wrapped the little case carefully in tissue-paper, and laid it aside in her drawer. Some days passed before Lady Dolly came down to the cottage again.

And when she did so, she was driving tandem, with Sir Anthony at her side, and her smart groom sitting behind.

She sprang down, and ran into the little garden, flinging the reins to her companion.

"Darling Miss Letty, here I am! Did you think that I was never coming to see you again?" she cried, flinging down upon the table a basket of fruit and exquisite hot-house flowers.

It was then that Miss Lettice gathered up her courage in both hands, and faced the girl steadily.

How charming she was in the fresh flush of her youth and strength! and how becoming the sailor-hat was to her piquant face, and the serge gown to her figure!

"Lady Dolly, my dear, I have heard some—some glad news about you," said Miss Lettice tremulously. "But surely it is news that you should have come to your old friend with, for interest, and—and sympathy. Will you take this little present, dear, from me, and wear it often, and think of an old maid who loves you dearly, and wishes you every happiness in your married life?"

The pink flush from her own cheeks seemed to be reflected on Lady Dolly's face.

"You dear, dear thing! but it is a secret; I thought no one knew—for I may not speak about it yet," she stammered confusedly, as she took the neat little parcel into her hand.

"And will you tell Sir Anthony from me how glad I feel for his happiness: how—oh! you know best what I should like to say!" ended Miss Letty feebly.

Lady Dolly looked a little bewildered, then she kissed her old friend warmly.

"You might have been sure that I should have told you directly there was anything to hear, for you are the dearest friend I have ever had in my life," she said. "I will tell Sir Anthony, for he has been so kind about it all. And now, good-bye, and thank you a thousand times."

And she whirled away, leaving Miss Lettice a prey to some surprise and a little uneasiness. How lightly she had spoken of Sir Anthony! "Kind" was scarcely a word that seemed applicable to the occasion. But Miss Lettice knew that she had not kept pace with the times, and, no doubt, it was the fashion to take these affairs more lightly than in the old days.

"Sat looking at it in a brown study."--p. 167.

Still, "Kind!"

She brooded over the word till her head ached and her brain felt bewildered.

In her own passionate wooing, no such word could have found place. But times had altered since then. When she had had her simple evening meal, she threw a lace scarf round her shoulders, and went out into her plot of garden.

It was late evening, though the dusk of the twilight had scarcely become merged in night.

There was a tremulous whisper about the beech-trees as the breeze stole in and out among the leaves. And away down in the village street, every now and then a light crept out of the dusk, like a star.

The voices of the children at play on the green, the sharp bark of a watch-dog in a distant farm, and the tinkle of a sheep-bell near at hand were the only sounds that broke the edge of the evening. And Miss Fontaine, as she bent over her roses, pulling off a withered leaf here and there, started as the little wicket-gate opened, and clashed to again impetuously.

Surely the witchery of the hour must have been upon her, for it only woke a faint wonder in her heart when she looked up to find Sir Anthony Vesey standing at her side.

She could not speak, but she smiled tremulously, and held out her hand.

He took it in his own firm manly one, and held it tightly pressed in a warm clasp.

"Letty, what has come between us?" he said abruptly. "When I saw you that Sunday for the first wonderful time—you, for whom I have been looking the whole wide-world through, since I returned from exile—you showed me only too plainly that you had forgotten me, and that we had ever loved one another. What has come between us?"

Her white lips murmured:—

"Lady Dolly—sweet Lady Dolly!"

"Lady Dolly!" he cried, with sudden impetuosity; "why, she loves my ne'er-do-weel scapegrace of a nephew, who is not worthy of the very ground she treads on! How could she come between us?"

Miss Letty's heart stopped beating for an instant, then went on in a wild tumultuous race.

"Do you love me no longer?" he was saying bitterly. "Strange, when my love has never varied for you since the day when we were forced asunder. I have always kept my heart for you, striven to lay up money enough to make a home for my wife. And when a marvellous chance gave me possession of my cousin's title and fortune, I rejoiced only in the hope that now I should be able to search for you and to find you out, even though you were in the utmost ends of the earth. Verily, and indeed,

'Woman's love is writ in water,
Woman's faith is traced on sand.'

He half turned away, but she caught him by the sleeve.

"Anthony, is it true?" she said wildly. "Can you care for me, a faded old maid? Look, Anthony, see my face lined and wrinkled, my hair growing grey, my——"

"Darling!" he said tenderly, "I see nothing but the face I love better than all the world beside."

And with a low cry of wonder, she crept into his arms, and laid her head upon his shoulder.

Their wedding was a nine days' wonder in Sandhaven—a nine days' wonder and a nine days' regret.

"For, of course," as Mrs. Hawke said lamely, "if we had known that Miss Fontaine was ever going to have the chance of marrying so well, we should have been more civil to her. And now, I suppose, the gates of King's Haven will be closed upon us."

But Lady Vesey was not spiteful. She had her husband, the lover of her youth, the faithful lover of her old age, and the pettiness of the whole world was merged in her joy.

IGNORANCE OF TO-MORROW.

BY THE REV. J. R. MACDUFF, D.D.

"Ye know not what shall be on the morrow."—JAMES IV. 14.

THE MORROW HIDDEN. In other words, translating it into figurative language, the next turning and all subsequent turnings in the journey of life are unrevealed to sight. We cannot penetrate beyond to-day. What may appear at first a trite and commonplace statement will doubtless be found, as it was intended to be, profitable for instruction in righteousness.

In some subordinate—indeed, in some important—senses, we can look forward and cast the horoscope of the future. The man of science can register the hour, the minute of the eclipse. By a more ordinary calculation, founded on the simplest experimental data, each of us can forecast the morrow and the time to come, in respect of the succession of day and night, or the revolution of the seasons. We know that on the literal morrow the sun will rise in the eastern sky. In the green of early summer we can anticipate with certainty the yellow sheaves of harvest. In the waning days of autumn we know that outer nature will ere long go to its grave—with the snow as its winding-sheet; with equal certitude that it will, in due time, come forth anew in resurrection attire, clothed in the living verdure of spring; while the meteorologist, in one of the latest phases of his study, ventures, with singularly approximate accuracy, to foretell climatic and atmospheric changes. But though the morrow can be thus made matter of prescience and calculation regarding the sequences of Nature, not so regarding human experiences. No telescope has ever penetrated or can penetrate that mysterious undeveloped future. No telegraph message can reach us from its shores—no electric spark traverse the depths of its unnavigable sea. No vessel ever yet set sail to that impenetrable silent land, and from amid its fogs and darkness brought back an authentic and authenticated message. The Morrow! It often ushers in events with the suddenness of a shock—like the instantaneous upheaval of the earthquake. Life flows on, from day to day, a placid river. We get accustomed to and familiarised with its easy, untroubled current; not a wrinkle obscures or ruffles its surface; no premonition of a cataract at hand. But in a moment, with one furious bound, down it is swept in foam and thunder to the rocky caldrons beneath. Ah! the soliloquy is often rudely broken: "To-morrow shall be as to-day, and much more abundant." To-morrow comes, but it comes with chairs emptied and windows darkened. To-day—rings some jubilant chime; to-morrow!—the bells are muffled, the eye is dimmed, and "man goeth to the long home"!

Take a brighter alternative view and picture. How the future often brings joy and blessing and prosperity, utterly unexpected! How many can tell to-day of the horn of plenty being poured into their lap; realised abundance which in days of youth would have seemed a fairy-dream. They never thought of aught other than a humble mediocrity. The picture (their own mental picture) of "the morrow" was that of Jacob. They set out in life, staff in hand—existence an anticipated hard battle. But, like him, they can say now: "With my staff I passed over this Jordan, and now I am become two bands." How even our shrewdest guesses and calculations turn out incorrect. What we feared would be our greatest troubles turn out our signal mercies and blessings. We may remember how the mother of Jabez weaved her plaintive, mournful lullaby over the cradle of her child. She had no delight in him. She called him Jabez, i.e., "Sorrowful." But her verdict was at fault, misplaced and mistimed. When the morrow of her child's life came, he was "more honourable than his brethren." He grew up her prop and joy and solace. He became more truly her "Barnabas," a son of consolation—the nourisher of her old age—erasing the furrows from her brow, and, perhaps, closing her eyes in death!

But I need not multiply illustrations, so different is that morrow of life, in the case of most, from what was anticipated; so strange and fitful the transformations in our individual histories, as to lead us at times almost to question our personal identity.

Let me, however, view this ignorance of to-morrow's road as containing a gracious ordination. Our Blessed Redeemer, in making a similar statement in His Sermon on the Mount, more positively still than His later Apostle, asserts the kindness and beneficence of this Divine arrangement when He exhorts to "Take no thought for the morrow." It is very true that in some respects and in some circumstances it would be a desirable thing were the future unfolded to us. In the reminiscences of not a few, could they have known the morrow, how many evils, sorrows, sins, might have been spared! "Had I foreseen," one may be heard to say, "that temptation, I would have fled from it. Had I foreseen that sunken rock, I would have steered in time the moral helm and averted moral and spiritual shipwreck. Had I been able to prognosticate that impending sickness and premature death; had I anticipated that my fellow-pilgrim or relative would have so soon succumbed to the last enemy, how differently would I have acted! How I would have avoided the needless irritation, or saved the infliction of the thoughtless pang, or cancelled the unforgiving word; smoothed with tenderness the pillow of pain, or used with greater promptitude efforts to ward off the blow with its irreparable loss:—how I would have spoken and expostulated with the fidelity of tried friendship on the one subject of peerless importance. Ay—more than all—if I knew that next year my own summons would come, that next year the green grass would wave over my own grave, how differently would I now live! How would these fleeting, fugitive, golden moments be garnered and improved! As I marked day by day, week by week, month by month, the diminishing grains in the sand-glass, till the solemn reality was before me that I had but a day more to live! another sun only to rise, but which would set unseen by me—my watching time and working time vanishing for ever—how would all worldly projects look worthless!—how would the point be driven away from my winged ambitions, and the gold I covet seem as base alloy! Yet, notwithstanding these apparent partial advantages which a knowledge of the future would doubtless confer, there is diviner beneficence in the reverse. The provision of the Almighty is a wise and loving one: "Ye know not what shall be on the morrow."

In order to give definiteness to these remarks, let me proceed to assign a few reasons why this ignorance of the morrow is desirable.

I. It enables us, in a Christian sense of the word, to enjoy the present. It allows us to retain present equanimity, and to enjoy the blessings which God has given to us. Were that morrow known, it is not too much to assert that it would make life one long anticipated sadness and sorrow. That friendship—now so sacred—heart answering to heart in blissful communion and interchange of thought, feeling, and interest: some unforeseen, trivial accident interposes, like the jutting rock in the mountain rivulet; the stream is severed, and each, in hapless divergency, pursues an opposite course. How the thought—the possibility of such an estrangement—would have marred every hour and moment of confidential intimacy and affection while it lasted: a forecast of it would have rendered such companionship impossible.

Take a more sacred case: that of the loving parent. Could the mother feel certified that that child, sporting innocently at her feet, or climbing on her knee, was in a few brief years to die, that its tiny bark was to be wrecked ere leaving the home-haven, how sorrowfully would its glad laugh sound in her ears! how grating the music! Ask the father whose soul is bound up in some precious little one, the inheritor of his name and fortunes—every dream of the future associated with his boy—what would be his feelings? How would years of happiness be palled in sackcloth were he to know that in life's earliest morning he would be called to stand by that loved one's grave, or to gaze on the empty cradle and unused toys! I say, again, would not existence be turned into one long season of forecasted misery: its torture increasing as he felt the day was drawing nigh when the remorseless tide would reach the mark and sweep his treasure away? But, blessed be God, no such prescience is ours. We are permitted, as God's children, to enjoy the spring blossoms without foreseeing them scattered and withered with storms. This, let us solemnly recall, was one special and unique element in our Lord's sufferings which His suffering people know nothing of. He did know the morrow! As the Omniscient One to whom the future was all marked out, the dark shadows of Gethsemane's Garden and Calvary's Cross were projected on His path. There is a familiar and impressive tradition which more than one great painter has utilised: Jesus, while toiling in the workshop of Nazareth, being startled by the figure of the Cross formed by the planks on His bench. The tradition is a vain one. But there was a dread reality in the truth it meant to convey; that to the eye of that young Galilean artisan—to the eye which, under human garb, had the glance of Divine foreknowledge, there loomed the shadows of approaching suffering. From us, all coming years of pain and sorrow are mercifully concealed. But what must have been the thoughts, the pangs, which burdened His soul, when, of His last journey to the scene of supreme anguish, it is said: "He set His face steadfastly to go up to Jerusalem"! There was in this respect an awful and special emphasis—because they had a meaning peculiar to Himself—in the words: "Can ye drink of the cup that I drink of, and be baptised with the baptism that I am baptised with?" (St. Mark x. 38).

II. A second reason why there is kindness and beneficence manifested in our ignorance of the future (our not knowing what shall be on the morrow) is that it leads to a simpler trust in God. He knows that future. He knows that morrow—every chapter, every page, every line in life's history. It is the joy and prerogative of His child to confide in Him. "Oh, my Father!" he says, "lead me. Unfold to me Thine own plans and purposes. I do not anticipate them. I have no anxious, overweening care. The Lord is my Shepherd. The Lord is my Keeper. The Lord is my Guide, even unto death."

"Father, I know that all my life
Is portioned out to me;
The changes that will surely come,
I do not fear to see;
I ask Thee for a patient mind,
Intent on pleasing Thee."

Yes, it is this trust in God which distinguishes the believer from the unbeliever; the child of grace from the child of nature. In the context of the words of St. James, the Apostle is rebuking "the men of the world" who have no such trust, who have their portion only in this life; who live as if to-morrow were their own; as if there were no Guide at the helm, and the vessel were plunging and heaving in the waves of wild, wayward, capricious fate. They are their own masters. Their time is in their own hands. They lay their own plans and purposes, as if there were not the chance of divergence or disturbance. "They even rejoice in their boasting." "Stop," he seems to say, "ye arrogant boasters. Ye may not heed me. But this" (he adds in v. 15) "is what ye ought to say, 'If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this or that.'" Like the rich fool in the parable, they build their barns, they construct their schemes, as if the world were to last for ever. They refuse to open eyes or ears until the crashing sentence startles them from their atheist-dream—"Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee!"

Blessed for us (and for all the children of God) will be this ignorance of what is to befall, if it drive us closer under the shadow of the Almighty's wings; if it lead us more lovingly to trust Him in meting out for us every drop of to-morrow's cup, and to cherish with unwavering assurance the unfailing promise, "As thy day is, so shall thy strength be." Would that we could thus ever see our lives as a programme, written, as it were, by the great God Himself. In laying every plan for the future, whether with regard to our families, our homes, our places of business, be it ours to say in the words just quoted (not in mere proverbial conventionalism, but in devout acknowledgment of the great Guider and Provider), "If the Lord will." It would moderate all anxieties. It would disarm all misgivings. It would extract the sting from all sorrows. It would take us to the graves of our children and enable us to read, through our tears, words written by Him who knows that future which we do not know—"Taken away from the evil to come."

III. A third reason why it is well for us that we are ignorant of the morrow, is that this ignorance acts as an incentive to constant watchfulness. This thought has been already anticipated, so that it is unnecessary to expand. Enough to ponder the solemn words of the Wise Man, "Boast not thyself of to-morrow; thou knowest not what a day may bring forth!" You may live to a green old age—a goodly cedar in the Lebanon forest. But who can tell? The axe may be laid at the sapling's root. As the Lord liveth and as thy soul liveth, there may "verily be but a step between thee and death!" What an argument, therefore, does this veiling of the future afford for habitual vigilance; that on no returning day when the early beams gild our chamber can we tell whether or no it may be our last. The friend we talked with but yesterday on the street, or transacted business with in the exchange, so full of worldly schemings, so sanguine of a successful future—his air-castle, turret on turret, was being built. We open the morning's newspaper, we read how the touch of an invisible hand had, in the twinkling of an eye, overturned the fabric and written over it, "Gold which perisheth."

"Go to now, ye that say, To-day or to-morrow we will go into such a city, and continue there a year, and buy and sell and get gain. Whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow. For what is your life? It is even a vapour, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away!"

Let us be up, and, with the energy of men, remain no longer traitors to our immortal trust. Redeem the time. It is not "to-morrow"—but "to-day, if ye will hear His voice." We know not how soon the last morrow may overtake—the alarm-bell ring, and the Judge stand before the door. Our ignorance, surely, accentuates the Master's call—"What I say unto one, I say unto all, Watch!" "Wakerif" is a quaint word used by some of the old divines, expressive of calm faith and expectancy—the girded loins and the burning lamps. Let this attitude be ours.

Thus Watching, Waiting, Working, the morrow may be left to evolve itself without anxiety or apprehension. When the unlooked-for summons and the supreme hour arrive, if we have fled to Christ as our Saviour, Christ within us the hope of glory, we shall be ready with the response, "Lo! this is our God: we have waited for Him:" and the uncertain and precarious morrows of time will be exchanged for the cloudless and unending "Morrow of Eternity."

EARTHLY PARADISES.—II.

BY THE REV. E. J. HARDY, M.A., CHAPLAIN TO H.M. FORCES, AUTHOR OF "HOW TO BE HAPPY, THOUGH MARRIED," ETC. ETC.

HE wife of one of our most celebrated literary men said, not long ago:—"It is a great mistake for brainy people to marry brains, and, happily, few of them do it. Put two geniuses together in matrimony, and you have two cats in a bag—nervous, fretful creatures, with no patience, and less common sense, who will be always worrying each other, and tugging in opposite directions at the matrimonial chain. What a clever man wants is a clear-headed, sensible wife, who will forget his vagaries in remembering his brilliancy, and remain a constant shield between his sensitiveness and disagreeable things: something, in fact, like one of those cushions that sailors put down the side of a vessel to keep it from jarring too roughly against the dock. Look at me, for instance. I never wrote a word for publication, painted a picture, composed music, or did anything clever in all my life. But I make my husband just the sort of wife he needs."

If what is here said be a law of nature, it is one to which there are many exceptions. One is the case of the French writer, Alphonse Daudet, and his wife, who loved literature, and was a charming writer and critic herself. They worked together in an earthly Paradise. "She has been," says his brother, "the light of his hearth, the regulator of his work, and the discreet counsellor of his inspiration. There is not a page that she has not revised, retouched, and enlivened." Once Daudet had a sentimental and dramatic scene with his wife, concerning which he remarked:—"This seems, my dear, like a chapter that has slipped out of a novel." "It is more likely, Alphonse," was the reply, "to form a chapter that will slip into one."

I do not recollect any of our celebrated prose writers who was quite so happy in his domestic life, as long as it lasted, as Lever. He nearly died of a broken heart when he lost his wife.

It might be thought that an autocrat of a breakfast-table could not be a married man; but this Oliver Wendell Holmes was for forty-eight years. That he was happy, though married, might be inferred from his genial writings, even if we had not the direct testimony to this effect of those who have visited him. A friend thus describes the sharer of his home:—"Mrs. Holmes was not a literary woman, but she was a woman of education and refinement, and no one who has ever visited the author's home will forget the gracious charm of his wife's presence. She was a small, dainty woman, with manners of old-fashioned cordiality; and yet, with all her gentleness, she stood as a breakwater between her husband and the prying, pushing world.

The contemplation of Nature's calm and orderly working would seem to exercise a soothing influence upon her students if it be true, as it seems to be, that more great natural philosophers have lived in earthly Paradises than celebrities in other walks in life. After twenty-eight years' experience, Faraday spoke of his marriage as "an event which, more than any other, had contributed to his earthly happiness and healthy state of mind." For forty-six years the union continued unbroken, the love of the old man remaining as fresh, as earnest, and as heart-whole as in the days of his youth.

James Nasmyth, the inventor of the steam-hammer, had a similar experience. Speaking of his wife, he said: "Forty-two years of married life find us the same devoted 'cronies' that we were at the beginning."

Considering how weak the health of Darwin was, he would probably never have been able to make his fruitful discoveries if he had not had a wife and children, who saved him from trouble, and the leisure of a very happy home.

It is pleasant to find harmony in the home of a great musical composer as well as in his compositions. There were no discordant notes in the matrimonial duet played by Mozart and his wife. Being only eighteen when she married, the latter had not attained to a great amount of wisdom, but she had much of her husband's gaiety of heart, which, in the inevitable perplexities of their ménage, was the best possible substitute.

In all his family relations Mozart was the tenderest of men. In his darkest moments he had always a smile for his adored wife. For years she was an invalid, and he used to write by her bedside while she slept. When he went out in the morning for a ride, he would steal softly into her room and leave a tender note to greet her waking. Here is one of them: "I wish you good-morning, my dear little wife. I hope you have slept well, and that nothing has disturbed your repose. Be careful not to take cold, not to rise too quickly, not to stoop, not to reach for anything, not to be angry with the servant. Take care also not to fall upon the threshold in passing from one room to another. Keep all the domestic troubles till I come, which will be soon." The home of a man so unselfish as this could scarcely fail to be an earthly Paradise.

It frequently happens that men of letters, artists, clergymen, and people who work at home, do not appreciate their homes as much as men do whose work takes them away from them for days at a time, or at least for several hours each day. These last feel as Burke did when he said:—"Every care vanishes the moment I enter under my own roof!" President Lincoln never failed to get relief from public burdens and responsibilities in the society of his family. He could turn aside from the mob of office-seekers who daily afflicted him, and find in his children's society refreshment of spirit, the bonds of affection being thus strengthened by the cares that too often estrange a busy man from his family.

Another great American who found an earthly Paradise in his home was Franklin. In his early life he paid attention to a Miss Read, but soon afterwards went to London, where he remained several years. During the separation he neglected the young lady in a manner which he himself afterwards condemned. On his return, he found that she had married and become a widow. Franklin's early love revived, and he asked her forgiveness and a renewal of her affections, which were readily granted. Of their union, which continued nearly forty years, the husband remarks:—"We prospered together, and it was our mutual study to render each other happy. Thus I corrected as well as I could the error of my youth."

A friend of Lord Beaconsfield, speaking of the time he was only Mr. Disraeli, writes:—"We were congratulating him upon the result of an election. He had been returned by an enormous majority. One thing he said I particularly remarked: 'My wife will be very pleased.'"

This lady was fifteen years older than Disraeli, and he used frequently to tell her, in joke, that he had married her for her money; to which she would reply: "Ah, but if you had to do it over again, you would do it for love"—a statement to which he always smilingly assented. But if Disraeli did not marry for love, the affection which existed between him and his "perfect wife," as he called her, stood the trials of thirty years, and deepened as they both declined into age. If defeated, he hurried home to be comforted by the helpmate and confidante, who never believed that he could fail, and in his greatest triumph there was to him no place like home. On April 12th, 1867, when he defeated Mr. Gladstone's amendment to the Reform Bill, the younger members of the party extemporised a supper at the Carlton Club, and begged him to join them. But Lady Beaconsfield was never tired of repeating: "Dizz came home to me"; and she would add how he ate half the raised pie which she had prepared in anticipation of his triumph. On another occasion (3rd of April, 1872) this sympathetic wife hastened back from listening to a great speech in order to receive the orator. When she heard his carriage, she hurried from the drawing-room to the hall, rushed into his arms, embraced him rapturously, and exclaimed: "Oh, Dizzy! Dizzy! this is the greatest night of all! This pays for all!"

The picture that is given by his biographer of the home-life of the Right Honourable William Edward Forster is a very beautiful one. He was never weary of acknowledging his indebtedness to his wife, whom he cherished with a chivalrous reverence not too common in the present age. She was the daughter of Dr. Arnold, and his admission into a family of such intellectual distinction insensibly widened his sympathies, and brought his mind into contact with ideas of which he had known comparatively little before. He did his work in the same room with his family, he reading and writing at one table, his wife at another. The library was the scene of their joint life and perfect companionship.

Few couples live in a more complete paradise of congeniality than Prince Bismarck and his wife. And yet the great statesman began his wooing in a characteristic way, that might almost be described as violent. He had once or twice met Fräulein von Puttkammer, but he did not know her parents even by sight when, in 1847, he made up his mind to marry her. He wrote a brief, business-like letter to the young lady's father and mother, demanding their daughter. As his reputation was not the best, they hesitated; but when Johanna, their daughter, intimated that she did not look upon the young gentleman unfavourably, it was decided that he should be invited to come and see them. When the time came for him to arrive, the parents put on an air of grave solemnity, and the young lady stood with her eyes modestly bent upon the ground. Bismarck rode up, and alighting, threw his arms around his sweetheart's neck, and embraced her vigorously before anyone had time to remonstrate. The result was a betrothal. Bismarck is fond of telling this tale, and he generally finishes with the reflection:—"She it is who has made me what I am." No home into which bores enter can be called a Paradise; and, if it were for no other reason, Princess Bismarck deserves the undying gratitude of her husband because of her success in keeping at a distance these enemies of peace. An ambassador of one of the great Powers called on Bismarck, and in the course of a rather long conversation asked the prince how he managed to get rid of troublesome visitors. "Oh, that is very simple," replied the Chancellor. "When my wife thinks anyone is staying too long, she merely sends for me, and thus the interview ends." At that very moment a servant entered, and, bowing low, begged his master to favour the princess with his presence for a few minutes. The ambassador blushed, as much as any diplomatist can blush, and at once withdrew as gracefully as possible in the trying circumstances.

In much the same way Mrs. Gladstone defends the Castle of Hawarden from the attacks of bores. She at least understands her grand old man—what friends to encourage, whom to protect him against. Mr. Gladstone has publicly announced that every morsel of animal food which he puts into his eloquent mouth requires, for the purposes of digestion, thirty-three—or is it thirty-two?—distinct bites. Mrs. Gladstone, therefore, takes care that he should always eat slowly. It might be said of her as was said of Mrs. Carlyle:—"Her hardest work was a delight to her when she could spare her husband's mind an anxiety or his stomach an indigestion." For more than half a century this grand old couple (we are not speaking of politics) have presented to the world a wholesome and blessed example of happy marriage.

SHORT ARROWS.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

SPIRITUAL DEATH.

HERE are families, districts, aye, churches, where there is to be found a state of things similar to that which is recorded of the whaling ship with its frozen crew. The captain of a Greenland whaler was surrounded with icebergs, and lay-to until the morning. When morning came, he looked about and saw a ship near by. He hailed it. No answer. Getting into a boat with some of his crew, he pushed for the mysterious craft. Getting nearer, he saw through the porthole a man at a stand, as though keeping a log-book. He hailed him. No answer. He went on board the vessel and found the man sitting at the log-book frozen to death. The log-book was dated 1762, showing the vessel had been wandering for thirteen years among the ice. The sailors were frozen among the hammocks, and others in the cabin; for thirteen years this ship had been carrying its burden of corpses. Alas! how many communities, families, churches are like this ship! Well-preserved death is the most that can be said of them. And so they continue year after year; and when a call of life comes to them, they know it not. God keep us from this frozen state—from ice around—from death within.

"COME TO JESUS."

There was a woman who was very ill and was visited by one of the London City Missionaries.

The missionary had to go away, but before going he left with her the little book, "Come to Jesus." On his return, with uplifted hands and a face the missionary never could forget, she said, "I thought I should never see you again. Come and tell me more about Jesus. This little book I could eat! Read this page; I have read it again and again." How many are there who will not taste the words of life, much less eat them! It needs a hungry soul too long to appropriate the Word.

THREE ESSENTIALS.

It is interesting to notice the progress of civilisation among the wild tribes of Afghanistan. In the year 1885 Mr. Salter Pyne was commissioned by the Ameer Abdur Rahman to establish workshops in Cabul for the manufacture of "what the country needed;" the necessary funds and labour being placed at his disposal. Three months afterwards the Ameer inspected the works, and then made the following speech:—"This is one of the happiest days of my life. I have to-day seen the foundation of what is to be a great event for Afghanistan. Before these workshops can be finished there are three essentials required: 1. God's help. 2. My money. 3. Your work. Your work and God's help without my money are useless. God's help and my money without your work, and your work and my money without God's help, are equally valueless. I will find the money; you will do the work; and we must hope for God's help."

There are those among us in this highly favoured England who work forgetful of the fact that it is God alone who gives the increase, and therefore do not reap their highest reward; and there are those who leave everything to God, and do little or nothing themselves, and then grumble that the result is not altogether satisfactory—disregarding the words of St. James: "Faith without works is dead." Employers and employed may learn a lesson from the swarthy Afghan ruler, and would do well to bear in mind the three points of his remarkable address:—1. God's help. 2. My money. 3. Your work.

LIFE AND DEATH.

In the midst of life we are in death, and it is well that the thought of this should exercise a solemnising and restraining influence upon our minds. In ancient Egypt, at the end of a fashionable dinner, a mummy richly painted and gilded was presented to each guest in turn by a servant, who said, "Look on this; drink and enjoy thyself; for such as it is now, so shalt thou be when thou art dead." They made a wrong use of the thought of death. With them the teaching of death was, "Eat and drink, for to-morrow you die;" with us it should be, "As thou must die, take heed how thou dost live."

OVER THE FIELDS.

OVER THE FIELDS.

Perhaps nothing shows Shakespeare's knowledge of human nature more than his representation of Falstaff as babbling of green fields when dying. No matter how we have lived, our thoughts at the end of life generally wander back to the innocent days of childhood. And how children do love the fields! You tell a boy that you are going over the fields to some place, and he will ask with the greatest eagerness to accompany you, whereas he would not care to go at all if the journey were to be made by road.

IF ONLY THEY KNEW IT!

The amount of money lying in the various banks in the kingdom concerning which there is no clue as to the owners amounts to about two hundred millions of pounds sterling. There are about nine hundred millions sterling in the bank deposits; and of that no one knows the owners as to about one-fifth. Ignorance keeps the rightful owners out of their wealth. And if only in spiritual things people knew what is theirs, they would claim it, and be enriched for ever. But they don't know, and often they don't want to know; and their incredulity keeps them out of their riches up to the very end.

THE PARABLE OF THE SLIPPER AND THE BOOT.

A slipper once said to its friend the boot, "You have a much better time of it than falls to my lot. My master puts you on his foot, and away out into the world you go to see its sights. You are with him at his business, and with him in his pleasures. You have a goodly time, friend boot, whereas I perforce have to content myself with the humdrum of home, for he wears me only in the house. I would that we could exchange places."—"Oh! brother," said the boot, "yours is a shallow complaint. I truly see the world, but I pay a penalty. The constant tramp over hard stones and rough roads wears out my sole. When first our master wore me I used to creak and groan, for the hardness of the way chafed me, and the dirt into which he trod made me sick. All this I have become used to, and now am silent. But just think for a moment: if I see the world, it is because I have a thicker sole than you and a stouter upper. You do your work, and I do mine; 't were a folly to talk of exchange." Moral.—Every man works best in his own sphere.

OPPORTUNITY.

Shakespeare says that there is a tide in the affairs of men which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune. This is probably that one great opportunity which comes to a man once in his life, and to some men more than once. A sculptor once showed a visitor his studio. It was full of gods. One was very curious; the face was concealed by being covered with hair, and there were wings to each foot. "What is its name?" said the spectator.—"Opportunity," was the reply.—"Why is his face hidden?"—"Because men seldom know him when he comes to them."—"Why has he wings upon his feet?"—"Because he is soon gone, and once gone he cannot be overtaken." The history of many a failed life is that of lost opportunity. The opportunity was unperceived at the time, or it was not taken advantage of. Sometimes these opportunities tarry with us for a while—sometimes they are off as in a moment. Jerusalem had her opportunity—"If thou hadst known, even thou, in this thy day, the things which make for thy peace."—But she did not, and so they were hidden from her eyes. "Agree with thine adversary quickly whilst thou art in the way with him, lest . . ." and the opportunity will be soon gone, and then you will find yourself cast in prison. It is bad enough to lose the opportunities which have to do with the things of this life, but oh! how far worse to lose those which have to do with the life to come!

"THE QUIVER" HEROES FUND.

The publication of the list of THE QUIVER Heroes in our January number has led to an awakening of interest on the part of our readers in the work of the Fund, and to our receiving particulars of several deserving cases. The first one brought to our notice was that of the Rev. W. R. Oldroyd, Vicar of Haswell, Durham, who, while visiting the village of Sandsend, near Whitby, rescued a youth who was in danger of drowning whilst bathing in a choppy sea. The strong current running at the point made the work of rescue very difficult, and success was only won at the cost of exhaustion to the gallant rescuer of so severe a character as to lead to three months' illness. In this case we had pleasure in awarding the Bronze Medal of THE QUIVER Heroes Fund to Mr. Oldroyd.—The next case brought to our notice was one which occurred at Crackington Haven, Cornwall, on the occasion of the wreck of the Swedish brigantine Welm, on the night of the 29th January last, when two men, Henry James Rogers and William Moyse, in the face of a strong incoming tide and a heavy ground-sea, and despite the fact that it was blowing a gale, scrambled over the rocks and through the water at imminent risk to their lives and saved the mate of the ship. Their danger may be realised from the report that they had to move very quickly to escape the tide which, at the point where the rescue took place, goes quite up to the cliffs. In this case we had the pleasure of sending to the Rev. C. H. Walker, a neighbouring clergyman, a Bronze Medal for each of these gallant men.—The latest case reported to us is that of the conspicuous gallantry displayed by two porters in the employ of the Metropolitan Railway Company at Portland Road Station on the 8th February. A passenger, Charles Trinter, was seen to fall off the platform on to the metals just as a train was approaching, and the two porters, William Morgan and Ernest Maddock, at once jumped on to the line and between them managed to drag Trinter under the narrow projecting edge of the platform just as the train entered the station. The three men were in this position until it was ascertained that, almost by a miracle, they were uninjured, and then the train was slowly backed out and the three men were got on to the platform. In this exceptional case the Silver Medals of the Heroes Fund were awarded to each of the two men, and are to be presented by the General Manager of the company.

"THE TIME IS PAST."

The late Lord Malmesbury, who had been eminent as a politician, was consulted by a friend on a political question. He was now an old man, and in failing health, and his answer was, "Why ask an old man like myself about politics?—the time is past." Those are solemn words—"The time is past." Politics were engrossing, absorbing at the time, but now they were all ended, so far as he was concerned. And very soon for all that we make so much of now the time will have past; all is fleeting—the eternal, the spiritual alone abiding.

WORK AND PRAY.

Some persons misuse prayer, by asking this and that from God without using the means which He has ordained for bringing about that for which they pray. Though perhaps they would not do such a thing wilfully, they are really tempting God. God certainly intends us ordinarily to use the means within our reach, and it is on that use that His blessing comes, and it is on that that it may be sought. There was a girl at school who was rewarded for repeating her lessons well. When she was asked how she accomplished this, she said that she always prayed that she might do so. Her schoolfellow said, "Do you? then I will pray too." But, alas! next morning she could not repeat a single word; whereupon she angrily taxed her schoolfellow with having deceived her. "Perhaps," said her schoolfellow, "you took no pains to learn it."—"Learn it! learn it!" answered she. "I did not learn it at all; I thought I had no occasion to learn it when I prayed that I might say it." God is not the patron of idleness. He can work, no doubt, without means, and in many instances has done so; but in all circumstances of ordinary life, He requires us to use the means which He puts into our hands. Jesus took the five barley loaves and two small fishes which were at hand, and blessed them, and then and there came the grand result. A blessing on the means when there are means—a blessing without the means when there are no means—this is what we may look for in prayer to God.

AN OPIUM DEN.

'LIVES BITTER WITH HARD BONDAGE.'

Night by night in the opium-smokers' dens and divans all around us in Shanghai (writes a missionary correspondent) may be seen by hundreds such victims of the poisonous drug as are depicted in our illustration; day by day do we meet with them in every rank of life—merchants, scholars, domestic servants, riksha coolies—in the miserable condition which follows their fascinating opium trance, dependent on a constant recurrence to their suicidal stimulant for the artificial strength which alone is left them. And in our own missionary compound, this body-and-soul-destroying indulgence is perpetually brought to view. At the large native hospital adjoining our home, not less than 100 cases of attempted self-destruction by opium-swallowing have been treated during the past year, of which thirty have ended fatally. While in a class of native Christian students, whom my husband is training for mission work, one of the most promising has within the last few days succumbed to the opium craving which had seemed, before his admission to the Church, thoroughly subdued.

PRIDE AND HAPPINESS.

It is astonishing in what small and ridiculous things pride comes in to destroy human happiness; but this is found to be the case continually, and all the world over. We met the other day with a curious instance of it. In an account of some of the districts of France it said what great store was set by household linen—the people going so far as to ornament the front of their houses with it. A lady who took a great interest in a young girl found her one day very sad, and on asking the reason why, was told that it was because she wanted to marry a certain Pierre, and that her family refused their consent. There was nothing whatever to say against the young man and his family; "but," said the young girl, "my father is proud, and Pierre's family is not of our circle." The lady expressed her astonishment, which the girl proceeded to enlighten, by saying, "Why, you see, madam, Pierre's family have cotton sheets." Truly pride shows itself in many ways—in small things as well as great—in ridiculous things as well as in those of real consequence. And many a time it forms a ridiculous obstacle to real happiness, and peace.

A CHANGED MIND AND A CHANGED HEART.

There was an awful man, who went by the name of "The Devil." He was called "The Devil," because he had two cloven feet, and was a fearful blasphemer, and awfully wicked. The devil is popularly represented with cloven feet, hence partly the man's name. He owned himself that from the age of twenty to that of seventy, "he was the biggest drunkard, the greatest blackguard, and the most filthy, foul-mouthed man that could be met with." His wife's face had gashes on it as long as the man's knuckles could make them, and her arms were just the same as her face. As a City Missionary was going to his meeting, he saw this man, with broken hat and in a generally dilapidated state, leaning against a railing. The missionary asked him to come to his meeting, but he only laughed at him. However, the missionary still urged him; and at last he said he would go with the missionary under certain conditions. He wanted to get rid of the missionary, so he said, "I'll tell you what: if you will walk arm-in-arm up the street with me, I will go with you." The missionary said at once, "I'm your man; come on." So he took him by the arm, and with some difficulty, owing to his maimed feet, got him along. The man came out of that meeting with tears in his eyes. For ten years from that night he never touched a drop of drink. He went home to his wife and he said, "Mary, I have changed my mind; I am going to be a new man." This, by the grace of God's Spirit, he became; and instead of going in the early morning to the gin-shop, used to get a halfpenny-worth of coffee and a halfpenny-worth of bread and butter at a coffee-stall, and there stand and preach Christ to the workmen who were having their early refreshment. It was the willingness of the missionary to come into close contact with this poor sinner that was the means of saving him. He followed his Master, who of old let a woman who was a sinner touch Him.

BOOKS, NEW AND OLD.

Twenty years have passed since the first edition of Archdeacon Farrar's "Life of Christ" was issued by Messrs. Cassell, and during all that time it has been the companion and assistant of a countless army of teachers and preachers. At the request of the publishers, the author has now revised the work, and in its new form it is issued in a single handy volume, of a size which makes the book eminently serviceable. Many readers who have copies of earlier editions must find them the worse for wear, and be glad to procure the latest form of this indispensable work. And for all who have not got it there is now an admirable opportunity of acquiring it.—From Mr. Elliot Stock we have received "The Psalms at Work," a series of practical notes on the English Psalter, accompanying the text of the Psalms. The notes, short and pointed, are from the pen of the Rev. C. L. Marson, of St. Mary's, Soho. And from the same publisher we have received a small collection of "Hymns Supplemental to Existing Collections," edited by that ardent lover of hymnology, the Rev. W. Garrett Horder, with excellent taste and feeling.—From the office of Home Words comes a sympathetic memorial sketch of our friend the late Prebendary Gordon Calthrop, under the title of "Found Faithful;" and, uniform with it, a second edition of a series of lectures at St. Paul's Cathedral by the late Prebendary, which many of his friends among the readers of THE QUIVER will welcome.—What a change has come over the teaching of English history in recent years since we departed from the bald catalogue of dates and reigns which used to be our staple fare at school! Messrs. Longman send us one of their "Ship" Historical Readers, by Mr. S. R. Gardiner, and devoted to "The Stuart Period." They send us, further, four of their excellent "Stories for Girls," attractive in appearance, reasonable in price, and which all in search of present or prize for a girl-friend should see. From Messrs. Morgan and Scott we have to acknowledge the receipt of the second volume of "The Story of the China Inland Mission."

THE BROADS.

During a visit to Norfolk we spent a fortnight amongst them, and never shall we forget the quaint beauty of those tranquil lakes. There are no banks or rocks, but flatness as far as the eye can reach. Were we in Holland, or in the Sunderbunds of India? It was certainly a great contrast to the busy world we had just quitted. These broad solitudes of smooth water made us think of the lines—

"The calm retreat, the silent shade,
With prayer and praise agree,
And seem by Thy sweet bounty made
For those who follow Thee."

THE BROKEN GLASS: A PARABLE.

Outside a cathedral lay a heap of broken coloured glass. All the hues of the rainbow were represented among the pieces, and the passers-by remarked how untidily the place was kept that such rubbish should so long have been permitted to litter the ground. The Dean at last heard these rumours of discontent, and ordered that the heap should be cleared and thrown away. But before the order could be carried out many went by, and nearly all had somewhat to say. A little girl picked up a scrap and said: "Mother, how nice this will look in my doll's house!" A man of science came and selected a few oddments to illustrate the laws of symmetrical reflection in a kaleidoscope. A painter of sign-boards took a strip whereon he might mix his pigments. A carpenter chose a piece with a smooth edge to scrape off the roughness of a plank. Yet, whilst some thus found a use for the fragments, the majority who passed concurred in calling it a pile of rubbish. At last an artist came along, and saw in those shattered coloured pieces possibilities of beauty that had escaped all other eyes. He set to work, and soon there grew beneath his hand the picture of a saint, and his creative restoration lives to-day in a window of the church. Moral.—That which is outcast may still be capable of redemption.

"THE QUIVER" FUNDS.

FOR THOSE WHO SUFFER.

I WANT to-day to speak to those who are great sufferers, whose trials are acute, or multiplied, or indefinitely prolonged.

Very often there is scarcely breathing-time between troubles that come one after the other, like waves beating down a struggling swimmer. Or there are repeated attacks of physical agony, almost unendurable, which cast long dark shadows behind as well as before them. Or there is lifelong affliction and incapacity—bereavement, disappointment, loss. There may be overwhelming unmerited disgrace, or the bitter grief caused by the sins of those near and dear. Nights of wakefulness and tears; days of darkness and distress; waters of a full cup wrung out for the breaking hearts, the racked frames, the shrinking souls of God's dear children! Troubles such as these make life at times a burden hard to be borne; they rob it seemingly of its usefulness, certainly of all that made it bright.

"Lord, save me from this hour!" is our cry; but deliverance does not come, and the cry dies into a faint echo of that wail from the cross, "My God, why hast Thou forsaken me?"

Sometimes the faithless soul is ready to despair—ready to believe that God has forgotten to be gracious.

Is it not true that when we ask for great gifts and graces, we generally expect them to be bestowed in some mysterious, but quite painless, way? We ask to be made holy in body and soul, to love Jesus as well as ever any of His saints loved Him, to be greatly used by Him in bringing others to the cross, and we expect that somehow or other the desired grace will increase within us, while our enjoyment of lesser gifts—love, health, reputation, and the like—will still remain, or even be increased also.

We forget that it is enough for the disciple to be as His Lord, and that He was "perfect through sufferings."

If we will be very near His heart, we must be prepared to feel something of the pang which broke that heart.

Shall we, then, choose to be contented with a lower degree of grace, if haply more of earthly happiness may be ours? Content with less pain and less nearness to our Lord? A lighter cross here, a paler crown there? Surely not; oh, surely not!

Let us covet earnestly the best gifts. Let us unceasingly plead for them. Only let us also be ready to take up the cross, and, if need be, to die upon it.

Is it not a blessed privilege to be permitted to drink of His cup? to be baptised with His baptism?

Ah! the angels would count it blessed. And would not love choose always to share the sufferings of the Beloved One, even more than His bliss?

For a little while the agony, for endless ages the joy! For a few years the cloud, for all eternity the light, the sunshine of His Presence!

Oh, there shall be sweetest comfort, special comfort, for the sufferers!

Of the holy virgins, so strong and blessed, who did so much for God, it is said that "They follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth." Of those blood-washed souls who came out of great tribulation it is said, "The Lamb . . . shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."

Will it not be well worth shedding the bitterest tears to have them thus wiped away?

Watch with your dear Lord, then, in Gethsemane for the one hour of this life; weep with Him, agonise with Him; the angel of His Presence is at hand to strengthen you.

Carry the cross with Him along the Way of Sorrows; He will bear the heaviest end of it.

Wear with Him your glorious crown of thorns; you shall rest your aching head upon His breast very soon in the green pastures of perfect peace, beside the still waters of His most sweet, most blessed consolations.

"Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life."

A GOOD-FOR-NOTHING COUSIN.

BY MARGARET S. FAILL.

CHAPTER I.

THE PICNIC.

THINK this portrait is the best thing you have done yet, Lewis," and the speaker took a few steps backward, still critically examining the canvas on the easel.

"What's that?" asked the other occupant of the studio.

"The portrait of Miss Douglas. I suppose it's finished now!"

"Yes—almost," the artist admitted, somewhat reluctantly, as he strolled over to the spot where his friend stood beside the work in question.

It was the picture of a pretty girl, with dark eyes and brown wavy hair—not a beautiful face, certainly, but there was something interesting about it, which attracted the attention and made one feel it was a lifelike portrait. The eyes which looked out from the canvas and met those of the beholder had an expression at once arch and soft, while the lips left one in some uncertainty as to whether they were actually smiling or not.

The two men contemplated the painting for a few minutes in silence, both looking at it meditatively. The artist was short and inclined to be stout, with a face bronzed and reddened by exposure to the sun, and beaming with health and good-humour. He looked a man of forty years or more, while his companion must have been about ten years younger. The latter's grave, serious countenance, with a dark moustache, was as great a contrast to the other's jovial one as the thin figure was to the stout.

"I don't know much about art," the younger man remarked at length; "but I do think this is the best thing you have done."

"Well, I'm not quite satisfied with it myself," the artist replied; "but I'm glad you like it, Gordon. I wonder what you would say to a very old one I did, about eighteen years ago!" and he turned and crossed over the polished floor and soft rugs to a distant corner of the long studio, where stood an old carved chest. This he opened, and began rummaging amongst its contents of shabby portfolios and dilapidated sketch-books, until he came upon the object of his search. It was a sheet of coarse paper, on which was a rough little water-colour drawing. He placed it, with a smile, on the easel above the large canvas, before which the other man still stood. "What do you think of it?" he asked. "Do you recognise the same person in each of these?" and he pointed to the two very different works of art.

The water-colour was an unfinished and somewhat crude little sketch of two children seated on a hill. One child had a sun-bonnet dangling down her back, while the other held one in her hand; but this, as far as one could distinguish, was positively the only difference between them. They were pretty little girls in white frocks, with chubby smiling faces, and dark curls falling over their shoulders.

"But which is Miss Douglas?" Gordon asked, when he had studied the little picture for a few minutes.

"Well, they're both Miss Douglasses, of course," the artist returned, laughing. "It's an old thing I did of the twins, and of which I was uncommonly proud at the time. This is Miss Ruth," and he indicated the child who wore the sun-bonnet hanging from her neck.

"The twins?" Gordon repeated in a tone of surprise.

"Has Miss Douglas a twin sister? I never knew that. I did not see her when I stayed there a fortnight ago; and they never mentioned her, either."

"She lives in England, with an aunt," his friend replied; but he offered no further explanation, nor did he comment on the fact that the family never mentioned the absentee.

"She was the original of the picture."—p. 484.

Gordon's curiosity was piqued at this silence; but as no more information seemed forthcoming, he did not choose to make any direct inquiry. He could not resist, however, making an indirect attempt to learn something more.

"Those two children seem wonderfully alike," he remarked. "Are they so still?"

"I don't know," the elder man replied, shaking his head. "Miss Ruth is the only one I have seen since they were five years old."

He picked up his sketch as he spoke, and replaced it again in the old portfolio, as if to put an end to the subject. "Suppose we go out?" he suggested. "I wish to make a note of a little bit before the shadows lengthen, and the sun should be about right just now."

He pulled aside a thick curtain and looked out, letting in a perfect stream of light, which shone on picture-frames and china plates which adorned the wall, and threw up the rich subdued tones of the draperies, and made some quaint Bohemian glass vases glitter and sparkle till they looked like flashing gems of every colour in the rainbow. He dropped the curtain as if satisfied with his survey; and slipping a few sketching materials into his pocket, he stepped out through a half-open door on to a balcony, where his friend joined him. Outside, a glorious August sun was blazing, almost dazzling the eyes of the two men, after the dimness of the studio. A flight of wooden steps, hanging with creeping plants, led from the balcony down to a cool shady garden, at the bottom of which rippled a loch, with trees growing quite to the water's edge. The two men passed through the garden, out on to a road bordered on one side with high heathery hills, and on the other by the shining blue waters of the loch. They made their way slowly along till they reached a village, consisting of one street with a row of thatched cottages, and a pier at the bottom. A little further off a church spire was seen nestling among the trees. Down on the shore, near the pier, they espied what was evidently a family party gathered round a small boat. An elderly lady and a little girl were already seated in the boat, while a boy was busily handing-in baskets, and a young man stood by, giving directions.

The little girl caught sight of the new-comers as they drew near, and called out: "Oh, here are Mr. Matthew and Mr. Gordon."

"Well, is this a pic-nic party?" the former of these gentlemen demanded gaily, when he reached speaking distance.

"Hulloa, Lance! you've had a good load if you carried that basket all the way."

"You bet I did," the boy responded, with a grin; "but it'll be a jolly sight lighter to carry up the hill again."

"We are going for a gipsy tea to one of the islands," the young man explained, as if he were half ashamed of the project, while all the party shook hands. "If you two fellows care to join us," he added, "I'm sure my aunt would be glad;" and he looked toward the lady in the boat.

"Oh, yes," said the person thus appealed to, "just step in; there is plenty of room, and the more the merrier. We're waiting for Ruth," she added plaintively.

"Of course!" interpolated an unmistakable elder-brotherly voice.

But just at this moment a figure was seen emerging from the nearest cottage—a tall slim girl in a pink blouse. She stepped along lightly over the stones with a free graceful carriage and without any undue hurry, although she saw the group waiting for her. It was clear at the first glance that she was the original of the picture in the studio, although at present there was considerably less of the soft look than one might have expected after seeing the painting, and more of a quick brightness about her eyes, as her glance rapidly took in the new-comers. She bowed, with a half-surprised look, to Gordon, who stood nearest; but she made no movement to shake hands, as hers were full. The artist, however, was not content with a bow. He went over to meet her, and relieving her of some cups which she carried, proceeded to shake hands very warmly, while he laughingly asked what she had been doing.

"Borrowing those cups," the girl said, with a frank smile. "It was too far to bring our own."

"Oh, Ruth!" interrupted the little girl, "you'll have to get two cups more; for Mr. Matthew and Mr. Gordon are coming with us."

Gordon waited to hear his friend refuse, as he had come out ostensibly to do some work; but the sketching materials remained innocently in the depths of the artist's coat pocket, and were never mentioned. Instead, their owner expressed the utmost willingness to join the party, and offered to accompany Miss Douglas back to the cottage to borrow the two extra cups. For a moment it struck Gordon that the young lady did not look particularly delighted at this promised addition to their numbers; but whatever the momentary look had been, it was gone instantly, and she was smiling quite pleasantly as she turned to retrace her steps, escorted by the artist. When they returned they were laughing gaily, the gentleman carrying a couple of solid-looking mugs.

"I hope you can drink tea out of a mug, Mr. Gordon?" the girl said, as she stepped into the boat. This was the first remark she had addressed to him, the young man noticed. But she did not give him time to reply.

"I am going to row," she announced, preparing to sit down.

"Nonsense!" interposed her brother. "Lewis, I suppose you'll take one oar? I'll take the other."

Except for raising her eyebrows slightly, the young lady made no further protest; but the younger brother burst out laughing, as if greatly amused.

"Here, Lance! stop that fooling, and get in, can't you?" and the speaker whisked round angrily, seizing an oar and pushing off with a suddenness which left Lance barely time to scramble on board, and threw Ruth and Mr. Gordon, who were still standing, against one another. Ruth made an involuntary clutch at her companion as the boat lurched, while the lady and little girl both screamed. The boat, however, righted itself, and the girl quickly subsided on to a seat, blushing a little, but casting a somewhat resentful look at the unoffending Gordon, as if he were to blame for the catastrophe.

"It's all right now, Aunt Lennox," she said reassurdanger lay, not in anyone's losing their presence of mind, but in one particular person's loss of temper; but if this reflection struck anyone, it was not uttered aloud.

In spite of the inauspicious start, the little party

"She almost despaired of ever reaching the shore again."--p. 437.

ingly to the agitated lady, who still grasped the sides of the boat; "only Jack is rather too quick for us."

"Mercy on us!" ejaculated Mrs. Lennox. "We'll all be drowned before we get to the island if you don't keep still, Ruth. Let Katie and me out before we go to the bottom."

"Pooh, nonsense!" said the real culprit, whom nobody seemed inclined to blame, and who dismissed this pathetic appeal in an offhand manner. "The water is as smooth as glass; and nothing will happen if you don't lose your heads."

It might have occurred to an onlooker that the real reached the island, and disembarked without any more difficulty. They spread their cloth on the grass under the trees, and everybody set about to help—nearly everybody, that is. The two young men fastened the boat, and then stood talking together, until Katie called to them that tea was ready. Ruth presided over the teapot, and when she had supplied her aunt, she turned to Gordon, and smilingly held out one of the mugs to him.

"Very appropriate, isn't it?" she murmured; and Gordon could not understand why all the others laughed, until he set down his steaming beverage, and discovered the legend printed in large gilt letters on the outside of the mug: "A Present for a Good Boy." The recipient of this charming gift did not join in the laugh with the others; neither did he look annoyed.

"Why do you think it appropriate, Miss Douglas?" he asked quite gravely, looking straight at the young lady.

"Oh, because I am sure you always were a good boy," she retorted, throwing him a saucy glance in return for his steady one; but, as she confided afterwards to the artist, she resolved to try no more jokes with Mr. Gordon. He was far too solemn, she declared, and had not the slightest sense of humour; and certainly jokes do fall rather flat with a person who persists in looking perfectly serious, and who does not think it necessary to call up the most fleeting of polite smiles. If the man only had looked angry at being made fun of, Ruth would have been much better pleased. But no; he looked completely unmoved, and sipped his tea with the utmost composure and indifference.

Perhaps the picnic was no great success; and although it looked an inviting enough little group seated under the trees, it is doubtful if anyone found it thoroughly enjoyable. Jack was cross, and Gordon, who was the greatest stranger, contributed absolutely nothing to the general entertainment. Ruth was thankful when the repast was over, and the company separated and strolled about the island. They had not done so for long, however, when Jack's voice, shouting, recalled them again. They would have to leave immediately, he said, or they would be caught in a squall before reaching the mainland. Indeed, the sky, which in the afternoon had been so bright, had already clouded over, and a considerable breeze had sprung up. Everyone was quite ready, when they discovered those signs, to be off as quickly as possible; but as they were stepping into the boat it was found that Lance was missing. They shouted several times, but without any result. What was to be done? The island was large; to have searched all over it would have lost endless time; and the sky became every moment more threatening. It was really provoking. What could have become of him? At last, it suddenly struck Gordon to mention that he had seen a sailing-boat come round the corner of the island about half an hour ago, and a boy in it had called out and waved his cap.

"Of course that would be Lance!" exclaimed Jack impatiently. "It is just like him to go off like that; and he knows every boatman in the place."

This solution was hailed joyfully by everybody except Ruth, who felt doubtful if Lance would really leave without saying a word to anybody. However, her objections were overruled, as the others were eager to start. It was a pretty stiff pull to reach land again, although no accident befell the boat in its crossing. Mrs. Lennox, who was terribly frightened, insisted on being put ashore at the nearest point, which was some distance from the pier where they had started. Her two nieces got out with her, while the three men, with their now lightened load, agreed to take the boat round to its destination.

As the pedestrians trudged slowly uphill on their long homeward walk, one at least felt that the day had been rather a failure, and was glad that it was so early at an end. But had she only known, she need not have congratulated herself so soon, as the events of the day were by no means over.

CHAPTER II.

A NIGHT EXPEDITION.

QUITE late that same evening the artist, seated alone in his studio, was startled by hearing a vigorous knocking at the door which led out to the balcony. The sound had been going on for some minutes before he was aware of it, but the howling of the wind and the lashing of the rain, which was coming down in torrents, at first prevented him from hearing anything else. He jumped up, with the book he had been reading still in his hand, and went quickly to the door.

"Miss Ruth!" he exclaimed in the utmost astonishment, as he beheld a dripping waterproofed figure on the threshold. "Are you alone?" and he tried vainly to peer into the darkness behind her.

"Yes, quite alone," the girl returned rapidly. "Is Jack here?"

"Jack? No; he left more than an hour ago;" and a sudden gust of wind, stronger than any preceding one, would have blown out the lamp, had not Mr. Lewis drawn his unexpected visitor into the room and shut the door.

He looked inquiringly at her with some concern, for it was past eleven o'clock, and the Douglasses lived a good three miles away, at the head of a lonely glen, so it must have been something serious to bring the young lady out alone on such a night. But before he could ask what had happened, she burst out quickly—

"Mr. Matthew, we have left Lance on the island."

"What!" he cried in consternation; "and on a night like this!"

"Yes; isn't it dreadful? We expected to see him come home every minute, until it got dark, and then I waited for Jack; and at last I started off to meet him. I thought he was never coming, and the longer I waited the more time we were losing—for of course we must row out again for Lance."

"Yes, of course," assented the artist; "but I wonder how you missed Jack? He was here until ten o'clock, and meant to go straight home, up the glen."

"Perhaps he took some short cuts," suggested the girl; "but we mustn't wait any more for him. I know you'll help me, Mr. Matthew."

"Oh, assuredly! but you don't think of going yourself, Miss Ruth? Wait till I fetch Gordon; he and I could easily take the boat over. It isn't fit for you to be out in such a storm."

Ruth would have preferred to do without the other gentleman's assistance, but she did not see how she could very well object; and Mr. Lewis was already opening the door which communicated with the house.

Left alone in the studio, it all at once struck the girl that in some people's eyes her presence here might look rather singular. In her hurried journey down—when, truth to tell, she had been horribly frightened at the darkness and storm—her mind had been too full of fears of one sort and another to have any qualms about the proprieties; and then she had expected to find her elder brother. Now that she stood in the lighted apartment, and had leisure for reflection, she began to wish she had gone to the front door and rung the bell, and seen the ladies of the house; or waited a little longer for her brother; or, indeed, done anything rather than be found here, a dripping, dishevelled object, coming in by a private entrance after eleven o'clock at night.

The Lewises were such old friends, and knew her so well: it was not of them she thought, but of Mr. Gordon. She could imagine his look of calm wonder when he beheld her—not as if he were really surprised, but as if he were saying, "What an extraordinary young person! Whatever will she do next?" She thought she would step over to a mirror to see if she looked quite as bad as she felt; but when she discovered what a pool of water she had already made on the polished floor from her dripping umbrella and macintosh, she refrained from carrying her traces further. The artist returned almost immediately, but, to her relief, he was alone.

"Gordon must have turned in," he said, "and the wind is whistling so loudly I couldn't make him hear without disturbing my sisters. Mary has had a sick-headache all day, and they both retired early, so I should be sorry to alarm them by any more noise. I think I could manage the boat alone. Do you mind waiting here by yourself? Jack is sure to return very soon, and he will keep you company until I bring Lance back."

"No, no, Mr. Matthew!" Ruth cried eagerly; "you couldn't possibly take the boat across alone. I must go too. You know I can row as strongly as lots of men; and two people are better than one. We can take an oar each. Don't let us wait any longer for Jack; there's no knowing when he may be back, and poor Lance will be catching his death of cold."

However unwilling Mr. Lewis might be to let the young lady brave the elements, there was so much truth in what she said that there seemed no help for it; so he was reluctantly obliged to agree.

Accordingly they sallied out into the storm, as well equipped as possible, and carrying an extra coat and rug. At the bottom of the garden they found the little boat belonging to the house. There was no difficulty in starting, as the bit of the loch which bordered the garden formed a tiny bay, and was comparatively calm. The rain had abated slightly, and now and then the moon gleamed fitfully through the drifting clouds; but the wind seemed to rush down from the glens in furious gusts, and with undiminished force.

Ruth had said truly that she was a good rower, but certainly never before had her powers been put to so severe a test. Once they were fairly out of shelter of the land, she almost despaired of ever reaching the shore again. Still, she clung desperately to her oar with blistering hands, while every now and then the waves broke over the boat. She was only sustained by the sight of the comfortingly solid-looking figure before her, steadily working away.

"Five minutes more should take us in now," said a reassuring voice from the artist, as he glanced over his shoulder, just as Ruth had begun to think that the next wave must certainly swamp them. The matter-of-fact tone restored her courage in a moment, and she asked herself if she had not perhaps exaggerated the terrors of the crossing. The worst of it was over by this time, although it took fully ten minutes before they slowly ploughed their way under the dark shadows of the trees. Their landing-place was a narrow opening, and everything around being shrouded in deepest gloom, it was a difficult matter to guide their boat aright, when all at once the sound of Lance's familiar voice struck joyfully on their ears—

"Hi! hi! this way!" And as they answered the cry with a couple of strong strokes, the keel grated on the stones, and the two exhausted voyagers felt the bow of their boat seized and drawn on shore. Ruth sprang up instantly.

"I'm so thankful to see you!" she was beginning, although it was almost pitch dark, and impossible to see anything against the dark background of trees, when it struck her that the firm hand which was assisting her to land was much too strong, and came from too great a height to belong to her brother Lance.

"And I am more delighted to see you," said a strange voice, laughing pleasantly, which made the girl pause in some bewilderment; for surely she had recognised the first guiding shout! But she was not long left in doubt.

"I say, Ruth, you were a precious long time in coming to look for a fellow!" said another voice, the tones of which were unmistakable; and Lance himself stepped forth from the dark shadows into a patch of comparative light which the half-obscured moon was endeavouring to shed.

"Hullo! there are two of you!" exclaimed Mr. Lewis, as he jumped on shore.

"Yes; companions in misfortune," replied the stranger's voice quite cheerfully; and the figure of a tall young man with a fair moustache was dimly discernible as he moved farther into the light.

Ruth was agreeably impressed with the pleasant voice of the speaker, although she could not see his face; but he was going on easily: "You've no idea what an inspiring sight your boat was, coming across. I call it an uncommonly plucky thing to come out in such a storm;" and he looked at Ruth, who was the most plainly visible of the party, standing with cheeks flushed by her exertions, and hair in the utmost disorder, curling and waving from under her hat.

"It was a pretty hard pull," the artist made answer; "but the tide will be with us going back. How did you come to get left behind?" and he turned to Lance. "We thought you had gone off in a sailing-boat."

"Well, I hadn't," said the boy. "What made you think that? I was over the hill, at the other side; and when I got back I found you had all gone."

"I'm afraid I was to blame for that," interposed the stranger. "If it hadn't been for helping me, you would have been all right. You see"—and he turned explanatorily to the other two—"I came from the other side of the loch, and when I was more than half-way to this island I found my boat was leaking so dreadfully that it was all I could do to get over at all. I was delighted to find somebody who could assist me; but after we had hammered away at the wretched thing for half an hour, it only made it worse, and it filled with water the moment I tried to get into it. So we gave it up at last, and came round to this side, but only to find the place deserted."

"That was hard lines, certainly," said Mr. Lewis sympathetically; "and no doubt you are thoroughly wet by this time?"

"Oh, wet!" and the young man laughed. "That's nothing. One expects a few wettings in the Highlands; and we were pretty well sheltered by this rock and the trees. I thought myself in luck to fall in with a companion who expected a rescue sooner or later."

It was wonderfully comforting to find the east-aways so cheerful, for Ruth had had dreadful visions of a lonely miserable figure, half-dead with cold and fear, hiding in some remote corner of the island; and instead, here were two people, quite bright, who appeared to have had rather a good time than otherwise.

"Well, the sooner we start the better," said the artist. "I suppose you won't object to passing the night on the wrong side of the loch?"

"Oh! I'll be delighted to find dry quarters anywhere," the young man declared; adding frankly: "And something to eat; for, to tell the truth, I'm ravenous, as I had no dinner, and only an early luncheon on the moors."

In the face of this, it seemed wonderful that he could be so good-humoured; but his manner as he helped Ruth into the boat was as gay and pleasant as if he had never heard of the sensation of hunger.

"I think I ought to take both oars and work my passage across," he suggested, as the others got in.

"Oh no!" said Ruth, smiling; "that isn't necessary. I think Lance should row too; it will warm him."

This, Lance declared, was what he wished to do; and Mr. Matthew remarked that they would find it hard enough work for two.

"But now that the rain has ceased," he added, "and the tide is with you, it won't be so bad as Miss Douglas and I had it."

At these casual words, the young man, who had been looking somewhat attentively at Ruth, now leant forward eagerly.

"Douglas!" he exclaimed. "I thought so. Why, we're cousins!"

"Cousins?" Ruth repeated, in the utmost astonishment. "But I don't see how that can be. I don't think we have any cousins."

"Well, not first-cousins exactly, but still relations," the young man insisted. "Surely it is your sister who lives with old Aunt Douglas down in Surrey?"

"Yes;" but there was a slight restraint in her tone as she spoke.

"Ah! I was sure I recognised a resemblance," he declared triumphantly. "I am Archie Douglas"— but seeing no answering look of recognition in the girl's face at this announcement, he went on quickly—"one of the Douglasses from Surrey. You must have heard Aunt Douglas talk about our family?"

Ruth shook her head.

"I have never seen Miss Douglas at all," she said, "nor," she added, with something of an effort, "my sister either, since we were children. But all the same," and she smiled pleasantly, "I am very glad to find a new cousin."

She spoke with perfect truth as she looked at the handsome figure in the grey tweed shooting-suit opposite her.

"Glad!" he cried gaily, "are you? I know I never was so glad before to see a cousin as I was to see you to-night—although you never even heard of me."

"You see," Ruth said apologetically, "there was no one to tell us about our relations, as we have no mother, and our father is abroad. But what is the real relationship?"

"Let me see"—and he knitted his brows in thought for a moment—"Miss Douglas is your father's aunt, and my father's second or third cousin. Well, never mind; we needn't go into it. I am your cousin Archie, and you are my cousin Ruth, and—" he looked inquiringly at the artist, who was seated in the stern beside Ruth.

"Oh, Mr. Lewis is not a relation," the girl said, in answer to the look, "only an old friend."

It hardly seemed like the same journey, this return from the island. They scarcely noticed the roughness of the water, so eager were they in talking; and Ruth felt inclined to smile at her former fears and terrors as they pulled into the little bay of Lakeside garden.

Jack was waiting for them on the shore; and to anticipate any probable fault-finding on his part, his sister called out—

"Oh, Jack! we have brought Lance back, and another relation as well."

Young Douglas jumped out lightly, and lifting his hat, advanced towards Jack.

"Perhaps you have heard of our branch of the clan Douglass?" he said easily—"the Hugh Douglasses."

"I think I have," Jack responded, with considerable interest. "We belong originally to the same family, although your people are settled in England."

"Oh, we are cousins, as I was telling your sister," the stranger declared, with conviction; and then, the others having landed, everybody began to pour out an account of their doings. At the end of this, Jack turned again to the new-comer, and said—

"Then, of course, you must come home with us; and we ought to start at once, for my aunt will be very anxious until we return."

CHAPTER III.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS.

NEXT morning the family at the head of the glen had sufficient leisure and daylight in which to study their new-found relative. He was an exceedingly handsome young man, tall and straight, with fair curly hair, and bright merry blue eyes. His manners were so frank and easy that by the end of breakfast the whole family felt quite at home with him. He seemed to possess the gayest of spirits, and had a most infectious ringing laugh, in which it was almost impossible not to join. Everybody, from Mrs. Lennox down to little Katie, was agreeably impressed by his good looks and attractive ways.

"The whole family felt quite at home with him."

"I expect," he was saying tranquilly, "that Webster and the other fellows will be dragging the loch or sending out a search party over the hills by this time—that is," he added carelessly, "if they have missed me yet."

"Were you staying over at Major Webster's shooting-lodge?" Jack asked.

"Yes; but I didn't go out with the others yesterday afternoon. I saw the old boat lying on the shore, and thought I'd try it: so unless they notice its absence, they won't know how I left the place."

"I am sure your friends must be in dreadful anxiety," remarked Mrs. Lennox. "Last night, when Lance didn't come home, I was in a perfect fever about him; and when Ruth rushed off alone, I felt quite ill with fear of what would happen."

"It was an uncommonly plucky thing for my cousin to do," said the young man, paying attention to only one part of the lady's speech, and forgetting to condole with her on her past fears, as he looked admiringly over at the girl on the other side of the table. "It's a pity we can't give you the Victoria Cross for bravery, cousin Ruth."

Ruth laughed, and blushed a little.

"Oh, I wasn't brave," she declared; "I was dreadfully frightened."

"Then you had all the more credit in doing it," he promptly protested. "I think," he went on, after a pause, "I had better relieve Webster's mind as soon as possible. How often do the steamers run to-day?"

"To-day?" Mrs. Lennox cried. "You weren't thinking of travelling on the Sabbath Day, surely?"

The expression at the corners of the young man's mouth seemed to betray that such had been his wicked intention, when Lance interposed bluntly—

"He can't. The steamer doesn't run to-day."

"Well, that settles it. I don't think Webster's hair will turn grey with anxiety; so if you don't mind keeping an uninvited guest for another twenty-four hours——"

But he was quickly interrupted by protestations that the longer he could stay the more his relatives would be delighted. The visitor accepted those assurances with great willingness, and declared that, for his part, he considered it a most lucky accident which had led him to the disabled boat the previous day; so the breakfast ended with satisfaction all round.

In the afternoon, while they were all seated in the little garden, the artist and Mr. Gordon made their appearance. Ruth wondered if the latter gentleman felt vexed at having been asleep during all last night's excitement, for he seemed graver and more immovable than ever. Perhaps, though, it was only in contrast to the gaiety and liveliness of the young stranger that his manner appeared noticeably silent.

Mr. Lewis announced that there had been a man in the village this morning making anxious inquiries about a Captain Douglas, as the small boat had been missed and traced to the island; but that he had been able to solve the mystery, and explain to the man that the gentleman he sought was all right, and staying with relations. He had also taken the liberty of sending the messenger back, as he had come in a sailing-boat, and the tide was favourable. "And," he added, "I presumed you would be in no great hurry to leave your cousins."

"Indeed I am not," young Douglas declared heartily. "The fact is, we shall all be sorry when Monday comes and I must go."

There was a general laugh at this; and then Ruth betook herself into the house, in search of a parasol, she said. She felt a little curious to know what impression the new-comer would make on the other two men, and she would have preferred to remain in the garden; but the advent of the unexpected guest had caused a good deal of commotion in domestic affairs, and she was aware that her presence in the house was necessary. It was some considerable time before she felt at liberty to join the others again; but when she reached the door-step she stood still, watching the group before her, while a half-derisive smile curled her lips for a moment.

There seemed no doubt about the impression Archie Douglas was creating. He had thrown himself in a carelessly graceful attitude on the grass, while round him were clustered the whole party. From his gestures, he seemed to be talking with great animation. Ruth could hear the murmur of his voice, but not the words. Apparently, however, what he was saying was deeply interesting, judging from the faces of his listeners; and occasionally a wave of merriment would pass round, and a burst of laughter seem to testify to the general enjoyment. Mrs. Lennox was seated in a garden-chair, and Gordon stood leaning with his back against a tree, while the others, in various attitudes, were gathered as close as possible to the speaker; but one and all appeared to hang on his words as they dropped from his lips.

Ruth stood looking at the little scene for a few minutes, and then strolled out slowly; but she did not go over and join the group.

"I needn't add to the admirers," she said to herself, somewhat disdainfully. But Archie's quick eye caught sight of her as she passed.

"Why don't you come over here, cousin Ruth?" he called invitingly. "We have been missing you."

"Have you?" Ruth said, shrugging her shoulders slightly. "I thought perhaps a larger audience might embarrass you."

The young man cast an amused glance round the circle, and then burst out laughing. He jumped up, and went over to where Ruth stood.

"That's one for me, isn't it?" he said, looking into her grave face with such an irresistibly comic expression that, in spite of herself, her lips relaxed into a half-smile.

"You seemed to be telling a very interesting story," she said, ignoring his remark, and still determinedly keeping up an indifferent air. "I suppose it was about a very interesting person?"

"About myself, do you mean?" he demanded, with disconcerting quickness, which made Ruth blush, as that had been her meaning.

"Well, I wasn't talking about myself," he went on, enjoying her momentary confusion, and with such a mischievous gleam of fun in his blue eyes that Ruth, meeting his glance, gave in on the spot, and abandoned all further idea of snubbing him. What was the use? It was enough to make anybody conceited to have a whole party so admiring and so attentive to one's every word; but, after all, it was almost impossible to help joining in the popular feeling. There was a charm about this young man, with his good looks, his brightness, his good-humour, and perfect confidence to please, which made his society most agreeable, Ruth was fain to confess; so when a walk was proposed, she found herself hoping he might fall to her lot as companion. Unfortunately, however, the same idea seemed to occur to everybody else. Everybody wished to walk with the hero of the hour; and as Ruth was merely conscious of the wish, but had no idea of doing anything to further it, she found herself likely to be last in the race. Jack and Mr. Matthew planted themselves one on either side of young Douglas, while Gordon brought up the rear; and little Katie, running after, insinuated herself in between the artist and her cousin, grasping hold of the latter's hand. Ruth turned to her brother Lance, who stood somewhat disconsolately looking after the others, as if he too had been disappointed. This was too much for her gravity.

"Run, Lance; you could crush in yet," she said, with a laugh, indicating the group in front, who had just reached the gate; when at that moment Archie turned round and saw them.

"We must wait for cousin Ruth," he said, and, coolly extricating himself from the others, he stepped back to the two loiterers. "Where shall we go, Ruth?" he began; but then discovering her half-suppressed laughter, he asked with great interest: "Why, what's the joke?"

But neither would tell him; and he glanced round vainly at the figure of Mrs. Lennox disappearing into the house, but could find no apparent cause for merriment.

"It's too bad to keep a joke to yourself," he expostulated; but Ruth only shook her head, and declared that it would not bear repetition, and then they joined the others on the road.

It was clearly impossible that seven people could walk abreast, so some division of the party was inevitable. As they ascended the hill, Ruth found Archie by her side, and she thought with some satisfaction that now they might enjoy a tête-à-tête; but almost before this idea had time to form itself in her mind, Gordon, who was a few steps in advance, turned and placed himself by her other side, with the evident intention of remaining there. This made general conversation necessary, and Ruth was rather surprised to find how much Gordon had to say, as she had formerly considered him an extremely silent man. On this occasion, however, he did most of the talking—in fact, after a while he did it entirely. He was just finishing a somewhat long story when it struck Ruth that Archie's voice had been unusually long silent; and turning her head to make some remark, she was greatly astonished to discover that he was gone. The path had become too narrow for three people to walk abreast; and as Gordon was in the midst of speaking, he had naturally walked on with Ruth, neither of them doubting but that the third person was following close behind. But he was not. A long way off they could hear his voice and Lance's, borne up the hill on the clear, still, summer air, in cheerful tones, with occasional laughter. Evidently they were enjoying themselves. Ruth looked back half longingly. To-morrow this new cousin would be gone, and there was a great deal she would have liked to talk about with him. True, Gordon and Jack would also be gone away to town on Monday morning, but she never thought of that. The walk was finished without any further change of partners; and it was not till Ruth was entering the house, after saying "Good-bye" to the artist and his guest, that she had a few words with her cousin.

"Well, I call it too bad of you to neglect me like this," said the young man, in a tone of half-playful reproach, coming up behind her. "I thought you would have walked with me; and instead of that, you go off with that other fellow."

"Oh, how can you say such a thing?" cried Ruth, turning round with a laugh. "You know you deserted us. I was quite surprised when I discovered that you had gone."

"Yes, there it is," he insisted, still reproachfully. "You didn't even know whether I was there or not."

"I was listening to Mr. Gordon at the moment."

"My goodness! You were!" he declared meaningly.

"Well, couldn't you have listened too? I am sure he was expressing himself very well," she added, with a touch of malice.

"But surely you couldn't expect me to listen to another fellow expressing himself well?" he exclaimed, with such a comical look of surprise that Ruth began to laugh.

"Why not?" she asked. "You can't expect always to do the talking yourself."

But the young man took no notice of this thrust.

"It really was too bad of you," he persisted. "You know you neglected me, although you try to justify yourself; and I had ever so much to say to you."

If he had a great deal to say, it seemed that he was to be favoured with a chance of unburdening his mind; for Mrs. Lennox very warmly pressed him to return and pay them a longer visit before he left Scotland. She, like the others, was taken with the young man; but, apart from that, there were a great many questions of family interest which she was desirous of asking, and was only deterred by lack of time. Thus, everybody was pleased when the invitation was accepted—"For a couple of days, on my way home," he said; but even that was something to look forward to.

CHAPTER IV.

ARCHIE DOUGLAS.

It was rather a chilly day in September when Archie Douglas, with a bright face, jumped off the little steamer on to the pier, and shook hands with Lance and Katie, who were waiting there.

"It was awfully good of you to come down to meet me!" he said; but his eyes wandered round, as if in search of someone else.

"There's Ruth, coming along with Mr. Gordon," Katie said, answering the mute inquiry.

"Oh! does he live here?" asked the young man, in a tone of no great delight.

"No," Lance replied; "he lives in town; but he's staying down here just now, at the hotel, for his holidays."

But they had approached one another almost as the boy spoke; and Ruth hurried forward smilingly.

"I am so glad to see you," she said frankly, and her face expressed even more welcome than her words.

Her cousin took her hand and retained it considerably longer than was necessary, while his face betrayed equal satisfaction; and then at last he turned to Gordon.

"How do you do?" he said, pleasantly enough, but somewhat carelessly.

In the bustle which ensued, collecting the visitor's luggage, at which performance everybody assisted, Gordon thought they were all going off without saying "Good-bye" to him. Ruth, however, appeared to recollect his existence in time to shake hands, and Archie lifted his hat before they gaily set off up the hill, all chattering at once.

Gordon, thus left alone, felt rather out in the cold. It was not exactly pleasant to be utterly ignored the moment the all-conquering Captain Douglas made his appearance; and perhaps it was not to be wondered at that, as he looked after the retreating figures, Gordon should mutter to himself—

"They'll spoil that fellow; and he's conceited enough already."

But the four who proceeded up the glen were blissfully unconscious of having given any offence, and, indeed, forgot Gordon entirely before he was well out of sight.

Mrs. Lennox had fully intended gathering a good deal of information from her guest at the earliest possible opportunity; so on the first evening, finding herself alone with him, she quickly availed herself of the chance. With such a very frank young man, she argued, it would be easy to learn all she wanted; but somewhat to her surprise, at the end of the interview she found herself very little wiser. Archie had an easy way of turning the conversation when he pleased, and a habit, very disconcerting to a lady with little sense of humour, of laughing occasionally, with no apparent cause, instead of answering. Added to this, young man said, with a smile. "She looks down on us all."

This did not seem a very satisfactory answer; but Mrs. Lennox tried again.

"And bringing up Rachel away from her family—never seeing her twin sister—I call it downright wrong. She'll think herself far better than any of the others;" but as this leading remark elicited no comment whatever, she asked point-blank: "What is Rachel like? Is she at all good-looking?"

This question seemed to afford Archie some amusement, for he laughed, and repeated—

"At all good-looking! Why, I know someone who there was a certain hauteur visible now and then in his manner, which she had not perceived before, and an indefinable something in his air, which, whether it proceeded only from the elegance of his attire or from some real superiority, she was unable to determine, but was dimly aware that it made him different from the other young men of her acquaintance. However, she proceeded as judiciously as she knew how, first asking with great interest about his family, and then she went on casually—

"And so you know old Miss Douglas? We aren't honoured by her acquaintance. A rich lady like that looks down on poor relations like us, you see."

Mrs. Lennox, although the young people called her aunt, was only their father's cousin, and had therefore less feeling in the matter than if she had been more closely related.

"Oh, Aunt Douglas is the head of the family," the

"It was Archie's turn to flush hotly."—p. 493.

thinks her the prettiest girl in the kingdom;" and this was all Mrs. Lennox could get out of him. She began to think he might not prove so delightful an inmate as she had expected. But his cousins liked him, if possible, better than ever. His "couple of days" lengthened out into a week; and during all the time there did not seem to be one dull minute. Archie was such good company. He was so good-natured, so amusing, and so full of life, that it was no wonder all the young people were charmed with him. Gordon, however, who might be included among the young people, did not appear to share the general feeling, or to appreciate all those good qualities. He often encountered the cousins in their walks, and generally joined them; so he had plenty of opportunity of judging.

On one of these occasions it struck Ruth that their little party was not very harmonious. It was a fine September afternoon, and they had been tramping over the hills until she felt tired.

"I think I'll wait here for you," she said, sitting down on the heather.

"Oh, we'll all rest here," said Gordon promptly, placing himself down beside her. "I think we've walked far enough."

Archie stared at him for a moment with a sort of nonchalant impertinence.

"Pon my word," he began, in a slightly drawling tone, "I feel inclined to rebel. If our commanding officer had not called a halt, I should have preferred to go on. What do you say, Lance?"

"Oh, let's go further," the boy agreed, grinning.

"Very well. If you'll excuse us, Ruth"—and he lifted his hat with the air Mrs. Lennox had found so baffling—"we shall take the liberty of going on."

Ruth felt the greatest inclination to laugh as he strode off with a dignified step, followed by Lance; but as Gordon, except for a slight increase of colour, took no notice, neither did she. They began to talk on other subjects, and were in the midst of quite an interesting conversation when, about twenty minutes later, the other two returned.

"Have we been long, Ruth?" Archie asked, throwing himself down at her feet with a pleasant smile. "Those moors are so glorious, I've been dying to have a shot."

"And so, Miss Douglas," Gordon went on, carefully ignoring the interruption, "we must do our best before you at the tournament."

"What tournament is this?" Archie asked carelessly.

"A military one, in which the volunteers are to take part," Ruth replied, seeing that her companion did not offer to speak.

"Oh, volunteers!" and there was a distinct note of contempt in the young soldier's tone. "Keep well out of the way of the awkward squad, Ruth; they are to be avoided in a crowd."

"I think," said Gordon, in measured accents, but flushing angrily, "that, speaking as one of the 'awkward squad,' I can promise that our public behaviour shall be at least as irreproachable as that of Captain Douglas's regiment—which is perhaps not saying a great deal."

It was Archie's turn to flush hotly; but whatever angry retort he was about to make he checked, as Ruth jumped up quickly, saying—

"Oh dear, how disagreeable we all are! Do let us be moving on; it must be past post time now."

They all set off down the hill, looking somewhat heated; but the young officer soon regained his serenity.

"My telegram ought to be here now," he said, taking out his watch as they approached the post-office. Neither his tone nor his expression betrayed the slightest trace of the recent passage-at-arms. He stepped forward, whistling gaily, and disappeared through the door, while the others sat down on the low wall outside, to wait for him. There they were joined by the artist who was passing through the village. Archie reappeared at the door almost immediately, with a beaming face.

"Congratulate me!" he cried, waving an open telegram. "Our regiment has won the Challenge Shield."

"Ah!" said Mr. Matthew, laughing, "I thought you meant other congratulations; but if you'd gained a fortune, we'd all wish you joy."

"A fortune! no, indeed. I only wish it were," said the young man, still smiling.

"Well, are you not going to read your love-letters?" the elder man asked jokingly.

"Yes, that reminds me;" and Archie turned over the packet he held in his hand, and selecting one, he shoved the others into his pocket. He spoke playfully, as if in answer to the artist's bantering tone; but Ruth noticed, without meaning to look, that the writing was clearly in a feminine hand, and he did not once look up till he had come to the end of the four closely written pages.

THE CHILD AND THE ANGELS.

A PARABLE.

ALL the long day the little one lay
On its mother's breast a-sleeping,
All the lone night by the lamp's muffled light
The mother was praying and weeping.
Night was just o'er, when close by the door
Two angels were watchfully staying
On mission of love from the Father above,
And they heard how the mother was praying.
Said the dark one, "I crave this babe to have To take to my bosom while sleeping."
But the fair one said, "Nay, see the first beam of day:
The little one comes to my keeping."

The grey morning's dawn over forest and lawn
In luminous ether was breaking;
Forth the golden sun broke, and the little babe woke,
And smiled on its mother while waking.
The glad mother felt, as in prayer she knelt,
That her darling to health was returning,
And she knew that the strife between Death and Life
Was past, as night passes to morning.
Then the fair angel smiled, and said, "Now the child Unto me, O my brother, is given.
The dark angel Death, to the Life angel saith,
"Be it so."—And they went back to heaven.

JOHN FRANCIS WALLER.

THE BOOK OF RUTH.—III.

BY THE RIGHT REV. W. BOYD CARPENTER, D.D., LORD BISHOP OF RIPON.

VIEW which poverty takes of the world, and the view which wealth takes of it, are essentially different. To the poor man the world seems hard; everything is against him; his life is one perpetual struggle. He sees in every quarter the signs of abundance, while his hands can grasp but little; even the necessary things of life are won with difficulty, and he is tempted to look enviously on the luxuries which seem to come so easily to others. To such an one life appears hard, and he deems those more happily placed than himself to be destitute of compassion. Wealth has full hands; but wealth seldom opens its hand to bestow anything on him. The rich seem to him incapable of large and generous deeds; he thinks them stingy in their wealth, and, in his view, their life affords them little scope for heroic action. The rich man, to him, has no chance of self-denial. If any of his family are sick, he can supply their need without effort; there is no tax at such times upon his resources. Self-sacrifice seems hardly to enter into his life. In the view of the poor man, the life of the rich is a life of ignoble ease, unilluminated by the opportunities of those heroic or self-sacrificing actions which brighten the lives of needier men.

Such is the view when we contemplate wealth from the side of poverty; but when we look at the same life from the standpoint of wealth, then we may perhaps mitigate our view. Every sphere of life has its special heroism and its peculiar virtues. It is true that wealth has no chance of practising the same class of self-denial which poverty can show; but wealth, too, has virtues which it can exercise. The possession of riches is a vantage-ground of good. Gentleness and suavity of manner come more readily to wealth than to want, and all men recognise the possibility of an appeal to nobility based upon nobility of position. To some men noblesse oblige sounds like a trumpet in the ears, and summons them to thoughtfulness, to liberality of action and generosity of temper in ways and in circumstances hidden from public view.

We see life from the side of poverty and from the side of wealth in the Book of Ruth. We see Ruth driven to extremity and seeking to obtain her livelihood in the harvest field. We see, on the other hand, the man of wealth, Boaz, the man of many servants, and the lord of large possessions; and the story shows us heroism in both. In Ruth we see the heroism of sacrifice and labour on behalf of another; in Boaz we may see not only the gentle temper, the large-hearted liberality, the stately suavity, of the man of great possessions, but also the scrupulous self-denial and the self-restraining forbearance which marks noble characters.

Few spots can give us in more vivid contrast the picture of wealth and of poverty than the harvest field. There is wealth suggested in the very presence of the golden grain. The wide extent of the fields, the solid structure of the granaries, the vast number of people at work, are features which make up a scene of plenty and ease; but in the corners of the fields may be seen those who are the pictures of poverty. Here the poor gleaners may be seen carefully clutching at every stray handful of fallen corn, glancing suspiciously at each other, hurrying in competition to be first where some chance sheaf may have fallen, looking with grudging eyes at the figure of any new-comer. Here, need struggles with need, and sorrow necessity seems to banish the generosity and heroism of the poor.

Such a scene might have been witnessed in the fields of Boaz. All over his white harvest fields the men were at work reaping the corn, and binding together the sheaves and piling them up on the waiting waggons. It was the season of barley harvest. In the near distance were the roofs of the barns and the out-houses, and further off might be descried the gleaming walls of the white houses of Bethlehem. Under the hot sun the reapers were at work, when suddenly upon the scene there passes a change. A movement as of expectancy takes place. The reaper pauses as he puts in the sickle, or the workman that has idled for a moment hastens to resume his toil; for all in the field have noticed the approach of the master. He is a man of wealth; but he is much more than this. He casts a quick and kindly eye over the fields, and towards the people at work. He gives to all a greeting of piety and of courtesy: "The Lord be with you!" and the murmured answer comes back from the many lips around, "The Lord bless thee!" His bearing is martial, and as the harvest folk turn to greet him they remember that he is no less famous in the field of war than courteous in the homes of peace. As he looks round, his eye is the master's eye: he sees in a moment the whole range of his field, and he detects the presence of any stranger. Soon his eye falls upon the comely stranger who is now reaping, for the first time, amongst the fields of Israel; and as he is quick to observe, so he is resolved to know the names and circumstances of all whom he employs. Besides, he notes the beauty of the stranger, and he knows the roughness and perils of the harvest field; and it is not altogether unlike a man's nature to show bounty to beauty. So far we see him as man amongst men; but as the story unfolds we get glimpses of his character; and his character, we find, is marked by nobility.

One of the great problems of the religious life is the problem how to preserve naturalness with piety. We are in danger either of being unnaturally eloquent or unduly reticent of our religious feelings. If we give utterance to them, the habit is apt to end in mere talkativeness. If, from a desire to be scrupulously honest with ourselves, we check our speech, we may lose the opportunity of the influence which speech bestows; we may blunt our spiritual perceptions and render ourselves incapable of those very emotions to which we have refused to give utterance. The happy art of preserving the mean between overmuch talking and an unfruitful silence is hard to win. The aim of all should be, that their religion should be so really their own that their utterances on religious subjects should be neither forced nor fluent, but just simply natural. The speech of piety should be like the voice of song, sweet because irresistible, and irresistible because real.

In Boaz there is, we think, a hint of this happy mean. Religion is on his tongue; but religion is in his heart and in his life. It is on his tongue, for his greeting to his reapers is the greeting which recognises the Lord as the Lord of the harvest; and when he speaks to Ruth it is perfectly natural to him to speak as if the Lord were the guide of her life, the recompenser of her toil, the protector under whose wings she had come to trust. His is the speech of one who is urbane and courteous, but through whose courtesy there breathes the strain of natural piety. In harmony with this, his religious life is seen in his character and in his action. His is a religion which is thoughtful for others; it is generous in action, it is scrupulously upright, and it exercises that conscientious self-restraint which makes righteousness, rather than inclination, the guide of life.

He is thoughtful for others. More than once does this thoughtfulness appear. Kindliness, as well as admiration, and perhaps even more than admiration, led him to speak to Ruth. He saw that she was a stranger; he understood that she might feel awkward amongst so many strange faces; a single word from the master of the field would put her at her ease; she would feel no longer any hesitation about her right to be there; and thus, as he greets her, he makes her, as it were, free of the place.

But his thoughtfulness goes beyond this. He knows the discomforts and dangers of the reaping field; the habitués of the place would grudge the presence of a stranger, and many rough and unscrupulous characters were to be found in the fields. Boaz shows his thoughtfulness by seeking to protect Ruth from the hardness of regular gleaners and the roughness of the idlers. He counsels her to work amongst the women in his own field: "Go not to glean in another field, neither go from hence, but abide here fast by my maidens: let thine eyes be on the field that they do reap, and go thou after them: have I not charged the young men that they shall not touch thee? and when thou art athirst, go unto the vessels, and drink of that which the young men have drawn." The same thoughtfulness seeks to protect her reputation. After the interview which Naomi had arranged, he sends her home under the cover of the dark. He shows himself careful for her good name.

He is thoughtful in his generosity, and he will not send her back empty-handed to Naomi; he wishes that she should be well supplied with food: "Go not empty unto thy mother-in-law," he said, and measured six measures of barley into her veil. The same generous temperament had showed itself earlier, in the instructions given to his young men: "Let her glean," he said, "even among the sheaves, and reproach her not: and let fall also some of the handfuls of purpose for her, and leave them, that she may glean them, and rebuke her not." These little touches indicate character, and picture to us a man who looks with a thoughtful and liberal eye upon all under his protection.

And this generous-handed man was strictly upright. Justice and generosity do not always go hand-in-hand, for liberality is often associated with laxity; but in the case of Boaz there is almost a stern inflexibility and uprightness which is perhaps unexpected in one who was so generous. This integrity is seen in his refusal to take advantage of Naomi's claim without giving the nearer kinsman an opportunity of doing so. He has a resolute regard for the rights of others. His heart is captivated by Ruth, but the right of the nearer kinsman must be respected, and therefore he postponed any action which his inclination might have dictated till all the elaborate ceremony which the law commanded should have been gone through. This spirit of righteousness shows itself also in the scrupulous determination to leave Ruth perfectly free. He is a man past the prime of life. He will not use his position or his wealth to overawe her affections or to over-reach her interests; and as he carefully protects the rights of the kinsman, so he sedulously guards those of Ruth also. In the language which he uses we feel that Ruth has been left free, and that her choice as well as his has been given in the matter. "Blessed be thou," he says, "of the Lord, my daughter; for thou hast showed more kindness in the latter end than at the beginning, inasmuch as thou followest not young men, whether poor or rich."

Thus the narrative tells us of one whose character is considerate, liberal, righteous in word and deed, reverent towards the affections and impulses of others. All these qualities were bound together and rooted in a simple faith. The chief thought in his mind was the thought of God. God was the God of battle, and God was the God of homesteads and harvest fields also. The influence of a character such as this made itself felt, for he became not only a noble figure in the eyes of Ruth, but a true representative of all Israel. We judge of creeds by character; we are not wholly right in doing so, for many people are worse than their creeds. Inconsistency is not an infrequent failing amongst religious people, and it is never fair to judge of the moral dignity and beauty of a faith by the base and ignoble lives of those who are its empty professors; but while this is true, it is also true that high qualities of character necessarily commend faith. There is a relationship between what men believe and what men are, and when we find men pure, unselfish, and upright, and worshipping a God whose character is one of purity and righteousness, we are insensibly led from the beauty of the character to the beauty of the faith.

Ruth was a Moabitess; she came from the land where morals were low and faith was degraded. She encountered one who was typical of the Israelite indeed, and the generosity and goodness of Boaz became a revelation to her of the power of the Israelitish faith. It was a happy thing for her that in her early experiences of the people of Israel she met with two such noble examples as those of Naomi and Boaz. Little by little the influence of these worked upon her heart and mind, and built up within her a higher conception of the meaning of religious life and a deeper reverence for the God of Israel.

Boaz became a shelter and protection of her life. The dignity and force, the gentleness and self-restraint of his character made him as one who became a shelter indeed to the lonely exile from Moab. His name meant strength; and like the pillar (also called Boaz) which stood at the entrance of the Temple, he was a tower of strength to the heart of the fair Moabitess whom he made his wife. The Temple pillar itself must have given voice to some memories which lingered in Israelitish minds of that high-minded, gentle-souled, and courageous Boaz, who had not been merely mighty in his own day, but who was the very one from whom sprang a race of heroes and of kings. The secret of his strength lay in his faith. To him the thought of God was no mere formal thing. God, to him was a protector, the shelter, the guardian of human life; beneath His wings all human beings were safe. He welcomes Ruth to that shelter which he knew and which he had tried—the shelter of the God of Israel under whose wings she had come to trust.

It is this high confidence and faith which gives to men strength. It is this which calms the emotions of the heart and softens the asperities of the character. For faith in its very nature strengthens and soothes, and the man who possesses it can not only meet the dangers of the world with courage, but the trifling anxieties of life with calmness. Circumstances may do much to soften the manner, and ease and wealth, perchance, do give placidity of disposition and foster quietness of demeanour: but faith alone can give that confidence of heart which remains calm amid the waves of this troublesome world.

MEDICAL MISSION WORK IN PALESTINE.

BY THE REV. DR. PRESTON, RUNCORN.

WHEN I paid a second visit to the Holy Land in the spring, I inspected closely the working of various Medical Missions in different parts of the country. That a great and beneficent work is being done is manifest. Through their useful agency, missionary enterprise is receiving considerable assistance, thereby prejudices against Christianity are being gradually removed, the loving fruits of the Gospel are being brought home to the hearts of the people in a very direct manner, and the Gospel of Christ itself is being received by numbers. It is preached in a practical way, and the preaching is forcibly telling. Many can be approached, and do hear the "truth as it is in Jesus," who otherwise would not be got at, or who would not give it the patient hearing which now they do. The effort is made of seeking a blessing for the souls of men by doing good to their bodies. The principle is the one which the Master employed. He healed the diseases of those who waited on Him, and then He sought to draw them to Himself and to save their souls by preaching the Gospel to them.

From what I have seen and learned, Medical Mission work will tell far more effectually, and will win converts to Christianity more effectively and in larger numbers, than will the efforts of the ordinary missions, however zealous, loving, and active may be their missionaries.

Let us now inspect somewhat of their working in Palestine. We will begin with JERUSALEM.

As the Gospel went forth first from the Holy City, so here was first established English Medical Missions. This was done some fifty years ago. After much difficulty the present building, which serves as an hospital, was hired in 1821. It is situated in an unsavoury quarter. Its surroundings are not conducive to a rapid restoration to health. It is within the walls. The streets about are remarkably dirty, and are badly drained. It is for the benefit of the Jews. At first twelve beds were fitted up; a few years later an additional twelve were furnished. Since then further progress has been made. By each bedside there is a locker, on the top of which is seen a Bible, a New Testament, and the English Liturgy. No forced proselytising is permitted. Patients come from many quarters: from Egypt, Turkey, and even distant India. Between 1860 and 1891 over 19,000 in-patients have been admitted; and some 300,000 cases have been treated in the out-patients' room. I spent a morning in watching the modus operandi in connection with the latter. The patients assemble in a large room, to which there is admission from the very narrow street. Adjoining it is another small room, which contains a harmonium and furniture; a door connects them. Here the medical officer (Dr. Wheeler) and his staff meet each morning before any patients are examined, and when these have assembled in their own hall a short religious service is held. A hymn is sung, a portion of the Old Book is read, and prayer is offered. The patients are observers and hearers of what takes place. This concluded, the doctor and nurses proceed to another room, also connected with the waiting-room; and then those who require medical treatment are admitted in turn. Considering the number of cases, the work is skilfully and expeditiously done. The wards are also carefully visited, and the sick are well looked after. Where such loving-kindness is displayed, it is no wonder that prejudices are softened and the Gospel penetrates. Indeed, one of the ordained missionaries in Jerusalem who visits the hospital has confessed he finds it the best place for influencing Jews and bringing before them the claims of the Messiah. It is one of the very best means for casting the Gospel net far and near.

We will now proceed to BAMALEH.

This place is three hours' ride from Jerusalem. We stayed at the Convent, a fine airy building, which is kept by American ladies. Here are maintained a fair number of girls, who receive a good education. The Sunday-school has some one hundred and ten children in attendance. The villagers appreciate the good work being done, and send their young ones to the schools. We heard some hymns sung in excellent English, and likewise in Arabic. One of them was the well-known hymn of Moody and Sankey, "Wonderful Words of Love." There is a Medical Mission in connection with this institution. It is highly valued by the natives. They come to the dispensary from surrounding distances. Some of them have ideas of their own as to how a cure is to be worked. The following illustrates this:—A woman came from Bethel with her sick baby. The doctor gave her a prescription, telling her to give the child each day a third part of the prescribed medicine. He heard nothing of the prescription at the dispensary as having been made up. In time the mother paid him another visit, bringing the baby, who was now well. He inquired what had become of his prescription, when she told him that she had cut it into three parts, and had given her child one portion each day as directed! It was a marvel that there was a recovery at all. Through the agency of this mission the Gospel is leavening this out-of-the-way locality. The Sunday services are well attended.

Next we will visit

SHECHEM.

The ride to this place is some twelve hours, through a labyrinth of mountains, sterile and stony. In many places the ancient terraces remain, and here and there are olive groves and numerous fig-trees. The valleys were carpeted with a variety of wild flowers. Watch-towers appear in different directions. In many places the mud was knee-deep, and proved irksome to get through. Roads there are none. It was a case of climbing over precipices and through rugged by-ways choked with stones of all dimensions, and of such a nature that one would think no animal but a goat could manage to get a footing or make its way through such a wilderness and over such irregular and intricate ground. One descent was so dangerous we had to dismount and walk quietly and carefully down. Darkness came on two hours before we arrived at our destination. We were rounding the shoulder of Mount Gerizim and through shoals of rugged rock and tortuous windings. We had to leave the horses to their own instincts to pick their way as they considered best. On arrival we put up at the house of the Church Missionary Society's agent.

In connection with the Church Missionary Society there is an important Medical Mission here. It is doing genuine work under the genial and active Dr. Bailey. From long distances the people come to hear him, on camels and donkeys, in litters and on foot, bringing the withered, halt, and lame, also diseases of every description. Many a patient has to be supported by his fellows on the animal which carries him. When the Mission was started, the head of the Mahomedans, who here are bigoted and fanatical, greatly opposed the work. So far did he succeed that he induced the Turkish authorities to close the dispensary. In time he fell ill; his native doctor did him no good; he sent for Dr. Bailey, who at once saw what was wrong, and prescribed accordingly. He, at the same time, said to him, "You believe in God. So do we Christians. Now do you pray to God to bless the remedies to your restoration, and I will do the same." Ere long recovery took place, and he who was formerly the bitter foe of Dr. Bailey is now his firmest friend. He often visits him, and kisses him, after Oriental manner, in the most affectionate way; the bigotry of those under his sway has practically ceased; the assaults against the Christians which were common are not committed. The English doctor is in high repute and great demand; he often takes a long day's journey to visit a solitary patient. Some of the natives treat their prescriptions in a peculiar way. One woman, having got hers, washed the ink off it, and then drank the compound! The piece of paper she kept sacred, and placed it securely on the top of her head. The native doctor used to write his prescription on a circular piece of metal. This the recipient placed, and carried about, on the top of the head. The idea was that nothing more was required. No wonder that diseases spread. The same doctor died of the like complaint which his chief had, and which he was incompetent to deal with. The dispensary is open at nine a.m. Before attending to the many waiting cases, Dr. Bailey reads a short portion from God's Word. He makes a few remarks, and then offers up prayer. This greatly impresses the Mahomedans, for they have had the idea that Christians do not pray. They now say and believe that they do. They also remark that the English church is, like their own mosque, free from all images, whilst the Latins and the Greeks have such things in their churches. I learned that some 10,000 cases passed through the hands of the Medical Missioner in 1892. One thing he urgently needs, and which he is making an effort to secure, and that is a suitable hospital.

It would be of immense service, and would do much to strengthen the good work going on and to promote evangelising. It is to be hoped it will ere long be erected. The present dispensary is of small and insufficient dimensions.

Bidding adieu to Shechem, we will proceed to sacred the city where thirty years of our Saviour's life were passed—"His own city." It is completely encircled by the mountains; these, with the level country at the base, give the idea of a vast extinct crater. The houses are situated on the slope of the mountain. The streets are very irregular and narrow, and are the receptacles of all kinds of refuse; even the animals for human food are openly slain in them. The Church Missionary Society has a mission here, and a pretty English-looking church and missionary's residence. From Dr. Vartan, the medical missionary, I received marked attention and kindness. This mission is doing well. On an average, he attends forty patients daily. These are of all classes of creed. Before he begins his medical work he has a short religious service. He superintends a Sunday-school which has some fifty scholars; he has also a day-school, which is attended by several Moslem lads. This mission is being worked by the Church of Scotland. There are other Christian agencies busily employed; these I pass by, and proceed to our next point—

TIBERIAS.

It has a population of over 2,000, the greater part of which consists of Jews. The streets are narrow, and filthy dirty; the bazaars are not much to boast of. On three sides the town is surrounded by lofty crenated walls and towers, which are truly picturesque (the great earthquake of 1837 considerably shattered these); the fourth side runs along the water's edge. There is an old mosque in a state of decay, and a few palm-trees are dotted about. The place is supposed to be identical with the Old Testament Rakkath, in the lot of Naphtali. Herod Antipas (27 B.C.) lavished great wealth upon, and rebuilt it; Roman gates, Grecian colonnades, marble statues adorned it. The famous hot baths lie about one mile to the south. To the Jews it long has been a sacred quarter, and here is the tomb of Maimonides, the famous scholar; the remains of other eminent Jews also rest here. A steep hill rises to the west to the height of 1,000 feet; it is full of caverns cut in the rock. Originally they were tombs, but in our Lord's time they were inhabited by men possessed of evil spirits; to-day the jackals reside there. The view from above is inspiring; it overlooks the Sea of Galilee and the surrounding country. Coming from Nazareth, when from the summit a first sight of the sacred lake is obtained, it awakens emotions which can be felt but hardly described. To the east there is a wall of hills, and there are places where the ridge droops perpendicularly to the water. The destruction of the swine when Christ visited the region can easily be understood. So much for this really interesting place. Next for the medical work here; it is carried on by Dr. Torrence, under the supervision of the Free Church of Scotland. He has built a handsome house as a residence for the medical missionaries; he is likewise erecting a substantial hospital which will soon be ready for patients. His present dispensary is a wretched, incommensurable concern, with an almost impassable approach; he faces his difficulties with a cheerful, prayerful heart, and his willing services are much valued. I spent some time in viewing his surgical operations—some poor creatures sadly needed them. He has a struggle to meet the demands. The sick in this region are not diminishing in numbers, and, as the report of the mission spreads, they increase. However, the outlook is full of hope. The dispensary book contains the names of 2,242 persons, who paid over 6,000 visits to the consulting-room during the past year (many patients were also visited in their homes); prescriptions to the number of 7,886 were dispensed during the period. A short address is always given in the waiting-room to the assembled patients, who are urged to look to the great Physician above. Many persons come from the east of the Jordan, long distances off, presenting serious cases, some travelling a three days' journey. This speaks well for the repute of the doctor. One poor fellow, who was suffering from dyspepsia, earnestly desired they would cut into his stomach and clean it out! Some operations have to be performed under chloroform, and those that have been carried out all proved successful. I have been informed that, as a rule, most patients lend an open ear as they are told of Jesus of Nazareth. The doctor is persuaded that the Gospel is forcing its way into the heart of Moslem and Jew, and that ere long many will be found to witness for Him "whom to know is life eternal."

TIBERIAS, FROM THE FORTRESS.

WAITING TO SEE THE DOCTOR.

HAIFA.

I had not much opportunity of inspecting the Medical Mission in Haifa; I understand that a good work is being done. Bishop Blythe of Jerusalem is anxious to have a suitable hospital, as there is a crying need for such a useful institution. Three days' hard riding and driving, under a broiling sun, along the coast, over sand and by paths of rough and wearisome description, brought us to the ancient Joppa, where foolish Jonah took ship to escape from the presence of the Lord. From here light streams out into the villages beyond, and penetrates into the heart of Jew and Moslem. Crowning a picturesque hill-top, which commands extensive views, stands a noble red-tiled building, with balconies and verandahs around it; it is the English hospital. Its wards are airy and spacious; they contained various specimens of humanity, some as black as ebony. As many as 500 or 600, male and female, pass through them during the year, whilst nearly 12,000 patients visit its dispensary. It is pleasing to learn that there is a real desire among the people to listen to God's word; numbers come for more teaching after leaving the hospital. The creeds of those admitted are diversified; the majority are Moslems. To this hospital patients come from great distances: a father and son came from far-off Mecca. An amusing story is told of the father. He made his way, walking, to Jaffa to get work, so as to "buy a fresh wife." When asked if she was dear, he replied, "No, only six pounds," which he thought very reasonable. The age of the intended spouse was only eleven years! He and his son in time returned to Arabia, impressed with the Gospel they heard, and with the New Testament in their possession. The women are particularly fond of singing hymns and learning texts; they eagerly engage in this work in the afternoons. Some of the boys are precocious. One youngster, on an occasion, collected the women around him, and made them repeat a hymn after him; he next recited texts, and finally knelt down and said the Lord's Prayer. Attached to the hospital is a neat, commodious chapel; here patients are collected in the morning for a short service (all who come for medical advice must attend). God's blessing has hitherto attended the earnest efforts being made to illumine dark minds with the light of saving truth.

In conclusion, the importance of these Medical Missions cannot be over-estimated. Those faithful workers who carry them on deserve all praise, encouragement, and the earnest prayers of God's people. By their loving and self-denying efforts they are sowing the incorruptible seed far and near. What the result will be, none can tell; the day will declare. They sow in faith, leaving it to a higher Power to give the increase. The process may be long and hidden, but One has assured that His word shall not return void, and shall accomplish that He pleaseth. Through the blessing of the Heavenly Husbandman a rich harvest may yet be gleaned from the fields of the Holy Land. Golden sheaves of saved souls may be cast at Emmanuel's feet when time on earth shall be no more—the harvest gained through the toil and labour of the Medical Missions.

RUPERT!

BY M. BRADFORD WHITING.

THE soft darkness of an October night was beginning to fall, and the leaves of the trees that edged the roadway rustled in the evening wind.

Few people were about, for a London suburb in October is an almost deserted region, and house after house showed by its shuttered windows that its owners were enjoying mountain scenery or seaside breezes.

A young man came down the road, with a light and active step, and paused near one of the more spacious of the "desirable villa residences" that lined the road. It was a detached house, standing in a pretty garden, and he looked at it with a curious and longing gaze that might have led a casual observer to the conclusion that he was a returned wanderer at his father's gates.

A nearer inspection, however, would not have favoured this idea. Far from being clothed in rags, Rupert Osborne was clad in evening dress, with a light overcoat thrown back upon his shoulders, and his gold studs and watch-chain gave no impression of poverty. He was a fine-looking man as he stood there, his figure showing darkly in the uncertain light of the street lamp; tall and well built, with broad shoulders and a well-set head covered with closely curling hair.

His reverie lasted some time, but at the sound of distant footsteps he roused himself, and opening the garden gate, walked slowly between the double line of shrubs that led up to the door. On reaching the steps, however, he changed his mind, and, turning to the left, went through a trellis-gate that led round to the back of the house. A heavy dew was falling, and the scent of the flowers filled the air; he stood still again under the trees, and seemed to be lost in thought. All was dark on this side of the house as well as on the other, and there was not a sound to break the stillness of the night. It was evident that some agitating thought was passing through his mind, for his brow was knitted and his hand clenched; but at last he seemed to take a sudden resolution, and, going up a flight of steps, he gently turned the handle of the glass door that led into the house.

It was locked; but, as one well accustomed to such obstacles, he drew something from his pocket and set to work on the fastenings. In a very few minutes he had undone them, and stood inside looking round him curiously. The house was in total darkness, and, striking a match with some caution, he made his way along the hall and entered the drawing-room.

The room was prettily furnished with comfortable chairs and art-muslin draperies, but he frowned as he lit a candle, and muttered, "Nothing fit to be seen!"

He came out again into the hall, softly closing the door behind him, and was just going up-stairs on a further voyage of discovery, when the sound of a heavy footstep, on the flags outside, made him pause. He listened for a minute or two in breathless silence; then, going through the glass door, he drew it after him, and made his way down into the garden. All seemed perfectly quiet; but, as he opened the gate into the road, a policeman's lantern was suddenly flashed across his eyes, and a harsh voice sounded in his ear.

Rupert made neither start nor sign. "Good-evening!" he said calmly, looking the policeman full in the face.

"Beg your pardon, sir," said the man, with rather a disconcerted air, "I saw a light in the window, and, thinking the family was away, I just looked round to see if there was anything amiss."

"Quite right!" said Rupert. "We are much obliged to you, I am sure." He gave the man a friendly nod as he spoke, and passed on down the road, humming softly to himself as he went.

No sooner had he turned the corner of the road, however, than a change came over him; he thrust his hands deeply into his pockets, and his brow contracted painfully. For a moment he seemed hardly able to breathe, then, conquering himself, he walked on quickly, looking neither to the right hand nor the left.

Rupert Osborne had been all his life in the difficult position of a younger son in a noble but poor family. All his friends and acquaintances belonged to that circle of society where money is professedly no object, but where the command of money is absolutely essential. As long as his father was alive he had received a certain allowance, but as soon as his elder brother came into possession he had nothing but his own resources to depend upon, and his own resources were nil.

What was to be done? Rupert was utterly unprepared to meet the question; he was not disinclined to work, but he had been taught no business or profession; and a very little inquiry convinced him that appointments are more easily sought than found. In the meantime he must live; and, having borrowed a little money to enable him to do so, he was met by the necessity of paying it back! A stroke of luck on the turf saved his credit and induced him to try his fortunes still further, with the result that, at six-and-twenty, he was without a penny, while his debts amounted to some hundreds of pounds.

There was only one who had any power to lead him in a better way; but Ethel Vaughan's mother forbade her to listen to him, and, though she loved him, she would not disobey her. So, disowned by all, he resolved to think only of himself, and looked about him with perfect recklessness for some means of escape from his dilemma.

Taking up the newspaper one day, he read the account of a daring burglary by a man of good position. While staying in a country-house, he one night excused himself from the dinner-table on the plea of illness, and while the whole household was down-stairs took the opportunity of ransacking his hostess' jewel-cases.

The utter audacity of the thing commended itself to Rupert, and he began to wonder whether he could not achieve something of the same kind. At first he treated the idea as an absurdity, but gradually the temptation grew upon him, returning again and again, and each time with new force, until at last he could resist it no longer. He knew that at present it would not be safe to try a similar robbery; everybody would be too much on the alert; besides, it would require too much scheming and planning for a first attempt. He must get his hand in with something simpler, and therefore he resolved to make his first trial on a house that he knew to be empty.

But the trial had failed. His agitation had shown him that he was a long way yet from being hardened; and though he had succeeded in baffling the policeman, he felt that under a little sharper scrutiny he must have broken down. The state of his feelings could not, however, alter the state of his fortunes; and unless he could find some other way of raising money, he must stifle them as best he could. It would not do to try the same neighbourhood again; and he kept his ears open for useful information.

A few weeks after this, he was dining with some men of his acquaintance, and chanced to hear a remark that set him thinking.

"I was staying at General Gascoigne's the other day," said a man near him, "and I told him it was perfectly absurd for people who had such diamonds to be so careless about their defences."

"And what did he say?" asked another.

"Oh! he said that therein lay their safety. No one would imagine that there were diamonds in a tin box in his dressing-room, whereas if they had an elaborate strong case it would attract everyone's attention."

"That is an original idea. I wish I knew the General; his acquaintance must be worth making."

"Well, you can make it if you like; he and his wife are coming up to stay with us for a night or two next week, and we shall be very pleased to have you to dine."

"Delighted, I'm sure! Which night shall I come?"

"Wednesday, if you have no other engagement. We shall have one or two people that night."

The man addressed made a note of the day and hour in his pocket-book, and Rupert made a note of it in his mind.

"Can it be possible that I have fallen so low?" he asked himself, as he walked away from the house; but this was a question that he had asked many times before, and dismissing it from his mind he began to think out his arrangement.

He knew General Gascoigne by repute; his house was situated on the Surrey side of London, and Rupert had often passed it, though he had never been inside the gates. He had no fears about effecting an entrance; the maid was certain to accompany her mistress to London, and he knew enough of the habits of butlers to feel sure that if he had not been given a holiday during his master's absence he would take one. But there were still some difficulties before him. However empty the house might be, he would run the risk of encountering some stray servant, and it would be impossible for him to account satisfactorily for his presence. All at once, however, an idea struck him that seemed pledged to success by its own simplicity. Why should he not ring at the bell, and say that Mrs. Gascoigne had asked him to come down and fetch her jewels, as she had to attend a reception that night? She was certain not to have taken all her diamonds with her, even if she had taken any; and as he could give the name and address of the people with whom she was staying, and describe the position of the box, none of the servants would have any scruple in handing them over to him.

He dressed himself with unusual care on the eventful night, and put a flower in the buttonhole of his evening coat. His train arrived at half-past eight, and he walked leisurely up from the station. He rang the bell boldly on arriving, and asked the maid who came to the door whether this was General Gascoigne's house.

"Yes, sir," said the girl; "but he is not at home."

"I know," said Rupert; "he is staying at Sir Trevor Oakshott's; but I have come on an errand for that very reason."

The girl looked at him doubtfully; but his dress, manner, and bearing were all calculated to allay her suspicions, and opening the door wider she asked him to walk in.

Rupert stepped into the hall and began his explanation; but, without waiting to listen, the maid showed him into the drawing-room and shut the door. This was not quite what he had anticipated, but he supposed that she had gone to fetch the housekeeper or someone in authority, and he was still running over his story to make sure that it was coherent, when steps were heard returning, and the door opened.

"RUPERT!"

The words died upon the young man's lips as he heard the cry, and he stood in the centre of the room looking at the figure before him with a stupefied expression. That Ethel Vaughan should appear at this moment was nothing short of a miracle.

"Ethel," he said at last, "what are you doing here?"

The girl looked at him sadly. Now that the first surprise of seeing him was over, she remembered the barrier that stood between them, and a feeling of embarrassment came over her.

Rupert meanwhile was going through an inward storm of feeling. His design was prevented—that was his first thought. No angel could have barred his way more effectually than this slight trembling girl, with her eyes dimmed with tears, and the wild-rose colour in her cheeks. But how could he account for his presence in the house? No doubt the servant had called her to receive his message, and what plausible tale could he invent on the spur of the moment?

"I did not know that Mrs. Gascoigne was a friend of yours," he said at last.

"They are old friends of my father's," said Ethel in a low voice, and once more silence fell upon them.

Ethel was the first to break it. "I was told that you came on a matter of business," she said; "can I give any message from you to General Gascoigne?"

Now was the crisis, and Rupert clenched his teeth in desperation. Any subterfuge seemed unworthy in this pure presence, and with a sudden resolution he came nearer and began to speak in hurried tones.

"Ethel!" he said, "I have a strange story to tell you, but for the sake of the past I ask you to listen. I came here to-night for the purpose of robbing this house."

A low cry escaped from Ethel's lips, but he went on without heeding it.

"You know how I have been brought up—extravagance on every hand and nothing with which to meet it: I am not trying to excuse myself, but only to show you how this has come about. After you refused me I was reckless; I became deeper and deeper involved, and now my position is hopeless. I made up my mind to steal. Once before I tried it, and was hindered, and now to-night you have stopped me in the very act. That is the whole truth. I know how you must loathe and despise me, and now you can send for the police. I will promise not to escape." He threw himself into a chair as he finished speaking, and buried his face in his hands.

The silence in the room lasted for some time unbroken. Ethel had never believed half the stories that had been told to her about Rupert Osborne; but now she had heard his confession from his own lips, and it was blacker than any of the reports to which she had turned a deaf ear. And yet, even while the dull tide of misery rushed through her heart, she knew that she had never loved him so well as at this moment. What was she to do? She had no hesitation in deciding that she need not send for the police; for Rupert had told her that up to the present he had committed no robbery, and she knew that he spoke the truth. It was the problem of his future that confronted her, for she felt that it lay in her hands.

She was not long in making her decision. "Rupert," she said, going up to him and laying her hand on the broad shoulder, "I have something to tell you."

There was a strange ring in her voice that made him raise his head and watch her face as she spoke.

"I daresay you know that since I saw you last my mother is married again. I am alone in the world now, and I have often felt very sad, but never so sad as you have made me to-night!"

The young man's lip quivered, but he made no answer, and Ethel went on speaking.

"I am going to ask you something, Rupert. Will you give up all that has led you wrong and go out to the colonies and work till you can pay off all that you owe? Will you make yours a life worth living? Because—because I love you!"

"He threw himself into a chair as he finished speaking, and buried his face in his hands."—p. 503.

Her voice faltered over the last words, but Rupert heard them and started to his feet.

"And you can say that to me, now?" he cried.
"Ethel, you are an angel!"

"Hush!" she said. "Perhaps I ought not to have told you, but I could not help it. I love you, and all I ask you is to make me proud of my love."

A look of awe came over Rupert's face, and taking her hand in his he kissed it reverently. "I will do all that you ask me, Heaven helping me!" he said.
"There is not another woman living who would have had courage to do what you have done, and as soon as I can come to you with an unstained name I shall claim you for my own."

A step in the hall startled them, and he was gone without another word; while Ethel, exhausted by the strange interview, gave way to a flood of tears.

It was some years before Rupert Osborne was seen again in England; but from time to time a remittance was sent to his creditors, and with each debt that was discharged a brief letter reached Ethel to tell her of the fact.

Ethel treasured those short and business-like epistles far more than any outpourings of love. She knew that he would not speak of his affection until he had cleared his honour, and she felt that his silence was the greatest proof of devotion that he could have shown. She had always known that he had abilities if he would only use them, and though the rough work that he had to do was a strange contrast to his former life, she did not regret it for him. It was not long before he began to succeed. The sheep-farming company for whom he worked soon discovered his value, and when the post of manager was offered him he knew that his chance was before him.

No one understood why Ethel Vaughan was so obdurate to all those who tried to win her favour; and when Rupert Osborne came back, a bronzed and stalwart sheep-farmer, there were many voices to oppose her being carried away to a life so different from all that she had been accustomed to.

But Rupert and Ethel had no such fears. The crisis of their life had been passed five years before, unknown to all; and none of those who saw them start on their outward voyage, with faces full of hope, could guess how strange nor how close was the tie that bound their hearts together!

There was a Time when Children Sang.

Words by T. R. TAYLOR, 1836.

Music by J. W. ELLIOTT.

1. There was a time when chil - dren sang The Sa-viour's praise with sa - cred glee,

And all the hills of Ju-dah rang With their ex - ult - ing ju - bi - lee.

O! to have joined their rapturous songs
And swelled their sweet hosannas high;
And blessed Him with our feeble tongues,
As He—the Man of grief—went by!

But Christ is now a glorious King,
And angels in His presence bow;
The humble songs that we can sing,
O! will He, can He, hear them now?

He can, He will, He loves to hear
The notes which babes and sucklings raise;
Jesus, we come in trembling fear;
O! teach our hearts and tongues Thy praise.

We join the hosts around Thy throne,
Who once, like us, the desert trod;
And thus, we make their song our own—
Hosanna to the Son of God!

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

MAY 20TH. THE CHILDHOOD OF MOSES.

To read—Exod. ii. 1–10. Golden Text—Ps.

xcv. 15.

INTRODUCTION. Last lesson told of Israelites' hard toil as slaves in Egypt after Joseph's death; but they increased rapidly in numbers till Pharaoh gave orders that all male children born should be at once drowned in the River Nile. To-day's lesson tells of the birth of their future deliverer.

I. MOSES IN DANGER. (1–4.) A marriage. A Levite marries a woman of his own tribe. After a time a "goodly" boy is born. Called "fair to God," or "exceeding fair." (Acts vii. 20.)

God the Giver of all beauty of body or mind. Must they kill this beautiful boy? They cannot. They have faith that God will keep him safe. So they hide him for three months. (Heb. xi. 23.) Then they put him in a little coffin-shaped basket of reeds (papyrus), making it water-tight with pitch. Then place him among the flags by water-side. Miriam, his elder sister, is left to watch. The father and mother return home to pray. Notice about Moses' parents—

1. Their strong faith. God who gave them their child could surely preserve him from harm.

2. Their use of means. Hid him in the most unlikely place for him to be found.

LESSON. Trust in God and be doing good.

II. MOSES IN SAFETY. (5–10.) Picture the scene.

A bathing party. The princess and her attendants. Most of the maids stroll along the river-side. Princess keeps one to wait on her while bathing. Suddenly she sees the basket among the flags. Sends to fetch it; opens it; sees the boy. The baby cries; Miriam comes forward. Volunteers to fetch a Hebrew nurse for it. Runs home; tells the tale; fetches her mother. Jochebed engaged to nurse her own child. Moses grew, was brought to princess and adopted. Became learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. (Acts vii. 22.) And a mighty man.

LESSONS. 1. From Miriam—discretion. Came forward at the right time; said and did the right thing.

2. From Pharaoh's daughter—compassion for the helpless.

3. From Jochebed—train children aright; God will reward.

III. MOSES A TYPE OF CHRIST. How?

1. Made like his brethren in all things. (Heb. ii 17.)

2. Persecuted by a cruel king. (St. Matt. ii. 16.)

3. Delivered by God's overruling providence. (Golden text.)

MAY 27TH. MOSES SENT AS DELIVERER.

To read—Exod. iii. 10–20. Golden Text—Isaiah xli. 10.

INTRODUCTION. Moses lived forty years in Pharaoh's Court, becoming well known to the king, learning from the wise men, waiting patiently for what should happen. Heard also and saw the miseries of his own people. At age of forty "visited" them (Acts vii. 23), and determined to give up the luxuries of Court life to live with his brethren (Heb. xi. 25, 26) and deliver them; but acted rashly, killed a taskmaster, incurred Pharaoh's wrath, and had to flee from Egypt. Settled in Midian—married a daughter of Jethro, prince and priest—till after another forty years, God, speaking out of a burning bush, called him to return to Egypt as deliverer of the Israelites.

I. THE CALL. (10–14.) Moses is to go.

Why does God want to send someone?

He has seen His people's affliction.

He has heard their bitter cry. (Ver. 7.)

He knows all their great sorrows.

He has come down to deliver them.

So He has determined to send a deliverer.

Moses hesitates—feels his own unworthiness.

God promises His presence—He will be with him.

Gives a token—they shall worship on this same mount—fulfilled when Law given. (Ex. xx.)

Moses still hesitates. God is unknown to Israel.

By what name and title shall he make Him known?

God reveals His name—"I AM THAT I AM," meaning self-existent, eternal, almighty Lord Jehovah.

Unlike heathen gods of wood and stone, silver and gold, work of men's hands. (Ps. cxv. 4.)

LESSONS. 1. As thy day so shall thy strength be.

2. In God's name shall we tread them under that arise against us. (Golden text.)

II. THE MESSAGE. (15–20.) What is Moses commissioned to do?

Leave his adopted land and return to Egypt.

Gather the elders of the people together.

Tell the tale of God's appearance to him.

Say that the time has come for their deliverance.

They are at last to go to the Promised Land.

Then the elders must go with him to Pharaoh.

God's message must be told to the king.

They must first hold a solemn sacrifice to the Lord.

They must go a three days' march away.

But Pharaoh is certain to refuse this request.
God will then stretch out His hand on the land.
He will do great signs and wonders.
Afterwards Pharaoh will let them go.

LESSONS. 1. God's voice is of love—He pities.
2. God's word is of power—must be obeyed.
3. God first gives warning—"Let My people go."
4. God punishes when His message is despised.
5. God will put all enemies under His feet.
Therefore, "seek ye the Lord while He may be found."

JUNE 3RD. THE PASSOVER INSTITUTED.

To read—Exod. xii. 1—14. Golden Text—1 Cor. v. 7.

INTRODUCTION. Moses, and Aaron his brother, gave God's message to Pharaoh; but he laughed them to scorn. They performed the three signs, viz., water changed to blood in a basin, the leprous hand, and the rod turned into a serpent. The magicians by sleight of hand appearing to do the same, Pharaoh refuses to believe in God. God sends ten plagues—most of them directed against some of the false gods of Egypt. The king promises many times to let them go, but does not. At last God hardens his heart, and he refuses absolutely. The last plague is the death of the first-born in each family, connected with which was the institution of the Passover.

I. THE FEAST. (1—14.) Notice—

The author—God Himself; therefore must be kept.

The month—the first month of the year.

All the months to date from this month Abib.

Showing the great importance of this Feast.

The day—the animal to be taken on tenth day.

Kept till fourteenth day of the month at even.

The victim—a lamb for each family.

One in its prime—of the first year—the best possible.

A youngling of sheep or goats.

The sacrifice—to be killed in the evening.

All the people to do it at the same time.

Not a single bone allowed to be broken.

The blood to be sprinkled on the door-posts.

The flesh to be roasted with fire and eaten with unleavened bread and bitter herbs.

Nothing of it to be left till the morning.

Any small scraps remaining to be burnt.

The ceremonies—it was to be eaten in haste.

Loins girt ready for a journey, staves in hand.

Shoes on feet, all ready dressed to depart at once.

The cause—it is the Lord's Passover.

Angel of death will destroy Egypt's first-born.

Angel of life will pass over and spare Israel.

The memorial—similar feast to be kept yearly.

In memory of God's mercy and deliverance.

II. THE TYPE. Point out carefully—

Christ, the Son of God, is the Passover sacrificed for us. (Golden text.)

He is the spotless, sinless Lamb. (1 Pet. i. 19.)

He was chosen beforehand. (1 Pet. ii. 4.)

Killed by the people. (Acts ii. 23.)

Killed in the evening. (St. Mark xv. 34.)

His blood sprinkled on conscience. (Heb. x. 22.)

Eaten with unleavened bread. (1 Cor. v. 7, 8.)

All must share if they would escape everlasting death. (St. John vi. 53.)

No salvation except through His blood. (Rev. v. 9.)

LESSON. "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world."

JUNE 10TH. PASSAGE OF THE RED SEA.

To read—Exod. xiv. 19—29. Golden Text—Heb. xi. 29.

INTRODUCTION. After the Passover Feast, at midnight of the same day, the destroying angel smote the eldest son in each house of the Egyptians. A cry of agony was heard throughout the land. Pharaoh in haste dismissed the Israelites. The people heaped gifts upon them to hasten their departure. They marched by way of the Red Sea, and encamped between the mountains and the sea. Pharaoh followed them with an army intending to force them back.

I. ISRAELITES SAFE. (19—22.) What happened?

God's angel moved between them and their enemies.

Pillar of cloud also moved behind them.

Was light to Israel, darkness to Egyptians.

Then Moses stretched his hand over the sea.

God caused the sea to divide as by a wind.

A passage stood open before them in the sea.

The Israelites marched through on dry ground.

March lasted all night—half a million men.

Women and children four times as many.

Truly the God of Hosts was their refuge.

II. EGYPTIANS LOST. (23—29.) Where were they?

Obliged to keep still till morning light.

At first dawn pursued Israelites right into the sea.

But God sent a mighty storm. (Ps. lxxvii. 18.)

Rain, hail, lightning terrified the Egyptian hosts.

Their chariot-wheels also came off in the sea.

They fled in fear from God's anger and power.

Then followed a fearful catastrophe.

Moses, at God's command, stretched out his rod.

The sea returned in all its strength.

The Egyptians in vain tried to flee away from it.

But they were all overwhelmed in the waters.

Israel saw Egyptians cast up dead on the shore.

No one of the enemy survived to tell the tale.

LESSONS. 1. After Passover Feast came danger.

After great blessings often come great trials.

2. By faith they left Egypt, but faith soon failed.

God, however, continued His work for them.

"What time I am afraid I will trust in Him."

3. The Egyptians tried to resist God.

He turneth the counsels of heathen to naught.

4. They were led by the guiding light.

"Thy word is a lamp to my feet, and a light to my path."

THE TWO BENS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "COLONEL KIT."

BIG BEN had just struck seven; little Ben, sitting on a seat on the Embankment, looked across and counted the deep strokes. He nodded approvingly; then, as somebody edged him against the arm of the seat, he got up and moved away. Ben was hump-backed, pigeon-chested, and altogether rather a miserable little object, yet his face had a bright intelligence and alertness that made him almost attractive.

He was short, and the parapet of the Embankment is high, but by placing his toes on the little projection, and hooking his outstretched arms over the broad top, he was able to look over. It was a very fair scene on which he gazed; the sun was setting, its level rays turned the muddy Thames water into a golden stream; up the river, the Houses of Parliament showed clearly, but the light haze which hung about gave an air of unearthliness to everything.

Ben blinked as the sunlight came into his eyes, but by turning a little, he had the shadow of a lamp to protect them, and he could look on with comfort. The river traffic did not attract him; he scarcely noticed the passing steamboats. This was his favourite time, but it was not always so pleasant. Ben could not understand why the sunset hour made him feel quiet and peaceful, but the sharp look of the London street-boy left his face, and was succeeded by one of gentleness and longing.

Ben's toes slipped, and he came down, grazing his cheek in so doing; he did not climb up again, but sauntered on, taking very little notice of the other ragged children who played about noisily. Across the water was St. Thomas's Hospital, and Ben was fond of watching the sick people, who spent a good deal of time in the fine weather on the verandah outside the wards. There was one young man whose bed used to be brought out in whom Ben took a great interest; but he had not been there lately, and the boy quite missed him.

The sun had gone down now, all the lights had faded out of the sky, and a little chilly breeze came from the water. Ben had crossed the bridge and passed the hospital, and was walking by the archbishop's palace and St. Mary's, Lambeth. He knew nothing of history, or his thoughts might have dwelt on the many things that had happened about there; he might have pictured James the Second's unfortunate queen waiting in the cold and darkness for her means of escape. Ben knew he liked the place, but could have given no reason for so doing; he liked, too, to look at the curious half-pagan monuments in the churchyard, which was so still and peaceful amidst the stir and turmoil of the sordid life around.

Outside the churchyard a man and woman were "having words;" but Ben did not feel interested, and turned to go back the way he had come. Most of the seats on the Embankment were occupied, but on one there was only an elderly gentleman at one end, and Ben took his place at the other, glancing now and then at his companion, as though to intimate that he was quite ready for conversation. Evening had quite settled down, and the great bell struck eight.

"Same name as me," said Ben, after counting the strokes.

"Indeed?" said his companion, looking a little amused.

"Yes," said Ben; then, as if he must do the honours of the place, "Often come here?"

The gentleman bent his head.

"Wonder I ain't seen you. What, going already, guv'nor? I'll look out for you to-morrer."

Mr. Grange went on his way, feeling curiously interested in the little waif. He had been bitterly disappointed in one he deeply loved, and from that time had shut his heart against love and friendship. Sometimes overtures had been made to him by those who pitied his loneliness, but they had been rejected so decidedly that there was no encouragement to try again. So now for many years Mr. Grange had led a solitary life in his old-fashioned house in South Lambeth. His housekeeper and servants did what he needed, then left him to himself, and lived their own more cheerful life in a different part of the house. Of late, Mr. Grange had taken to walking on the Embankment at night, sometimes not returning home till the small hours. His selfish, bitter life had left its impress on his face, which was by no means attractive now.

Yet somehow little Ben had been attracted by it; and next night, when Mr. Grange took to pacing the Embankment, he found the little arab following him.

Perhaps he was tired of his loneliness; and the boy seemed safe to speak to, and there was no one to notice; so, almost to his own surprise, the solitary man took to talking to his small admirer.

"You ought to be in bed," he said once, when it was late; but Ben's patient little shadow still followed him.

Ben grinned. "Ain't got no bed; sleep under arches if the coppers don't move me," he said.

"But haven't you anyone belonging to you?"

"Only him," answered Ben, with a sweep of his arm.

Mr. Grange was puzzled; there was no one very near him, but the great clock was chiming the quarter.

"Him," explained Ben; "he's just like a brother, and we've got the same name; and he don't never go on at a fellow, but just speaks kind and cheerful; even when it's too foggy to see him, he speaks up to say he ain't a-going to leave me."

Mr. Grange looked at the eager face rather pityingly, "So that's why you like to be here?" he said.

"Yes; seems as if he looks kind of sorrowful when I've been away long."

"Can you read, Ben?" asked Mr. Grange suddenly.

"No," said Ben. "When I lived with Aunt Bet, before she was took, someone said I had oughter go to school, but Aunt Bet ups and says, 'Bless yer soul! don't bother the boy; he'll never be a growed-up man: and better for him, such a poor little 'natomy,' he concluded, as calmly as if talking of someone else."

"Do you know what she meant?" asked Mr. Grange.

"Meant I shall die," Ben said indifferently.

"Have you ever heard of God, Ben?" said Mr. Grange.

"Him as people speak to, though they can't see Him?" said Ben, in an awestruck whisper.

"Yes, Ben; may He take you to Himself when you pass from this world!"

Ben would have liked to ask some questions, but Mr. Grange had turned away, and was striding hastily homewards. The man was strangely stirred and shaken by the child; the voice of conscience which he had stilled for so long was making itself heard again. For long he had kept apart from his fellow-men, holding out no helping hand to those who were perishing around; now he was making up his mind to help the poor little deformed waif who had come into his path.

Next evening Mr. Grange went to the Embankment rather earlier than usual; Ben was there, but was not looking out for him, and he watched him from a distance. He felt shy and nervous over the task he had set himself, and wondered which would be the best way to put it to the boy.

Ben had hooked himself on to the wall in his usual fashion; his sharp little chin rested on the cold stone, and his great hungry eyes watched his big namesake admiringly; some of the sunset light caught his rough fair hair, then shone out fully, and wrapped him in a momentary glory.

"Altogether rather a miserable little object."—p. 508.

"Chi-ike!" suddenly yelled a voice in his ear; it was only a boy coming up from behind, who was bent on mischief, but intended no harm. Ben was startled; his hands and feet slipped, he struggled for a moment, then fell backwards in a heap.

Mr. Grange looked to see him get up as if nothing had happened; but, instead, when he tried to rise he sank back again with an agonised groan.

"Why, you ain't hurt?"

"I dunno," Ben gasped; but some of the terror left his face as Mr. Grange bent over him. "No, don't touch me; let me be here," he cried out.

"But I must. There, my dear lad, the worst part is over," Mr. Grange said quite tenderly, as he held him in his arms; but he was quite at a loss what to do next. However, the other boy had a suggestion ready. "Take him to the hospital, Mister," he said, nodding towards St. Thomas's; "they'll do him good."

"Thank you," said Mr. Grange, moving off quickly.

The doctors at the hospital looked very grave over little Ben; there was an internal injury, they said, and they might have to perform an operation; at any rate, they must keep him; and Mr. Grange went away, knowing that the little fellow was in good hands.

When he went to the hospital next day, he was told that Ben was in a serious condition, and must have been before his fall; they would do what they could to relieve him, but nothing else was possible. Had he any relations? If so, they might come to him at any time.

Ben, lying in his white bed in a nest of pillows, greeted his friend with a smile that had something of entreaty in it.

"He wants something, sir," said the nurse who was standing there; "it's someone he wants to see, I think. 'The other Ben,' he calls him."

"The clock; isn't that it?" asked Mr. Grange; and Ben brightened and looked more satisfied. The ward he was in did not face the river; but when the authorities were told of the boy's great desire, he was moved into another; and whenever the weather permitted, his bed was wheeled outside.

"It's very comfortable here," he said one day to his friend; "and the big'un, he's easy in his mind now I'm so well off."

Mr. Grange had bitterly regretted that his resolve to help the little waif had come so late; very falteringly, feeling how far behind he was in practice, he tried to teach the child of better things. It was quite wonderful to see how much Ben could grasp and understand, and it seemed as if the evil amidst which he had lived had not been allowed to harm him. The Good Shepherd had watched and guarded His lamb, and now was leading him into the fold of Paradise.

"He just has been kind!" said Ben one day, as he looked at a picture of the Good Shepherd, "and I can't do nuffin for Him; and the thorns hurt Him so."

"You are doing something for Him now, Ben, as you try to be patient in your pain and weakness," said Mr. Grange gently.

Ben shook his head. "T ain't nuffin!" he said. "He's done such a lot for me."

Such a lot! Aye, He had indeed; but Mr. Grange's heart smote him as he thought of the boy's deformed, neglected, unloved life, and of what his own had been. How was he treating the Heavenly Father who had done so much for him? At that moment he made a prayerful resolve to do better in future.

"Stop with me, guv'nor," pleaded Ben one day, in a strangely weak voice; the thin little fingers grasped his own, the great dark eyes looked at him imploringly, and Mr. Grange stayed.

Ben's was the only bed out on the verandah, and it was sheltered as much as possible; the boy had begged so hard to be where he could see his namesake, that he had his way. Mr. Grange sat at his side; nurses and doctors came to look at him every now and then, and went away again softly.

Ben lay very still; when Big Ben chimed the quarters or struck the hours he responded with a smile or weak motion of his hands. His fingers plucked at the counterpane; once Mr. Grange laid his own on them, but they would not be stilled.

"Guv'nor, where are you?" he cried presently.

"Here I am, my dear; I have not left you."

"I can't see you; it's getting very dark. Oh, guv'nor, hold me!"

The sun was setting behind clouds, but great shafts of light came from them, while higher still little golden and crimson clouds floated over the blue. The boy's eyes were dim and frightened, and he moved his head from side to side.

"Lighten our darkness, we beseech Thee, O Lord," prayed Mr. Grange, in words with which he had once been familiar.

Ben heard, and the words brought into his mind something he had learnt in the hospital: "Through the darkness be Thou near me; watch my sleep till morning light," he said.

Morning light was very near for him, though over the city the sun had set and twilight was fast turning into darkness. "T ain't dark now," he said, as if surprised, as he turned his head restfully. Then he lay still.

And Big Ben, as it solemnly struck seven, almost seemed to tell of a triumph.

* * * * *

Ben's is a very short, perhaps unsatisfactory, life-story; but there is one at least who is ceaselessly thankful for it. Mr. Grange no longer lives a selfish, solitary life; and in helping others he is himself blessed: in making them happy he finds true happiness.

"T ain't nuffin!"

THE LOVE WHICH IS OMNIPOTENT.

BY THE REV. HARRY JONES, M.A., CHAPLAIN IN ORDINARY TO HER MAJESTY.

"Charity never faileth."—1 COR. xiii. 8.

THESE are daring words to utter in face of the wide belief that "all things come to an end": "Charity never faileth." It is true that St. Paul puts it on the same pedestal with "faith" and "hope." These abide, but have what might be called a personal limited range and use. They strengthen a man's own hold on God's laws and help; they cheer his course and brighten his life. But "charity" concerns our relation to others. It is shown in the way we carry ourselves towards our fellow-men; and it is especially in regard to its "power" in doing this that I wish to notice how it "never faileth." What is this grace?

We can hardly say that it is the same as love. It means, also, that deliberate consideration and forbearance which we can exercise in dealing with those for whom we cannot entertain a tenderness prompted by what we commonly call "love." True "charity" involves many efforts. "Love," as generally understood, requires no pressure for its application; we do not command, but obey it. It acts spontaneously, and does not need to be explained. Indeed, it cannot be explained. St. Paul does not attempt to describe the indescribable. The "charity," however, enjoined by him is set forth at some length, so that we may be well advised what it is we have to show and do. It suffereth long, and is kind; envieth not; vaunteth not itself; is not puffed up; doth not behave itself unseemly; seeketh not her own; is not easily provoked; thinketh no evil; rejoiceth not in iniquity, but in the truth; beareth, believeth, hopeth, endureth all things.

Love is thus believing and hopeful when we are under its influence, and carry ourselves tenderly towards those for whom we cannot help feeling affection. But charity can be deliberately exercised in bearing, hoping, enduring, under circumstances which do not compel us to show kindness. When, on the contrary, we are tempted to yield to provocation, or to become weary in well-doing, we may see that manifold grace which gives its excellence to "charity." It is in chief measure by the use of this that we can find how charity never faileth, not merely as "abiding" when other things "cease," vanish, or are "done away," but as giving us the greatest "power" in bearing or doing what has to be borne or done.

Life is crowded with duties and trials, great and small. We can hardly pass a day without being touched by something which tests our endurance or influence, and in meeting which we want strength. This need is felt on many occasions. It may come when the cross is laid upon us in some presumably depressing shape, expected or unexpected. If it comes, e.g., in the form of natural decay, in the ordinary course of human life, some are tempted to resent and deplore it, to kick against the inevitable pricks of time, the slow result of wear and tear. But as we have, as all share, the love of God, a door of escape is opened to us. There is no wear and tear of the faithful, trusting soul. The heart in communion with God is in touch with immortality. We accept a condition which is insufferably distasteful to those who have no such sense of resort, but which denotes no failure in our Father's treatment of us, and does not weaken the bond between ourselves and Him.

That bond does not depend upon time and place for its continuance and strength.

So, too, when a trouble is unexpected, charity enables us to endure, and feel that the sorrow is no sign of the withdrawal of God's care for His children.

As we apprehend and share the love of Christ, tribulation leads us still more to commit ourselves into His Father's hands. We may, indeed, try to thrust away the cross. We may seek to ignore it with spasms of fictitious bravery, which pass away and leave us, and let us drop into moods of disappointment and vexation.

But there is always some good to be had out of sorrow when we take it as coming from God.

Many of the occasions, however, which prove us and measure our ability in endurance or influence, arise in our dealings with our fellows. Here the "power" of charity is seen and shown when everything else is found wanting. Its might appears in our dealing with the sick, who are sometimes, naturally enough, peevish, inconsiderate, and inappreciative, however wise and well-intentioned the efforts to relieve them may be. But charity gives power to our purpose. The very term "Sister of Charity," accorded to those who supplement the physician in ministering to such as are bodily distressed, suggests the use of that power which never faileth.

Considerate and attentive kindness, then works wonders, which no expostulation or reasoning can bring about. So, also, in dealing with the young. I do not mean that punishments are never to be inflicted. God punishes, chastises. And we know that the prospect or perception of some materially unpleasant alternative will sometimes produce a salutary result in the case of children whose obstinacy has to be overcome. But (again and again) wise teachers have found an influence in the charity St. Paul speaks of, which is effective when all other methods of treatment have been tried in vain. This can break down the barrier, dissolve the young but stubborn tenacity with which a child occasionally tries to hold a position of resentment towards its parent or instructor.

So also when we are confronted, not with the peevishness of the sick or forwardness of the young, but have to bring about some desirable end with perverse, opinionated, or sullen people, who doggedly refuse to listen to the clearest reasons, or even to be moved by considerations which appeal to their best interests. Then St. Paul's charity ignores all these motives, applies an inducement quite apart from the other direct methods which have been tried, and has been found to have an unsuspected effect.

They say that when a stable is on fire it is almost impossible to drag a horse away from the approaching flames, but if, in the midst of the uproar and alarm, you simply and gently put a saddle on his back, he is dislodged from his attitude of resistance, and suffers himself to be led quietly out. So in the case of some urgent importance, when the methods of compulsion or impression which most naturally suggest themselves have been used in vain with a seemingly immovable mind, the application of charity, if it cannot be said to bring obstinate people to their senses, takes them (so to speak) righteously off their guard, and leads them to the result which is desired. The dullest souls and hardest hearts have been thus reached. Charity never faileth.

So, too, charity prevails when we have to meet deliberate provocation and survive hindrances purposely thrown in our way. The charity of which St. Paul speaks "endureth all things," "is not easily provoked." There is an incalculable store of resistance and power of survival in abstinence from rejoinder. I do not mean that dogged calculating patience, which lies low and keeps dark for a time in order to smite all the harder when it sees an opportunity, but the spirit which thinketh no evil, will not impute bad motives, tries at least not to magnify them, though it may be affection to ignore their existence. Charity discerns the best in adversaries, and, if an opening should come, does not use it in leaping on a careless foe, but abstains from recrimination and reproach.

Charity never faileth—at least, the failure is not that of charity itself. Its treasure-house of influence is not empty because its stores are rejected. It does not shrink back, feeling that a mistake has been made, but rejoiceth in the truth, even though the true way may have been scorned.

And it is thus powerful because in all these uses of charity a man is kept up by the knowledge that the excellent way he has adopted in dealing with this or that difficulty is the Christian way, the way of Him who, though He was crucified, has all power given unto Him in heaven and in earth, and (which is best to the point) is with His disciples, His brethren, always, even unto the end of the world.

PRAYER FOR THE HOLY SPIRIT.

GOD, Who once at Pentecost
Sentest down the Holy Ghost:
Grant us by that Spirit's light
Evermore a judgment right;
Through the Son, Who reigns with Thee
In that Spirit's unity.

God, Who by Thy Spirit taught
Humble souls that asked and sought:
Grant that He to us may bring

All His holy comforting;
Through the Son, Who reigns with Thee
In that Spirit's unity.

God, Whose Spirit came to guide
Faithful people to Thy side:
Let Him lead us to that shore
Whither Christ is gone before;
Through the Son, Who reigns with Thee
In that Spirit's unity.

THE VILLAGE BY THE BURN.

A STUDY IN STILL LIFE.

BY KATHLEEN WATSON, AUTHOR OF "MY LITTLE MAN."

WAY in northern Britain there is, far from towns and the turmoil of the same, the queerest cluster of huts and hamlets that was ever called a village. Milton of Edradour is the long grand name by which it is officially known, yet to none of those who tread as children of the soil its one broken dreamy way was it ever other than Balnauld, which being interpreted is, The Village by the Burn.

Bubbling and gurgling from the distant heights, down it rushes, that clear yellow burn, widening where the old distillery and the village hamlets lie alongside, making, as it goes, a constant music: sometimes stormy, sometimes sad—a music which, like the love we have always with us, we seldom rightly value till we lose it.

About the little hamlets and the barns, the slanting turf-thatched roofs, the tumbling bridge of pine planks, and the grey stone distillery on the other side, there is a charm which is hardly to be caught, held fast, and straightway set down stiffly and securely in black and white. Should you greatly care to grasp the magic and the mystery of that charm, you must go there often and sit there long, and open heart as well as mind to the gentle old-world influences around, otherwise the Village by the Burn may be no more to you than was the primrose by the river's brim to him of fame inglorious if enduring.

As you draw near it from the east, through the high-lying barley-lands which are whitening to the northern harvest now, you must be made of stern stuff indeed if no faint smile escapes you at first sight of that Village by the Burn. Since, so queerly and irregularly are the cottages pieced and patched and knocked together, that they look for all the world as though they had been flung down from the mountain-sides to the little hollow of Balnauld, and then left standing just as they chanced to pitch.

On certain of the roofs odd little lumps show forth, and compel the inquiring to wonder concerning the necessity of their being. It seems that once, long years ago, the fever of a certain fashion ran its course among the simple natives of Balnauld, and the fashion was—to own an eight-day grandfather's clock, and have it standing proudly and serenely "ben the hoose"!

Now, grandfather's clocks stand high, and Balnauld roofs stand low, exceeding low; and since it was apparent that the clocks were not made for the roofs, it became also apparent that the roofs, or at least little corners of them, must be made for the clocks. Holes were therefore made in the thick brown thatch, the clocks, fitted firmly in the earthy floor below, and the thatch brought once more over the obstruction in a thickly piled-up mound or lump.

I understand that it became rather a mark of honour than otherwise to have this peculiarity attached to the plain monotony of your roof; for did it not proclaim aloud to every neighbour round, that you at least were of the fortune-favoured few who could afford to live up to the fashion of the hour? Yet, side by side with the humour, there nearly always is the pathos of it too. For dear old Hendry Gelatly, who saved for long and weary years to buy his clock, putting by a bawbee here and another there, till the old tankard on the narrow shelf grew rich and heavy with the fruits of his denial—he even had the hole made in the roof, ready for the reception of his dear one, long before he was near the winning of her. He used to say it encouraged him "powerful" to persevere. Then dark days fell upon him thick and sore, and to ease the dying years of one who had done him grievous wrong, the bawbees and the little "siller" pieces were taken one by one from the old blue tankard on the shelf, and now . . . Hendry's hair is white, and he sits by his fireside looking sadly sometimes at the hole and the vacant place—just as you and I will look back some day on the sweet brave plans we made for our lives, and wonder mutely at the Providence which laid them all so low.

"His little heart was far away."—p. 514.

"Placed the poor tuneless thing on the topmost shelf."—p. 515.

I told this story of the queer old roofs to some people in London the other day—terrible people they were—who rather thought I was trying to "get at them" with the whole thing. But the truth is sometimes very odd and quaint; . . . and Hendry's vacant clockless hole remains.

The population of Balnault, all told, numbers eighty-seven souls; and, strangely enough, among them all, in things pertaining to the swine, there is but one pig-sty, and one pig only; nobody owns him, it seems. Two old ladies have a life-interest in him; that is to say, they dwell next door to him, and throw their scraps to him, and have acquired an undoubted prestige from living in such close and constant intimacy with him; but legally, he is no more theirs than is he yours or mine. His sty is built against one of the tumbling stone walls; split pine-trunks enclose it, old barrels from the distillery are ranged against its one side. Sometimes the hens and chickens stroll up from their home a little lower down the brae, and look in at the hospitably unlatched pig-sty door. The pig does not give himself the airs which his perfect independence might entitle him to; he is a general favourite, and one, moreover, whose proud boast it is that he always keeps open house.

I chance to think of him just now, because, with his heavy confident strut, he recalls to me one of the saddest scenes I have lived through, a scene at which he, with his suite of hens, chickens, and a couple or so of stray ducklings, assisted also.

It was in this way. Just across the road, opposite the pig-sty, is a tiny white-washed cottage, a trifle ruder and rougher than all the rest, perhaps. Its humble roof was never broken that an eight-day grandfather's clock might stand up, straight and proud, in the one poor room below; for grimdest poverty has ever been the heritage of those who have dwelt and struggled there. There, sixteen years ago, was born a little Highland laddie, the last of a family of ten. At twelve years old, when his brief schooldays were done, they sent him to a hill-side farm where his brothers, one and all, had laboured before him. But while he was cleaning out the stables, tending the lambs and cows, washing the pails, or working in the fields from dawn to dusk, his little heart was far away with the clouds and mountains, the sweet waters and the dancing lights, the waving woods and the braes of heather. All these things, which were mute to those for whom he toiled, spoke, nevertheless, to him in a language which they who once have listened to will count the world well lost if they may but hear it evermore. That is to say, that though he was but a little shepherd-lad, his soul was brave with the passion and the instinct of the artist.

By chance it fell that a stranger sojourning at the farm for a summer week or two, took notice of the little lad, his earnest deep dark eyes, his seriousness, and his smiles so far away. Before they parted he gave him, in remembrance of their talks together, an old violin which he said he had no longer time to use himself. Then came the deluge, for it was as though one had given wings to a wee caged bird and let it loose into the sunshine. At last the boy had found that through which he might give expression to the beauty of the dear dream-world in which he so continually moved.

But with this great new thing that came into his life, the little trivial things which mean the daily bread were sadly left to slide. He was for ever forgetting what he had been told to do, and doing what he should have left undone, and thrashings made him none the wiser. One day when he had finished planting a plot with potatoes, he deliberately dug each one out again as methodically as he had put it in. As a matter of fact, while his little body had been with the potatoes, his soul was on the mountaintops with a melody of magic meaning. But they rosy dawn he crept to his home and his broken violin like a little wounded animal. He was never very strong, and after the chill there came a fever, and then a weakness from which there was no recovery. At first they did not know that he was dying: he lay on his low narrow bed so white and still, his eyes turned ever to his violin on the upper shelf, but he never spoke of it or asked that he might be allowed to hold it in his hands just once again.

Until someone passing by heard all the pitiful little story, and had the violin made strong and beautiful once more: and on the afternoon of the day before he died, the echoes of a very sweet old song rang up the broken road without. The pig and his followers came across to listen: the homely procession of beast and bird entered in at the open door and stood in a solemn line against the wall: the sun hung low in a yellow sky: a curious glow shone in through the thick small panes of knotted glass. And this is a fragment of the song to which that little dying boy tuned his violin for the last time—drove him home with bitter words and blows, and his angry father, with the awful cruelty of ignorance, dashed the violin from his hands, and tore the tender strings asunder one by one, and placed the poor tuneless thing high on the topmost shelf, with a grim stern order concerning its removal thence.

Then that agonised little boy went about his daily work with a heart more truly broken than many a love-lorn lady's has ever been. . . . And one sharp dewy night he lay under the stars on the cold hillside, tending a little lamb that seemed to be dying, and a sudden chill took hold of him, and in the

I hied away to Annie:
The time flew by with tentless heed,

Wi' sma' persuasion she agreed
To see me through the barley."

His own melodies were dead within him, but he remembered his mother's favourite song. And surely, somehow, the little Village by the Burn is the richer for the tiny flame of genius that once was born and perished there!

CHAPTER VII.

A VISIT TO TOWN.

"I walk to love and life alone
Over these mournful places, Across the summer overthrown."

"It sometimes happens in life, as though everything, after apparently agreeing to work steadily up towards a certain crisis, fails at the last moment. We await the event; no one can say what is lacking, but suddenly things are put altogether on another level of life. A letter which is not answered, a call on business, some little interruption—and our fate is changed.

After that evening at Deepfen, life could never be quite the same again to Rowan. She had let herself insensibly be influenced by the spirit of the place, by Nurse's talk, by the old-world memories lingering there, even by her unusual dress, by Amyot's masterful love-making, into a dreamy acquiescence in a feeling, the recollection of which, the next morning, startled and confounded her. She looked at the fingers he had kissed, and was angry with his daring, until her memory conjured up the vision of the tall strong figure in its becoming evening dress, the gleam of the dark eyes in the half-light of the old-fashioned room, even the curl of the short hair as he leant towards her. Her frame thrilled. She drew her breath quickly, and a light came into her beautiful eyes. What did it mean?

At breakfast her father spoke very little. He was busy with his letters and papers; and Rowan had leisure, not only for her engrossing thoughts, but also to read and think over a long letter from her London aunt, which was her portion of the morning's correspondence. It contained a pressing invitation for a month's visit.

"Too late for any drawing-room this year; but you must see some of the gaieties, my dear, and the pictures. I know these always appeal to you country people more than the study of our manners and customs. At any rate, my dear, come—before it gets too hot and odious."

Rowan sat striving with herself. She did not want to go to London. With amazement she realised that pictures, and manners, and customs, were all equally uninteresting to her. Her thoughts were satisfied with the picture she had witnessed yesterday: the waving green flat, the white-shirted navvies in the distance, the sparkling inflowing sea. Her sympathies were all enlisted in the ambitions of one masterful man. And what picture could present a deeper tragedy than that lonely life on the sea-bank? If Rowan's nature had not been a very sincere one, she would almost have persuaded herself that, for the sake of that poor lonely woman, she must remain at home now, and try to make up to her in some measure for the long years of exile. The thought did come into her head, but she pushed the hypocrisy aside. She saw the wisdom of her father's counsel after she had narrated to him the scene with her aunt.

"You cannot thrust yourself upon her," he had said. "But I will go, now that you have broken the ice, and see what I can do with her. And yes, my dear," he went on, "I should like you to accept your aunt's invitation. Can you be ready by to-morrow, as she asks?"

"Yes, father."

"Then I will take you up, and come back on Monday for these meetings. You had better telegraph."

And so it was that Amyot, on presenting himself during calling hours the next afternoon, was met by the intelligence that Mr. and Miss Gayle had gone to London that morning.

"For long?" he asked the servant.

"Mr. Gayle returns on Monday, sir. But Miss Gayle is remaining with Mrs. Chester."

He could ask no more, and turned away a disappointed and uneasy man.

He could not help wondering at the cause of this sudden departure, and disquieted himself, in every way possible to a lover, during his homeward ride. Had he been too venturesome? Had he offended her? The blood rushed into his face at the thought. But no. She had given no evidence that his attentions were displeasing to her. She had not seemed to resent his daring.

And then, with a sudden bound of the heart, he recollected that London was not two hours away, that he had many friends there, and a most comfortable base for operations at his very pleasant club. It was Thursday. Now, he bethought himself that it was absolutely necessary to go up to see about some plans which were being prepared for the next week's meetings. It was no use waiting for them to arrive, and be possibly incorrect. He had better go himself, and make certain that they were all right.

So he paid a hasty visit to the fen, filled up the whole evening with business of various kinds, and the next day put himself in the train for London.

But by this proceeding he only ensured much disquiet to himself. After he had satisfied his conscience by inspecting his plans, Amyot spent the next two days in haunting every place frequented by the ladies who have the privilege in this life of doing nothing. He thought Rowan would be sure to ride. So he was in the Row for two hours, gazing steadfastly at every equestrian who approached him. Then he thought that she would be sure to drive. So, in company with a friend whom he had picked up at his club—none other, indeed, than his landlord and neighbour,

Lord Lescough, whom he had already had the art to interest thoroughly in his Fenshire schemes—he, for another two hours, stood by the railings or under the trees in the Park, and saw pass before him some of the youth and beauty of England. At last Lord Lescough, having the use of his eyes, asked with interest—

"Looking for somebody, Hardy?"

"Yes," Amyot answered, his face reddening.

"Oh!" said his lordship, smiling. "All right, old fellow. Good-luck to you!"

But no Rowan drove in the park that afternoon.

Then he reflected that it was Saturday. She would probably have gone somewhere. But how was he to find out where, amidst all the choice possibilities?

He agreed to dine with Lord Lescough and go to a concert: an especial concert, which was sure to attract a new-comer from the country. And everybody there had the chance of remarking a big young man with a magnificent physique and gleaming eyes, who surveyed the whole house in the most careful manner instead of attending to the music. He was written about in the papers the next week as a distinguished foreign detective. Lord Lescough let him alone. Except just when they parted, he said, smiling, "Try church parade to-morrow. That'll fetch her." Amyot returned the smile, but shook his head.

"Not that sort," he answered. Then he went on, "And you will really come down with me on Tuesday morning? Then we shall get our way. They won't go against you. I see my village built; I can even smell the narcissus."

Some few days after this, Rowan received a letter from her father, together with a Lescough Gazette, which, he said, told in detail what was too long to write.

"We have been having quite an excitement down here," he wrote. "Lord Lescough turned up with Hardy for the meeting; they both dined and slept here, my dear. Lord Lescough told me about you. And we had a very full meeting, and tremendous interest shown. Hardy spoke very well: indeed, some of us thought, better than Lord Lescough—and everybody got excited. The result is that Hardy is to undertake the engineering work next spring as soon as labour can begin—provided that what he has already done stands the storms and high tides of the autumn and winter. The money is to be raised by a voluntary rate on adjoining property. We shall have to find a large share. But Lord Lescough is as hopeful as Hardy, and guarantees a large amount. And I suspect it is he who has been at Hardy's back all along. So glad you are enjoying yourself so much. No, my dear, I am not lonely. This business is very engrossing."

"Gazing steadfastly at every equestrian who approached him."—p. 516.

Rowan was enjoying her gaieties, and acting as an excuse to her sociable aunt for much party-giving and going. Mrs. Chester did not approve of girls hiding themselves away in the country—and such country, too! How could they be seen and known in the heart of the fens? She wished her brother would again let the Abbey, and live in a more convenient neighbourhood: at any rate, until Rowan was properly settled. For she could not possibly marry anyone down there. There was no one to marry. And "down there" was connected with that unpleasant family scandal. It would not conduce to Rowan's success to have that old story raked up against her. Mrs. Chester always pushed the ugly recollection away, whenever it intruded on her.

As a girl, she had bitterly resented the conduct of her sister in throwing so terrible a cloud over the family. She turned deaf ears now to any hints or suggestions of Rowan, and got quite agitated when at last one day Rowan spoke out.

They were sitting in the pretty sweet-scented morning-room in Mrs. Chester's pretty red house at Kensington, overlooking the gardens. Rowan had now been nearly a month in London, and her delicate bloom was giving way to a pallor and air of fatigue which her aunt secretly resented.

She had been much admired, her aloofness and quiet dignity giving her an individuality which was acknowledged to be picturesque even by girls whose manners and appearance least resembled hers. Mrs. Chester was delighted with her success, and was leaving no stone unturned to crown it with a marriage which she felt sure was now in Rowan's power.

"If only she would be a little more interested," she thought, trying unsuccessfully to fathom the meditations which lay behind the abstracted gaze of Rowan's beautiful eyes.

"What are you thinking about, my dear?" she asked at last. "Has your ride tired you? I think you go out too early."

"I prefer it, Aunt. I am afraid I was not meant for a town life. I don't care to ride when everybody rides."

"What does your father say to-day?" Mrs. Chester asked, seeing that Rowan was pretending to answer a letter received from her father that morning.

"Read it, Aunt. I think he will be glad now when I go home, though he was so independent at first. And he wants you to go too."

"No, thank you, my dear," said Mrs. Chester hastily. "I have no pleasurable recollections of Lescough. I never wish to see it again."

And then as she read, her brow clouded, and an angry flush mounted to her pleasant face. She gave back the letter to Rowan, saying wrathfully—

"I wonder at my brother! It is insupportable that he should have any dealings with that man!"

"What man, Aunt?" Rowan asked, startled, taking back her letter and glancing down the sheet.

"Those disreputable Hardys! How he could demean himself to dine there I cannot imagine, or to have any communication with them."

Rowan's eyes flashed out an unwonted fire. She sat up in her low chair, every fibre of her body alert and tense.

"They are not disreputable," she said slowly. "I have dined there, Aunt."

Mrs. Chester gazed amazedly at the transformation in Rowan's aspect.

"You have! You, Rowan?" She almost gasped.

"Yes; why not? I don't know what you mean by disreputable. Disreputable!" she repeated passionately. "It seemed to me an exceedingly well-conducted, simple, home-like place."

"It is unaccountable to me," went on Mrs. Chester, "that Stephen can tolerate even the name. It is a disgrace. A man can do what a woman ought not. But that you should go there, Rowan!"

The tears were in Mrs. Chester's eyes, but Rowan looked at them mercilessly. She took them for tears of wrath—as perhaps they were.

The grey eyes and the tearful ones gazed at each other in quiet struggle, and Mrs. Chester said—

"Has your father not told you? But how could he? Why, you should not even look at a Hardy!"

"No, Aunt? And I have looked, and am none the worse."

"How can I tell?" the poor woman said piteously. "The last I heard of that household, a year or two ago, was so bad, that it was not fit for a decent person to go to."

"I daresay," said Rowan indifferently. "But all that has passed, and ought to be forgotten."

"And how about your own aunt? She may be there, too."

"Oh no! she is not," said Rowan. "Mr. Hardy would like to get her there if he could, but she won't go. I've seen her too, Aunt Mary."

"Upon my word, you have been very busy!" Mrs. Chester said sarcastically. "And does your father know that, too?"

"Yes. Father is sorry for her; and so am I."

"Then I am not. She deserves all she has to bear, whatever it is. She deliberately chose her own way, and must bear the consequences."

"Not consequences that her own nearest relations can save her from," said Rowan sturdily. "Life may be hard, and punishment will follow mistakes, but we ought not to make things harder. And she has borne enough."

"Then, for her sake, since you pity her," Mrs. Chester said triumphantly, "you ought to have no toleration for the Hardys. If ever a woman was brutally treated—I have heard—she was; and by one of them."

"And yet you have no compassion for her, Aunt! And he who treated her so is dead. Why should his sin be visited on somebody who is innocent? As well argue that her sins should be visited on me."

Mrs. Chester glanced across at the upright, indignant figure, and perhaps saw something in the gentle sternness of her niece's face which made her say falteringly, what a moment later she regretted bitterly having given voice to.

"And so they are, my dear. Do you suppose that anyone who knows that scandalous history would look upon you as they look upon a girl without such a scandal behind her? Such a thing taints a family for generations, unless it can be buried and forgotten. I know how men talk: 'Oh! she! Yes, one of her people ran away, and there was some talk of a murder, don't you know? Something bad in the blood.' And a girl from such a family is game for any man. He need not be too respectful; he can flirt without danger. Oh! I know only too well, my dear."

And then Mrs. Chester realised the mistake she had made.

Rowan was very white, and her grey eyes were fixed on her aunt, with the look of one who sees some fascinating horror from which she cannot turn away her gaze. Her lips moved, and some words were formed. Mrs. Chester, alarmed at the effect she had produced, heard the indistinct whisper—

"So long ago!" and then Rowan turned away her head.

"My dear, don't think of it so," she said, with compunction. "No one knows the story now. And no one would dream of behaving to you otherwise than respectfully," she added uneasily. Rowan was distant and aloof enough now in her manner with attentive eligibles, she reflected. It was stupid to say anything which would make her suspicious that they were ever wanting in respect. And Mrs. Chester, who thought she had very good reason for cherishing an ambitious hope for her niece's future, watched Rowan uncomfortably during the next few minutes.

"We have had almost a quarrel, my dear," she ventured presently, when she considered her to have recovered; "but I cannot help losing my temper about Lescough. I wish your father could be persuaded to come away, and let it or sell it. It seems to me we have every reason for dissociating ourselves from the place."

"It is my home," said Rowan slowly. "And I would rather bear any burden there may be to bear than try to shirk it. If there is disgrace, I am disgraced as much away as there."

She finished proudly, with her head in the air, looking, indeed, as if disgrace and she could never dwell together. And soon she wrote her letter, fixing the day for her return, and then got up softly, and went away to her own room.

But she had had a shock. As day after day passed since she left home, a faint wonder and uneasiness came into her mind at Amyot's silence and withdrawal. She heard of him constantly from her father. He seemed to be coming and going, and to be making himself busy as a citizen, as well as a farmer, land-surveyor, and engineer. He had been in London, she knew. Lord Lescough had mentioned that they had been at a meeting together. Lord Lescough, indeed, talked a good deal of him, which added to his own interest for Rowan; he told her a great deal more about what had been done in the fen than she had heard down at Lescough. It was one of her charms that she could listen with interest to it would seem, quite uninteresting details. And not only listen, but master their technicalities. Several times when they met at evening festivities, Rowan sat listening in peaceful quiet, amid the chatter and noise of moving throngs, to Lord Lescough's description of the work he and Amyot were now doing. And all the time Mrs. Chester was rejoicing, and other people were prophesying.

Why had Amyot never been near her? Why had she never even seen him since that evening, now a month ago, the mere recollection of which was sufficient to bring the hot blood into her face? She got a little angry as time went on; but always she thought of him.

To-day, as she sat by the window in her room, doing nothing but gaze over the trees in Kensington Gardens, picturesque in the blue haze in which a summer's day in London veils its beauties, she again recalled the events of that evening. But there was bitterness in her soul—the bitterness of a woman who believes herself lightly or carelessly dealt by.

"How dare he have done it?" she asked wrathfully, and unavailingly.

Her aunt's words had cut deep. "Game for any man! He need not be too respectful!"

Even while she thought it, Rowan's soul revolted in disbelief as regarded this special man. But why, why had he never come near her? Had he been, after all, only amusing himself? Flirting was a word of abhorrence to Rowan. She could not bring herself to use it or think of it in connection with herself. It was all very humiliating.

It was with a very chastened spirit that she dressed that evening for one of her last parties before returning home. Her aunt had been blaming herself inwardly, ever since her ill-judged speech in the morning, and was not much consoled when she noticed the expression on Rowan's face as they struggled up the wide staircase at Burlington House. Some people might have thought that it expressed but resignation at the press and the pushing; but Mrs. Chester knew that the pretty eyes were shining with a steely light most unusual to them, and that the plaintive curve of the soft young lips was not to be taken as a sign of weakness. Small encouragement would any man receive at Rowan's hands that night.

Mrs. Chester trembled for her scheme.

CHAPTER VIII.

AN ENCOUNTER.

"The low winds moan for dead sweet years,
The birds sing all for pain,
Of a common thing, to weary ears—
Only a summer's fate of rain,
Only a woman's fate of tears."

AN hour or two later, Rowan, listening idly, and with little enjoyment, to a renowned band, was sitting by her aunt's side, idly admiring a parterre of flowers, apparently growing in the floor before her. Lord Lescough came up presently with a hurried air, and stood before her.

"At last!" he said, somewhat breathlessly. "I have been looking for you everywhere, Mrs. Chester. I was afraid you had gone or had not come!"

"Not come!" Mrs. Chester exclaimed. "Why, this is Rowan's last festivity. Of course we came. Not that she has been enjoying it very much. Have you, Rowan?"

Lord Lescough thought that the eyes lifted to his were the sweetest, clearest, most limpid orbs he had ever seen.

"I have been enjoying it as usual," she said, a little indifferently. And then she took Lord Lescough's arm, and they sauntered off.

Some people standing in a doorway near, made outspoken remarks as they disappeared. It was apparently nothing to them that Mrs. Chester sat in their immediate neighbourhood.

"Oh, yes—quite settled, I believe," a gentleman said. "It has been going on some time, and was foreseen from the first. She is a nice girl."

"And from his own marshes, I believe. They are neighbours in the country."

"His own marshes are going to be a jolly good thing for him," another said. "I wish I had some marshes. There's an engineering fellow going about who can beat Canute in his commands, and get minded, too. By George! you should hear him. I saw him with Lescough just now. There he is."

"And what does he do to beat Canute?" asked the other. "If it is that big black fellow, I should think he could beat most chaps not prize-fighters."

"Well, he says, 'Thus far you shall go,' etc.; you know the old tale, and the chair, and the seashore, and the courtiers, and the jolly wetting they all got? Well, it's like that. Only this fellow doesn't get a wetting."

"Is he a conjurer?"

"Jim haunts the Egyptian Hall still," laughed the narrator aside to another man. "No, Jim, he isn't a conjurer; but if you'd like to know, let's ask him. I know him a little."

So one of the good-natured trio, catching Amyot Hardy's eye, nodded, and beckoned him into their group.

"This little chap—he calls himself a sapper—is bursting with curiosity about you, Hardy. He wants to know how you rule the waves, and if you're a conjurer."

"You had better come and see," Amyot answered; "that is, if you really want to know. We shall be having an exciting time down there soon."

"How? King says you do the Canute business. He often talks rot."

"I have planted a good many acres of corn on seaboard land some feet below the sea-level at high tide; and nothing but twenty feet or so of dyke keeps the sea from swamping the whole place."

"But what did you do it for?"

"The land was waste. It is only once a year or so that there is really any danger. So I thought we would guard against that and use the land."

"And supposing you can't keep out the sea?"

"But I can, ordinarily. But there may be danger in the autumn; and if I don't get my corn cut before then—why, I shall be anxious."

"Did you really mean I could come and see?" asked the other cogitatively. "I should like it. How if your banks burst?"

"But they won't. They aren't made to burst."

"How if the sea rose up mountains high?"

"But it won't. It isn't its way without warning."

"I knew a girl——" began the other solemnly.

"So did most of us," another voice interrupted.

"This girl was washed away up at Filey. The sea just rose up thirty feet or so, and took her; so the people said who saw it. Sometimes the sea does what isn't expected of it."

"Yes," agreed Amyot. "Well, if it gets in this time I shall be a poorer man than I hope to be. But, at any rate, if you are in the same mind then, come and see. I've only an empty house, and shall be delighted to have you."

He spoke warmly. The boy's interest was soothing to the rather sore and disturbed mind he was now carrying about with him.

The month that Rowan had spent in London had been passed by Amyot in a kind of nightmare. First had come that unavailing pursuit, immediately after her departure, which he had to give up, in order to attend to his drainage meetings. The night that he and Lord Lescough had spent with Mr. Gayle at the Abbey had informed Amyot as to Rowan's whereabouts, from Lord Lescough's conversation about her. Amyot noticed that Lord Lescough was intimate with Mrs. Chester, and spoke of Rowan in connection with Rome and Florence, as if they had been accustomed to meet there. Amyot had somehow felt "out of it," as he expressed it to himself. Then had followed a week full of business, during which he had found it quite impossible to get in even a flying visit to London. The work in the fen was being pressed on vigorously, with a view to the inclusion of a much longer seaboard than Amyot had at first intended to include in this which he considered his trial attempt.

Meanwhile, Mr. Gayle had been informed by his sister of the hopes she entertained for Rowan—hopes which she had, indeed, good reason for entertaining. Lord Lescough was still a young man, though a widower, with one little daughter, and was a desirable match for any girl. He had met Rowan constantly during her childhood and girlhood abroad, and had always been attracted by her serene aloofness. She was restful, and yet suggestive. And latterly had come into his mind a warmer feeling, as Mrs. Chester had divined; but he greatly feared it was not reciprocated by its object.

In the third week of Rowan's absence Amyot had boldly asked Mr. Gayle if he could carry any message to her when he announced his own departure for London. No message had been entrusted to him, but Mr. Gayle had uttered a few enigmatical sentences which had greatly disturbed and discouraged Amyot. He had called twice unavailingly; but his cards on the hall table had never been seen by Rowan; and if Mrs. Chester recognised to whom they belonged, she had never alluded to him.

He went everywhere where he would be likely to meet Rowan: to picture-galleries, concerts, and even bazaars; but his time was short, and his work at home too important and engrossing, to allow him to neglect it. He returned the second time to Deepfen, feeling not only disheartened, but disturbed by rumours which had reached him at his club.

A few days' serious and successful work; and now a third time he was in London, staying with Lord Lescough for one night only. He had been persuaded to accompany his host to this party, where men—"and such a man!" as Lord Lescough laughingly told him—would be very welcome.

He had been conscious of a slight impatience and hurry in Lord Lescough's manner: an eagerness, in fact, to be off to his dissipation, which, in Amyot's knowledge of him, was unusual. And his own fears had made him guess the truth; though, at the same time, he had willingly snatched at the painful joy of seeing Rowan again. He had felt sure she was to be present, from Lord Lescough's manner; and had only missed approaching her with him, by being stopped on his arrival to speak to a friend.

As he was talking now, his eyes were roaming in all directions in search of her, high over the head of the good-looking elderly lady sitting close by, who had just turned her eyes in startled scrutiny of himself. For it had just penetrated Mrs. Chester's unwilling mind, from the scraps of conversation she had been overhearing, that this distinguished-looking man could be none other than a hated Hardy.

To say that she was immensely surprised is to give a very small description of the chaos of wonder that filled her mind. The boor, the brute, the clod that she had considered him—this! How came he here? What did it mean? He seemed to know people. An uneasy feeling filled her mind. She could not but acknowledge that in looks and appearance, at least, he was anything but what she had supposed.

And then suddenly, like an electric flash, there came over the face she was observing an indescribable expression. The dark eyes were full of fire, the whole face glowed, the attitude of easy grace became rigid with feeling. A presentiment of evil almost made Mrs. Chester afraid to turn her head, to see what had caused this inexplicable change. She knew—as one does know things one would rather not—that Rowan was moving towards her cool and comfortable retreat, on Lord Lescough's arm. A pang shot through her as her eyes proved her conviction true. If only Lord Lescough had already spoken! But no: she could see that he hadn't.

The girl came forward, sweet and refined-looking, her dress making her more like a picture than ever: a desirable possession for any man, with that air of serenity which was her charm. Her head was slightly bent, her eyes downcast; she was listening to what Lord Lescough was saying, but, fatally perceptible to the experienced gaze bent upon her, here were none of the tremors and falterings of love.

In Lord Lescough's attitude certainly there was a certain triumph of possession, a lover-like eagerness, as he bent towards her. But he was only teasing her about a picture which they had been rather warmly discussing, of which Rowan had expressed great disapprobation. As she neared Mrs. Chester she lifted her head to make some laughing rejoinder. And then—her eyes met Amyot's.

The surprise was great, and for a second she faltered and lost her presence of mind. During that moment, Amyot saw all that he wanted to see—surprise, joy, emotion in the faltering gaze and flickering colour. The next, she had bowed slightly, and had turned to her aunt.

But Amyot held out his hand with an imploring look regardless of the interrupting figure, and put Rowan's on his arm before this manœuvre could be carried through, and his dark head was immediately bent in some earnest entreaty.

“Won't you give me one minute?” he was saying. He was not one to let his opportunity slip now he had got it. He pushed aside all his doubts and disturbances in the delight of Rowan's presence, and seized the chance his good-fortune had given him.

“I have so much to tell you. It has been like a nightmare. I found you gone. I followed, and could not find where you were staying. I have called in vain. I have tried to meet you everywhere. I have done all but write; and that I dared not. Come with me,” he went on rapidly. “I want to show you something.”

The eager compelling tones were sweetest music to Rowan's ear. No trace, here, of the disrespect or want of interest her aunt's words had suggested to her half-credulous imagination. Instead, an eager man, masterful and determined indeed, but tender, courteous, and above all, true.

She gave her aunt a backward glance as she allowed herself to be led onward through the nearest doorway: a glance in which compunction and triumph were strangely mingled.

And the two watchers, following her retreating form, saw the swaying of her slim figure towards Amyot's bending head: one of them, with a deep breath and a fierce tug at his heart-strings, recognising convincingly that his own cherished hopes were vain indeed.

"Who is that rude man?" Mrs. Chester asked angrily, striving to recall her scattered wits.

Lord Lescough gave a little laugh.

"My friend," he answered. "He isn't rude, Mrs. Chester."

"Is the man—I suppose the man's—a constituent? It must be a nuisance to have to be civil to such people."

"A constituent? Well, yes, in a way. He is staying with me. Don't you know him?" Lord Lescough asked a little curiously, for he was acquainted with the histories of his country neighbours.

Mrs. Chester did not reply. She was angrily fanning herself, her pince-nez on her nose; and was, perhaps, too much out of breath to have an answer ready.

"It is Amyot Hardy," Lord Lescough went on. "They have never let out, either of them, that—this—" he stopped, in some difficulty, remembering Amyot's anxious watching some weeks before.

"This!" snapped Mrs. Chester. "Rowan mentioned to me casually one day that her father knew the present tenant of Deepfen; but she apparently did not know the history of the place or its owners. Nor is it fitting she should."

"None so blind as those who won't see," was the homely comment on this speech that occurred to Lord Lescough, but he did not give it voice.

"Hardy," he said, later that night, when they were having their final chat in Lord Lescough's smoking-room, "how is it you never happened to mention to me that you knew Miss Gayle—so well?"

Amyot glanced steadily into the mischievous eyes.

"Because I don't know her—well. To be quite accurate, this, I believe, is the eighth time I have seen her."

"Then perhaps you won't mind my saying that you've the very biggest cheek of anyone I know."

Amyot thought a minute or two. Then he said—

"And latterly—since I knew you knew her—so well—I have been afraid to speak of her at all. I heard—" and he stopped. "But I thought and hoped that I had reason not to believe it."

"You heard right," the other said presently, with feeling. "She is a sweet good girl. But I saw to-night that she will never be my little Molly's mother, as I will confess to you only, old fellow, I had hoped. I am afraid, though, you will find a good deal of opposition."

"When I am sure of—her—I shall not care a fig for opposition. But I should not dare—I should be a poor man, Lescough, if our schemes fail."

"And I," agreed the other, "shall be a poorer than I care for; but they won't fail." And then they parted.

As Amyot rode about his fields the next few days, his mind was full of her. And a change in the weather, which set in wet and cold at the beginning of August, only seemed to him the natural accompaniment to his own gloomy and discomposing thoughts. It gave him a great deal to do and think of, and provided him with much cause for anxiety and foreboding. The works in the marsh were interfered with and delayed: the pumps were in constant use. And, in spite of all, the constant downpour made the ripening ears of grain hang heavy and sodden on their bending stalks. The flat fen country is apt to be depressing in rainy weather, if the accompanying thoughts are also of a discomfiting kind.

As Amyot viewed, morning after morning, his blurred windows, saw the flowers outside heavy with unseasonable wet, listened to the swish, swish of the rainy trees, and beheld the outlines of his wide landscape only in glimpses through enclosing mists which never seemed to rise, faint miserable doubts chased one another through his mind. How could he ask Rowan to come to such dreary exile? What right had he to seek to tie down a bright young life to this solitary and inhospitable fen? And when he remembered Lord Lescough's many advantages, and the very different prospects he could offer, a great impulse of renunciation almost came into Amyot's purpose.

Almost—not quite. Love could overmaster solitude and rainy days, he remembered, and could be lord of all, even in an inhospitable fen. So much the more, indeed, as so much would be demanded of it. And if she loved him—if she would love him! Amyot grew breathless at the thought.

Early one afternoon, after a week of almost incessant toil, when, after riding about all day, he had come home night after night wet through, when he was beginning to be filled with anxious fears, not for his corn only—that would be past caring for if the present weather continued another week—but for the safety of the dyke itself, he was riding again towards Lessdyke, when just as he reached the turning from Deepfen on to the turnpike, his attention was caught by the sight of a brougham rapidly approaching.

Only a doctor would be driving about on such a day, he thought; but this brougham looked too smart to be a doctor's, and the horses were travelling at a rapid pace. A prevision of the truth rushed across his mind, as previsions sometimes will when wishes go before them. One characteristic was always in Amyot's favour. He was not slow to seize upon opportunities. He stayed his horse and waited, recognising horses and coachman, and—yes—Rowan, alone in the carriage.

His hat came off with a sweep, and the horses were pulled up in obedience to his signal. His own horse proving restive, he was off in a moment and at the open carriage window, with a glow of the delight in his heart reflected on his face.

Was it fancy? or did Rowan smile gladly too, as she laid down her book on her lap, and leant forward.

"What a downpour! What weather!" she said. "Father is terribly anxious about the corn. Are you?"

"It is past being anxious for about here," he answered, all his dismal doubts vanishing as his eyes feasted on the soft curves of her cheek and chin, and drew her every soul through the beautiful eyes.

"And he is getting anxious, too, about my poor aunt at Lessdyke. He tried to see her again the other day, after he left you. But she would make no sign, if she were at home. So I am going to try again. Father is very concerned, too, about the dyke. Are you anxious?"

She let her soft eyes rest on his, and Amyot's heart bounded at her tone.

"Anxious! yes. But only"—he pulled himself up, and went on in more restrained accents—"if the work fails now, it will have to be done over again. I shall feel it hard to wait; that is why I am anxious."

His eyes said what his words implied, and her soft eyes fell.

"Yes. I—we have been thinking a good deal about it."

Then she went on—

"Someone told father that there were signs of the bank giving: that is why I came. We wondered if the cottage would be quite safe—if, under all circumstances—"

"Quite safe there," he assured her. "I have never heard a whisper or seen a sign of the bank giving. But even if it did, unless there was a most unusual tide, or the river overflowed in some impossible manner, no danger could reach that cottage. The whole land would be under water first."

"And that isn't possible?"

"No—I think not. Of course, one does hear of an unusual set of circumstances, such as an eagle, feet instead of inches high, and a strong wind and a spring tide all together. You know Jean Ingelow's poem?"

"Oh, yes."

"But that was not quite hereabouts. We are more sheltered—generally. May I come in to-morrow some time, and hear how you speed to-day? I shall be at the sessions."

"Father will be glad. He is very dull. Come to lunch, if you can."

And then, as the carriage drove on, he took his hat off again, and had a battle with his big black horse, who wanted to try a race with Mr. Gayle's chestnuts, and succeeded in exciting them to a suspicious speed, in spite of all Amyot's restraints. So his master put him at a "drain," and landed himself on the edge of one of his own wet fields, whence he had a tiring ride to his destination, a mile or so away.

But the men at work wondered at, and responded to, the new heartiness and vigour with which the difficulties were approached that day. Nothing seemed to daunt or discourage Amyot; he thought of a remedy for all disasters, and foresaw every possible contingency. His own shoulders were put literally, as well as metaphorically, to many a wheel; and if, at times, his keen eyes looked longingly through the haze of rain, across the sodden grain which should have been swaying golden in a ripening breeze, towards the invisible spot where his love was also perhaps now struggling—who shall blame him?

He would have liked to go to her; but he resisted the temptation. Rowan was not the girl to intrude upon with impunity. And he respected her unprotectedness; and, as he hoped she might come again, he felt his only chance would be to leave her undisturbed now.

"Had a battle with his big black horse."

But as he listened in his lonely home that night to the descending torrents, watching from his open doorway, with his face turned towards Lescough, visions—nay, presences almost—of Rowan stood, and breathed, and lived beside him.

CHAPTER IX.

A TALE THAT IS TOLD.

Only one youth, and a bright light was shrouded,
Only one morning, and the day was clouded,
Only one old age with all regrets is crowded."

THE month sped away—that disastrous month which should have seen the harvests of England gathered in, but the close of which beheld them lying rotting in their fields.

To one person, however, those weeks of rains and storms had been a season of rejoicing. Day after day an eager woman had looked hopefully over the grey rain-enclosed flat, and watched the swelling rush of the waters in the river, with a feeling of expectation and triumph. Night after night a tall figure had fronted the buffetings of the angry wind, and had wandered on and on seawards, along the exposed dyke, Nature speaking loudly in her ears, in tones long custom had made familiar and endeared, of the energy of its resistance to the dominion of man. The heaving and swelling waste of waters on one side, which the rain lashed ceaselessly, were scarcely greyer or murkier than the waste of fen on the other. The brilliant eyes could not pierce the mists which, like a wall, shut in the dreary scene. But the watcher would often speed on and on, a buffeted, struggling, forlorn figure, in the hope that they would rise and let her behold the long-delayed fulfilment of her desire.

The huts which had been built for the temporary convenience of the workmen, and which had been pleasant enough shelters in warm weather, had, at Amyot's desire, been deserted; every night seeing the men safely housed in the cottages at Lessdyke and neighbouring hamlets, or carried to Lescough by the train, which once or twice a day straight as an arrow sped its way across the flats.

But as the month went on, a rumour got about amongst the men, that a mysterious figure had been seen hovering round the works, and that strange unaccountable mutterings and shrieks had been heard through the midnight air. There grew up an uneasy feeling, which, together with the depressing weather, had its effect upon the men—that something uncanny was in operation. It is strange how soon such a belief can arise, and how, having arisen, everything tends to foster it. Amyot himself was not wholly free from its influence, when at last the rumour reached his ears, but his uneasiness took the form of a long talk with Mr. Gayle. It was partly in consequence of this talk that Rowan had herself driven over to Lessdyke.

After she left Amyot that afternoon, she did not again take up the novel she had brought to beguile the tedium of the way, but looked out of the windows, with anxious interest at the dreary scene around. How wet it all was, and how green! Surely out of Ireland was never seen such greenness. Every ditch was full of water. Their fringes of willows, and rushes, and sword-like irises, and huge purple spikes of loosestrife, and delicate green of mints and willow herbs, were bowed and sucked along the stream. The sound of falling rain, the dripping of branches, the purling of rills, filled the air with a soft music of their own, whilst the even tread of the horses' feet sounded in a series of splashes. And presently from the distance came a monotonous and even thud—like the throbbing of some great heart—of which Rowan could not guess the cause. Was it the waves thundering against the shore? she wondered; until she remembered that they were not given to thunder here, but crept and curled about in little insinuating curves, with scarcely any more noise than just a splash.

When she reached the bridge, she got out of the carriage, and sent it to the hamlet, a quarter of a mile away, for shelter. Almost before she reached the cottage door, it was opened to her, and her aunt stood in the doorway, with almost a smile on her face.

"Come in," she said. And there was something triumphant in her tone. "I had a thought that you would come to-day. The work is nearly done, and is worth seeing. Oh, it is a fine work when man thinks he knows better than God, and has to be taught his place! I am glad you haven't missed it."

"What work is that?" Rowan asked, surprised at her cordial reception, sitting down in the window-seat her aunt indicated.

"What work? The work that God is frustrating—which will ruin a man and bring down his family's pride; as if God didn't know best where He means His own sea to end! At last!"

As she spoke, she advanced to the window and stood within the folds of the white curtains—a striking figure, with her soft white cap framing her face, whence the brilliant eyes seemed to be searching the misty distances.

Rowan's fascinated eyes followed her gaze, as she listened in a disturbed silence.

"I have warned him. I told him that the time was come. He did not care. He fills the cottages with noisy men, and they laugh and swagger about, as if it were a small thing to contradict God."

Then she turned to Rowan, and went on, with an indescribable change of expression.

"And he knows that it won't succeed. He is getting uneasy. I saw him last night, in the darkness and rain, at the turn of the tide out there, watching—watching."

"But you should not be out there at night," Rowan answered gently. "It is not safe this stormy weather, in the darkness; you might slip or miss your footing."

"The darkness is nothing to me," Mrs. Hardy answered indifferently. "But it is then that the danger comes, when the wind rises and the water comes creeping round steadily, hungrily. Last night I could have bent down and touched it from the top of the dyke. He sat there on his big horse for an hour or more; and the pumps throbbed through the night, like a great creature, obeying him. It must be grand—grand to have power like that!"

"Father thinks it will succeed, and Lord Lescough," Rowan said, restive at the assumption of knowledge beyond bounds. "They have all agreed to it now. This weather is unfortunate, but it won't last for ever."

Mrs. Hardy turned and looked at her for a minute in silence.

"And you are Rowan Gayle! This weather?

by an unconscious desire of removing this inimical watcher from the scene of Amyot's labours.

"Go away? Now?" The words came breathlessly. "After waiting for forty years! No; I will see the end."

"I don't know what you mean by the end," Rowan said remonstratively, after a moment. "The end of what?"

She was tempted to the question by the look of triumph in the eyes before her.

"Several lines, Rowan's first glimpse showed her, had been deeply under-scored."—p. 526.

What is it but God's own sending—to show that man that he can't rule the elements? The corn is sprouting in the fields—it is waste—waste! And the dyke will be waste too. I haven't watched day and night for nothing. I know where the weak places are. And still the rain comes steadily down." And she turned, as if satisfied, to the blurred window-panes again.

Rowan felt unreasonably angry. She got up quickly.

"I came—father thought you would be so uncomfortable here in all this storm," she said, her eyes revealing the emotion beneath her words; "so I came to beg you to come home with me. Can't you come for a few days?" she went on, her request emphasised

The other hesitated a moment. Then she said quickly—

"I will tell you; you shall judge. I see, you think me cruel—you are on his side. But you are a woman, and you are Rowan Gayle. I will let you judge. But first you shall have some tea."

She hurried away, a graceful alert woman, in her long grey dress, no evidences of age or feebleness in her bearing. She put up a slender hand and smiled at Rowan's faint expostulation, and waved her back when she would have followed to assist her preparations.

Left to herself, Rowan turned to the window again, an uneasiness she tried hard to combat, filling her mind. She strove against it with all her might; but the influence of the outlook was in its favour, and it was with a fascination almost amounting to certainty that she watched the rapid current of the river setting landwards. The tide was evidently now coming in fast. Why had Amyot been watching in the night if there were nothing to fear?

Beset by uneasy thoughts, she turned from the window, and let her eyes wander round the pretty room.

A little wood fire was burning in the grate. Some mignonette and heliotrope scented the air. A number of books, new novels, magazines, and papers, lay about the tables and sofa. Her aunt was evidently, if a hermit, a hermit quite in touch with at least the literature of the world. And roaming round, her eye casually fell upon an open pamphlet which lay upon a little table in the window, close by where she stood. Evidently her aunt had been reading it when she arrived.

She took it up. It was an old-fashioned astrological almanack, in great vogue amongst the country people, by whom it was believed to foretell unerringly the events of the year. It was open at the month of September, and several lines, Rowan's first glimpse showed her, had been deeply under-scored.

She read: "September 3rd, great ruin will befall. Storms and unexpected floods will destroy the land. Harvest will rot in the fields. A cloud will arise from the sea, and will spread devastation." And further on: "All building and engineering trades will suffer collapse. Banks will break."

Rowan lifted her head. A sense of lightness filled her mind, and a smile broke over her face. This, then, was what her aunt's prophecies, which had caused her so much uneasiness, were worth. They were the easy guesswork of an almanack-maker. Then a sudden recollection made her glance at the book again. Yes, there was an elaborate table of tides for this coast on another page; and this, too, was scored. On September 3rd it would be high tide hereabouts at five o'clock in the afternoon. Spring tide, too, she saw, with a little return of uneasiness; some words of Amyot's suddenly recurring to her.

Her aunt entered the room, bearing a dainty tea equipage, and during the little meal did not touch on any disturbing topics. She talked with discernment and knowledge of the books which filled the tables, of new music, even of entertainments and pictures; revealing a cultured, even if a prejudiced, mind. And Rowan, on her side, described her late visit to London, the pictures and things she had seen, the people she had met, the places she had visited; keeping back with thoughtful tact the name of her entertainer and hostess, as she recollected Mrs. Chester's vindictive feeling.

"And where were you staying, my dear? Who was your chaperon? Was your father with you all that time? You surely are not one of the advanced ladies I read about, who live in flats and go about alone?"

"Oh, no! I wasn't alone," said Rowan, hesitating. "I was staying at Kensington with my aunt."

"Oh!" The face before her underwent an immediate change. Mrs. Hardy sank back in her chair, and Rowan saw the long slender fingers lace and interlace themselves nervously. "What is she like?" she asked presently. "Is she like me, now?"

Here was a question Rowan could at least answer discreetly and without trouble.

"No; not nearly so good-looking, Aunt," and she smiled. "She looks older, and she is stout and fashionably dressed. Oh, you look far nicer! The middle-aged women in London look all alike."

But Mrs. Hardy was apparently not listening. Her gaze had again returned to the window; and there was the far-away and yet intense look in her eyes, which gave the impression of absolute vision beyond and outside ordinary sight. The mention of her sister had evidently stirred deep feelings. Rowan did not disturb her thoughts.

Presently she moved, and fixed her eyes on Rowan.

"And she has prospered in a happy life; while I——" the eyes shone with suppressed anger. "I said I would let you judge. You are Rowan Gayle too, and I fear—I very much fear you too——"

She stopped for a moment, and began again in low rapid tones—

"I have said you shall judge. When I was a girl, we were not taken every year to London. We had to be satisfied with such gaieties as we could get hereabouts, unless we went sometimes to stay with families a little further off. I was seventeen when Jane and I were asked to go and stay near Lincoln with some friends. There I met Sebastian Hardy. He had been turned out of doors by his father; but his friends had not quite given him up then. I was incredulous in those days, as you are now. He was plausible, and I believed him. So I lowered myself to deceit. I—a Gayle—condescended to meet him secretly, to receive his letters, to reply to them. His eyes—you know, Rowan, what his eyes could look. The same eyes have looked into yours. Women are easily beguiled. I consented to go away with him. I believed all he told me about the wrong his father had done him. And I knew mine would not look at a Hardy. But I loved him more than all. We were married. And then came my punishment. Imagine a girl—an innocent, tender, guileless girl, I was all that, though I had deceived—at the mercy of a brute. He soon had no money. Oh! what shifts was I driven to, to hide our state. My own money was sent to me regularly; but my father would not—no one would—see me. Very soon he took it all—all! And then"—the low tones gathered passion, and the grey eyes kindled—"he struck me—often."

She paused a moment.

"I hated him!"

Rowan shivered at the concentrated hatred in the tone, and involuntarily put up her hands with a gesture, as though warding off a blow. Indeed, the tones seemed to strike like an actual impact. Her eyes grew hazy; she could scarcely see, from the keenness of the mental vision Mrs. Hardy had conjured up.

"Then—we had no money—we came to live in a little cottage near here, on my father's land: a workman's cottage; he thought we should pay no rent there; and he did not care to what indignity he put me. We struggled along for four years. Oh, that time! He was often away, racing, gambling, drinking; but he would come back always to intercept my money. At last I planned to deceive him. I wrote to the lawyer at Lescough to keep it back. I told him to send it to a woman who was kind to me. Old Madam Hardy, my husband's mother, would send her sometimes to see how I was getting on. He guessed what I had done, and one day he came, furious with drink. I cannot tell you all; but my wrist was broken, and I fainted. Nurse found me so, and so people got to know. And then he was out all one night in the fen in the mist and cold, and when he came home early in the morning I saw he was ill. But I hated him! I was glad that he should suffer. The doctor came, and the days passed, and he grew worse."

She paused, and Rowan, listening with wide-eyed interest, caught her breath. What was she going to hear?

She resumed after a moment, in restrained tones—

"The fever was very high, and sometimes it was almost more than a woman could do to control him. The doctor told his family, but they would do nothing. Only old Mrs. Hardy came once, when her husband was out of the way. But I would not see her; they had never acknowledged me. I left the house, and he told her lies; he said I was starving or poisoning him. And when the end came, that pretty story was brought up against me—me! Do you wonder that I hated them all?"

As Rowan listened, she was feeling the influence of the sharp incisive tones, of the sorrowful proud eyes, of the pathetic face. She did not believe that the crime attributed to her, was hers.

"He lingered on. The doctor said I must have help. And a young woman from the village offered to come. I did not know then, what I knew later, at the trial. One night—it was in a time of rain and storm like this—I can remember it well—I was to sit up, and the woman was to sleep on my bed in the only other room we had in the house. The doctor had sent in an extra sleeping draught, in case we could not send, with a warning on it. There were six doses instead of three—they were to be mixed with water. He was very restless, and as the night wore on, he clamoured for more of the medicine before the proper time. I tried to soothe him, but he called, and swore, and beat out at me, and tried to get out of bed, and I gave in. I poured a dose into the glass."

She faltered, her breath coming quickly, the light in her eyes of this far-gone memory, illuminating her worn face. Rowan, in spite of herself, uttered a low cry, and immediately the brilliant eyes turned on her coldly.

"I moved to fetch the water-bottle from the wash-stand, and whilst my face was turned away, he must have poured out the rest of the medicine. Afterwards, the bottle was found, empty. I did not notice; the light was dim. Just then, as he was drinking, there was a little sound, and the woman stood in the doorway. He saw her, and called out in gasps, 'She has poisoned me! She has killed me! It is too strong!' And I put out my hand to soothe him. But he struck me—before her. And then she accused me of exciting him, and was insolent. So I took her by the shoulders, and put her outside the house. I ought to have done it before. That was the only sensible thing I did at that time," she added, with a little laugh.

"But he slept on and on, and I could not wake him. I had no one to send for the doctor. And so they said I had murdered him."

There was a silence. Rowan shrank as she thought what the burden of suspicion and the disgrace of the trial must have been to this proud, undisciplined nature.

"I had no one. I was twenty-one; I was alone; my father refused to see me. But the jury did not believe the woman's tale. Though I told them"—with a strange triumph in her voice—"that it was mostly true. So I was set free. And I came here; it is forty years ago. Now you shall judge whether I could go away now, and miss the sight of my vengeance."

She sprang up, and walked quickly up and down the room, as if her feelings were getting beyond her control. Rowan too rose, and put out her hands, as if to stay the passionate steps.

"You have been terribly wronged—by us all. But now—now we want to make up for it; won't you let us? See, there is the carriage. Come home with me. Indeed, indeed, we cannot leave you here alone in this dreary place, any longer."

Mrs. Hardy shook her head.

"No, no; till the end. It won't be long; I can see it coming nearer. A few more days, and then perhaps I will go away."

Rowan paused in hesitation. Then she asked—

"What end, Aunt? What do you see?"

"I see surging waters, and desolation, and a flood."

She spoke with the curious rapt gaze of one really beholding what she described.

"I can see that too, if I try and think of it." Rowan urged, looking out at the falling rain; "but I see also something quite different. Listen to me, Aunt: over there, I see the red roofs of cottages, shining in the evening sun. And inside, the happy wives are getting supper ready for the men coming home from work, and little children—toddling babies and rosy boys—are running about the door, and shouting when they see the first glimpse of their fathers; and the mother runs to the door, and puts up her hand to shade her eyes from the low sun, as she looks to see if it is her man coming. And she catches up the little one, and kisses its soft neck, and goes to meet her husband at the garden gate, and holds up the baby to him. And there is a soft sweet scent everywhere; and I see a golden plain of daffodils, and fields of white narcissus and pink peonies, and tall plants of fragrant lilies, red and white and pink."

Rowan's beautiful eyes were shining now, and her face glowing with her story; and Mrs. Hardy's sorrowful eyes were fixed steadfastly upon her face.

"And there is plenty of corn, too, in the far distance—acres and acres of soft waving green, looking like an imprisoned sea. And soon it is golden too; and the sun is hot, and the reapers come and gather it in, in the sultry noontide. And then when night falls—there is calm and peace over all that land, and happy homes and sleeping children, safe and cared-for in their mothers' arms. I see it; it is a beautiful picture. And desolation and storm are far away."

Rowan's voice sank. She was almost overcome by emotion at the picture her fancy had conjured up.

Mrs. Hardy's face, too, had softened, and her eyes were moist.

"Yes, yes; your picture is beautiful," she said mournfully; "but it cannot be. It is too late. Must you go?" as Rowan, catching sight of the clock, turned, and took up her hat with a hasty exclamation. "Come again soon—to-morrow—before the end."

(To be concluded.)

SOME UNFASHIONABLE SLUMS.

SECOND ROUND.—SOUTH LONDON.

BY F. M. HOLMES.

"IT'S a reg'lar mixed-up neighbourhood, that's what it is; some o' the men work at the gas company's, some at the wharves, some at the railway shops, and some don't do nothin'—they lives by thievin'."

"Rather a rough district, then?"

"It is; I tell you. There are two of us here, one on the point, and the other patrollin' about. We're on what we call a short beat."

"That is because it is a dangerous neighbourhood?"

"Yes, that's it. I've bin called to two fights among women already this morning."

"Why, what were they about?"

"Oh, one was as to who should pay for half a quartern of gin."

"Yes, I tell you," chimed in another constable, "drink is all they think about down here. Some o' the men earn very good money, and then they and the women spend it in drink. They get paid on Friday, or, if they don't, they borrow from those who do, and then they go boozin' till Tuesday. Tuesday to Friday is our quietest time down here, when they ain't got no money."

"And the women buy meat at three pounds for fo'pence, or four pounds for threepence. I've seen 'em do it. There's stuff for their husbands' dinners!"

And he sniffed scornfully; that is, as far as a sedate London policeman could sniff.

"Well, look at the number of public-houses," put in the other constable. "There's one, two, three—there's seven public-houses within three minutes' walk o' the pier, and they must all get a living. That's where the money goes, and then they ain't got it for other things."

The pier referred to is Nine Elms, on the south side of the Thames, and in the south-west division of the metropolis. Not very far off is Lambeth Palace. Large gas-works are near, and here also are the "shops" of the London and South-Western Railway, and some works also of the London, Chatham and Dover Railway; while, in addition, there are the wharves along the river-side. An industrial neighbourhood, one would say, but not necessarily one in which you would look for some of London's worst slums.

"Ah! there's plenty of rows here," continues the policeman. "They says things have improved a little, but I don't see no improvement. I wonder there ain't more illness down here. They say it's the gas-works stops it; the smell is good for fevers and sich-like."

"Well, the stench in the houses is bad enough," remarks his colleague. "I was called to a fight in one the other day, and the smell was enough to knock you back'ards. Some of the houses are in a shockin' state, dirty and filthy, and broken about inside, with plaster off the walls."

Presently we stroll through some of these slums. They mostly swarm with children, wretchedly clad; the head of a dirty woman peeps from an upper window; groups of women, none too clean, throng the mean and dirty doorways; here a drunken woman, in the bright light of the morning, vociferates disgusting and senseless talk, and other women, standing about, laugh at her. Near by, a fish-hawker is loudly endeavouring to sell his poor stock.

Some of the houses present a woeful appearance—broken windows, patched with paper, or sashes barricaded by shutters, appear at every hand, while open doors reveal dirty passages and broken plaster. The houses are low and mean and squalid in appearance, without a trace of adornment—merely a line of dead wall pierced at regular intervals by the two lines of windows and the doors. The cottages are but one storey high, and their three or four rooms are crowded with inhabitants.

"Often one family to a room," says the constable.

The size of the rooms varies, but ten feet square would perhaps be the average. In one of these a man and wife and family have to eat, drink, and sleep! No pleasant trace of greenery enlivens the dull dead line of the cottages; but here on one window-sill is a small bird-cage, and inside the room, close to the window, is another of larger size.

The inhabitants do not seem to feel the sordid squalor of the place. And here, at last, is a faint gleam of blessed humour which glints on so many aspects of human life. Here is an old man sitting on a doorstep and vigorously rubbing and rumpling the pale, thin, lanky hair of a pale, thin, emaciated little mortal, who appears quite delighted by the elephantine petting. The signs of genuine good-feeling in the old man's heavy caresses appear quite refreshing in the squalor.

The streets are fairly wide, and the men—many of them—earn fairly good wages. These streets, therefore, seem to belie somewhat the idea that the slums make the people, rather than the people make the slums. No doubt the truth is, that they act and react perniciously upon each other. A man or woman living in a bad neighbourhood will too often yield to its influences. A family finding themselves squeezed into one small room may not unnaturally turn for some sort of comfort and pleasure elsewhere, and the flaring gin-palace is only too ready an attraction.

"The person who has got most influence with these people," says the policeman, "is a curate, I think; but I can't mind his name just now."

In addition to which we learn that the London Congregationalists have taken over a mission hall, not very far off, once belonging to Mr. W. S. Caine, M.P., and intend to carry on work in the district. This hall, indeed, would form part of a chain of agencies which that denomination has at work along the south side of the Thames, including the famous Collier's Rents Hall in the Borough, and Browning Hall in Walworth. A College of Clergy, under the auspices of the Bishop of Southwark, is being established, which, together with the "Grey Ladies"—a society under the headship of Miss Yentman—are engaged in special duties and parish work in South London. The Wesleyans have a "Settlement," under the Rev. J. Scott Lidgett, while the Baptists are well represented by the Rev. J. C. Carlile—to mention no other—who probably knows Bermondsey and Rotherhithe as well as anyone.

These efforts—which we do not pretend to suggest exhaust the list—show that various religious bodies are busy in South London, the vast district of which is almost superseding the East End in its unenviable notoriety as Slumdom.

Parts of Bermondsey are covered with nests and networks of courts, running one into the other in a most perplexing way—and some right down to the water-side.

Once a stranger gets into these mazes of courts, he might be robbed and murdered with comparative ease before he could find his way out, and no one know anything about it.

Rumours also of successful smuggling lurk about these courts. And, indeed, they are well adapted for that sinister undertaking. It is strange to think of such an offence being conducted in London, almost opposite the Custom House, and at this stage of our free-trade history; but such are the rumours. And once a case of wine or box of cigars is brought into this spiders' web of courts, all hope of tracing it would seem lost.

But the march of improvement is making itself felt, and some of these old courts are being swept away. The School Board also reigns here, as elsewhere, and has raised aloft some noble piles.

"Yes, and in that school," says Mr. Carlile, who is himself a member of the Board, "you would probably find that two-thirds of the children attend without shoes and stockings, and the other third without a shirt."

That fact alone speaks eloquently of the character of the neighbourhood. Yet some of these south-eastern slums look fairly clean, and some of the children fairly clean also. A curious explanation of that fact has its humorous side.

"It does not pay here. No one visits these unfashionable slums." A dirty child in a neighbourhood that is much visited as a "dreadful place" appears to be worth a good deal as an object of emotional sympathy, and an opener of the ready purse. So difficult is it to be wise and discriminating in almsgiving!

Many of the dwellers here are dockers and waterside labourers; but occupations are varied as to "odd jobs," as in other "slums." Here is a groundsel-seller, whose not wholly unmusical cry wakes the echoes, such as they are, of these dingy streets.

"Where do I pick the grun'sel? Oh, out in the nurseries."

"That is, the market-gardens, I suppose?"

"Yes; Messrs. So-and-so lets me go in their grounds and get the bird-seed. Yer see, I got grun'sel here, and plantain and chick-weed!"

"And a little mint, I can see, also."

"Oh, ah, just a few heads. Ye see, I walk over there and pick up these bird-seeds. They know me! I wouldn't take no cabbages! Law, bless ye! 't wouldn't pay me to take a couple of penny cabbages and hide 'em in my basket, 'stead o' the bird-seed. I'd sooner 'ave the grun'sel and sell it, and buy a penny cabbage if I wants it."

"And what do you do in the winter?"

"Well, there's water-creases, ye know. Now, my father was a barrister, and I had a reversion to £8,000. I borrowed a loan of a thousand on it, and then I only got about £850 for my reversion. Then I took a public-house—and—and," to cut his story short, here he is, a groundsel-seller in Slumdom!

The details of his story were certainly not remarkable for clearness, and his father appears to have been a solicitor—or, indeed, he might have been a lawyer's clerk, for the man's ideas of the legal profession appear to have been of the vaguest; but, in any case, when a young spendthrift gets in the hands of unscrupulous money-lenders, a few thousands do not go very far.

So, passing by the details, we ask him if he finds groundsel-selling as profitable as public-house keeping.

A CORNER IN NINE ELMS.

A NEW WAY OF KNOCKING AT OLD DOORS.

Poor though the people are, yet many of them manage to pay a few pence weekly to the Industrial Insurance agent.

Into the controversy concerning such insurance we do not propose to enter. No doubt, like some other good things in this puzzling world of smiles and tears, industrial life assurance—and especially the insurance of children—is liable to gross abuse; but the fact is, that very large numbers of the poor do insure, and the insurance agent-collector forms quite a feature of the slums. We saw three busy in one afternoon in the same neighbourhood.

"I suppose," said one of them, "that there is not a family in this street that is not insured."

"And does that sort of thing hold good of all the poor districts of London?"

"Very much so. Every poor neighbourhood, I should say, is vigorously canvassed."

"And do the persons use the money to pay for the funeral?"

"Very likely; but that's not my business. I've got to get my living at insurance-collecting, and I mean to try and do it. One family, I remember, had not enough money to pay for the certificate of death, and we advanced it."

"And how much was that?"

"Two-and-sevenpence. A funeral is our best advertisement, and we make the most of the opportunity."

It seems thrifty and wise for a dock-labourer, for instance, to insure his life for twenty pounds, and after the funeral expenses and the cost of moderate mourning are defrayed, a balance might remain for the benefit of his widow; but should it be wasted in other ways, the assurance society and its collector would argue that it was none of their business. It is another instance of the misuse some people make of things good in themselves.

He grins, and admits he makes about a shilling a day.

If "live on sixpence a day and earn it" is good advice, our groundsel-gatherer seems following it out; and, truth to tell, his sunburnt face is not unhealthy in appearance. He lives in chambers—as some lodging-houses or model dwellings are called—nearby, and his wife goes out washing!

Some of these boys exhibit noble traits of character. There was a lad who had benefited by the children's free dinners given in the neighbourhood, under the auspices of the Rev. Mr. Carlile, and in due time the boy betook himself to boot-cleaning.

As he stood at his post one day in the street, he heard a splash and a cry. A child had fallen into the canal near which he stood.

In another minute Jack was in the water, and was fishing the child out. Then, dripping with wet, he took it home.

The mother received it with abounding thankfulness, and, in the fulness of her heart was endeavouring to collect a few coins for his reward, when Jack, who had been eyeing her closely, said—

"Beain't you one o' the wimmin as was at the kids' dinners?"

Yes, she was.

Then Jack rose to the occasion, and with great fervour, he exclaimed—

"Blowed if I'll take any money from you, then, missus!"

Some of the children early show signs of self-reliance and resource: perhaps because they are forced to do so—they are left so much to themselves.

A GROUNDSEL-SELLER.

AN ALTERCATION.

We noticed a child who, wanting to knock at a street door to gain admission, instead of wailing and weeping or seeking the help of a passer-by, hauled herself up to the door-handle—for this portal actually rejoiced in such an adjunct—and, clinging to the handle by her 'nees, caught hold of the knocker and rapped vigorously. That child ought to work its way out of the slums by sheer force of determined hard work.

In various of these London slums we come across traces of decayed respectability. The rotting door may have its bits of old carvings or mouldings, a big handle, and possibly even a brass knocker. In the days of the first George or of ancient Queen Anne it was, probably, a very highly respectable door, giving entrance to a very highly respectable house of irreproachable sentiments, and possibly also of stiff and starched demeanour.

Now, how are the sentiments and the demeanour fallen! It is a tenement dwelling in a London slum. No one cares for it; and, going gradually from bad to worse, it yet shelters half a dozen families in its sad old age—an old age so different from the mellow, happy, wholesome old age of some people and of some buildings. Presently it will be condemned; the house-farmer will know it no more; and a pile of modern model dwellings will arise in the street, capable of housing a hundred and fifty families or more at three shillings or four-and-six a week.

But all slums do not exhibit such signs as these. Some seem to consist of comparatively recently built houses. Their descent has been rapid—if they ever stood fairly high; and the houses themselves seem modern.

In some of these courts and streets pleasant traces of greenery can be seen, and one beautiful small-leaved creeper seemed so well grown and firmly rooted that it must have been there a number of years. But other courts and thoroughfares, again, are frowsy, dirty, squalid, sickening.

By the extraordinary irony of events which often happens in things human, some slums bear the grandest names. If you come across a Golden something, or a So-and-so Gardens, it will most likely prove a very unpleasant place. In one crooked court named after her gracious Majesty, some children were playing, and a stalwart young woman was knocking nails into a box with much noise.

"What a grandly named place you live in!"

"Yus!" replied the stalwart young woman, answering for the children. "Ye don't want nothin' to eat when you looks at that, do ye?"

An ironical way of saying that fine words do not fill hungry mouths. And it may be added that, though the children attended the Board-school, they appeared to have no idea who Victoria was, after whom their court was named.

"Ye don't want nothin' to eat!" said the woman.

It seems the first thought of the dwellers in the slums.

Food and warmth! Yes, these seem to be the two chief wants. They are, so to speak, woven in the bed-rock of need. In such a climate as England's, they are two of the prime necessities. With impoverished resources, we soon get down to the most primitive wants; and these unsatisfied, appear to loom so large and to rise so imperiously as to dominate and, indeed, absorb every other.

Food and warmth! It almost seems as though Slumdom said: Give us these and we care for nothing else; we can gratify other wants ourselves.

So it comes about that some people, if they can only get a little food and old clothes by begging or cadging, never dream of work; and so it is that I have seen in the pale light of early dawn human beings groping and scratching with bent sticks among the garbage of the last night's street-market, if haply they can find any broken food or discarded fruit, or anything whatsoever that they can eat.

What is the cause of Slumdom? There is no one cause. I distrust all persons who say glibly there is but one cause, and that all remedies are to be built up on that idea. It will prove, probably, but a pet fad or a sentimental theory; and the sentimental view of Slumdom is as misleading as a purely sentimental view of anything else.

The causes of Slumdom are many and various, and the remedies must be many and various likewise. Yet, if there be one thing more than another, I should be inclined to seek it in character; though, after all, character is but one name for a number of attributes. Where you get thoroughly thriftless, and unskilled, and casually employed people with no money, you get chronic poverty; and where you get chronic poverty you will probably get the one-roomed tenement so characteristic of a slum.

Yet we freely admit that poverty alone need not make a slum. There is usually poverty and a sordid viciousness and squalid thriftlessness, and often downright crime. A loafer of forty-five will probably remain a loafer to the end; a confirmed street-door woman of the same age will probably remain such all her life.

The bad environment of the slums acts upon the people, and the people perpetuate the slums; so events move on in a vicious circle, and it will need all the combined efforts of churches, missions, School Board, and County Council to break its malignant power.

HEDGED IN

BY THE REV. T. M. MORRIS, IPSWICH, PRESIDENT OF THE BAPTIST UNION.

"Hast Thou not made an hedge about him, and about his house, and about all that he hath on every side?"—Job i. 10.

Why is light given to a man whose way is hid, and whom God hath hedged in?"—Job iii. 23.

PLACING these passages side by side, we are presented with a curious coincidence. We have Satan and Job complaining of the same thing. They are complaining of something which they agree in regarding—though for different reasons—as a hindrance, an obstruction, which they would like to have removed. They are both complaining of a hedge which God has created, and with which He has encircled His servant Job. Satan and Job are on two different sides of this hedge. So far as they respectively are concerned, it serves two very different purposes, and, viewed from different sides, it awakens different feelings; but both to the one and the other—to him who is inside and to him who is outside—it is an occasion of irritation and discontent. Satan complains because, as long as that hedge remains, he cannot get in to inflict any real injury on God's servant Job; and Job complains because, in painful and straitened circumstances, shut up to endure loss, bereavement, personal affliction—literally "hedged in"—he can discover no way of escape. As he exclaims elsewhere: "He hath fenced up my way, that I cannot pass." Satan complains of the hedge because it will not let him get in; Job complains of it because it will not let him get out. We see, then, that this hedge is both a protection and a restraint; a protection because it is a restraint. If Job could have easily got out, Satan could as easily have got in; and if Job had availed himself of the opportunity of getting out, Satan would have had no need to get in. If we would enjoy the protection which the hedge affords, we must submit to the restraints and limitations it imposes.

The history of this hedge which God planted round His servant Job—or, rather, perhaps, the hedges with which He encompassed him—is very remarkable. When we first meet with Job, he is occupying a very large place; the protected area is very extensive: larger than that occupied by any other man in all the East. We see a series of concentric circles of defence, shutting in and protecting Job's property and servants and family; and there in the centre is the small innermost circle—the citadel, as it were, the impenetrable hedge which God had planted round Job himself.

At first, the protecting line encompassed and safeguarded all Job's property and possessions—sheep and camels, and oxen and asses, and a very great household. It was about all that he had. Another line of defence was drawn around his family, and then another around himself.

God for purposes of His own allowed these external defences to be destroyed; we know how hedge after hedge was broken down, and how, in swift and terrible succession, unexampled calamities broke in upon him—a very sea of troubles; and he saw all his vast possessions and his hitherto prosperous and happy family swept away. But we have Job himself left—ruined, desolate, personally afflicted, yet safe: the man himself unharmed within that innermost circle of defence. There, in that narrow place, he who a little while ago was the greatest man in all the East, the head of a large and powerful and prosperous family, sits in poverty and distress, his only company being a complaining wife, and three friends, who come to inspect his misery and talk with him through the hedge, and whose ambition seems to be to convince Job that he would not be shut up there to the endurance of all these miseries unless, in some unacknowledged way, he had brought this trouble upon himself by misdeeds, which they implore him without any further delay to confess and repent of.

We need not wonder that Job having, as he thought, so little left to protect, should undervalue this remaining hedge as a defence, and think of it chiefly as a restraint, as a limitation, as that which shut him up to the endurance of what he found to be very hard to bear, fencing him in on every side, so that there was no room to pass.

We see here as in a picture or a parable what God is ever doing. He is putting round all of us a hedge which is at once a protection and a restraint, and which is a protection because it is a restraint. Around men are placed providential and circumstantial safeguards, through which they have to break, with more or less of difficulty and pain to themselves, before they can get into serious mischief. In a country like this, and certainly of the class of persons such as would be found in Christian congregations, it may be said that before they can go very far wrong they have to break through many a thorny hedge. There are many who do not respond to the highest motives, and who do not enjoy the protection of the best and truest safeguard of personal religion, who yet are kept out of a great deal of mischief by those social, circumstantial, providential restraints which are seldom thought of, but which in a Christian country are constantly and powerfully operating. God has ordered human life in such a way that we not only suffer for wrong-doing after the wrong is done; but we always find that there is some impediment, some hindrance, some obstruction which has to be removed or overcome ere the wrong can be done. There is some hedge of thorns that must be broken through.

It is not easy to realise what we owe to the restraints imposed by a Christianised civilisation. We, as a nation, are far from being what we ought to be, and have often occasion to hang our heads in shame and penitence; but with all these drawbacks, Christianity has done great things for us. There is the subtle and powerful restraint of public opinion, which, if it be not moulded, is at least modified, by the Christianity that dwells in our midst. In a country like this there are almost innumerable restraints and limitations, the value of which cannot be estimated till we visit countries where life is lived under different conditions, and where such restraints do not operate at all, or only in the slightest degree.

But we have to consider not so much the hedges of limitation and protection which are placed more or less around all, as the way in which God deals with those who place themselves under His protection. The hedge referred to in the Scriptures quoted at the commencement of this paper, and of which both Satan and Job complained, was a hedge which God put around His servant—a good man, who feared God and eschewed evil.

Let us, then, look again at the position of Job, and see what lessons we can learn from the Lord's dealings with him. He is in a very strait place; he has not much room to move; he is in what men would call "a tight corner." He has lost his property, been bereaved of his children, he has lost nearly everything that men ordinarily value; on every side of him there is a thorny hedge; no way of escape to a more prosperous condition; he is fenced up; hedged in. His way is hid; there is mystery, perplexity, painful restriction; but there is light above; and if he cannot move forward in any direction, he can rise up.

We learn from this that a good man may have to complain that his way is hidden, and yet have to acknowledge that light is given. In every life, in varying degrees, we have those two things of which Job speaks—obscurity and illumination. These two things always go together. Where the darkness is thickest there is some illumination, and where the illumination is strongest there is always some remaining obscurity.

The way is hidden. In all life there is a measure of obscurity and of consequent perplexity. We cannot conceive of anyone whose way is more completely hidden than that of Job as he lies there in the dark shadow of that sheltering hedge. Every way seems closed. Moving in any direction, he comes almost at once upon the sharp prickles of this impenetrable hedge. It is not given to many to have such an experience; but while that extreme is not often reached, we may be often so bewildered and perplexed that we know not which way to turn or what next to do. There seems no open, available way. Behind, there is Egypt, and we can hear more and more distinctly the tramp of the pursuing host; on either side are the mountains, which offer no shelter, and open up no way of escape; and before us is the apparently impassable sea, the wash of whose waves we can already distinguish. We are hedged in—our way is hid.

But we learn from Job's experience that where the way is hidden light is given. Where the obscurity is most dense and the perplexity most bewildering, there is always some illumination. However straitened our circumstances, there is room

By means of this light we discover that, though our way is hidden, it is not hidden from the Lord. He knoweth the way that we take.

There is light enough given us to reveal the meaning and merciful design of the hedge which encompasses us, and of the restrictions and limitations imposed by it, of which we are tempted to complain. It should silence our complaints to remember that our bitterest, most implacable, most dangerous foe is complaining of the same thing. We complain because we can discover no gap in the hedge through which we can creep and run away from what is so little according to our mind; and there is Satan complaining because he can find no gap through which he can gain an entrance and get us more completely in his power. Let us not forget that the hedge which means restraint and limitation means also protection and safety.

We have light enough to read the assurance which God gives us that when the time comes for it He will open up a way of deliverance. He did so in the case of His servant Job; God brought him out into a large place: The sharp, searching discipline answered its purpose, and Job came forth as tried gold; and the Lord blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning.

It is not always that God deals thus with His people. They are sometimes kept closely hedged in all their lives. But while they may not have a door of immediate deliverance set open before them, there is the door of hope in the Valley of Achor, and they know that deliverance is coming and that deliverance is sure. The narrow and painful limitations of this life will be for ever left behind when once they pass through the gates into that City which no enemy can enter, and the gates of which may be safely left open night and day. But in this world, so full of perils, and crowded with watchful and malignant foes, they have reason to thank God for the hedges He has planted around them, which, if they often obscure their view, and sometimes limit their activities, are a protection as well as a restraint, and a protection because they are a restraint.

FELICIA JOSCELYNE'S LETTER.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ANN PRESCOTT'S FORTUNE," "COUSIN WALTER," ETC.

IN TWO PARTS.—PART II.

CHAPTER III.

HE weather was everything that could be wished, but the days were not half long enough for the busy collectors. The school-room was turned into a veritable naturalist's den; Martha wondered privately if it ever could be clean and tidy again.

All the little town became familiar with Mr. Gordon's tall stooping figure, and the shooting-jacket with the bulging pockets. He was a universal favourite;

Amy loved to hear his wonderful stories of ants and bees. Lucy stored up new facts about the wicked ways of her enemies, the slugs and caterpillars, and Jack had never been so peaceable in any previous holiday on record. "I really think Mr. Gordon begins to like me a little, since I caught that runaway spider for him," thought Felicia. "I shall introduce myself to-morrow when we are in the woods. I can do it quite easily and naturally with the children rushing about, and preventing any elaborate explanation, and then I shall send a long letter to his mother."

This was on Thursday evening; Felicia had just returned from a walk to the other end of the town, where she had been to take a mould of Mrs. Wilson's famous stone cream to an invalid friend. She had taken off her hat, and was giving a mechanical pat to some unruly curls, when there was a knock at the door, and Dora came in, throwing herself into a chair with a weary sigh.

"Life grows more and more difficult!" she began. "If you only know how much better it suits you to wear your hair simply, Ruth," rousing a little—"comb it off your forehead, please, for my sake! You know," she continued, after a short pause, "that I have always tried to keep a distinct, definite aim before me—to be a social reformer! There are plenty of people at work on the 'submerged tenth,' but who thinks about, and works to remove, the utter dullness of the middle classes? I felt that might be my vocation—to elevate and rouse them. One is always told that charity should begin at home, so I determined, when I left school, to attack and rout the enemy here. But what a weary fight it is! They are so satisfied with dullness; absolutely apathetic! If I read aloud the most beautiful passages from Browning or Ruskin, they fall asleep. Months ago I traced some of this intellectual numbness to the way we live—the heavy middle-day dinners, and substantial suppers. Then the kinds of food! think how much phosphorus for our brains there is in fish, and how seldom we have any, except those vulgar bloaters for breakfast, which I detest. You need not laugh: I am certain it does affect people wonderfully. Excuse me, Ruth, but I have noticed how the edge of your intellectual sensibility has become dulled lately."

"Oh, Dora, how awful! I'll turn hermit, and live on water-cresses," cried Felicia.

"Ruth!" said Dora, annoyed, "it is no joking matter. I believe Mr. Gordon would understand me."

"If you expect him to do so, you had better open your heart to him at once, before his sensibilities get blunted, Dora; for didn't you notice how very thoroughly he appreciated a hot supper when he and Jack came home yesterday?" asked Felicia, with mock gravity.

"He only pretended to, out of politeness," said Dora.

"Then virtue was its own reward, evidently," returned Felicia.

"We'll say he enjoyed the sacrifice, not the supper."

"Well, we need not discuss that point," resumed Dora. "I had a little comfort yesterday. Mrs. Taylor noticed the improvement I had made in the drawing-room; the round centre table was moved before your time."

"Yes, I have it in the schoolroom," said Felicia.

"It took just a year to move it," said Dora solemnly, "and longer still to have those dreadful wax flowers banished."

"Your mother was fond of them because her sister made them," remarked Felicia.

"Yes; but, as I tried to make her understand, that was the very reason why she should treasure them in her own room, not in one supposed to belong to—to society in general! We might as well let the drawing-room, though," relapsing into her former despondency. "A fire in it once a week to keep it aired, and then no one will sit there!"

"Dora!" whispered Felicia, "Mr. Samuel Briggs' views are just as advanced——"

"Felicia!" cried Dora, starting up angrily, "how can you make such allusions?" And without another word, she ran down, and joined the rest of the family in the large cheerful dining-room. Richard had come home before tea, and was in the midst of a game of chess with Mr. Gordon. Mr. Wilson had his newspaper, his wife her knitting; Jack and the little girls were busy at the table. A bright fire was burning, for the early spring evenings were still cold.

"What are you doing, children?" asked their father.

"We are putting Ruth's desk tidy," replied Lucy. "It is her Indian one; everything in it smells so nice and foreign. She was looking for something in a hurry before she went out, and turned it all topsy-turvy. I asked her if I might put it straight, and she said 'Yes.'"

"Where is Ruth?" asked Richard.

"Gone to inquire after Miss Bateman, dear," replied his mother.

"Why didn't you send one of the servants?" said Richard.

"Your move!" said Mr. Gordon.

"Ruth has come back; she is in her room," said Dora, looking up from her book.

"That's the pencil-case I gave Ruth on her birthday," said Amy. "Isn't it pretty, Jack? What are you feeling about for?"

"We are looking for secret drawers," said Lucy.

"Ah! that's right. What dear little things! Such a lot of money in this one!"

"Shut it up directly, Lucy," said her father.

"Yes, father," said Lucy calmly. "Ruth ought to put this money in the post-office—I shall tell her so. She is rather rich; that aunt in Jamaica, you know, Jack, sends her money to spend, as well as what father pays her for teaching us. Why, there is nothing in the other drawer but one letter. I wonder why she keeps it there?"

"Check!" said Mr. Gordon sharply. "That is my bishop!"

"I beg your pardon," said Richard.

"Lucy, don't touch it," cried Dora. "No doubt it is one of her father's."

"It isn't a love-letter," remarked Lucy, "because she told me once she never had had one; I asked her: and it isn't her father's, I'm sure, Dora, for I saw her take it out of the desk months ago. She read it over—stamped, and looked so angry and cross; she didn't know I was in the room. I wonder who it's from! Look, Jack: what a funny, squiggly hand!"

"Why," spluttered Jack, "it's old Grubs' writing."

Richard started up, overturning the chess-board. Mr. Gordon drew himself to his full height, strode over to the table, caught hold of Jack's shoulder, and said, with a look which terrified Amy, "Are you crazy, Jack? I never wrote a letter to Miss Ruth in my life."

"It is very like your writing, sir," murmured Jack.

"It is your crest, Mr. Gordon—a dog begging," remarked Lucy, turning the envelope over: she was the only one of the party quite at her ease.

"This letter is addressed to Miss Felicia Joscelyne," said Mr. Gordon, examining it with a bewildered air, and then a start of recollection; "but how could Miss Ruth have it in her desk?"

"She is Felicia, not Ruth," said Lucy. "Amy gave her that name when she was so ill, and we have all called her Ruth ever since. I was beginning to tell you so once at breakfast, and then somebody interrupted."

"Miss Joscelyne will explain it quite nicely, no doubt," said Mrs. Wilson hurriedly. "Richard, don't forget yourself; sit down quietly."

"Ruth," she called, opening the door, and Felicia quickly appeared.

"What is the matter!" she exclaimed. "Amy, why are you crying?"

"Because everyone is angry with you, Ruth. They say you have been hiding up one of Mr. Gordon's letters."

"Of course not, dear Ruth," said Dora, taking her hand. "Lucy was turning out your desk, and found a letter——"

"Lucy, have you been reading it aloud? Give it me this minute!" cried Felicia breathlessly.

"As if I should open it, even," was the indignant answer.

"You did not tell me that you had even met Mr. Gordon," said Mrs. Wilson.

"We never had seen each other before," said Felicia, recovering herself.

"If you had honoured me by introducing yourself, to Felicia, "and had no idea I should have the pleasure of meeting you here. I don't think that my letter was worth such careful preservation," he continued; "in fact, I have almost forgotten its contents;" and opening it, he read it through. What would Lucy have given to have looked over his shoulder? Felicia was crimson. "I will burn it, with your permission,"

"Why did you keep that ridiculous letter of mine?"—p. 538.

Miss Joscelyne, it would have spared a very unpleasant and embarrassing situation," said Mr. Gordon, looking down very sternly at the culprit before him.

"I was going to tell you to-morrow," murmured Felicia.

"I will explain at once, Mrs. Wilson, that Miss Felicia Joscelyne is the daughter of an old friend of my father's," said Mr. Gordon. "At his death, my mother was anxious that she should make her home with her, but an unfortunate misunderstanding arose, and Miss Joscelyne left the house. My mother was much distressed, and at her wish I wrote to ask her to alter her decision—that is at least three years ago.—I thought you were still on the Continent," turning he said, frowning a little; and, not waiting for an answer, he tore the sheet across, and threw it on the fire.

"That is soon explained," said Mr. Wilson, rubbing his hands.

"If Ruth had just told us when she heard you were coming—" said his wife, with a hurt expression.

"I suppose Miss Joscelyne felt it difficult to explain the reason why she found it necessary to leave my mother: it was nothing very dreadful"—with a slight smile—"but a family matter, which my mother would not certainly wish to have discussed. Now," turning to young Wilson, "would you like to have your revenge?"

"My revenge?" said Richard blankly. "Oh, another game of chess! No, thank you."

"Richard looked like fighting a duel just now," said Lucy, in a stage aside to Jack.

"Lucy," said her father severely, "you ought to have been in bed half an hour ago;" in which opinion more than one of the party heartily joined.

"Briggs says his cousin Sam is coming to the woods with us this afternoon," said Jack next day to Felicia. "I expected he would look us up, after what Lucy told Briggs."

"What did she tell him?" asked Felicia resignedly.

"Why, that Mr. Gordon thinks everything of Dora. You weren't in the room the other day when I brought her the note on the big tea-tray; you know Dora is always worrying about Martha using a waiter. Well, I didn't notice Old Grubs sitting in the window, but he flew up as if he was shot—sent me out with the tea-tray, and made me bring the note in properly, talked to me about behaving like a gentleman, and no end of a row. We made it up afterwards, and he was very jolly, and Lucy needn't have put her finger in the pie! Sam is all right, but of course he isn't a patch on Mr. Gordon. It's quite certain the D.V. would never turn herself into Mrs. Samuel Briggs."

"Lucy wants a thorough scolding," said Felicia energetically. "At her age she ought not to think about such things; she would be better at a good boarding-school; I shall tell your mother so. Amy is tired, and not well to-day; you won't tease her with worms and things if she goes with us, Jack dear?"

"I shall most likely be too busy," was the satisfactory answer.

The party reached the woods in high spirits, and quickly dispersed in all directions, except Felicia and Amy, who kept to the more open part, near the entrance, at Amy's earnest entreaty; her legs ached, she said; also, in spite of lessons in English history, she had a lurking terror of hearing a wolf growling somewhere in the thick undergrowth, and really expected to make the acquaintance of a fox or two during the afternoon. So while the others, oblivious of the peace and quietness of aristocratic pheasants, pushed through the tangled bushes into the very heart of the wood, these two were filling a large basket with the primrose roots which grew around them in such abundance, and at last Amy was glad to be wrapped in a shawl, and settling cosily on a cushion of moss and dry leaves, leant her head against Felicia's knees, and was soon fast asleep. The sunlight touched the newly opened leaves of the hawthorn and young elms; there was a distant view of a broad river, with the glistening sails of little fishing-boats looking like the wings of white butterflies; the woodpecker's cry came loud and clear. Felicia, like Amy, was beginning to yield to the dreamy influences of the afternoon, when the apparition of a tall stooping figure, with be-scratched face and hands, made her feel wide awake in a moment.

"Is Amy asleep?" asked Arthur Gordon, mopping the bridge of his nose with a much-enduring handkerchief. "I was going to show her a tree with a woodpecker's hole. She does look tired, poor mite! I will stay with her if you want to join the others."

"No, thank you," said Felicia; adding, "That is a bad scratch on your face, Mr. Gordon. Mrs. Wilson always provides plaister when we go on an excursion like this; Jack generally manages to get in the wars. I had better put a piece on your nose; it is no use rubbing it in that way. Will you look for my case in that little basket, please? It is under the biscuit-bag. Can you put your head down; I don't want to wake Amy."

Opening the case, Felicia cut a strip of plaister, and applied it to the wound with great gravity.

"I don't believe in the existence of Miss Felicia Joscelyne!" said Arthur, as he thanked her.

"That 'very romantic, flighty young person,' as you called her. No; her dreams of a wounded knight never called up the picture of a hero with scratched nose and battered-in hat!" said Felicia, with her merry laugh. "She disappeared years ago, poor thing, and left a very prosaic ordinary young woman, called Ruth."

"Why did you keep that ridiculous letter of mine?" asked Mr. Gordon, putting Amy's shawl more closely round her.

"As a kind of moral corrective, I think," said Felicia, flushing a little, "to remind myself what an absurd creature I was."

"I am glad it is burnt," said Arthur.

"Will you tell your mother that I am not quite so silly as I used to be?"

"I can't draw any contrasts; but when I have told her what a 'ministering angel' you have proved yourself, I am sure she will forgive you on the spot. Are you quite happy here?" he asked, with an affectionate elder-brother air.

"Yes, very happy," she said quietly. "They are kind, warm-hearted people, and treat me as if I were Dora's sister. Poor Dora! You have been hearing some of her troubles, haven't you? Her woes will look very trivial when she knows a little more of the real sorrows of life."

"But she is thoroughly in earnest; she has been telling me how she wants to make the family life more orderly and beautiful—to give it refinement and polish; but, like so many reformers, she begins as an iconoclast, and throws down—or would like to—so many old-fashioned idols of middle-class comfort," he added, laughing.

"Dora is restless and discontented just now, as many girls are; young men from eighteen to twenty-two, everybody allows, have turbulent ideas, and are generally an immense anxiety and worry. Richard is going through the same stage, but his unrest takes another form," said Felicia. "They will both settle down in time into douce, respectable members of society."

"I am glad you can still remember your own youth through the mist of years," remarked Mr. Gordon.

"You are laughing at me!" said Felicia; "but I am older than both of them—years in knowledge of the world!"

"Indeed? Richard, I am sure, does not realise that."

"I do, and shall remind him of it when it is necessary," returned Felicia, with dignity. "But we were talking about Dora," she continued. "She thinks she would be happier with some definite work, but her father does not like her to leave home, and says she can help her mother; but Mrs. Wilson is as energetic as ever, and would not wish to give up, or even share, housekeeping duties. I'm sorry for Dora; her family hardly understand or appreciate her."

"I am dreadfully old-fashioned, of course: in fact, I often feel I belong to the last generation," said Mr. Gordon; "but I must confess I am of Mr. Wilson's opinion. If I had a sister, I should like her to stay at home with my mother."

"If there were plenty of work for her," insisted Felicia. "There isn't for Dora; and she wants to live for something higher than tennis and evening parties, and a prospective husband."

"Forgive me, but surely Miss Wilson's natural duty, after the really good education her father has given her, is to teach her young sisters."

"I suggested that to Mrs. Wilson long ago," said Felicia, "but she told me she wished Dora to be free to pay visits and enjoy herself. You make me think I am one of the poor wandering amoeba—isn't that their name?—that you were telling us about yesterday, trying to attach myself to something or other. Of course, you consider me a very inefficient teacher!"

"I hope you won't attempt lessons in natural history," he returned, with a slight smile. "You know, there is a niche for you to fill: I mean, that my mother would be delighted—," and then he stopped, embarrassed.

"Pray don't explain further. I am not likely to misunderstand your meaning, Mr. Gordon. Though your letter is destroyed, I perfectly remember its contents," said Felicia, deeply mortified. "Oh, there is Jack!" with a sigh of relief, and a great shouting and crashing of boughs announced Jack and Lucy.

"How stupid of you to have stopped here the whole afternoon!" exclaimed the latter. "Why, Ruth, you do look cross!"

"She thinks Mr. Gordon is angry with her about that letter you found," said Amy. "I have been awake ever so long. He says Dora ought to be our governess, Lucy: we shouldn't like that, should we? Oh, my legs do ache so!"

"Where is Dora?" asked Felicia.

"Having a long talk with Mr. Briggs; here she comes, and all the rest of them. I'll walk home with you," taking Felicia's arm.

"Mr. Gordon, there is a nice clean little stream outside the gate, if you would like to wash your face: it is smeared with mud, and has been bleeding. Who put the plaster on for you?"

"Mr. Briggs has found such a curious spider: he wants to ask you about it, please, Mr. Gordon," said Dora, coming towards him with a pretty blush.—"We will all go on, Ruth, and you can follow more slowly with Amy."

"You are so tired, Amy: would you like a ride on my shoulder?" said Mr. Gordon.

"That will be capital," said Lucy. "Then Ruth and I will hurry on first, and tell them to have tea all ready by the time you get in. Come along, Ruth; you had better carry these eggs for Jack. See if we are not home twenty minutes before the rest of you!" she shouted back.

"How nice it is to be so high up in the air!" exclaimed Amy. "Mr. Gordon," she whispered confidentially, "I do wish you would be kind to Ruth, too!"

CHAPTER IV.

"I HAVE been looking for you everywhere. I didn't think you would be sitting in the midst of all these nasty spiders and beetles! That letter is not very particular, is it, Ruth? Do put down your pen!" and Dora drew Felicia to the old schoolroom sofa with its broken springs. "You know, I have no secrets from you!" she said reproachfully. There was a pause.

"What did you want to tell me, Dora?" asked Felicia.

"I have been thinking that perhaps, after all, I have been too impatient for results; certainly I used to prefer Tennyson to Browning myself, and mother and aunt may have the same feeling about Cowper. If I have a home of my own, Amy could come and stay with me; dear mother is so kind to us all, I know I should miss her dreadfully—and—and—no one has ever spoken to me like Mr. Gordon, Ruth. I seem to know him completely, and yet a fortnight ago I was not aware of his existence! He is so clever, and yet so simple-hearted and so good, without being in the least priggish."

"I thought that 'not impossible he' was to be blue-eyed, fair, rather consumptive-looking—"

"Oh, stop, stop, Ruth!" said Dora, laughing. "Surely I could never have been so silly?"

"Still, perfect as he is, I should hardly have thought Arthur Gordon could transform your ideal to the actual," remarked Felicia.

"You are too much influenced by externals, Ruth: it is quite your failing. If Mr. Gordon had a smart little moustache like Richard, and always wore perfect gloves—"

"Instead of none at all," said Felicia. "Well, Dora, I will try and appreciate him for your sake. I never knew till this minute that I was such a vain, surface creature in other people's opinions; it is good for us to see ourselves as others see us, I suppose. How does Mr. Gordon see me, by-the-bye, Dora?"

"Well, he asked me about you!" said Dora slowly. "I don't remember that he told me his own opinion. But I didn't mean to talk about that."

"Of course you did not—such a stupid subject!" said Felicia, starting up.

"Oh, dear Ruth! don't go; I have been longing for a talk with you."

"Have you, Dora?" said Felicia penitently, kissing her. "I do wish you to be happy, indeed, dear."

"Then you've guessed it, without my telling you. You clever girl!" exclaimed Dora, her eyes sparkling. "Oh, Ruth! do you think I can make him happy?"

"Of course, if he loves you. There is Lucy calling me. I can't stop, Dora."

Later in the evening, Mr. Gordon went to the schoolroom, and was busily packing up some bottles and tin boxes, when he thought he heard a sound like a stifled sob, and then noticed for the first time a little figure in the window-seat.

"Advancing absently, scissors in hand"—p. 512.

"Miss Joscelyne!" he exclaimed.

"I have such a bad headache; I came here for a little quiet," she said.

"Can you stay a few moments? I may not have another opportunity of speaking to you. I meant to have told you this afternoon—if I had not floundered in such a conversational bog—a little of our family history. In spite of my mother's admiration for French customs," said Arthur, with a slight smile, "she married my father against the wishes of all her friends—it was a runaway match, in fact. They were very poor, and would have suffered real privation if it had not been for Colonel Joscelyne—he was only Captain Joscelyne then, and did not give his friend that which cost him nothing: in short, he was our good angel. And all I have been able to do in return was to frighten away his little daughter. Ruth, I really can't bear to see you crying. It is ridiculous for you to be a governess; you ought to be taken care of."

"Father told me so once; but many girls are as lonely as I am," said Felicia.

"We spoil so much by our own impatience," said Mr. Gordon, half to himself.

"I used to be impatient; I don't think I am now," said Felicia.

"I was not thinking of you, poor child. I would rather manage half a dozen boys than one Lucy."

"Lucy will grow into a practical, business-like woman—the prop of the family. She is very fond of me in a superior sort of way; like you, she does not think much of me as a governess," said Felicia, brightening up a little. "I have often longed to write to your mother, but felt that I didn't deserve she should care for my letters."

"She would care a great deal more than I can tell you."

"Then ask her if I may send a letter every week; it is better than only writing at odd times. Good-night, Mr. Gordon; it is such a comfort to know that your mother was romantic and flighty once on a time."

"We shall all quite miss you, Mr. Gordon," said kind Mrs. Wilson, at breakfast next morning. "You have been so good in interesting the children, and all of us, indeed, with your microscope and wonderful things. I should insist on your staying longer, but I know your mother must want your society. It is so nice to think that you know Miss Joscelyne in a sort of way. She looks brighter this morning. The foolish girl fancied last night that we were not wanting her to stay with us. She will be more necessary than ever now."

"Ruth is always up and down," said Lucy. "Richard calls her Lady April. But why is she more necessary now, mother?" looking curiously at Mr. Gordon and Dora. "I hate secrets.—You were up early, Dora, talking to Mr. Briggs in the drawing-room before breakfast: about such silly things, too! I heard him at the front door saying you looked like a pink rosebud. Once you told me he was the only person about here who had read anything of Mr. Ruskin's; and if his books are about such nonsense——"

Mr. Wilson broke into a hearty laugh, and his wife, to hide Dora's confusion, said—

"Miss Joscelyne and Jack are tying up your specimen-boxes in the schoolroom, Mr. Gordon. Perhaps you would like to see if they are ready. The dog-cart will be round in a few minutes;" and of course he went at once.

"The parcel is just ready; I have written your full address on it," said Felicia, laying down her pen.

"Does the world seem a little less miserable this morning?" asked Arthur.

"Oh yes!" said Felicia. "I had been a little hurt about something Dora said——"

"And she has explained——"

"Not that, exactly."

"I shall hear about you all, then, through my mother.—Jack, you will send me a message about those caterpillars!"

"Yes, sir. Have you heard the news that Dora is going to marry Sam Briggs? So Briggs and me will be sort of cousins. He isn't half a bad fellow—Sam, I mean. I'm going to drive you to the station, sir, and will get your things into the cart," said Jack, going off with the brown-paper parcel.

"You knew about Dora's engagement, Mr. Gordon!" exclaimed Felicia.

"I did not know it was finally settled—Miss Wilson did not honour me so far; but I could see that the chief objection to Mr. Samuel Briggs was—Samuel Briggs."

"It is a dreadfully ugly name—hideous!" said Felicia, laughing. "And you think so much of names—Pamela or Evelina.—Ah! here is Dora."

"I am afraid we must not keep you longer," said Dora.

"You will let me offer my very sincere congratulations, Miss Wilson," said Mr. Gordon.

"I owe a great deal of my happiness to you for advising me so wisely," said Dora shyly: "I mean, about caring principally for things beneath the surface. Everybody is in the hall waiting to say good-bye, and the children are quarrelling about going with you to the station."

Then the adieus were quickly said, and Jack drove off in triumph, quite ignorant that Lucy had climbed into the back seat at the last moment.

The Easter holidays were soon over, and comparative quiet settled down on the Wilson household, in which Mr. Briggs' fortnightly visits were now the chief events. Happiness wonderfully improved Dora; I think it suits most of us. She was very busy now, the scheme for the social and domestic middle-class reform of the poor little town was abandoned, and she now took practical lessons in housekeeping from her mother. Then, too, she made the acquaintance of Mr. Briggs' two step-sisters: clever, intellectual women, who were delighted with their brother's pretty, girlish fiancée.

Mrs. Gordon and Felicia kept up their regular weekly correspondence; Felicia wrote very pleasant letters, full of sunshine and life. Mr. Gordon had asked his mother if she thought it would be a breach of confidence if they were sent on to him, as he took a great interest in the Wilson family.

"Of course not," Mrs. Gordon had instantly replied. "And if there is anything in one that I think Felicia means to be private, I shall not let you have it."

Apparently, this never happened; Arthur evidently did not consider the letters of sufficient value to return to his mother, though he did not destroy them himself.

Felicia was to spend the summer holidays with Mrs. Gordon; Arthur had joined some friends in a short trip to Norway, and found, when he did return home, that Felicia had quite her own place in the household—she might say or do anything she pleased; the merry voice and flitting figure certainly brightened up the old house. And yet, to his mother's great concern, Arthur grew more and more dull and thoughtful as the weeks went by; and one day, when Felicia, clearing up his den, had emptied a bottle of most valuable infusoria and extremely dirty water, he said it didn't matter. Mrs. Gordon felt that things had indeed become serious, and told her old friend, Dr. Hewitt, that she feared Arthur was sickening for a severe illness. Mr. Gordon came into the room with Felicia whilst the conference was going on, and laughed in rather an embarrassed way at his mother's fears.

"I am only getting middle-aged and dull, mother," he added, with a half-sigh.

"Nonsense, Arthur! Pray how old would you make me, then? in my dotage, I suppose. If you were to smarten yourself up a little—have your hair cut, for instance, and take more pride in your personal appearance. Look at your hands," patting the one that lay in her own, "so brown and scratched; and it is very well shaped—just like your father's—if it is rather large. Besides, as to being not exactly a boy—I'm of Felicia's opinion, and think very young men extremely objectionable."

"Is that your opinion?" asked Arthur, turning to Felicia.

"Very likely I should have said so if I had known you before you went to college," replied Felicia.

"Ah, Miss Felicia! there is hope for us old fellows, then," said Dr. Hewitt, with whom she was a great favourite.

"Get your microscope, Arthur, and show me that Norwegian moss you were talking about."

Mr. Gordon obeyed.

"Wonderful, wonderful!" said the old gentleman. "Just look here, my dear," making way for Felicia; she was a long time adjusting the focus, etc.

"Can't you see it, Felicia?" asked Mr. Gordon.

"My eyelashes get in the way so," said Felicia.

"That's awkward," remarked Mr. Gordon, advancing absently, scissors in hand.

"Mercy on us, Arthur!" cried his mother, "you are not going to cut them off! such beautiful eyelashes!"

"Of course not," said Arthur, annoyed. "I was going to take a fresh specimen of the moss."

"Anything in the cause of science. Now, Arthur, confess you didn't know Miss Felicia had eyelashes!" laughed Dr. Hewitt.

"If I had been a kind of Vorticella, for instance, with particularly long cilia, they would have been worth noticing, wouldn't they?" said Felicia brightly. "I can see the moss at last; it is lovely!"

"You must take some of it back with you for Mr. Taylor to examine," said Arthur.

"I have left the Wilsons," said Felicia.

"Indeed, I did not know it!" he exclaimed, surprised.

"Yes, Felicia had very sufficient reasons—she has told me all about it," said Mrs. Gordon, nodding significantly.

"Gordon, man——" began Dr. Hewitt.

"Lucy is going to a boarding-school, and Dora will give Amy lessons for the present, until she marries," interrupted Felicia, with flushed cheeks. "They were all very kind to me. I have not made any plans for the future yet."

"Of course not, dear," said Mrs. Gordon, kissing her affectionately. "Your little pet, Amy, is coming to us for a long visit; I love to have a child in the house. —Dr. Hewitt, I want to show you my pteris ferns in the conservatory; the fronds are twice as long as yours."

There was a silence after the door had closed.

Felicia was diligently studying the moss, shutting first one eye, then the other.

"Ruth," said Arthur, at last, "Jack told me, a few days before he went home, something Lucy had written to him: that his brother Richard—is he the reason why you left Elmston?"

"He was very silly," said Felicia, embarrassed, "and thought he cared very much for me; but he will soon get over the fancy. A 'romantic young person, flighty' too, cannot hope ever to be loved by anyone whose affection was really worth having." And she turned away with something suspiciously like tears on the much-criticised eyelashes.

"Dear Ruth," said Arthur, starting up, and taking her hand in both his, "could you care to know that one dull stupid fellow at least will never love—never has loved—anyone but you!"

"But I don't think I should care for a dull stupid fellow myself," returned Felicia, looking down.

Mr. Gordon dropped her hand.

"I ought never to have let myself hope you might learn to love me," he said despairingly. "Do you remember the poem Dora read to us that one wet evening: 'By the Fireside'? One verse of it has been running in my head all these weeks. I ought to have feared to touch the last leaf. Dear, don't let me 'lose a friend,' at least."

"Arthur, I shan't have to learn to—love you. I believe I began to care for you from the very moment when I declared I never would or could."

"My darling Ruth!" cried Arthur, his whole face beaming with happiness.

"Oh, how conceited you would grow if you knew just what I think of you!" said Felicia, smiling through her tears. "I shall like even blackbeetles for your sake some day, perhaps."

"How glad mother will be!" said Arthur.

And when Mrs. Gordon came in, a few minutes later—

"Can you guess our secret, dear mother?" he said, Felicia's hand still in his own.

"Of course I can, silly children!" she cried, kissing them both (Arthur first). "An interfering old woman did not do so very much mischief, then, after all."

"And to think I have given my heart to somebody who promised me faithfully never, never to ask for my hand!" whispered Felicia.

FRESH LIGHT ON NEW TESTAMENT TEXTS.

BY THE REV. PROFESSOR W. GARDEN BLAIKIE, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E.

WE have heard much recently of fresh light on the Old Testament, through the Egyptian, Assyrian, and other monuments; but though less copiously and less formally, some parts of the New Testament also have been coming into clearer light through modern observations. I do not refer to such an absorbing question as the site of Calvary, although it seems to me that Major Conder and others have done much to settle that point; but to some smaller matters, of no great importance in themselves, yet interesting when we find them illuminated from unexpected sources.

I.—ST. PETER WARMING HIMSELF AT A FIRE AT EASTER.

THE incident mentioned by two of the evangelists that, owing to the cold, a fire had been kindled in the hall during the trial of Jesus, might have passed without notice, were it not that in countries of the latitude of Palestine, April is generally so warm a month that a fire would be superfluous. It happens that for many years the Meteorological Society of Scotland have had one of their stations of observation at Jerusalem, and are thus able to explain this anomalous circumstance. From their registers it appears, that though the winter is past in April, a cold week is usually thrown into that month as a sort of legacy from the retreating season, just as in this country we often find, after the milder weather of spring appears to have set in, that a new spell of frost and snow is by no means uncommon. With us this occurrence is incidental and irregular, but at Jerusalem it appears to be a stated experience. But who, save an eye-witness, or one who had received his information from an eye-witness, would have thought of adverting to so incidental a circumstance? It helps to fix the date of the Gospels, and it certainly disproves the rationalist position that they were not written till the second century. Evidently the scene was vividly before the writer, or at least the writer's informant; the fire, not regularly supplied, but improvised by the servants and officers for the occasion, "for it was cold"; the very material, ἀνθρακία, either coal, as in our version, or charcoal, as in the margin of the revised version; the company not seated, but standing round, and Peter with them; the glow of light bringing Peter's features into relief, so that the maid-servant was able to recognise him; the rapid assurance of the maid that he was a disciple, and the angry denial of the unhappy apostle.

A friend of the present writer, the Rev. Dr. Wells, of Glasgow, Convener of the Free Church of Scotland's Committee on the Conversion of the Jews, furnished him a few years ago with an unexpected confirmation of this explanation. In one of his visits to the Holy Land, he went down during Easter week from Jerusalem to the Jordan, in order to witness a well-known scene, the bathing of pilgrims in the river. In this journey he encountered a storm of snow and sleet so severe that it was with difficulty he could keep his horse's face to the east. Nor was this an unwonted occurrence; pilgrims are often exposed to something worse than discomfort, owing to the severity of the weather.

II.—THE COCK CROWING TWICE.

IN three of the Gospels our Lord's warning to Peter is, "The cock shall not crow till thou hast denied me thrice." In the other Gospel, that of Mark, the warning is different, "The cock shall not crow twice till thou hast denied me thrice." Usually this discrepancy has been accounted for on the principle that the inspired writers were not guided supernaturally to express things in precisely the same terms, but that they gave the substance correctly, with verbal differences, or even slight differences of fact. But in the present instance that explanation is hardly relevant. The insertion of the word "twice" is a significant circumstance, and not likely to have been made by any careful writer without due cause.

An explanation has lately come all the way from the New Hebrides Islands. In an interesting work, entitled, "Bible Illustrations from the New Hebrides," by the late Rev. John Inglis, D.D., a highly respected and successful missionary, sent out many years ago by a branch of the Presbyterian Church of Canada, the author has remarked that since clocks and watches have become so common, the habits of such animals as the cock are not so carefully marked as they were in our Lord's time, and as they are still in Aneityum, and other islands of the New Hebrides group. There, indeed, as among the Jews of old, the cock-crowing was the best marked hour of the night. Indeed, there are two cock-crowings, but of a different character, and here lies the point of the explanation. The first occurs between two and three in the morning, and is called the false cock-crowing; the second, between three and four, is the true cock-crowing. But after going to Aneityum, it was some time before Dr. Inglis and his friends became aware of the double cock-crowing. The discovery was made in this wise. A brother missionary, twelve or fourteen miles distant, had sent him a proof-sheet which he wished to be returned at an early hour the following morning. Dr. Inglis instructed the two native boys who had brought it to be ready to start by the cock-crowing.

"But which cock-crowing do you mean?" they asked.

"Which?" said the missionary. "How many are there?"

"Oh, you know," they said, "there are two cock-crowings, the true one and the false one."

"And what is the difference?"

"The false one is the first, and then after a while is the true one."

Dr. Inglis, beginning to observe the habits of the animal more carefully, found that if disturbed it would crow at any hour of the night, but if left unmolested, the two cock-crowings were as regular in their occurrence as the rising and setting of the sun. His house was in the neighbourhood of some twenty families, every one of which had poultry; the birds roosted on the trees standing round about the houses. No fewer than from thirty to fifty cocks were within hearing. Every morning, therefore, they could hear both crowings. About two o'clock one cock would crow, and a few others would follow, feeble and drowsy-like, as if half asleep; then all would be still. About an hour or rather more afterwards—about three o'clock or a little later—when one cock crowed, immediately there was a full ringing chorus, a perfect storm of crowing, every one more alive than another. This true cock-crowing marked the time with unmistakable distinctness, and was loud enough to arrest the attention of the most indifferent listener; as Robert Burns describes it, "a cottage-rousing crow." Dr. Inglis quotes from a letter of Mrs. Thomas Carlyle, describing the effect on her poor nerves of a cock-crowing at Troston Rectory in Suffolk: "Then about four o'clock commenced never so many cocks, challenging one another all over the parish."

It is likely that our Lord used the words of Mark, so that if Peter had been attentive, the feeble, earlier cock-crowing might have been a warning to him, and in that case the threefold denial would not have occurred. But our Lord foreknew that the first cock-crowing would not be thus observed by Peter, therefore he made his warning more precise—"The cock shall not crow twice." The other three evangelists deemed it sufficient to give our Lord's words in the abbreviated form, omitting the reference to the first and feeble cock-crowing, and making the other, which was loud enough, no doubt, to be heard over the whole hall, the emphatic proof that he had taken the right measure of Peter's courage.

III.—ST. PAUL'S INFIRMITY OF THE FLESH.

ST. PAUL'S ailments, real and imaginary, have been a fertile subject of speculation. We pass over what we look on as a very silly hypothesis, the product of rationalists and unbelievers, that he was subject to epilepsy, and that it was an attack of that disease that prostrated him on the way to Damascus. Unbelievers have always shown themselves as weak as children in estimating the great moral forces that have moved the world. Even some physical forces are beyond their comprehension. That a poor epileptic should have been able to lead the life that St. Paul led; to endure all the perils, and worse than perils, of which he gives so pathetic a catalogue in 2 Cor. xi. 24—27; keep from swooning in the prison at Philippi, or recover himself after being stoned at Lystra; and generally play the part of one of the greatest men the world ever knew, so as to influence thought, feeling and action, not only in his own generation, but for eighteen centuries, as no other mere man ever did—is too absurd a proposition to deserve serious refutation. But St. Paul speaks of two ailments—though possibly they were but one—which in themselves were real obstructions to his work, although by the operation of a beautiful divine law of compensation they were overruled for good. The one is the well-known "thorn in the flesh," which some have thought to have been defective sight, and others have interpreted in many different ways. But this too we must pass by. The other is an "infirmity of the flesh" which had been apparent to the Galatians, when Paul preached to them first (Gal. iv. 13). On this an interesting light has been thrown in a very learned and acute work which has just been published—"The Church in the Roman Empire," by Professor Ramsay, of the University of Aberdeen. Professor Ramsay has spent season after season traversing Asia Minor, and gathering all manner of minute information touching its condition at the time when St. Paul was going through his missionary journeys. To reach Galatia, he had to traverse Pamphylia. "Everyone," says Professor Ramsay, "who has travelled in Pamphylia knows how enervating and exhausting the climate is. In these low-lying plains, fever is endemic; the land is so moist as to be extraordinarily fertile, and most dangerous to strangers. Confined by the vast ridges of Taurus, the atmosphere is like the steam of a kettle, hot, moist, and swept by no strong winds. Coming down in July, 1890, from the north side of Taurus for a few days to the coast east of Pamphylia, I seemed to feel my physical and mental powers melting rapidly away." Professor Ramsay quotes the remark of an Indian officer that the climate of Cilicia, which is like that of Pamphylia, reminded him of Singapore or Hong-Kong.

It is supposed, then, that St. Paul caught fever on reaching Perga. Though, as a native of Cilicia, he had been accustomed to a similar climate, yet, after travelling on foot through Cyprus amid great excitement and mental strain, he was peculiarly liable to be affected by the sudden plunge into the enervating atmosphere of Pamphylia. If he encountered a severe attack of malarial fever, it would not only explain the "infirmity of the flesh," through which he preached first to the Galatians, but might throw light on the "thorn in the flesh," the effects of which were often so bitter. Bishop Lightfoot describes the illness as "a return of his old malady, the thorn in the flesh—the messenger of Satan, sent to buffet him, some sharp and violent attack, it would appear, which humiliated him and prostrated his physical strength.” “I appeal to all who have experience,” says Professor Ramsay, “whether this is not a singularly apt description of that fever which has such an annoying and tormenting habit of catching one by the heel just in the most inconvenient moments, in the midst of some great effort, and on the eve of some serious crisis when all one’s energies are specially needed.”

But, apart from the question whether the “thorn in the flesh” was the same as the “infirmity of the flesh,” spoken of to the Galatians, we have certainly in the coincidence between the fever-breeding climate of Pamphylia and Paul’s condition on his appearance in the Galatian country, an “undesigned coincidence” which escaped the acute mind of Paley, but which marks a very close correspondence between the narrative of the Acts and the Epistle to the Galatians.

IV.—THE WATER-MARK OF PERSECUTION.

PROFESSOR RAMSAY has found a very ingenious way of throwing light on the time when certain parts of the New Testament were written, by observing the particular phases of persecution under the Roman authorities, of which mention is made in the several writings. Thus, the earliest form of persecution to which the Christians were subjected was that of false accusations: very horrible crimes were laid to their charge, and those who were bent on injuring them had little difficulty in finding witnesses who would swear falsely against them. Nero persecuted them in order to throw on them the odium of his own act, when he set fire to Rome, but ostensibly because they were held guilty of horrible wickedness, especially in connection with their religious rites.

A great advance in the history of persecution was made at a somewhat later period, when the mere fact of their venerating “the Name” of Jesus was enough to demand their condemnation. Professor Ramsay finds no proof of this latter practice in the Epistles of St. Paul—a fact which confirms the early date commonly ascribed to them. Even the pastoral epistles, for which some critics demand a date in the second century, and a non-Pauline authorship, have no reference to this form of persecution, and are, therefore, allotted to St. Paul. On the other hand, in the first Epistle of St. Peter, persecution for “the Name” was manifestly known, as well as the earlier forms, for it is recognised that one may “suffer as a Christian,” hence a later date has to be assigned to that Epistle than to the writings of Paul. When we go to the Apocalypse, we find traces of a practice which did not begin till towards the end of the first century, when some of the emperors demanded to be worshipped as gods. This is symbolically brought out when it is said, “And they worshipped the dragon which gave power unto the beast; and they worshipped the beast, saying, ‘Who is like unto the beast? who is able to make war with him?’” On the ground of this and other statements in the Apocalypse, a later date—near the end of the first century—is assigned to that book. Whether the author has made out all his positions we do not profess to decide, but the criterion of dates, so far as we know, is new, and is very interesting. But there is another internal water-mark, applicable to some of the New Testament Epistles, which does not fall within Mr. Ramsay’s scope, but well deserves investigation—the marks of moral and spiritual degeneracy which had begun to appear, and which drew forth from the writers the severest and most scathing denunciations. The analogy of religious revivals in later times is fitted to throw some light on the time when the degeneracy began.

V.—BE COURTEOUS.

COURTESY is a virtue very expressly called for in the New Testament. Not only is it enjoined by St. Peter (1 Ep. iii. 8), but St. Peter’s Master before him—“If ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others?” It is evident that it was counted of great moment that the Christians should be marked, not only by good conduct, but by good manners. Dr. Inglis’s experience in the New Hebrides enables him to appreciate this. The most barbarous natives (he says) are able to distinguish very quickly between rudeness and politeness, between good and bad usage. “Many would scarcely believe it; but there is, perhaps, no place where politeness is of more importance than among savages.” If you reprove them roughly and publicly you make them resolute enemies; but if you speak to them of their faults privately, but kindly and pleasantly, you find them ready to listen and perhaps ready to mend.

The truth is, there is no class of men among whom personal influence goes so far as savages. When one first speaks to them on religion, he speaks on a subject which burdens and oppresses them, and they listen with timidity and aversion. But if by personal conduct the missionary has first won their hearts, and if he takes pains to show them that his religion will prove not a burden but a benefit, the case is changed. If he go like a mere schoolmaster, bent only on driving hard truths into their brain, he is sure to prove an utter failure. How many of our greatest missionaries have been men of winsome hearts and winning manners, and what a wonderful influence they have come to have! Dr. Inglis mentions the cases of John Williams and John Hunt, and to these we may surely add that of David Livingstone. With Livingstone, to conciliate the natives was more than half the battle, and he knew of no other way of doing this than by “good principles, good conduct, and good manners.” How came Frederick Schwartz to have such authority with the native rulers of India? or Alexander Mackay with the people of Uganda, but by kindly, courteous, honourable dealing, never taking advantage of their ignorance, or irritating them by an overbearing manner?

In the pages of Dr. Inglis it is interesting to read how readily the natives accepted the new habits of courtesy which the missionaries taught them, and how happy an alliance was formed between courtesy and Christianity. It is ridiculous to sneer at courtesy as if it were a mere code of artificial rules enacted by silly men and women, who look on neglect of society manners as a mark of vulgarity. Real courtesy is an emanation of Christian love, designed to sweeten intercourse, to save pain, and to promote happiness even in little things. The old definition of the gentleman is one that will stand the test of all time and all space—"gentle is that gentle does."

POSTMAN HICKS'S LAST DELIVERY.

BY THE REV. H. W. BRADLEY, M.A., VICAR OF BIRTLES, CHESHIRE.

OUR old postman Hicks had drawn his last pension, anybody could see that. The doctor, who looked in occasionally just to feel his pulse and change the medicine, told him plainly that the clergyman was the one who could do him most good now. He owned himself that he was "wore out." At the head of his bed, with a red pocket-handkerchief over it, hung his hat "handy in case he got well"; but everybody knew he would never need it again. An old overcoat which still had a few bright buttons left on it (witnessing to the days when it decked Her Majesty's mailcart), was degraded now into a sick man's dressing-gown, and lay over the coverlet trying to infuse a little more warmth into the tired old limbs. Mike Hicks's days were nearly done.

And to think of him ending them in that little dingy, dirty London back street; as much out of his native element as the blackbird down-stairs, which hung in a cage over the fruit-stall, and piped sadly on until ten o'clock at night, kept awake by the gas-jets. Mike and the blackbird had drifted there from the country some years ago, part and parcel of a stepdaughter's encumbrances.

As he lay up-stairs, in the top storey of the house, alone and solitary (for it was washing-day below, and they were too busy to do more than now and then just come and look at him), old Mike was suddenly conscious of a strange stillness in the room. Outside in the street, for a marvel, there was not a sound. It was just the drowsy time of afternoon. The gossipers had disappeared from their doorways, the children were not yet let out from school. A piano-organ had discharged its tunes and gone by, nor, strange to say, was there a single costermonger bawling his wares the whole length of the street. Absolutely was there rest, a delicious, drowsy stillness, intensified because so unnatural. Instinctively the old man felt it. He closed his eyes, and for a blessed interval his spirit wandered. Yes, and the past came to him again.

Suddenly and vividly it rose up before him; as if by magic the discoloured walls of that dingy attic-prison danced right away, and just for one brief spell he was out under the open sky, young again, joyous, active, free, breathing all the freshness of those early mornings on Piper's Hill as the sun was rising. Yes, he is on his mailcart again. He is starting out for the day with fourteen miles of turnpike road in front, and behind him the clocks just chiming six. There sure enough is old Bob's head joggling up and down, as he digs his toes in and tugs his load to the top of Piper's Hill. There is the Twyford spire, and the towers and factory chimneys of the town he is leaving behind him down in the valley, all rising out of the early mists like the tops of sunken vessels. To-night, when he comes back again, he will see the lights of the town twinkling below like lights at sea; and Bob and he will then begin to start thinking of the little home in Gossamer Street, where "the missus" is waiting for them with everything in readiness—bran-mash, warm slippers, baked potatoes, and cosiness generally.

Yes; he is on the turnpike road once more, with the sun just getting up and making gleamy side-shadows through the hedges, all the stubble glistening, a nibbling hare scattering sprays of dew as she moves quietly about amongst the sheep, and the larks tuning up. Some farm-lad is turning out of a stackyard with his team, to begin their day's work, and he is whistling merrily. Mike is there as sure as can be, elated—in raptures at travelling the old familiar road once more. Forty years had he taken that selfsame journey, out at daybreak and back at night. He never thought to see it again. Every bend and turn he knows, every house, every landmark. What memories it all awakens! Ah, here is Horrington, where he has to drop his first consignment of post-bags. What a quaint little straggling village street it looks, with its multiplicity of public-houses! And there is the "walking post" waiting, as he used, to take on the Ropsley letters, and Curtis the gamekeeper to know what orders there might be before he goes the round of his spinnies. Then Ockley comes, a village overshadowed by elm-trees and resonant with rooks and cackling jackdaws. Here is old Stubbs outside his cottage—village shoemaker, district postman, and parish clerk combined—also waiting for the mail-bag. Two miles on comes the Hollow, where the snow in severe weather always took to drifting. Not once nor twice had he and Bob been embedded there. Once when he was a walking post (in the days when Gawsworth was the end of his beat), at this very spot, Mike had been waylaid. It was one Christmas Eve, and he was heavily laden. He had reached the bottom of the Hollow, where it was all overshadowed by the trees above, when he was accosted by three ferocious-looking fellows. They were out on strike and rather desperate. They demanded the bags.

was a literary man; so he had agitated to such a degree, and so increased the delivery by requesting everybody he knew to write to him, that he got things attended to. Sunbury hereafter was to get its letters delivered from the Twyford centre by half-past eight in the morning, and Mike was to bring them—in a mailcart. It was a capital arrangement,

"'Nearly home, Mike?'"—p. 549.

Mike had resented the claim, and hours after was picked up senseless and nearly frozen to death. However, he had not defended himself in vain, for one poor fellow was so beaten that they easily traced him, and his discovery led to the conviction of the other two.

It had been due to Rector Bell that Mike first got his mailcart. Before the rector came to Sunbury-on-the-Hill Mike had been only a walking post, and his destination only as far as Gawsworth. Sunbury then had got its letters from an opposite direction, and they were not delivered till twelve and collected again at two o'clock. This hardly suited the new rector, who and Mike well remembered the first day he was promoted to wheels.

See! Here is Sunbury; certainly sunny and certainly on the hill. You can see it for miles away, with its spire overlooking all the country round. Bob always pricked up his ears when Sunbury came in sight. Like his master, he felt here the journey ended. Sunbury was their second home, their day quarters. A comfortable stall in the blacksmith's shed was always in readiness: but more often Bob was tethered to graze along the roadside, whilst Mike made his delivery on foot. Then during the rest of the day, from half-past ten till five, Mike was his own master.

Believe me, it had been a dangerous time at first, for "Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do," as the old hymn says. "Postman" was good-natured; he got to be looked upon in the village as universal handy-man. If a farmer wanted an extra hand in the harvest field, or a neighbour was hurrying to get in his hay, or his lordship wanted an additional beater, or there was a slaughter of rats going on in a stack-yard during threshing-time, it was always "send for postman." And what was the result? Too many friendly glasses. One night the mailcart never arrived at Gawsworth. They went to look for it, and they found Mike lying by the roadside, and his pony grazing near with bleeding knees. It was hushed up very generously, and supposed to be an accident. But after that he signed the pledge; and this was the very wisest thing he could do. Also he took an allotment and set to work to garden, which gave him a great deal of profitable enjoyment. He began, too, to wood-carve during the winter afternoons; and hardly a house in Sunbury but had a specimen of his handicraft, to say nothing of the lectern in the church. Yes, those were happy days. How their memories came back to him!

But the dream has changed. Suddenly there comes over it a mist, a chill, and a darkness. Once more he is starting out, this time for home. Night is setting in. The last late-comer has been and gone, and now the office is closed and the post-bags being sealed up. Outside, by the blaze of his lamps, Mike is harnessing to his pony. He is late and must lose no time. How numb and stiff his fingers are, and how cold it is blowing! The few idlers, waiting to see him start, come out from the cheerful ruddy light of the blacksmith's forge, and one says, "Good-night; see yer to-morrow, Mike." But something tells him he is driving out into the darkness for the last time. Then the snow begins to fall, beating in his eyes flake by flake and blinding him. He is measuring his remaining strength and thinking, "Can I last out?" One longing possesses him: it is for rest and home. Will the journey never come to an end! At every stage they tell him he is late and must hurry. He hears them, as in a dream; it is not being fined he is afraid of. More hills, more slipping back, and the snow as blinding as ever; till at last there are the Twyford lights twinkling in the valley below, and Mike Hicks knows he is nearly home.

"Nearly home"; he woke him up by saying it. A blaze of light burst suddenly over everything, and he was convinced he saw four walls jump into their place again. He stared at them for a moment in amazement, and then he recollected they were his bedroom walls, and he had been dreaming.

"Nearly home, Mike; yes, I don't think it will be long," said a voice at his side.

Mike looked round, and saw the clergyman sitting by his bed. "I am afraid I've been dozing, sir," he apologised, trying to raise himself on his side, but failing; "ay, but I had a lovely dream." And then he told it.

"Well, that was a look into the past, certainly," replied the clergyman. "You can count your mercies, can't you? and your sins and shortcomings too. Well, well, ask the One above to forgive them all; and then, Mike, look forward, for you are nearly home. You've often told me you've got loved ones waiting for you there. You'll soon join them. But, postman Hicks, may I remind you, you have one more delivery to make first? I hope you will be ready with that? Do you understand what I mean?"

"I think I do," said Mike; "but go on, sir."

"Mike, God when He created you gave you an immortal, precious soul. 'Don't let anyone rob you of it,' He said; 'it is Mine; keep it safe through the journey that is before you, and at the end deliver it up to be safe and unspotted.' Can you make your last delivery, Mike?"

After a pause the old postman answered, "Yes, sir, I think I can, for the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin."

They parted. Next morning a "gentleman" called, dressed in seedy black, and announcing that he was from Mr. Jones in the Commercial Road. He was shown up-stairs immediately. It was the undertaker's assistant, and he had come to take the measurements for the coffin.

Poor old postman Hicks was "gone."

NORHAM GARDENS is a quiet part of Oxford which lies just off the main road; a scholarly calm, a deep stillness, pervade the whole neighbourhood. It is an ideal residence for an Oxford Don. Here then, appropriately enough, lives the world-famed scholar, Professor Max Müller. There is, however, little about him to suggest either the rather ridiculously pompous and self-important person one usually pictures an English University Don to be, or the deeply learned man buried in abstruse science and the lore of a long-forgotten past. Professor Max Müller is a delightfully simple-mannered person, with all the pleasant cordiality and the perfect self-possession usually found in a man of the world. About the middle height, with grey hair, fast becoming silvern, that surmounts and surrounds a singularly handsome, well-cut face, he does not in the least give one the impression of a man who took his Doctor's degree just fifty years ago. And his voice and manner are as youthful as his appearance. It is impossible to realise you are talking to a man who has reached the limit placed by the Psalmist to the age of man.

"I came here in 1846," he tells me, "to look after the printing of the Veda, the most ancient book of India, possibly of the whole world, which I was engaged to publish at the expense of the old East India Company. Here I met many charming men, many nice fellows—Froude, Palgrave, Grant (Sir Alexander), Sellar, Stanley, Jowett, and others. One of the professors to whom I was acting as deputy fell ill. He died. 'Why should not you take his place?' said my friends. That is how I, a graduate of Leipzig, came to be an Oxford professor. And so I have lectured here in Oxford for many years, Professor Sayce and then Professor J. Wright being my deputies. Now I lecture but rarely. I am entirely given up to literary work, chiefly to the translation of the Sacred Books of the East and to new editions of my old books. Last year I varied the quiet monotony of university life by a tour to Constantinople, where my son is one of the attachés at the English Embassy. The Sultan gave me two of his highest Orders, and treated me with the greatest possible kindness and attention. Before I left he presented me with this beautiful cigarette-case"—and as he spoke, my host placed in my hands a magnificently jewelled gold cigarette-case, the value of which must have been very great indeed. "This morning," he continued, "I received this autograph letter from the King of Siam, in which he encloses an order for £1,200 to enable me to carry on the translation of the Sacred Books of the East. His Majesty is the chief Buddhist king now reigning in the world."

After a while, Professor Max Müller and I drifted into a conversation upon the condition of young life at Oxford of to-day. I referred to a remark that Mr. Froude had once made to me, in which he had spoken of the young men of his day having been so much more sophisticated than those who go to the university nowadays.

"That is very true," replied my host. "They are far less sophisticated than they used to be. Extravagant shops have come to an end; 'wines' have almost entirely died out. Indeed, many young fellows who come to my house to dine never touch wine at all. There is very little gambling. When I first came here, one frequently saw batches of from twenty to thirty red-coated young fellows riding off to the neighbouring meets. Such a sight is rarely seen nowadays. This is attributable, for one reason, to the agricultural distress, which has much impoverished our great landowners, who cannot, therefore, make big allowances to their sons, and to the fact that the smaller schools send up a great many of their boys, who are naturally much poorer than the men of old were. All these things work a slow change not only in the personnel of our students, but in their very character and habit of life. To many of these young fellows the getting of a good degree is a matter of life and death. They therefore eschew high living for high thinking. Work, not ease and comfort, is the rule of the day with them. The whole spirit of the place has changed in consequence. No doubt there is much more pushing than there was before; much more striving at what they can get out of the University Chest. Another cause of change is that whereas young fellows going in for the Foreign or Colonial Office or for the Army used first to come here, they now go to a private tutor, and so are three years ahead of their contemporaries. This, however, is but a momentary advantage, which does not last. A university education in the end is not only not detrimental, but it makes life fuller than it would otherwise have been. The Oxford honour-men always beat in the end."

"And is university life generally, is the whole genius of the place improved by the New Era, if I may so term it?" I asked.

"Ah! that is difficult to say," replied my host. "The lower stratum is lifted up, without a doubt; and that is a good thing. More work is done than used to be done, but the freedom of work is gone. The luxury and beauty of scholarly leisure have passed away for ever. It is quantity to-day rather than quality, I fear. The tutors become teachers far too young, and they work so hard that they have no time to look to the right or the left; and what is life if not a continually glancing to right and left? They give themselves no time to develop. They take a good first-class, and then give out what they have learnt, as teachers. This engenders the money-making spirit. I have no word to say against it, but still it all tells on the spirit of the university. To a certain extent, so far as these young tutors are concerned, this state of things is remedied by readerships, which give them more time for special and research work."

"How do you like the present system of constant examinations?"

Professor Max Müller slowly shook his head.

"Ah! we suffer sadly from these constant examinations; they stunt our young men. They have no time or opportunity to be idle. Now, do you know, it is my idle friends chiefly who have become distinguished men in later life. I believe in cultured idleness. It gives a man time to read for himself.

But look at these examinations; why, a man knows exactly what he has to read frequently to the very page. You don't call that study!" continued the professor, with a keen sarcasm. "These young fellows haven't time to attend any professorial lectures. They don't pay. I quite own that the examination system benefits—temporarily, at least—the great majority who by means of them creep into the varied posts which are safeguarded by the examinations; but vast harm is done to the select minority."

"Is the present generation, hurrying and pushing as it is, affected to any appreciable degree by the traditions of the place?" I asked.

"Oh yes!" replied my host, with much enthusiasm, as who should say, "We haven't altogether gone to the dogs"; "the traditions of each college are very strong. The genius and solemnity of Oxford tell on all our young men. For instance, in any foreign university you will find the walls and tables much defaced; but here they are too much loved and venerated. Now and again, it is true," he added, with a smile, "we have a bonfire, but that is rare. Indeed," he went on, drifting into another current of thought, "it is wonderful how, with the little real power we have, we are yet able to keep these three thousand young men in order! There are very few excesses. Of course, our final punishment is very severe, but it is very rarely resorted to. And yet, think how helpless we should be if they rose in rebellion against us! I am often amazed at the way in which discipline is kept up in these days."

"In some ways they are wonderfully docile. Chapel and hall are faithfully kept; no resentment is expressed at the iron-barred windows. An American student here the other day, thirty years of age, was forbidden to use a certain arm-chair in his rooms. When he objected, the reply was, 'You can leave, if you like.' Now, no Continental university, except perhaps in Russia, could carry out such a system; the men wouldn't stand it. There is nothing of the kind in Scotland, though there, I grant you, is the safeguard of poverty, which keeps the men quiet willy-nilly."

"The socialistic spirit of the day," continued Professor Max Müller, in reply to an observation I made, "is quite exceptional here. Now and again there is a debate on the subject, but as a rule the great majority don't care two straws about socialism. For the majority is decidedly conservative."

"Are they equally conservative in religious matters?" I asked.

"Some have very free religious views. Balliol men, for instance, followed their late Master very faithfully. One hears now and again the views of certain very clever fellows, but I don't think we harbour many Shelleys. There is less theological interest in conversation"—which rather surprised me to hear; "there are but few signs of opposition to established forms of belief. But then, freedom of thought is so general nowadays. Fifty years ago Froude's 'Nemesis of Faith' was burned in a lecture-room; to-day anyone might write it without attracting attention." As my host spoke, my mind went back to the day when Mr. Froude himself told me of this memorable and curiously mediæval incident in his life. "But the old High Church leaven is still here. Liddon was a great influence, but he has no real successor."

"How do they regard the establishment of such colleges as 'Mansfield' and 'Manchester'?" I asked.

"Well," he replied, "I don't think they resent them. You know, Stanley always fought to make the university national in the widest sense of the term: a place where all could mix on one footing. We seniors regret these new denominational places—Kemble, Mansfield, Manchester—which do away utterly with such a spirit. We wished that young men should not think too much of religious differences while at Oxford, but by this system all are labelled. I fully expect a Roman Catholic College next."

"Now for the great athletic question," said I.

"Of course," replied my companion, "athletics are excellent, but they are far too much to the fore. The whole afternoon is given up to them. A little is well and good. Men are apt to forget that we are composed of mind and spirit, as well as of bones and flesh."

I asked the professor how he compared life at an English university with the life at a German one.

"Well," he replied at once, "it is very difficult to compare the two, for there are wonderfully few points of contact. A German university is not for teaching only, but for pushing on the work in every branch of learning. There is no corporate life, as here. The students, again, take a much more independent line; there is therefore much more independent work done, and the work seems more congenial to the men. Each professor has a sort of seminary, or society, for which he picks out the cleverest men. To begin with, there is a Maturitäts-examen; all the men have to be up to a certain level when they enter the university; and as a rule, they are better workers. Oxford will never be what it ought to be, till the University resumes its entrance examination."

"And what as to that other feature of 'young with the poor husband. The enthusiasm of the women, and their consequent superiority of regard, are apt to be just a little irritating to the average "human" man.

"But," went on my host, "I feel much of their work is wasted. As soon as women leave their college they enter a different atmosphere, and nothing tangible comes of all their work, whilst if only they could get fellowships, they might do a great work. They have infinite patience, but the difficulty is, where are they to live and to work? If I had a dozen of them, I could give them all work to do: MSS. to copy, records to hunt up. This work they do so well; just like their needlework: mustn't Oxford of to-day'?" I asked my host; "I mean the girls' colleges?"

The professor smiled.

"I opposed them at first; but they are a great success, and it is a real pleasure to me to see the young girls so eager to learn. Young men do as little as they can, young women do as much as they can: too much, indeed. Again, they work more systematically and their knowledge is better arranged. It tends wonderfully to the improvement of the whole of their character. I wish the men could be shamed and spurred on to further effort. Indeed," he added, laughing outright, "a friend of mine and his wife went in for the same examination; she took a first class, he only a second."

I am afraid my sympathies as I listened were leave a stitch undone. Mrs. Humphry Ward used to collate and copy MSS. at the Bodleian; that was how she learned to work. But many of these really learned young women are wasted. Oh, the pity of it! But then," he continued, "how much waste there is! Look at the brilliant and most promising young men who go from here as curates, barristers, doctors—all wasted, I mean," he explained, "so few of them get the posts they really deserve and are best fitted for. These girls go home to be laughed at by their brothers. Here they would be a power if we could bestow fellowships upon them."

"Does their life here encourage what Mrs. Grundy would term laxity of thought?" I asked.

"Pooh, no!" replied Dr. Max Müller; "not a bit of it. The girls are very ambitious; and perhaps certain foolish ideas which old ladies might consider essential are driven out of their heads, but nothing more. Believe me, the women's colleges here are not hot-beds for the cultivation of the Emancipated Woman. They send out students and scholars, and that is all."

"And what about the University Extension system?" I asked.

"Very successful. It is opening up new avenues for thought throughout the whole country. I look upon it as an invigorating work. Here is an instance: A mining village wrote to say they would like a course of lectures on the Greek Tragedies. That is a new phase for them; and I believe in new phases. Even if the education it confers is a little superficial, it gives a fillip to life; they will have some other interest beside mere town and local gossip.

"But there is one evil in connection with the system: our cleverest men waste the most critical years of their life in daily travelling and daily lecturing. They make a fair income, doubtless, but I doubt if they grow intellectually richer themselves."

"Is young Oxford generally much influenced by the thought of the day?"

"Not much," was the rather hesitating reply. "They read current literature, but with no deep thought upon it, I should say; though, of course, I can speak with no certainty, as I see but little of our young fellows now. You see, here in Oxford nothing is permanent. All is change. There is a constant pulling up of plants to see whether they are growing. We seniors have no power of resistance, for the young dons walk together and talk together, dine together and smoke together, and naturally vote together in Convocation and can carry whatever they want. We have new life, it is true: sometimes a little too much of it. Wave succeeds wave, and the old is swept away."

SHORT ARROWS.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

"IS YOUR MIND AT EASE?"

"IS your mind at ease?" asked Dr. Turton of Oliver Goldsmith, as he lay sick of his last illness. "No, it is not," answered the poor poet; and these were his last words. There are few people in this hurrying, restless age who can say that their minds are quite at ease. Some are anxious about business or their children. For others the competition of modern life is too much. Others, again, have done something wrong of which conscience hourly reminds them. To the minds of these and of hundreds who may be met every day there is only One who can give ease. "Cast thy burden on the Lord." "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin."

"FREE INDEED."

We read in Scott's "Ivanhoe" how, in the days of serfdom, Gurth the swineherd wore round his neck, as though he were a dog, a brazen collar, on which were the words: "Gurth, the Son of Beowulf, is the born thrall of Cedric of Rotherwood;" and how, after great and gallant services, Cedric had the collar filed off, and said: "Thrall and bondsman art thou no longer. Be free in town, in forest, and in field." What Cedric the Saxon did for Gurth the swineherd, for his good deserts, that Christ did for all humanity in spite of their ill-deserts. When He makes us free we are free indeed.

ACROSS THE MEADOWS.

"When daisies pied, and violets blue,
And lady-smocks all silver white,
And cuckoo-buds of yellow hue,
Do paint the meadows with delight," we are indeed pleased, after walking long upon a hot dusty road, to find a path across them. On either side are cows feeding that seem to be emblematic of trustful peace. A river flows along, babbling to us lessons as from a book. A simple peasant or two we meet returning from their small transactions in the market. Still however delightful a path across the meadows may be in comparison to the ordinary beaten road, it is sometimes very deceptive, and leads us astray, or causes us to be late for our engagement. So is it with the old highway of duty. It is not at the time as pleasant as the "primrose path of dalliance," but it is far safer.

THE BATTLE OF THE SQUARES: A PARABLE.

The chessmen were put aside in their box. It was a tight fit to get them in, and their owner found it difficult to make the lid shut closely down. The men themselves felt cramped in such narrow quarters, and there arose no small contention about the matter. "There are too many of us here," said the knight. "The pawns must emigrate; there is nothing like change of air for the lower orders." "Quite right," answered the bishop. "I have always contended that overcrowding is at the root of every social distress." The pawns, when they heard this, rose up in rebellion, and, being stronger in point of numbers, took the law into their own hands and turned out the kings. "These kings are bigger and more useless than any other piece," they shouted. "They can only move one square at a time, and are powerless to protect themselves. They shall depend on us no longer." Next time the men were set upon the board the players found no kings, and, until they were discovered lurking out-cast in a corner of the cupboard, no game could possibly proceed. "Ah," cried all the men together, "how foolish have we been! We are undone without the kings." Moral.—Every man has his part to play in the game of life, be he high or lowly.

TRUTH INDESTRUCTIBLE.

When Jehoiakim, King of Judah, cut with a penknife and threw into the fire the roll of a book upon which were written God's threatenings against the sins of himself and of his people—when he treated thus contemptuously the Word of God, he may have fancied that he had killed truth. As if truth depended upon men and could be killed by them! They may believe or they may not; but though this matters to themselves, it cannot destroy truth. If the whole world ceased to believe Christianity, not one jot or tittle of its truth would perish. It is well to remember this fact, which, when stated, seems so obvious; for many have a contemptuous, patronising way of talking about religion as if it would perish if they ceased to believe it. When these clever people hear of some celebrated man or of a large number of people becoming unbelievers, they fancy that there is safety for their own unbelief in numbers, and that the mere prevalence of unbelief in certain noisy sections of society can destroy eternal truth.

CONSPICUOUS INCAPACITY.

People are often discontented because they have not obtained high positions in their professions, but before being so they should be sure that they would well fill larger places. "The way to fill a large sphere on earth is to glorify a small one." It is a check to grasping ambition to ask oneself—"Have I glorified my small sphere?"

BUDDHA THE GREAT.

For six and a half centuries, during which the monastery walls, which once enclosed it, have crumbled away, has stood the gigantic bronze Buddha of Kamakura in Japan. The image is fifty feet high, ninety-eight feet round the waist. The eye is four feet long; a full-grown man can enter the nostril. The interior of this huge idol forms a temple, into which we were admitted by a door under its left elbow. The day was gloomy, and there was a solemn impressiveness in the scene, deepened by the shadow of overhanging clouds, and the sombreness of the dark fir trees surrounding the majestic figure. Certainly Buddhist worship is seen at its best and grandest in Japan; yet what is there, we asked ourselves as we turned away, more satisfying to sad and sinful human hearts, what more comforting for dying men and women, in such a spectacle as this, than in the tawdry doll behind the guttered candles which we passed a few yards distant on our homeward way?

SOME NEW BOOKS.

To say anything fresh of "The Expositor's Bible" is difficult in the narrow space at our disposal. Like many of our readers, we are always on the look-out for new volumes in this series, and welcome one with avidity. The latest is Archdeacon Farrar's admirable volume on "The Second Book of Kings," which does credit alike to its distinguished author and to its publishers (Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton). There was room enough and to spare for this careful exposition of a portion of Scripture peculiarly rich in suggestive story and pictorial detail. And Archdeacon Farrar was pre-eminently the writer best calculated to guide preachers in their choice of subjects from this rich mine of historical teaching.—From the same publishers we have received a little volume of "Essays Suggested by Bible Figures of Speech" under the title of "Sayings in Symbol." The writer is our contributor the Rev. David Burns, and two of the chapters in his book have already appeared in our own pages. We wish his little work all the great success it deserves.—All students of Church history will welcome a new volume of lectures and addresses from Professor W. Bright, of Oxford, under the suggestive title of "Waymarks in Church History" (Longmans). As a whole, the subjects of the Professor's chapters are too recondite for enunciation in such a note as this, but they are of interest to many of our readers who will understand and appreciate our advice to turn to the book for themselves.—While the International Sunday School Lessons are showing Sunday by Sunday God's dealings with his ancient people, the issue of Mr. Telford's volume on "The Story of Moses and Joshua: its Lessons for To-day" in Messrs. Cassell's Series of Bible Biographies, is peculiarly seasonable. It is not so long but that every teacher, however busy, can spare time to read it, and it is so thoughtful and practical that no one could do so without being helped in preparation for his work. And in all senior classes, the book would make an excellent hand-book for the scholars themselves.—Our contributor the Rev. A. R. Buckland, M.A., is responsible for a deeply interesting little work, published by Messrs. Isbister under the title of "The Heroic in Missions," giving an account of pioneer-work in six different mission-fields.—Messrs. Cassell have just commenced a new issue in monthly parts of their "Cathedrals, Abbeys, and Churches," in a form and at a price which bring within reach of all our readers this interesting and well-illustrated description of the chief monuments of ecclesiastical architecture in our land.—We have also received a copy of a new and cheaper edition of Mr. Hardy's "How to be Happy though Married" (T. Fisher Unwin), of which there is nothing new to be said, except that it well deserved its former success, and merits the attention of the wider public to which it is now brought.—Another interesting new edition is that of "Lay Down your Arms," a translation of a German work, written in the interests of International Arbitration, and published by Messrs. Longmans.—We have also to acknowledge the receipt of "A Retrospect" (of the China Inland Mission), by J. Hudson Taylor, published by Morgan and Scott; "A Year With Christ," by the Rev. F. Harper, M.A. (John F. Shaw and Co.); and "Treasures of the Deep, and Other Poems," by Robinson Elliott, published by Mr. Elliot Stock.

BEATING OUT THE BUBBLES.

A visitor to a famous pottery establishment was puzzled by an operation that seemed aimless. In one room there was a mass of clay beside a workman. Every now and then he took up a large mallet and struck several smart blows on the surface of the lump. Curiosity led to the question, "Why do you do that?"—"Wait a bit, sir, and watch it," was the answer. The stranger obeyed, and soon the top of the mass began to heave and swell. Bubbles formed upon its face. "Now, sir, you will see," said the modeller, with a smile. "I could never shape the clay into a vase if these air-bubbles were in it; therefore I gradually beat them out." It sounded in the visitor's ears like an allegory. Is not the discipline of life, so hard sometimes to bear, just a beating-out of the bubbles of pride and self-will, so that the Master may form a vessel of earth to hold heavenly treasure? The work is slow and painful, but the beauty of the result may make amends if we yield ourselves to the Love that shapes.

MISS AGNES E. HENDERSON, M.D.
(From a Photograph by James Ewing, Aberdeen.)

A LADY'S WORK IN NAGPUR.

At a time when both the Philistines and the Sadducees are too much given to sneering at the missionary as one who seeks, by taking up the cause of the heathen, to gain social and pecuniary advantages which would otherwise be out of reach, it is peculiarly gratifying to be able to point to an instance of devotion to mission work which is so clearly the outcome of love and duty as that of Miss Agnes Henderson, daughter of Sir William Henderson, lately Lord Provost of Aberdeen. Surrounded from childhood with all that wealth and social position could give, her heart was in higher things than usually occupy young ladies of her class and age. Her father, a large shipowner and an eminently successful man of business, had repeatedly received the highest honours that his fellow-citizens could confer. He was widely esteemed as one of the most able and arduous leaders of the Free Church of Scotland, and as an energetic and munificent supporter of educational and missionary work. These sympathies were equally strong in his wife, and when she was cut off in her prime the mourning husband could think of no fitter tribute to her memory than the establishing of a Medical Mission to Women at Nagpur, Bombay. He therefore provided an endowment for such an institution in connection with the Free Church of Scotland Mission. In 1885 Miss Henderson, having resolved to devote herself to the work, entered the London School of Medicine for Women. On presenting herself for examination at the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons, Edinburgh, she at once, and without difficulty, gained her diplomas as L.R.C.P.E. and L.R.C.S.E., and at the Glasgow College she had equal success. Many medical practitioners of excellent standing have no higher credentials, and if Miss Henderson had chosen to go no farther she had the excellent excuse that the M.D. degree was not then granted to women in this country. But, with the tenacity of her townspeople, and in the determination that nothing on her part should be wanting to ensure success, she proceeded to Brussels, where she duly took her degree as Doctor of Medicine. She next spent some time in Vienna, studying the most advanced medical and surgical science of the capital as applied to the diseases of women. In the autumn of 1890 she left for India, and after spending some time in the hospitals of Madras and Bombay, gaining insight into the diseases peculiar to the country, she took up her work at Nagpur. Though of slight and delicate physique, Dr. Henderson has been able to devote herself assiduously to her duties. How her work has prospered may be gathered from the last report, which states that for the previous three months new patients numbered 300, of whom sixteen were Christians, 125 Mohammedans, and the rest Hindoos. During the same period over eighty cases were privately dealt with. A few months ago it was felt that the work was growing at a rate with which it was impossible for any one agent, however energetic, to cope, and Dr. Henderson was recently joined by Miss Wells, daughter of an eminent minister of the Free Church of Scotland and a Licentiate of the Glasgow Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons. To comment on the zeal and self-denial involved in such labours is as needless as to speculate on the mighty consequences to which they may ultimately lead.

HE FORGOT HIS BREAKFAST.

An absent-minded man of our acquaintance, having finished a very good breakfast, left the breakfast-room only to return a few minutes after, ring the bell, and ask the servants crossly why they were so slow in bringing his breakfast. They thought their master had gone mad, and assured him that he had just breakfasted. Still, it was only when they had pointed to the shells of eggs consumed by him that he realised the truth of their assertion. When we have partaken of the daily bread and other blessings which our Heavenly Father gives to us, are not many of us equally oblivious?

A GOOD DEFINITION.

There could scarcely be a better definition of true politeness than that which Madame de Sévigné gave to her daughter. She was advising her to lay aside her haughty manners, and she said: "My child, remember that politeness is the small change of Christian charity."

GRATITUDE AND INGRATITUDE.

A nurse told us lately an agreeable experience which she had with a patient in her hospital. He was a negro with white wool on his black face. Twenty-five years ago he had been a slave, and on his liberation became a sailor. Meeting with an accident on board ship, he was carried to the Devon and Cornwall Hospital on landing at Plymouth, where he lay in pain many a weary day and sleepless night. Still, he was quite enthusiastic in his expressions of gratitude for the care bestowed upon him. With him it was always, "Oh thank you, miss!"

"How good you are to me!" "Very sorry to trouble you!" "God bless you for your kindness to poor black sailor!" Contrast this man's conduct with that of another whom we know. He is healthy and wealthy, has a nice wife and children, and what should be a most happy home. Yet this man, with everything to comfort and amuse him, often speaks of his life as one long misery, and has frequently been heard to say deliberately that he has nothing for which to thank God!

THE OBLIGATION OF RANK.

The following illustrates the strength of that motive to which St. Paul appealed when he exhorted the Ephesians to walk worthy of the vocation wherewith they were called. In the old coaching days the Rev. Matthew Wilks was seated near a young nobleman whom he knew by sight. The nobleman began to talk on improper subjects with the coachman. Waiting for an opportunity, Mr. Wilks attracted his attention, and said, "My lord, maintain your rank." The nobleman felt the reproof, and, turning away from the driver, directed his attention to his reprover, in the most gentlemanly manner, through the remainder of the journey. When they parted, he asked him for the name of his "kind companion," and said that he hoped always to remember the just reproof. The same thing might be said to every Christian who is not walking worthy of his vocation. Maintain your rank. Remember that you are a child of God, a member of Christ, and an inheritor of the Kingdom of Heaven. Noblesse oblige—in a wider and a higher sense than its usual restricted proverbial meaning—your rank imposes obligation.

THE REV. DR. STORY, MODERATOR DESIGNATE OF THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

HERE is the marble block — shapeless, unhewn. It is untroubled and at rest. So it may remain, but in that case it will be a shapeless, useless block to the end.

The sculptor comes with his sharp tools. He sees — what none other could perceive — sublime capabilities in that inert mass. He sees within it the perfect form of an angel, instinct with divine beauty, such as shall stir the hearts of all observers, and raise their desires heavenward. He will make that rough block—if he can obtain possession of it for his purpose—a thing of beauty, a power for good.

It becomes his own, and the work is begun. With heavy blows the sharp chisel is driven into the stone. The chips fly in all directions. The marble suffers: it loses bulk, it seems more shapeless than before. Then the faint outline of the perfection that is to be, appears—very imperfect yet. The imprisoned Ideal emerges slowly, until at length hammer and chisel are put aside, and the angel is set free from the encumbering mass. The rough unlovely block is now become the glory of the sculptor, the pride of a nation, the wonder of all ages!

Such is the story which is familiar to us—a parable easy of interpretation.

Dear suffering reader—you who can say, "My Beloved is mine, and I am His"—you may see in the sculptor an image of your Lord; in the marble, yourself. In the imprisoned angel you may see the Idea which He embodied when He created you, and which—if you wholly resign yourself into His hands, if you are "still and let Him mould" you—He will set free from all that holds it captive, till it shall stand forth to glorify the Master-Hand that wrought the work. That is the "afterwards;" at present you are undergoing the process, and it seems to you "not joyous, but grievous." The chisel is sharp, the hammer is heavy. Day after day they pierce and smite you. Sore are the blows that strike off pride, selfishness, worldliness; and in their place bring forth and perfect humility, Christly love, holiness. At first, even under the sculptor's hands, the marble appeared more shapeless than before it was disturbed; it appeared to lose instead of gaining. So it seems to be with many a sufferer. Pain, laments such an one, induces impatience; trouble, despondency; weakness, irritability.

Have you felt it to be thus?

Well if so, don't lose heart. Only resign yourself, by an act of entire consecration, wholly into the hands of the Divine Sculptor. Join with Him—for you may—in the work, by unceasing prayer that His will be done in you. Say to Him, "Dost Thou will that I should suffer pain, heavy trial, constant disappointment? Be it so, Lord; I will it too. I will to have no will but Thine, for Thou desirest nothing but my sanctification!"

Let this thought help you, too. Each blow that falls on your quivering flesh, your wounded heart, is felt by the power of His exquisite sympathy, in His own Person.

It is the Loving Jesus—Whose flesh was torn, Whose heart was broken once for you—Who deals the heavy stroke. He feels your anguish. He marks your tears. He heeds the faintest sigh you breathe. He understands all the weariness, the faintness—bears the sorrow with you, carries the grief.

His is love so very great, so very pure, so utterly selfless, that it will not spare one necessary bitter pang. Nay, it "will bear its own anguish of refusal," when the weak flesh pleads—"Lord, spare me! I can endure no more! Take away this cup from me!" and will finish the work and perfect it—for your sake.

Ah, dear reader, the day is coming when you will not know how to praise and thank God enough, that He did not spare, did not remove the affliction which has worked for you a "far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory!"

Will you not make Him glad now, with a sweeter praise even than that which you will be able to offer Him then? a song in the night, a song of love and trust and thankfulness, out of the depths of your pain?

"I know, O Lord, that Thy judgments are right, and that Thou in faithfulness hast afflicted me."

"Every day will I bless Thee; and I will praise Thy Name for ever and ever."

CHILDREN'S DAY AT THE ABBEY.

(SOME NOTABLE CHILDREN'S SERVICES.)

BY F. M. HOLMES.

TINY LISTENERS.

"I HAVE heard a clergyman preach in a lantern."

"You have not," replied Hilda scornfully.

"I have," reiterated Bob.

"There were no candles in the lantern," interrupted little Oliver.

"Yes, there were, Mr. Confident."

"Why, how could there be candles?" exclaimed Oliver. "The lantern must have been very large."

"I know! It was a lighthouse lantern," suggested Hilda triumphantly. "You heard a clergyman preach in a lighthouse."

"No," replied Bob mysteriously, shaking his head.

"It is only some silly joke," remarked Hilda, pretending not to care about it, but really most anxious to know what her brother meant.

"What I say is quite true," declared Bob. "I heard a clergyman preach in a lantern, and I think mother said it was one of the most notable Children's Services in the year."

"Oh, a Children's Service!" exclaimed Hilda. "You mean, then, that the children carried lanterns?"

"No, I do not; I mean what I say. The clergyman preached in a lantern," persisted Bob.

"And where were you?" asked Hilda. "Were you in the lantern also?"

"Yes; and a number of other boys and girls besides."

"And it was lit up by candles?"

"Partly."

"I shall ask mother what you mean," said Oliver, giving up the puzzle in despair.

"Was I there with you?" inquired Hilda, thinking that she had been to most places with her brother.

"No, my child," answered Bob, rather patronisingly; "but I think mother means to take you this year."

"When? To-morrow is Innocents' Day, and we are going to the Abbey."

"Yes, that is it," said Bob. "The service is partly held in the lantern, and it is there where the clergyman's pulpit is."

"Are you not making a mistake?" said his mother, who had just come in with Oliver. "The lantern of a church is a structure over the dome or centre (when it is built in the form of a cross), and admitting light."

"Well, mother, we were in the centre of the Abbey last year, and the verger said that that was the lantern, and the space on one side was the north transept, and on the other the south transept, and another space the choir; and—they were all full of people."

"Many children?" asked Hilda.

"Numbers of children. And it was a dreadfully foggy day—so, besides the gas-jets, there were many candles with glass shades round them to light up the building."

"But the light could not penetrate far," said their mother, "and the lofty roof and fine stone piers were all lost in the darkness. You could hear the beautiful organ, but could not see whence the lovely music came."

"The people crowded up one of the transepts, and were gradually admitted to the choir and to the square space in the centre, which I thought the verger said was the lantern," continued Bob; "but many persons, I believe, were admitted to these places by tickets through the west cloister door, and were there long before three o'clock, when the service begins."

"Yes, the Abbey was thronged, certainly," observed their mother; "and a beautiful sight it was to see so many children in the lovely building. The service is so suitably arranged for children, and the Dean preaches so appropriately to them."

"I liked to hear the Christmas carols they sang," said Bob.

"And is there a collection?" asked little Oliver.

"Yes; and for a very suitable object," answered his mother. "It is for the Destitute Children's Dinner Society, which has fifty-three dining-rooms for poor school-children in London."

"I wonder what they have for dinner?" said Hilda.

"Meat stew, vegetables, rice, and bread. Mr. Punch started these dinners. In the winter of 1863-4 he published a paper in his genial journal called 'Dinners for Poor Children Wanted,' and that was the origin of the Society. About 200,000 dinners each winter, on an average, have been given, the children paying about a penny each—the meal, however, costing threepence each; and the collection at the Children's Service on Innocents' Day at the Abbey was for this Society; and I daresay it will be to-morrow when we go, so be prepared to give something."

These Children's Services were originated by the late Dean Stanley in 1871. "He had always enjoyed the companionship of children," says Mr. Rowland Prothero, in his recent biography of the Dean, "and the interest which he displayed in them in public was a most marked characteristic of his private life."

At these services, we learn from the same source, "the Psalms were specially selected for the occasion," the eighth Psalm being chosen to indicate "'how little children may find out the glory of God in the great works of Nature';" the fifteenth Psalm in order that they may see "'how, from our earliest years down to our latest age, that in which God finds most pleasure is the humble, pure, truthful, honourable mind';" the 127th Psalm to "impress on parents 'what precious, inestimable gifts are given them in their little children.'"

In the same manner the lessons were specially chosen: the first "'to remind you how little Samuel knelt upon his knees morning and evening, waiting for the voice of God to tell him what he was to do; and the second to set before us the example of our Saviour Christ Himself as the little Child.'"

"Adults with children only."

SINGING CAROLS IN THE ABBEY.

In the brief sermons which Dean Stanley used to preach at these services he was wont to seize upon topics suggested by the day and by the great building itself in which they were held. So, in 1877, Mr. Prothero tells us, the Dean collected "the remembrances which the Abbey contains of 'little boys and girls whose death shot a pang through the hearts of those who loved them, and who wished that they never should be forgotten.'"

On another occasion, when Innocents' Day fell on a Sunday, the Children's Service took place on the 27th, which is St. John's Day, and the Dean treated of stories and traditions of that Apostle. So also the conduct of the lads on board the training-ship Goliath, which was burned in 1875, on the previous day, furnished him with a subject; and, again, a few years later, the legend of St. Christopher, of which a sculpture appears in Henry VII.'s chapel, was utilised.

These services became extremely popular, and were very largely attended. Thus, in the same biography, we find it stated: "The service on Innocents' Day, 1876, was, he [Dean Stanley] says, 'attended by hundreds of children. I was glad, for it was a service in which my Augusta took the greatest delight.'"

Dean Bradley, who succeeded Stanley, has continued the services, which are specially arranged for the occasion. The opening sentences, read by one of the clergymen, were, on the last Innocents' Day—"Come, ye children, hearken unto Me; I will teach you the fear of the Lord," and "I love them that love Me, and those that seek Me early shall find Me." These texts were taken respectively from Psalm xxxiv. 11 and Proverbs viii. 17.

A portion of the Evening Service from the Church of England Prayer-Book followed, and then three special Psalms were chanted: viz., Psalms viii., xv., and cxxxiii. The Lesson came next, the portion of Scripture selected being from the First Epistle of St. John, chapter iv. This was followed by the Nunc Dimittis, the Apostles' Creed, and four collects: for Holy Innocents' Day and for Christmas, and the second and third collects at Evening Prayer. After the last collect a hymn—

"I love to hear the story Which angel voices tell"— was sung, and then came the sermon by the Dean.

Like Dean Stanley, he referred to some object of interest connected with the Abbey itself, more especially to a scene in a stained-glass window in the chapter-house, which illustrated a story of King Edward the Confessor, the founder of the great church in which his hearers were gathered.

But first he spoke of the day on which they had met, and addressing his audience as "My dear children," reminded them why the service was held, and why the day was called Holy Innocents' Day, insisting also that it was good and wholesome to celebrate special days. Innocents' Day had been called unlucky, even as sailors, for instance, regarded Friday as an unlucky day on which to commence a voyage because Christ had been crucified on that day. But they need not regard Innocents' Day as unlucky, for it was the day on which Westminster Abbey had been dedicated, more than eight hundred years ago.

The story of Edward the Confessor, the Dean told his young hearers, had been written in rhymed Norman-French six hundred years before, and given or dedicated to Queen Eleanor, wife of Henry III. It told how King Edward, on his return from exile, was shown by his courtiers much money in his treasury. They showed him this, thinking to gladden him. But the good king saw a black demon crouching o'er the gold and mocking at the misery of the people; and the sight reminded him of the sufferings of his subjects from whom the money had been extorted. Forthwith, then, he repealed the tax; and he enjoyed a rich reward.

From this incident the Dean gathered that the Spirit of Jesus had wrought no small work in the world even in that day, and it led him naturally to speak of the blessedness of relieving distress and of thinking of others. This was the lesson which he drew from the old story, and which he urged the children to learn.

After the collection, which, as Bob's mother had said, was for the Destitute Children's Dinner Society, the hymn "Brightly gleams our Banner" was sung, the General Thanksgiving and the Prayer of St. Chrysostom were offered, and then two Christmas Carols: viz., "In sorrow and in want, amid the winter wild," and also "The First Nowell," were sung, and the service closed with the Benediction.

"Did you see that dear little girl just behind us?" asked Hilda, as the children and their mother threaded their way home through the winter twilight. "The candle-light in the Abbey, perhaps, made her think it was bedtime, and she folded her hands and said the Lord's Prayer when the clergyman did."

"Yes, I know what you mean," answered their mother: "the solemn service seemed to have taken her quite out of herself."

"It was solemn, but it was cheerful too, mother," said Bob. "I saw that little girl, and there were two other children with her, and they all took hold of one paper, and sang 'Nowell' with the choir."

"They seemed quite to enjoy it," replied their mother; "and it is well that the children should have their day at the grand old Abbey—the priceless heritage of the whole English race, and with which so much of our history is entwined."

CHAPTER X.

GLAMOUR.

"As the in-hastening tide doth roll,

Dear and desired, along the whole Wide shining strand, and floods the caves—
Your love comes filling with happy waves
The open sea-shore of my soul."

At last the heavens grew tired of shedding moisture, and the last few days of the month rejoiced in real harvest weather.
The sun shone brilliantly all day long, the wind blew sufficiently from the east to be of a very drying quality, the bosom of the earth grew warm, and the puddles disappeared.

Amyot's men returned to the allegiance and belief in him and his powers, which the persistent wet and dreary days, together with the uncomfortable rumours afloat in the district, had disturbed. The work was proceeded with in vigorous earnest, and Amyot, freed from distracting fears, had even leisure to hope something from his harvest. The grain was lifting its head, and swaying merrily in the embracing breeze. Nothing, in fact, was quite so bad as he had feared. Some of the wheat, indeed, now that he could observe it, he saw gave good promise. Another week of such weather as the last, and his harvest would begin.

He was in the highest spirits as he rode down one morning to the Fen. The whole earth smiled at him, and the waters, gleaming and sparkling in the sunshine, returned the smile.

He had taken a roundabout way by a farm, where he wanted to give directions for housing some harvesters, and had crossed the river by a bridge higher up, and ridden down its right bank towards Lessdyke.

As he went along, he had observed carefully, not only the state of his crops, but the state of the river and its banks, and noted the possibilities which his engineering skill and knowledge and foreign experience suggested.

His way led him close by Mrs. Hardy's cottage, and his observant glance noticed that it looked unoccupied. No door or window was open this brilliant morning, no smoke was issuing from any chimney, and most of the blinds were down, giving to the house an uninhabited look, as of a body without a soul.

"I wonder," he thought in passing, "if she's away? Has Rowan"—his thoughts lingered on the soft syllables—"succeeded in persuading her to go?"

He reached the bridge, when some impulse made him turn his head to glance again at the cottage.

Was it fancy, or was it a face he saw above the blinds? Some little movement of the white curtains he felt sure had taken place.

Thinking it over, he persuaded himself that he had even discerned a slim white hand beckoning to him. For the space of a moment, during which his thoughts dwelt upon the fancy, he paused; but nothing further being visible, he turned and rode on.

The beauty of the morning filled his mind with longing for Rowan. As he rode along the dyke an impulse came to him to go over to Lescough, and hear his fate from her own lips.

His plans were succeeding. The reaction from the last month's depression had produced a corresponding hopefulness about them. Soon the smiling lonely plain would be bustling with life and production; and the equally lonely and gleaming sea would be busy with its fishing fleet of boats. And ahead, his mental vision produced at will, a bright little watering-place along the sand-swept dunes. Amyot's was a distinctly creative beneficence. He rejoiced in finding work for man, and in making Nature yield up to him her blessings.

As he cantered on, his face bright with his dreams, he gradually heard the monotonous throbbing of his pumps at their work. The dyke had been completed a few days ago, and the men were now chiefly busy in strengthening weak places and in carefully providing for the spring tides, which a few days would bring.

Amyot presently noticed a man at work in the field below him, and he paused to observe his occupation. Then, interested, he guided his horse down the sloping bank, green with turf and bents, and watched him till he paused, leaning upon his spade.

"What's the cause of that, William?" he asked, pointing to a little rill of water at adily trickling from the bank into the wide drain prepared to receive leakage.

"Can't say, sir; it do beat me: there must be some leakage in at t'other side. I mind me when this was built—afore your time, sir, a goodish bit—there were a difficulty here. Somethin' to do with the current, and with the bank not bein' slanting enough. The time and time it were washed away till it larnt us what were wrong."

Amyot looked anxious.

"Remind me to look when the tide is down; and get some piles and faggots here, in case it might be well to do something. By-the-bye, William, is it your daughter who waits on the lady at Lessdyke—Mrs. Hardy?"

"Yes, sir; she have waited on her many a year."

"Is she away now, do you know?"

"No, sir; she do never go away."

"The house looks empty this morning," persisted Amyot. "When you go home to-night, will you remember to ask your daughter? I suppose she goes every day?"

"What's the cause of that, William?"—p. 567.

"Well, yes, sir: she go, but she don't always get let in—madam sometimes won't answer no manner of ringing—and then Car'line come away."

"But what would happen if she were ill and couldn't let her in?"

"She never are ill, sir; she have too much sperrit to be ill. My! I allus tells my missus it would be a good thing for husbands if all women were to be as spry as her."

"Well, don't forget to ask your daughter about her to-morrow," said Amyot, recalling with pity the poor sickly woman who called William husband.

And then he got back to the dyke and rode on.

What a suggestive scene it was before him, viewed from this comparative height! A busy scene of white-shirted men, with their background of golden corn, bounded by an apparently illimitable plain of the greenest verdure. Above, the sky as deep and dark a blue as the sea below, a few feet from Amyot's path.

How men could call and consider this region uninviting, Amyot could not understand. Its width and largeness, its soft neutral harmonies, its amber and gold sheen, its magnificent skies, the movement and immensity of its banks of clouds, its flying shadows, its flocks of white-winged gulls, its possibilities, the engineering feats it invited, together with the fact that some miles away inland was living Rowan Gayle, made it to him a beautiful paradise.

He rode about, carefully inspecting every point, and in his own delight promising the men unlimited work in the future, if they cared to return to the neighbourhood when the further work should be begun.

"It will be best to leave all the sheds," he said—"they will do to start from again. I am having plans made for a row of detached cottages on the sandhills there, which could afterwards be enlarged, if necessary; and we might set to work on their foundations next month."

His voice rang across the fields. The corn waved and the waves sparkled, and the fresh breeze was like wine in his blood.

He had brought his lunch with him, and he ate it sitting in the shade of a shed, whence he could see the misty quivering level of the grain, on which the sun was beating down in almost visible waves of heat. And the brightness and sunshine were but the environment of Rowan, tempting him with visions of her in her soft white dress sitting under the cedars with her book; lifting up grave eyes now and then in thought, or strolling down the shady alley revelling in the summer beauty, or perhaps, later, riding towards Less-dyke in the cool of the evening to see her aunt.

He had always scrupulously avoided intruding on her on these expeditions, though he often saw her from afar, or heard of her being there. And he had had his reward; for once during the wet season, tempted by a comparatively fine afternoon, she and her father had taken Deepfen on their way home; and though he was absent, Peter and Nurse had been equal to the occasion and had speedily provided a delicious and dainty tea. And though Amyot had bewailed his misfortune in being absent, his absence had done his cause no harm; for Nurse, in a very cunning manner, had managed to insinuate such delicate praise of him as could never have been delivered in his presence.

He sprang on to his horse after his frugal lunch, with a half-purpose in his mind which thrilled his soul; and as he rode homewards, his purpose grew. After all, what reason was there for being silent any longer? He loved her; he was succeeding—his plans must eventually succeed. And he was not a poor man. If thoughts of Lord Lescough now and then made him uneasy, he pushed them aside. If Rowan loved him, she would not marry Lord Lescough, no matter what pressure might be put upon her—he felt quite certain of that. And he absolutely derided Mrs. Chester's sentiments concerning himself, of which Lord Lescough had told him.

He went home and wrote a few letters, dressed himself with extreme care in a fresh riding-suit, conscious that no dress could be more becoming, ordered the horse Rowan had admired, and, under the delighted and well-wishing eyes of Nurse and Peter, who perfectly understood the purpose of all this preparation, rode away through the summer afternoon.

"You'll maybe not be back to dinner, sir?" Nurse asked, lingering in the hall after finding some gloves he had asked for.

"Oh, yes—I think so," he answered. "I don't know of anything—any meeting that should keep me."

As he rode along, his vision was sensitive in an unusual degree to the bright aspects of nature presented to him by the sunny afternoon: the flat green country under the azure sky, quivering with misty heat; the soft and welcome shade of the elms and hazels, and some beautiful horse-chestnuts lining the road in front of a large white-gabled farmhouse; the lush growth and efflorescence of the plants which fringed the still waters of the "drains" on either side of his road, purple and red and delicate rose alternating with the creamy white of the fragrant meadow-sweet, and the madder of the flowering rushes and grasses.

He rode slowly, in a mood of tender expectancy, rejoicing in the wealth of beauty around him, and in the unconscious sense of his own youth and health and vigour.

As he passed the old church, grey with age under its protecting elm-trees, at the entrance to the town, he noticed that it was a little after five o'clock; and a sudden inspiration made him—instead of riding towards the High Street and presenting himself at the front gates of the Abbey—turn up a narrow grassy lane, from which a gate led into the Abbey courtyard. It was a short cut into the country, avoiding the town, which once or twice he had taken with Mr. Gayle, and now it served him in good stead.

When, at the sound of his horse's feet and the vociferous barking of several dogs, a groom ran out to meet him, he was told that Mr. Gayle had just driven away to a meeting, but that Miss Gayle was in the garden.

So, inwardly blessing his fate, he decided to be daring, and to present himself, without invoking the unnecessary aid of a servant. Could anything have been more timely?

At the little gate leading to the lawns he paused, his keen eyes searching the shady recesses of the trees on their further side. There were evidences of her presence—a flutter of white revealed the little tea-table; a newspaper or two on the grass near a big chair showed whence her father had departed; a crimson parasol lay open beside a low basket-chair; several books he could distinguish on the garden seat—but Rowan was not there.

His eyes searched the garden in all possible directions during the moment's space that he allowed himself to pause; and then he guessed with the sure prescience of one who knew her tastes, where she had gone.

He passed through the gate, and, with the thrill of a man going in uncertainty and doubt to learn his fate, crossed the lawn.

Fate had been good to him, he thought, as on reaching the green alley between the cedar hedges which led to the rose garden, a flutter of white at its further end showed that his guess had been correct. She was moving away towards the rose-garden, and, as all footsteps were inaudible on that velvet floor, he followed slowly, not wishing to startle her before she had discovered his presence.

Some premonition, perhaps, of his nearness made her presently pause and glance round—just as she was on the point of emerging into the open pleasance where the roses bloomed, and masses of tall lilies swung gently in the breeze. After a second's hesitation she turned and awaited him.

And so they met.

It was like a picture, had anyone been present to paint it. Behind Rowan, serving as a delicious background to her white figure, the sunshine gleamed on the pink and yellow, the red and white, which contrasted so vividly with the deep gloom of the foreground—the cedar and cypress hedges between which Rowan stood. Above was a perfect arc of blue, below a floor of emerald. And coming towards her, nearer, nearer—as she stood, an arrested, trembling creature, mastered by an unknown power—a man, looking every inch a man, with a gait which only centuries of command could have rendered so masterful, his brown dress in harmonious keeping with the old-world surroundings, and on his face the eager glow of love.

A second's glance as their hands joined, and, in spite of herself, Rowan's eyes fell before that ardent gaze. Amyot's dark eyes feasted on the tender curves of her face, on the flickering colour which mounted in warm glow to her cheeks, on the drooped eyelids whose thick fringe of dark veiled the beautiful eyes. Not thus, he knew with delight, does a woman look who does not love.

She had not withdrawn her hand. He wondered whether she could hear the loud beating of his heart, during the silence before he could find breath to speak.

They were in a world alone, together. Amyot unconsciously blessed the thick screens which hid them in this enchanted garden.

Then the words came.

"Rowan!" he whispered softly, putting his arm round her slender form—"Rowan!—sweetest—do not tremble so! I would not vex you for the world. Look up! Let me see your eyes: I want to read your soul."

She bent her head back against his shoulder, and slowly lifted her eyes to his. How beautiful they were!—deeply, unfathomably grey—liquid now with the unmistakable light of love.

For a second he paused, thrilled to the soul with the keenest bliss that God gives to man—the certainty of love returned. Then he bent his head and kissed her softly, lingeringly, rapturously, on the lips. The whole world was still around them as soul met soul.

After a second, with a sigh, a little soft sigh as of one returning to life after unconsciousness, Rowan gently withdrew herself, and half-turned as though she would pursue her way.

"You were going to gather roses, Rowan?" he asked. "My sweetest rose of all! This is an enchanted garden. How can I hope to transplant you to my solitary wilds!"

"Your wilds will not be solitary long," she answered, softly, letting him place her hand upon his arm and slowly pacing beside him. She spoke tremulously. Joy is a wonderful upsetter. And this joy had come suddenly, unexpectedly—as probably it mostly does to the people chiefly concerned. "Not solitary, if your plans prosper."

"No. And then I shall have to fence in my home, to keep it at least solitary for my wife. My wife," he repeated, exultingly—"I like her best—aloof and still."

"Indeed!" she laughed, tremulously; "then you didn't like me—in London, for instance?"

"My Rowan!" and again his lips sought hers. "I was filled with fears then. It was not a happy time. I thought I should never find you. And people said——" he stopped.

"No matter what people said," she answered, lightly. "I wondered you did not come;" and then she, too, stopped, ashamed of her admission.

"You loved me then?" he hastened to inquire. "Rowan, you have not said it yet. Darling, whisper—say you love me!" He took her again into his embrace, and gazed down into her eyes.

There was a silence. And then, across the roses, borne along the fragrance of the sweet summer air, a soft, low sigh was breathed out over the garden.

"I love you."

Was it Rowan speaking? Or was it some exquisite air imprisoned in the flowers, hidden away till then in the rose-petals and lily-cups, and now unloosed?

A rapture filled Amyot's mind as he heard. Rowan loved him.

After a time the lovers found a shady garden-seat under the old brick wall, where, with the roses and lilies blooming all round them, they talked over future plans. And then Amyot remembered the cottage at Lessdyke, and asked—

"Have you seen your aunt lately, sweetest? I passed this morning, and thought you must have persuaded her to come away."

"No," said Rowan, her face clouding. "I have tried in vain. What is to-day?" she asked, a sudden recollection occurring to her.

"The most blessed day of my life," replied Amyot, fervently.

"Yes?" assented Rowan, after a pause for thought. "But what day in the calendar?"

"The thirtieth of August."

"Are you getting very anxious?" she asked.

"I am anxious for nothing now, but to be worthy of you, sweetheart."

"Not about Friday?" she asked, rapidly calculating.

"Why Friday?" he asked, revelling in the upturned questioning gaze of the candid eyes.

"It is the third of September."

"What is in your mind, dearest? I am too happy to think of anything but you," he answered.

"There is an almanack called the 'Holland Sooth-sayer,'" she began. "My aunt believes in it."

"So do many people," he answered, laughing. "It is quite safe hereabouts to believe in it."

"Do you?"

"Well, I haven't, hitherto," he replied frankly. "But I will now, if you wish it. Oh, Rowan!" he broke off passionately, as his words brought to his mind how great would be the sweetness of common interests shared together. "You cannot dream what your love is to a solitary man who has had no one."

After a short interlude, Rowan began again.

"It said that September the third would bring ruin and desolation and flood. And my aunt believes it. It is strange it should happen to be the day of the high tide!" she questioned, uneasily.

"Yes; the tide will be worth seeing," Amyot answered. "If this weather lasts, dearest, you must come over. And we will have a picnic on the dyke. Nurse and Peter shall bring everything from Deepfen. We will celebrate our victory."

"I suppose nothing could happen?" she asked, soberly, thinking of her aunt's evil prognostications.

"Nothing in this weather. I suppose if there were to be a gale from the north-east we might get a little water. But then I should not let you come, sweetheart."

"Not let?" she asked, smiling. "And would it do much harm?"

"I hope not any."

"What time is the tide high on Friday?" she asked, presently.

He brought out a thick pocket-book with elaborate local tide and other tables.

"Most conveniently for our picnic. About five."

"And will that be the highest of all?"

"That is not possible to foretell, dearest. Change of wind, or a distant storm, or the eagre, might make Wednesday's, or Thursday's, or even Saturday's tides as high or higher."

"Then you won't feel quite safe for several days," she pondered. "And if the weather changes?"

"There is a change of moon. It probably will change," he replied.

And then the tides were forgotten in the temptation offered by the sweet curving lips; and life, and love, and the fragrance of flowers in the sunset, became one dream of unmixed bliss.

CHAPTER XI.

LETTERS.

"And what's the earth,
With all its art, verse, music, worth,
Compared with love found, gained, and kept?"

MR. GAYLE was in much perplexity. As he sat in his study reading over again his morning's correspondence, his face was a good index to the unwonted perturbation of his mind. The room had the same outlook as the drawing-room, and from where he sat he overlooked the lawn. There Rowan had been flitting about, gathering flowers, and the gleam of her white dress and the slim gracefulness of her figure was still photographed on his mental vision, long after she had disappeared up one of the green alleys.

On the table before him lay several letters. One, a very angry one, was from Mrs. Chester; another was from Lord Lescough, a third was from his lawyer. The last was just now causing him the chief part of his trouble; although the other two, coming as they did to accentuate it, acted like the proverbial troubles which come in battalions.

The lawyer's letter told him of money difficulties and pressing claims, and suggested selling some of his farms, or letting Lescough and retrenching abroad. It would not be possible to keep up the Abbey in proper repair at its present cost, and also do justice to the rest of the estate. He ended by hinting in a vague way that a rumour had reached him which presented a very pleasant way out of the difficulty, and he hoped that it might prove true.

With a knitted brow, Mr. Gayle laid down the letter and thought. It would not be possible to live at Lescough at a less expenditure than at present. Of that he was certain. The house and garden would go to ruin unless they were kept in constant and vigilant repair. So, after a few minutes, he put that alternative out of his mind. And it hurt his pride terribly to think of selling even outlying bits of his estate. If he wanted to sell, who would buy? There was no landowner in the neighbourhood to whom his land would be of the least value, except Amyot Hardy and Lord Lescough. But he did not feel inclined to go a-begging to either of them. Supposing that Amyot's scheme succeeded, there might indeed be no reason to sell—if he could tide over the present stress. His wedge of land was so favourably placed, as to make it the best site for the proposed little watering-place. In all Amyot's plans, Mr. Gayle's co-operation was necessary in his private capacity as owner of the land, as well as in his public capacity as chairman of the Drainage Commission. He did not mind owing any possible advantages which might accrue from the watering-place scheme to Amyot; but he minded very much offering to sell him his land.

And then he took up Lord Lescough's letter.

This promised to solve all his difficulties, but he nevertheless laid it down with a sigh. In some things he was an unworldly father. Rowan was very dear to him, as a motherless girl is almost always dear to her father. And Lord Lescough's manly letter, in which he avowed his love for Rowan and his desire to make her his wife, was such as to warm any fond father's heart. But yet, Lord Lescough was a man of the world, twenty years at least older than Rowan; and somehow, Mr. Gayle shrank from the idea of giving up to him his young daughter. And that was what made him sigh; for if he could have made up his mind to it, it would have smoothed away all difficulties.

It did not enter into his head that Rowan could have anything to say in the matter. For he was so blind as to believe her still absolutely heart-whole.

Lastly, he took up Mrs. Chester's letter, which made him angry. She wrote as an angry, rather unscrupulous woman would, who feared her pet schemes were being wrecked by carelessness and folly.

"What is this I hear from Rowan of constant intercourse with Lessdyke!" she wrote. "Surely that unhappy woman brought disgrace enough upon us in times gone by, without your giving her a chance of repeating her injury. I can scarcely believe that you allow Rowan to be there so much. I was also much vexed to find in London how intimate young Hardy seemed to be with Rowan. He took her away from Lord Lescough and myself in quite a rude way one night. I thought him most overbearing. And Lord Lescough, who is staying here, has just given me to understand that he thought the acquaintance between them was of a more intimate kind than one of mere neighbourhood. I took care to put that right, and to explain your reasons for allowing the acquaintance. I believe it both astonished and relieved him very much. It was evident in London that he admired and sought out Rowan. So I told him that the coast was clear for him. And I congratulate you; for he is a splendid match. And I should recommend that, except for business purposes, young Hardy should be discouraged. He struck me as a very forward young man, who had no idea of his proper place."

If Mrs. Chester had known it, the tone of her letter was more calculated to advance Amyot's cause than to retard it, with so obstinate a man as Mr. Gayle. He had returned from his meeting and subsequent dinner, too late the night before to find Rowan up; and had been too obviously occupied and perturbed by his morning's correspondence to encourage her to seek him with her story.

Amyot, on leaving her the evening before at the garden gate, had said that he should ride over the first thing in the morning to see her father, and she was content that he should be the first to plead his cause. If Mr. Gayle had not been so preoccupied, he could not have failed to notice Rowan's manner that morning. She was tremulous with happiness, and languid after a nearly sleepless night, during which all solemn thoughts had visited her. If a smile stole to her lips at a remembrance of Amyot's tenderness, it was speedily chased by a trembling doubt of her own power to be to him all that he would demand. Love-making and love receiving—whatever poets and storied say to the contrary—are not all bliss. They are a medley of feelings; uncertainty, doubt, fear, as well as rapture. So when she saw her father too busy with his own thoughts to attend to her, she not unwillingly withdrew to the garden, there to live over again the scene of the preceding evening, to conjure up again Amyot's words and looks and tones, even the caresses which brought the quick blushes to her cheek, and the tremulous quiver of happiness to her lips.

Meanwhile, with her father, Amyot was contesting step by step his claim to those blushes and tremors. Mr. Gayle, at first hardly believing that he was hearing aright, and afterwards absolutely incredulous as to Rowan's part in this surprise, was hard to plead with. He at first angrily refused to listen to any claim from Amyot—said the whole thing was impossible, and the marriage not such as he hoped for his daughter.

"In spite of herself, Rowan's eyes fell."—p. 569.

Amyot kept his temper, and heard, to all appearance imperturbably, all Mr. Gayle's objections, one by one. Feuds were out of date now, he had smilingly answered to the first, and he was merely a collateral heir to the inimical representatives of his family. He declined to be responsible for the follies of his forbears.

To the rest he listened indulgently, feeling its force. It would be a lonely life for Rowan, but he hoped that she need not necessarily live at Deepfen all the year. Certainly she need not, if his plans succeeded. To the third, that Lord Lescough had been before him, he answered simply—

"Not with your daughter; and I think, from what he said to me, that that letter is written under a mistake."

To the fourth—that Rowan could not care for him, or her father would have known her feeling—Amyot said—

"It is a feeling girls never allow, I believe, even to themselves. But now, if you will ask her, I think she will allow it to you."

Mr. Gayle gave in at last, however unwillingly. In spite of the feud and a good deal of family pride, he had grown to like and trust Amyot so thoroughly in their business relations, that he was not at heart averse from making these relations more intimate; and whatever had been his family history, he himself was a son-in-law of whom anyone could be proud.

So it happened that after an hour's hard pleading, Amyot went out victorious to find Rowan, leaving Mr. Gayle to write very different answers to his correspondents from those he had at first intended. One was very short; it ran thus:—

"DEAR JANE,—You will be interested to hear that I have this morning consented to an engagement between Rowan and the very forward and overbearing young man whose acquaintance you seem to have already made. You are quite right—he is very masterful!"

That evening Rowan received her first love-letter, sent by a labourer who came home from work by train.

"Do not think my motive a selfish one if I ask you to ride over to Lessdyke tomorrow, dearest. I hear that your aunt has not been well for some days, and I fear she is rather an unruly patient for her usual attendant to manage."

The result of this letter was to see Rowan in the saddle on the following morning as soon as her housekeeping duties were ended. Her father had driven off early to shoot over a few distant farms, and Rowan had the day before her.

When she arrived at Lessdyke, she found her aunt ill with a feverish cold, unwillingly kept in bed by the clumsy efforts of Caroline and her own weakness, which refused to allow her to rise. The doctor whom Rowan promptly sent for, reported so seriously of her condition that a nurse was telegraphed for.

Mrs. Hardy watched the progress of these arrangements with eyes bright with fever, and with some irrepressible excitement, of which Rowan could approximately guess the cause.

Much encumbered with her habit, when all her arrangements were made, Rowan resolved to leave Caroline in charge whilst she rode back to Lescough. Besides her own dress, many necessaries were wanted for the sick-room, and this would be the quickest and surest plan of action.

As she rode away she was conscious of a faint feeling of wonder that she had neither seen nor heard anything of Amyot during the day. She strained her eyes over the golden plain of corn waving gently in the soft breeze, towards the distant sandhills near which she guessed Amyot would be hard at work.

As she looked, she was conscious also of the moving plain of sea alongside, which was surging in somewhat tumultuous waves across the broad estuary of the river; and as she watched the strange sight—the blue waters sparkling in the sunshine, perilously near as it seemed, to the summit of the enclosing bank, separated only by that raised band of green from the golden corn some feet below—Rowan remembered the picnic they had arranged for the 3rd, and hoped that her aunt would be well enough for her to keep her engagement. Then, chiding herself for selfishness, she rode quickly home.

When she drove up again to the cottage some three hours later, with many appliances for the invalid's comfort during the night, and accompanied by her maid, the big black horse she knew so well was tied up near the cottage, and Amyot hurried out to meet her. He looked troubled and anxious, though as he greeted her, the tender love-light in his eyes almost banished the serious expression from his face.

"I am sorry to hear so serious a report from the doctor," he said presently, when together they stood for a few minutes in the pretty sitting-room. "I suggested that Mrs. Hardy should be taken to Deepfen, where she could have more comfort. But he feared the risk of moving her in her present state. Now, dearest, as soon as I reach home I shall send off old Nurse to be with you to-night, in case the nurse shouldn't arrive. Caroline is not much of a sick-nurse, I should think—her father objects to illness on principle; and if you should want anything"—he hesitated a moment, unwilling to frighten her—"put a candle in this window—I shall be at hand."

She looked at him, her sweet eyes grateful for this tenderness and care.

"How should you be at hand, Amyot?" she asked presently, softly returning his caress, and, with the intuition that love gives, divining something of his anxiety. "Are you uneasy about the tide?"

"It would not harm you, dearest," he said evasively. "You are safe here. Oh, Rowan! my sweetest, if—whatever comes, you have loved me, dearest?" he questioned eagerly.

"I do love you," she corrected gently, letting her soft arms be lifted round his neck, as he strained her close to his beating heart.

"And no one else?" he whispered.

"Never anyone else," she answered softly. "My heart is not big enough for two."

For a minute or two they stood, heart to heart, in the keen rapture of love, his lips pressed to hers in what seemed more than a lover's short farewell. Rowan was uneasily conscious of the pang of renunciation in his lingering arms, as slowly he released her. Afterwards, many times during the unrestful night, she recalled his look as he turned away, and wondered at its solemnity. She watched him mount and ride off hurriedly, and then she went up to her sick-room.

Mrs. Hardy's room was, for the size of the house, a large and airy one over the sitting-room; with a bay-window looking eastward over the fen and sea, and two smaller ones forming part of the front of the house. As the evening and night wore on, Rowan had many times cause to feel grateful for Amyot's forethought in sending Nurse. The hospital nurse did not arrive, and Rowan's maid, besides being inexperienced in sickness, was somewhat alarmed at the incoherent mutterings and delirious questionings which the sick woman uttered. Many times Rowan bent over her in vain striving to soothe and satisfy the perturbed mind. Her ministrations were received with half-suspicious distrust, and the glittering eyes followed her movements about the room, as if in doubt of her motives and knowledge. Now and then Rowan thought she must be mistaking her for someone else, so unmistakably inimical were her gestures and glances. But to Nurse she submitted quietly, thanking her gratefully as her poultices, and the ice brought from Lescough, after a time brought relief in the more acute accessions of pain.

It was a strange night. Towards morning, in the early dawn, her attention attracted by the rising gusts of wind, Rowan drew aside the curtain of the bay-window to look out. A black figure on horseback, silhouetted against the horizon just paling with the coming dawn, caught her vision. It was some distance away, but there was no mistaking the upright, soldier-like figure, slowly advancing along the dyke. Behind him faintly gleamed the sea, and Rowan noticed that the waters in the river were rushing by at a rapid rate. A wave of tenderness surged into her heart.

"He is anxious," she thought.

Presently, as he gained the nearer elevation of the bank on which the cottage stood, he saw Rowan, and raised his hat with a quick gesture of greeting. She returned it, and slowly let the curtain fall, pondered a moment undecidedly, and then running lightly down stairs, opened the front door and went out to greet him.

"I hoped you were sleeping, dearest!" he said, as he sprang from his horse on to the soft turf beside her.

"I have been. Have you been here long?" she asked. "Tell me, Amyot, are you uneasy? The water seems to be very near the edge," she said, glancing along the dyke in a fascinated way.

How sweet and fresh it was, in the cool of the dawning, with the fresh wind bringing in the clean scents from the sea! Almost irresistibly, Amyot was reminded of that other time, half a year ago, when as yet he had scarcely seen this girl whose fingers were now clasping his; when he had stood in just this same spot with the other Rowan, looking over the sea. Then, and now! What bliss the short months had brought him! He bent his ardent gaze on the loved face beside him, pale now in the grey light. And then their lips met.

"My Rowan! my sweet one!" he said softly. "Yes; I will not deceive you. I am anxious. Oh no! not for you!" as he saw her glance back at the cottage. "You are safe up here. But there is a spot in the dyke which seems to be leaking and is puzzling us. It is for my work and my reputation, and—yes, also for my harvest—that I am anxious. You see, I have so much at stake."

Something in his tone made her glance up anxiously.

"So much?" she questioned.

"You, my sweet. I could not ask you to come to a poor man's home at Deepfen. And I should be poor for a year or so if this dyke were to give now.—Why, Nurse—!" as the pleasant old face appeared at the door.

The old woman made a gesture for silence, and beckoned them in.

"Tie your horse to the rails at the back, Mr. Amyot, and come into the kitchen. I've got some hot coffee there. And then this young lady shall go to bed. Mrs. Hardy is easy now, and is sleeping quietly at last."

The cosy kitchen had its bright fire burning, and a table laid for breakfast. And presently the two lovers were enjoying some coffee and bread and butter, old Nurse waiting upon them as if they were children. After it was over, she left them for a few minutes together, before taking Rowan away to rest.

Nurse had the wisest intuitions. She saw that one needed comfort.

CHAPTER XII.

THE THIRD OF SEPTEMBER.

"And all the world was in the sea."

Two days had passed since Rowan had ridden over to Lessdyke. Mrs. Hardy was going on favourably. The temperature and the pain were both much reduced. It was conjectured—for she would give no information—that the many nights of the last wet month she had spent upon the dyke, had induced the attack of pneumonia from which she was suffering.

During these two days she had become more reconciled to Rowan's presence, although she seemed still to prefer Nurse's ministrations. Old Nurse was still at Lessdyke, but Rowan had sent her own maid away, Nurse and Caroline being as many as the house could comfortably accommodate. It was the afternoon which had been proposed for the picnic on the dyke, the fateful 3rd of September. Rowan was now standing in the window of her aunt's room, anxiously looking over the fen for Amyot. He had sent her a little twisted note during the morning to say that, although their picnic was denied them, he would still be with her about four o'clock. Rowan unwittingly held it in her hand now, as she stood by the window; and something in her attitude and the look upon her face as she read and re-read it, suddenly attracted Mrs. Hardy's attention.

The sick woman had lain all day with her pillows raised, gazing out of the window. The blinds and curtains at her request had been pulled aside, and the dark eyes, languid now and, as ever, sad-looking, had been fixed upon the wide lands apace within their range. Many times during the morning she had startled Rowan by her observations. It was almost with a belief in some uncanny power possessed by this sick, sorrow-worn woman, that Rowan had said to her uneasily at last—

"Aunt Rowan, you look as if you were expecting something. What is it?"

"I am expecting vengeance," was the quick response. "Get a Bible, Rowan; read to me about Elijah—that about the cloud no bigger than a man's hand coming up over the sea."

Rowan, in startled apprehension, turned a quick glance towards the sea, before crossing the room to do as her aunt requested. Since the preceding day the weather had changed. The sunshine had gone, and dark gloomy clouds, driven in from the sea, scudded low across the wide flats. The wind blew roughly in fitful gusts, and the waters tossed and tumbled in, in hurrying, overlapping waves, between the river's banks. Out over the sea the gloomy grey of the sky was reflected; and occasionally sharp scudding showers temporarily obscured the landscape.

Finding the Bible, Rowan had quietly read in low, even tones the story demanded by her aunt, feeling a responsive thrill of attention and expectation as she reached the end and lifted her eyes.

Then had come a diversion in the shape of a messenger from Amyot, and Rowan had been beckoned from the room by the sympathetic Caroline, to receive her lover's missive. She had stood for some time in the kitchen to hear Caroline's remarks upon the latest news from the fen, which she had gathered from Amyot's messenger. And now, in the afternoon, in the window, she was thinking it over and re-reading his note.

All the men had been ordered to leave the works at four o'clock, instead of five, that day, and to take away all their tools with them. It was reported that Mr. Hardy did not like the look of the dyke at some place not specified, but Rowan, for her comfort, gathered that it was at a part he himself had not built. The wind was very high, and the tide had run in to a great height during the night. Mr. Hardy, who had been watching, had seen the water himself within a few inches of the summit of the dyke. If it went on blowing, the water might be over, and it was long odds but the corn would all be swamped.

This was the chief part of the news, as it had filtered through Caroline, which was now filling Rowan's imagination; when her aunt, suddenly observant, startled her by a question—

"What is that, Rowan?"

"It is a note, aunt."

"Rowan drew aside the curtain to look out."—p. 573.

"From your father! I hope he won't come to-day."

"No," Rowan answered, her face flushing.

"Then who is it from?" Mrs. Hardy persisted, curiously.

"It is from Mr. Hardy," Rowan answered. "He is coming here presently."

The sick woman's eyes glanced from Rowan's restless fingers to her face, and then out across the grey landscape, now again obscured by an advancing shower, which presently pelted on the window-panes.

"Here, is he? What brings him here?"

"He is in the fen, down there. We had arranged a picnic on the dyke—to see the tide. But it rains and is cold. So he says he will come here instead."

"You will see the tide here; but you will not see him," the sick woman said quietly. Her tone, and the glitter in her eyes, had the effect of terrifying Rowan against her reason. She turned from the window trembling a little, but speaking courageously.

"Aunt Rowan, you do not know. Why do you wish harm to him? I love him. I am going to marry him. You do not wish me harm?"

Mrs. Hardy glanced curiously at her glowing face.

"You cannot marry a ruined man, Rowan. Ha, ha!" and she laughed harshly.

"I should marry him, ruined or not, Aunt Rowan," said Rowan quietly. "Why do you hate him? He is good. It was his doing that I first knew about you. He pitied you, and took your part before anyone."

"Silly girl!" was her aunt's scornful answer. "It is a pity that you ever saw him. Oh, I grant he is a man and good-looking. But you are young."

"Not so young as you, Aunt Rowan," Rowan answered, goaded into a speech she regretted the moment it was uttered.

"And do you wish to expiate your folly by a lifetime of loneliness, as I have done?" Mrs. Hardy said passionately. "I tell you, the Hardys are a doomed race."

"Hush, hush!" interrupted Nurse's voice, as she entered softly. "Miss Gayle, you will find tea ready down-stairs.—And you, madam, must be quiet."

She came forward, and bent over Mrs. Hardy, gently replacing the disarranged pillows, and soothing her excitement.

Rowan, on her way down-stairs, tired with her long morning in the sick-room, and possessed by an unacknowledged fear induced by Mrs. Hardy's words, was seized with a sudden impulse to go out of doors and meet Amyot. She turned into her room to get her hat and thick shoes, and then, after glancing into the sitting-room to make sure that he had not arrived, she opened the front door and went out.

As she fronted and struggled with the rain-laden wind, her spirits rose. She would go and meet her lover. If the elements were against him, she would not fail him. She stood on the bridge for some few minutes gazing around, and gratefully receiving the fresh gusty wind across her heated face.

What a desolate scene it was now, in the afternoon's gloom! How great a contrast to the sunny, smiling landscape through which she had ridden only two days before!

Across the flats, the only signs of life were the peewits crooning their monotonous plaint, and flying madly hither and thither as if from pursuit or fear. Whole flocks of them were coming in from the sea, as if driven before the wind. Rowan noticed also the big white-winged sea-gulls swooping up and down and screaming around her. It was a dreary scene. And the mud-coloured waters swirling tumultuously under the bridge, and mounting up its arches at each attempt to fling themselves through, added another touch to the desolate picture.

There was no sign of Amyot. But Rowan guessed that he would be watching on the dyke, and took her way thither accordingly. As she passed through the gate, some impulse—she could not tell how originated—prompted her to leave it open, to fasten it back even, against the wooden palings. On the dyke the scene was a striking one.

The water was rushing by, in breaking white-crested wavelets, sucking and lapping at the bank with a satisfied sound within a few inches of her feet. Surely the tide would rise no higher, or— She glanced downwards and around, in apprehensive pity, on the draggled grain which swayed wet and sodden-looking before the wind. She walked on, gazing ahead, striving to pierce the misty rainclouds which now and then came down almost to the ground and blotted out the landscape.

Her aunt's words kept running through her mind; and an undefined sensation of pain and anxiety and even fear took possession of both her consciousness and reason. Almost she wished she had not come, as an angrier gust made her stagger and pause, under the sense of oppression and dread that the whole scene induced. Where was Amyot? Surely it was later than he had promised. What if he were not here after all? He would surely not be so mad as to remain in danger, when he could do no good? Was there danger out there in the grey and dismal distance, whose misty depths her eyes were striving in vain to reach? She held her breath in a sudden thrill.

She glanced back. Only the distant red roof of the cottage was visible behind the masonry of the intervening bridge; the road to which, raised above the fields on either side, completely shut out the other houses of the hamlet beyond. A deep sense of loneliness fell on Rowan. Only the birds which soared and swooped and screamed in mad and agitated flights about her head, as if trying to convey some warning she could not understand, gave any indication that she was not in a desolate and lifeless waste alone.

She glanced at her watch. It was five o'clock, and Amyot had said he would be with her by four. She paused irresolute. Perhaps he had arrived, and was awaiting her.

And then, the grey masses of clouds over the sea lifted, and the wind seemed suddenly to lull, and in the unwonted hush and stillness, a wave, bigger than its fellows, curled up and up, as if striving to touch her feet, as she stood on the soft turf of the dyke. And in the lull, she heard, or thought she heard, the sound of a horse's galloping feet.

The sound made her look up eagerly, and gaze along the dyke. And her gaze was held, fascinated.

Far away, along the horizon, out at sea, it looked to Rowan, was surely the little cloud about which she had been reading in the morning—a small white cloud, looking like the crest of a wave along the dark gloom behind it. And coming towards her, thundering along the summit of the dyke, was the big horse she knew so well. But why was Amyot urging him so, she wondered, as he drew near; and her eyes as well as her ears testified to his rapid approach.

Presently he saw her, and called out some rapid order of which she could only distinguish the words, "Back—quick!" But almost before she could turn to obey, with a sudden certainty of something unwonted and terrible pressing upon her senses, he was pulling-up beside her, reining-in with difficulty his excited horse.

"Quick, Rowan—your hand, sweet!" he urged, bending low over the saddle, "your foot on mine. There," as he passed his arm round her, and hastily swung her light figure into the saddle before him. "Your arms round my neck, and cling tight, sweet, whatever happens.—Now, good horse, on, on!" he urged. What could it mean? Rowan wondered, as again the horse was urged on at full speed. And then she glanced back over Amyot's shoulder along the path which he had ridden.

What was that? Rowan thought her eyes must be deceiving her, and uttered a little cry.

The white cloud she had seen a few minutes before so far away, was advancing rapidly across the mouth of the river, breaking on either side over the banks in a wave of foam-covered water, circling hither and thither, spreading far on either side and yet appearing to gain in height as it advanced up the narrowing channel of the river. And, alas! for Amyot, over the fen the white wave was spreading, as it curled and broke along the dyke.

Then Rowan understood what had befallen. The eagle was upon them—that strange wave which she had sometimes seen in the river at Lescough. She had seen it a foot or two high—not a monster like this, with savage curled crest, "like a demon in a shroud."

Involuntarily, her arms clung tighter round Amyot's neck, as the good horse they rode gained the gate.

Ah! how Rowan blessed that impulse which had made her fasten it back!

It seemed then as if the heavens broke in rain upon them, shutting cottage and bridge and even wave from sight.

She heard Amyot say softly: "Thank God!" as turning his face for a second, he glanced back and across the bridge. "T'en—" "I dare not risk it, sweet," as he guided the horse on to the firm raised road, and they seemed to leap along. They could hear behind them the thunder of the breaking waters, the crash and clash of falling masonry as the wave reached and burst upon the bridge, and rushed headlong on its course up the river.

To Rowan's horrified eyes, the seething hissing sea seemed to be crawling round them.

"The cottage!" she whispered.

"It is higher than this—it is safe," Amyot answered.

And, as Rowan hid her face on his breast, he bent down and kissed her quivering lips.

"Sweetheart, the worst is over.—Good horse!" he went on gratefully, soothing and patting his trembling horse, "you have saved us a wetting."

As the storm-cloud passed, they could see across the water, which now in spent strength circled and curled and sobbed in shallow white swirls around them, the cottage standing, a desolate-looking landmark, above the surrounding water. They were too far off to see more than that it did stand, and that it was impossible to reach it, though, in fact, Amyot did reach it later, after Rowan had been safely housed at Lescough, and the waters had receded and settled.

The inmates of the cottage had, meanwhile, a time of terrible fear and anxiety. Nurse had been too much occupied in soothing and settling Mrs. Hardy to be aware that Rowan had left the house, and it was only a startled exclamation from that lady, whose eyes seemed to be ever searching, searching the landscape, that drew Nurse's attention to the slight figure crossing the bridge. She divined in a moment where Rowan had gone, and for what purpose, and would have thought little about her going out if it had not been for the increasing excitement of her patient.

"Send for her back—do you hear?" Mrs. Hardy entreated, sitting up and wringing her hands; and her agitation could only be appeased by Nurse retreating to send Caroline after her.

"But you need not go far," Nurse said, smiling. "Mr. Hardy will bring her back safe. But Mrs. Hardy

She could see the galloping approach of her master, a few moments—as it seemed to her—ahead of that curling death; and then the blinding storm hid what further passed. The thunder of the breaking wave, the waters rushing round the horse, told that Rowan,

"Again the horse was urged on at full speed."—p. 576.

won't be satisfied without your pretending to go—she's got some fancy into her head."

Whilst the woman began leisurely to make her preparations for following Rowan, Nurse went into the sitting-room to look after the neglected tea which had been prepared.

She was suddenly startled by an agonised scream and the sound of hurried movements in the room above; and, running up-stairs, was confounded by the sight of her patient standing at the window.

"Oh—save her! save her!" she cried in helpless terror; and Nurse, hurrying forward, was just in time to receive the swaying white figure before it fell, and to see the terrible scene taking place outside.

if not Amyot also, must have been in imminent danger; but Mrs. Hardy's condition of exhausting agitation was for a time so serious that all their efforts were directed to calm and allay her remorseful fears.

Amyot's visit—when the moon had risen sufficiently for him to brave the unknown dangers of the receding waters—was like a message from heaven to the anxious household. And he rode back to Lescough that night, to carry news of its safety to Rowan.

Together they rode over to Lessdyke some few days later, and Amyot was presently summoned to Mrs. Hardy's room.

"Don't you contradict her, Mr. Amyot, whatever she may say," recommended Nurse; "sayings do no harm—leastways, when you take no notice of them.”

Amyot entered the room softly, flashed a glance at Rowan, who stood in the window looking over the desolated fen, and then bent gently over the figure lying on the bed.

So they met for the second time, those two, with a vivid remembrance of their first meeting out in the moonlight six months before, present to the minds of both. The dark eyes of the sick woman, darker by contrast with the white brows under which they gleamed, fixed themselves in a triumphant gaze on Amyot.

“Do you remember?” she asked.

“Yes, I remember,” he answered, more willing to humour her, as his eyes took in the ravages that her illness had made in her thin passion-worn face. “You were a true prophet.”

She scrutinised his face closely.

“Ah, you bear it well!” she said at last. “And now what shall you do? It has come: ruin and desolation, and a flood! What shall you do?” she repeated.

Amyot looked down at her in wonder. The hatred and satisfied revenge in the tones were almost appalling to him.

“I cannot tell until I know exactly the damage,” he answered. “This is an unusual flood. I suppose the eagre has not been so high as this for a hundred years—but it will make no difference in my plans.”

Mrs. Hardy glanced towards Rowan, whose delicate sympathetic face was turned towards Amyot.

“And Rowan?” she almost whispered—“she is free now? You cannot expect her to share your ruin?”

“Aunt Rowan!” put in Rowan quickly, coming to Amyot’s side and laughing; “you should not hit a man when he is down. I will not have my lover—my love”—her tones lingered softly on the word—“made to perjure himself whilst he is feeling troubled. Ruin!—there is no talk of ruin!” she went on. “Only a little loss and delay, which we can put up with.”

As she spoke, she clasped her hands together over Amyot’s arm.

Mrs. Hardy looked curiously at the two as they stood side by side, in all the flush of love and youth, and for a minute she kept silence.

“Ah!” she murmured at last—“together!” Then a little pause. “And I—have been alone for forty years!”

Amyot bent down.

“But not any longer,” he said gently. “Forget those past years—we will try and atone.”

She turned her vivid eyes from his to Rowan’s.

“He is a Hardy!” she said warningly, her penetrating gaze fixed on the girl’s delicate love-lighted face—“they are a cruel race.”

And then, as if satisfied with having borne her testimony, she turned her head with a little sigh, and seemed to wish to be left alone.

The devastation along the river’s banks was great. Where the banks had been neglected they were washed away, and much land was flooded. Damage was also done in the lower part of Lescough, where, for a short time, some lives were in danger.

But the flood had an unexpected result for Amyot. The Commissioners were convinced—by the loss consequent on this damage—of much that Amyot had been trying for months to make them believe and understand. Instead of finding himself and his opinions and schemes scouted, he was suddenly raised to the position of a prophet, whose prophecy had come to pass. The dyke had indeed given way, but it was at a place built long anterior to Amyot’s time, and he himself was the only loser by the inroad of the sea on the fen.

When she was well and down-stairs, Mrs. Hardy had another visit from Amyot, Rowan sitting by to give the solace of her presence to her lover. After his first greetings, he sat down in the chair pointed out by his hostess, who he felt was scrutinising him closely, from under her heavy brows. He scrutinised too, in his turn. What a sad pathetic face it was, and what a history of sorrow and passion was hidden behind it! Amyot forgave her hatred when he remembered what she had borne. Yet the face was vivid still, in spite of the languor and weakness of illness—vivid as an extinct volcano is vivid in its tale of past fires.

“And so, do you still think you can master the world?” was Mrs. Hardy’s first question.

“I never thought so,” Amyot answered quietly.

“What is this that Rowan tells me about a village over there?” was her next query.

And Amyot told her all that he hoped to do, she studying him intently the while, with the eyes which looked as if they had indeed seen visions.

“You are ambitious and hopeful, but I don’t see that ambitions and hopes will do to live upon. Is it true that you are still expecting my niece to marry you?”

“Quite true that I am hoping it,” Amyot answered.

“On what ground? What have you to give her?” asked the persistent querist.

“Love!” answered Amyot; and his eyes sought Rowan’s, with a tender light in them that brought a mist to the dark orbs fixed on his face.

“Pooh—all men say that! and you Hardys can promise anything. Another Hardy promised me the same.”

“I am myself; I am not another Hardy,” said Amyot quickly, transferring his gaze—with pity in it now—to Mrs. Hardy’s face.

“And you seem pretty sure of yourself!” Mrs. Hardy went on satirically. “Where do you mean to live?”

“At Deepfen chiefly; but that shall be just as Rowan likes—always,” Amyot answered.

“And what about Lord Lescough and Mrs. Chester?” laughed Mrs. Hardy, who had been indiscreetly entertained by Mr. Gayle with Mrs. Chester’s letter. “I could feel almost reconciled to the marriage, when I think of Mrs. Chester’s foiled ambitions.”

And then it was that Rowan delivered a prophecy, which made her husband in after-years declare that she had borrowed her aunt’s mantle.

“Amyot will be a far bigger man than Lord

Lescough," put in Rowan, smilingly silencing her lover's answer. "Why, when our fortunes are made, and the harbour there has its fleet, and in the Fen a big town toils where now the curlews cry—is that a quotation, Amyot?—Amyot will be made a lord—a labour lord, I shouldn't wonder; and I shall be a labour lady. I think Lessdyke is a prettier name than Lescough, and so that shall be my title. Do you hear, Mr. Amyot Hardy?—or would you prefer Lessand or Lessbeach? Lord Lessand of Deepfen will do nicely, I think."

And she stopped breathless with so long a speech.

"A Gayle needs no title," Mrs. Hardy said proudly.

"No, but I shall not be a Gayle," Rowan said, a little sadly. "The Gayles of Lescough will vanish with father and you and me. But, at least, we will vanish grandly," she finished, "and our monuments shall be the stones of a new town—not the grave-stones of an old churchyard."

A pretty yacht, whose name is the Rowan, was at anchor last summer in the little harbour at Lessdyke; and a pretty Lady Lessand, surrounded by a cluster of sturdy little boys on ponies, used to ride about the flats, and make the acquaintance of all the visitors in the new bright little watering-place which has grown up along that eastern seaboard.

But before that there were days of patient waiting and trust, and some disappointed hopes, during which the man and the woman together, loving one another truly, learnt the discipline which life offers to all.

THE END.

BIBLE JEWELLERY.

Chalcedony cylinder or seal of King Darius.

are told that Abraham was very rich in cattle, in silver and in gold, even before Abimelech gave him the thousand pieces of silver when he restored Sarah to him. He weighed out four hundred shekels of silver as the purchase-money of the field with a cave in it that he bought for a burial-place for Sarah; but ornaments are not mentioned till he sent his steward to find a wife for Isaac. Then, we learn, when Eliezer and his tired camels rested by the side of the well, and Rebekah came out of the city and filled her pitcher and allowed him to drink out of it, and then filled it again for the camels, he took a golden ear-ring of half a shekel weight and two bracelets for her hands of ten shekels weight of gold and gave them to her. When stating his errand and recounting his proceedings to Laban, the steward said he put the ear-rings upon her face and the bracelets upon her hands; and when Laban consented that she should be the wife of Isaac, he brought forth more jewels of silver and jewels of gold, and raiment, and gave them to Rebekah, as well as other precious things which he gave to her mother and her brother.

When Jacob went up to Bethel, he said to his household, "Put away the strange gods that are among you, and be clean, and change your garments." Whereupon they gave him all their strange gods—small images, perhaps, like those that Rachel stole from Laban—and took out all their ear-rings from their ears. We are brought face to face with Egyptian jewellery in the days of Joseph, when Pharaoh took off his ring and put it on Joseph's hand and put a gold chain about his neck. A little later we are told of the order to the Israelitish women to borrow jewels of gold and jewels of silver from the Egyptian women; and soon after, the same order for every man to borrow jewels of gold and silver from his neighbour. Then we find minute instructions concerning goldsmith's work given to Moses. The ark was ordered to be made of shittim wood, but it was to be overlaid within and without with pure gold, and a crown of gold was to be made round about. Eight gold rings were to be made for it, one for each corner, and two for each side. The staves that were to be passed through these rings, to lift or carry the ark, were also to be overlaid with gold, as well as the mercy-seat with its cherubim at either end of it. The table for the shewbread and its rings and staves were, likewise, to be overlaid with pure gold, and have a crown of gold round about; and the dishes, spoons, covers, and bowls, were to be of pure gold. A candlestick was also ordered to be made of beaten work of pure gold, with shaft, six branches, bowls, knops, flowers, tongs and snuff-dishes. Similar minute directions are given concerning gold work and silver sockets for the tabernacle. In the description of the ephod we come to word of onyx stones, two of which were to be worn on the shoulders, and have the names of the children of Israel engraved upon them, six on each. The breast-plate was to be composed of four rows of precious stones, and on each stone was to be engraved the name of one of the children of Israel. In the first row were to be a sardius, a topaz, and a carbuncle; in the second, an emerald, a sapphire, and a diamond; in the third, a figure, an agate, and an amethyst; and in the fourth, a beryl, an onyx, and a jasper, all set in gold. The sardius was a ruby. Some authorities think the topaz was a green stone, and others that it was the colour of gold. The sapphire was esteemed second only to the diamond in lustre and value. Job said of the earth, "The stones of it are the place of sapphires;" and Ezekiel speaks of this stone with others as part of the splendour of the King of Tyrus.

At this time we again hear of ear-rings, for when Moses did not come down from the mount when expected, and the people did not know what had become of him, Aaron said to them, "Break off the golden ear-rings which are in the ears of your wives, of your sons, and of your daughters, and bring them to me," and having received them, he made them into a golden calf, which Moses, soon afterwards, burnt and ground to powder. They are mentioned again in the enumeration of wrought jewels brought to Moses and Eleazar the priest as an oblation after the destruction of the Midianites; jewels of gold, chains and bracelets, rings, ear-rings, and tablets, amounting to sixteen thousand seven hundred and fifty shekels. Gideon too, is recorded to have required at the hands of the Israelites the ear-rings they had taken from their enemies, for, we are told, they had golden ear-rings because they were Ishmaelites. And when they had spread a garment and thrown all the ear-rings down upon it, their weight amounted to a thousand and seven hundred shekels of gold; there were also collars and ornaments, and purple raiment that was on the kings of Midian, as well as the chains that were about the camels' necks. Equally interesting is the record that among the gifts brought to Job by his brothers, sisters, and acquaintances these ornaments were specially mentioned: "Every man also gave him a piece of money, and every one an ear-ring of gold." Isaiah, Ezekiel and Hosea also mention this form of jewellery. One of the proverbs of Solomon says, "As an ear-ring of gold, and an ornament of fine gold, so is a wise reproof upon an obedient ear"—meaning, probably, that receptive minds will receive judicious admonition and advice with as much appreciation as they would accept an offer of jewelled earrings, or other ornaments and advantages.

There is frequent mention of seals and signets through these early centuries of old times. Many of them appear to have been worn as rings. Various letters and decrees are recorded to have been sealed with the king's seal, as in the instance of the letters that Jezebel wrote to the elders of Israel urging them to accuse Naboth and stone him to death, which she sealed with the king's seal; and in that where Haman sealed the decree of King Ahasuerus against the Jews with that monarch's seal, for which purpose the king took his ring from his hand and gave it to Haman, which ring he subsequently took back and then gave to Mordecai, when Haman was hanged on the gallows that he had prepared for Mordecai. And when Mordecai was instructed to write to all the lieutenants and deputies, and rulers, counter-ordering the decree that Haman had sent forth, he was told to seal his writing with the king's ring, because the writing that was written in the king's name and sealed with the king's ring no man might reverse; and he accordingly did so, and sent the letters by posts on horseback and by riders on mules, camels and young dromedaries, into the various provinces, where the king's commandment was received with joy and gladness, a feast and a good day. "And Mordecai went out from the presence of the king in royal apparel of blue and white, and with a great crown of gold, and with a garment of fine linen and purple." We learn they were used to give greater security to ordinary contracts likewise, of which two deeds were drawn up, one to be kept by the person in whose interest the agreement was made, and the other to be sealed and deposited in a public office. When Jeremiah bought the field in Anathoth of his uncle's son, and had weighed out seventeen shekels of silver for it, and had signed and sealed the evidence, or deed, in the presence of witnesses, he took both the sealed writing and that which was left open, and in the presence of the witnesses that subscribed the book of the purchase, charged Baruch to put the evidences in an earthen vessel for their preservation. There is word, too, that when Daniel was cast into the lions' den a stone was brought to close up the mouth of it, which the king sealed with his own signet and with that of his lords.

The great crown of gold mentioned as worn by Mordecai when he came out from the presence of Ahasuerus, was, of course, intended as a token of the high estate to which he was promoted. The same king ordered his seven chamberlains to bring Vashti the queen, with the crown royal, to show the people and princes her beauty; and when she fell into disgrace this same crown was given to Esther. We may gather that newly married men and women wore crowns on their wedding-day. In the Song of Solomon we read: "Go forth, O ye daughters of Zion, and behold King Solomon with the crown, wherewith his mother crowned him on the day of his espousals, and in the day of the gladness of his heart." The high priest likewise wore a crown, on the front of which was engraven, "Holiness to the Lord." The kings were anointed from the beginning; but when Joash was made king, besides the anointing, a crown was placed on his head as part of the ceremony of ascending the throne. Extra precautions were taken on this occasion, the guard was armed and lined the temple, and then the young king was brought into the temple, and we are told the crown was put upon him, the testimony given to him, and they made him king, and anointed him, and they clapped their hands and said, "God save the King."

Chains were also signs of honour and estate long after the days of Joseph. At the feast Belshazzar gave to the thousand lords, when all the gold and silver vessels that his father Nebuchadnezzar had carried off from the temple at Jerusalem were brought forth, and the guests all drank out of them, and the fingers of a hand wrote upon the plaster of the wall of the palace, the king sent for astrologers and soothsayers, and promised that whosoever could read the writing, and give him an interpretation of it, should be clothed with scarlet, and have a chain of gold about his neck, and should be the third ruler in the kingdom. The queen told the king that Daniel would be able to tell him the meaning of the writing, who was thereupon sent for, and promised the scarlet robe, gold chain, and third place if he would do so; and although Daniel replied that the king should keep his gifts and give his rewards to another, on his explanation of the mysterious writing he was clothed with the promised scarlet, and the chain of gold was put about his neck, and he was made the third ruler in the kingdom. When Ezekiel, likening Jerusalem to an infant, enumerates the benefits conferred upon it, both a chain and a crown are in the list of ornaments. He said, "I decked thee also with ornaments, and I put bracelets upon thine hands, and a chain on thy neck. And I put a jewel on thy forehead, and ear-rings in thine ears, and a beautiful crown upon thine head." In the Song of Solomon we read, "Thy cheeks are comely with rows of jewels, thy neck with chains of gold." Our chief magistrates and sheriffs, we may notice, carry out the use of this decoration as a sign of office, even now.

There are various precious stones studded about in the sacred writings, besides those that were placed in the breastplate of Aaron and his successors. The Queen of Sheba, for instance, when she came to Jerusalem with her train of attendants, brought spices, very much gold, and precious stones which she gave to King Solomon. Hezekiah made himself treasures for silver and gold and precious stones, and for spices and for shields, and for all manner of pleasant jewels. The merchants of Sheba and Raamah occupied themselves in fairs with spices and all sorts of precious stones and gold. Jewels, too, are frequently mentioned in the same wholesale and uncounted manner. The Revelation of St. John the Divine is specially rich in this way. The new Jerusalem was lit with a light like a jasper stone, clear as crystal; the wall round the city was of jasper, and the city was pure gold; the foundations of the wall of the city were jasper, sapphire, chalcedony, emerald, sardonyx, sardius, chrysolite, beryl, topaz, chrysoprasus, jacinth, and amethyst. The gates were made of pearls and the streets of gold.

The sumptuousness of Oriental riches is made very apparent when we read that silver was accounted nothing in the days of Solomon, for all his drinking vessels, two hundred of his targets, and three hundred of his shields were made of gold; and that the weight of gold brought into his kingdom in a year was six hundred, three-score and six talents. "And all King Solomon's drinking vessels were of gold, and all the vessels of the house of the forests of Lebanon were of pure gold; none were of silver: it was nothing accounted of in the days of Solomon," for the king made silver to be in Jerusalem as stones, just as he made cedars to be as sycamores for abundance. There were so many precious jewels among the vanquished enemies of Jehoshaphat, that when he and his people began to collect their riches, there was more than they could carry away; "and they were three days in gathering of the spoil, it was so much."

It is interesting to look over the more miscellaneous work of the goldsmith in those past centuries and in that Eastern land, though it be with the mind's eye only. There were the five golden mice that, with other gold work, were placed in a coffer by the Philistines and sent to Beth-Shemesh with the ark as a trespass-offering; there were the two golden calves that Jeroboam made and set up for worship, one in Bethel and the other in Dan; there was the calf of Samaria; there was the image set up by Nebuchadnezzar in the plain of Dura, in the province of Babylon; and, to go further back, there was the molten calf made by Aaron, not to dwell more particularly upon the golden floors, and general overlaying with gold of the temple, including its oracle, altar, cherubim, palm trees, and other features. Then, we must not forget one portion of the great wall round Jerusalem was repaired by the goldsmiths. Various lengths were allotted to different companies to rebuild or repair, and the goldsmiths and the merchants built the portion between the going up of the corner and the sheep-gate. A certain Malchiah, the goldsmith's son, repaired another length specially recorded; and Uzziel, the son of Harhaiah of the goldsmiths, repaired another.

There is word too, much later, of a silversmith, one Demetrius, who objected to the preaching and teaching of Paul, that there was no God that was made with hands, on the score that it was disastrous to his business prospects, as he wrought and sold silver shrines for the goddess Diana. We read he called his fellow-craftsmen together and stated his views, and the whole city was filled with confusion. "Great is Diana of the Ephesians," the mob cried. For about two hours the mob kept up this cry in the great theatre in which the assembly was held, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians;" till, at last, the town-clerk appeased the people, and spoke to them and dismissed them.

As we call these things to mind, this profusion of jewellery and gold scintillating through the centuries and the distance—kings taking off their rings and giving them to those they chose to invest with authority; victors casting down their thousands of ear-rings taken from vanquished enemies; Queens Vashti and Esther, almond-eyed, full-lipped, and of infinite grace, doubtless, arrayed in sumptuous apparel and wearing royal crowns; other beautiful women with chains, bracelets and ear-rings—sometimes, perhaps, with Egyptian hieroglyphics on them, sometimes with magic gravings, such as Rebekah, Rachel, Abigail, Bathsheba, the daughters of Job, than whom no others were so fair in all the land; merchants selling precious stones in Oriental fairs; Job's friends and relatives bringing him ear-rings; the wedges and vessels, the shields and targets of gold; the golden thrones and sceptres; the glitter of rubies and other gems, not to count the jewellery borrowed of the Egyptians; apples of gold in pictures of silver, as it were:—as we call these things to mind we must feel we have seen in the sacred writings more than the splendour of the Arabian Thousand and One Nights. And as we close the sacred volume, when we have looked upon the last page with its presentment of the golden city with golden streets, jasper walls and gates of pearl, lighted as clear as crystal by the glory of God, it is as though we, too, had seen somewhat of that which St. John saw as he stood by the side of the pure river of the water of life.

A VACANT PLACE.

"It is very mournful, yet not useless, to see and know how the greatest and dearest in a short while would find his place quite filled up here, and no room for him."—CARLYLE.

I.
HERE is nothing wrong with your eyes," said Dr. Westby abruptly to the timid little woman who had just been ushered into his consulting-room. She smiled faintly, and said—

"No, sir."

"Then, my dear child——"

said the great oculist: and he stretched out his hand towards the door, at the other side of which half-a-score of anxious mortals were waiting. But this slight little creature stood her ground womanfully.

"It is about my mother that I want to speak, sir. She can't come herself; and I want to know if you would be so good as to come to her, and what it would cost?"

Dr. Westby smiled, in spite of his impatience.

"I always charge my patients exactly what I think they can afford," he said; "so that is disposed of. What is the matter with your mother?"

"Cataract."

"Write your address here, and I will come the first day I possibly can."

She wrote a few words rapidly and firmly, and went away; and the next in order entered the consulting-room.

In the course of the evening he remembered her visit, and thought of looking in the address-book. It was out of consideration that he had allowed her to write in it herself. Being a keen observer of details, he had noticed that her face and speech were superior to her clothes, and, conjecturing that also her soul might be superior to her surroundings, he had wished to spare her the pain of naming them. The sight of her handwriting made him feel glad that he had done so. The entry informed him that her name was Smith, and that she lived in the Bowery; but the writing might have been that of a refined and well-educated lady. He looked at it side by side with an invitation which he had just received from a great house in Fifth Avenue, and decided that the latter was but a characterless scrawl compared with the clear, delicate caligraphy of little Miss Smith. Then he wrote to accept the invitation, and thought no more about the matter for that time.

The first day that came to him with a spare hour in it, he kept his promise, and set forth in an unaccustomed direction. He did not drive straight to the house where Mrs. Smith and her daughter lodged, but left his carriage at some little distance, and reached the given number on foot. He did not want to set the neighbourhood staring at these poor people, as he would inevitably have done had he arrived in state.

He was directed to a third-floor room, neat and clean, furnished with two small beds, disguised during the daytime as lounges; a chest of drawers near a curtained corner, which might be supposed to contain toilet appliances; a large table, two upright chairs, and one arm-chair, in which sat Mrs. Smith, nursing a cat—the only amusement left to her in her state of darkness. There was a number of shelves and pegs on the walls, the former containing large mysterious cardboard boxes, the latter supporting gowns in various stages of development. The table was littered with material in process of cutting-out, and the girl who had invaded his consulting-room was working at a sewing-machine.

It seemed to him that she looked quite different here, divested of her ill-fitting jacket and dowdy hat. He had seen before that she was very young, but he could see now also that she was pretty. That soft wavy hair about her forehead made all the difference in the world; and she had no "bang," which he observed as a distinct sign of superior character. Her simply-made dark gown fitted a neat little figure closely and well, and her linen collar was as perfect in its way as his own.

She rose to greet him with a beaming face. Here, in her own home, such as it was, she was less shy, more confident, but still diffident and deferential to a degree quite unusual among girls of her class. Dr. Westby, however, had no time to waste in the contemplation of trifles, and he gave his attention immediately to Mrs. Smith's eyes.

"You have called me in just at the right moment," he said, turning back to her daughter. "The cataract is exactly ripe for operation."

"Then no time has been wasted?" said the girl eagerly. "I am so glad!"

"What do you mean?" he asked. "Had you heard of me only last week?"

"Oh no," she said. "I have known about you for ever so long, but I—I was not able to go for you sooner."

"Why not?"

"I'll tell you, sir," put in the blind mother; "Emmie won't tell you herself. She's a good daughter, she is, and her days should be long in the land if she gets her dues. 'We won't run any risks, mother,' said she. 'If you have an operation, it must be done by the very best eye-doctor in New York, and for that we must have money.' And for six months she slaved nearly double hours at her dress-making, until she had fifty dollars saved and put by; and then she went to fetch you, brave an' independent. That's what Emmie did."

Only the day before, Dr. Westby had received five hundred dollars for just such an operation; but not the faintest trace of amusement was visible in the grave lines about his mouth—indeed, he felt none. His knowledge of the poor had hitherto come entirely from hospital experiences. He knew nothing of them in their own homes, so that the present interview was a revelation to him; and this supreme trust in the efficacy of fifty dollars seemed to him something like a touch of tragedy. He had as little wish to take the girl's savings as to snatch a crust from her plate, but he felt that to speak just then of this place plaguing my Emmie. There's a dozen of 'em in love with her—you need not try to shut me up, Emmie: it's a fact. And it's easier for her to keep them at the other side of the door while she has her old mother here to do dragon, if she can do nothing else."

"She rose to greet him with a beaming face."—p. 584.

refusing a fee would be in every way an offence against good taste.

"You did not think of going into hospital?" he asked the old woman gently.

"No, sir, I didn't; nor I won't," she said, with sudden patches of faint colour showing in her faded cheeks, and her voice trembling a little. "I ain't going to leave Emmie."

"No, of course not," said Emmie soothingly. "Mother never likes to have anyone around doing things for her but me."

"It isn't only that," said Mrs. Smith, "and she knows it. I don't want any of the louts that live in

"Oh, mother! the doctor doesn't want to know about these things; and there is no one in love with me, indeed," murmured Emmie, in great distress.

"That's the first lie I ever heard you tell," said her mother; "and I hope it will be the last.—I don't want to trouble you, sir, about our affairs, but I thought right to give you a good reason for not taking your advice."

"Oh, I wasn't advising, I assure you," said Dr. Westby quietly. "I merely asked. I shall be very glad to attend you here in your own home, if you prefer it; but as I expect the operation to be a grand success, you must run no risk of disappointment, and therefore you must allow me to arrange everything as I think best."

"I'm willing. I'm not an obstreperous one," said Mrs. Smith; and Emmie, who had a clearer idea of the doctor's meaning, uttered a few deprecating words, and blushed rosily; but he was not to be put off.

He saw the lodging-house woman, and engaged a second room on the same floor; a trained nurse arrived next day, and later on a supply of wine, game, and fruit, sufficient to provision a garrison. In this way he arranged things as he thought best, and entirely to his own satisfaction.

II.

"Ah, Dr. Westby at last! I was afraid you meant to disappoint me, after all; and you must know you are the lion of the evening. I have a host of learned men here on purpose to meet you. There are three poets eager to claim you as a brother on the score of 'Wandering Minstrelsy'; quite a dozen novelists ready to tar your eyes out with jealousy of 'A Simple Maid's' success; and a select coterie of scientific men, who ask only to see the author of 'Modern Optics,' and die. You are a deservedly fortunate man!"

"You flatter me," said Dr. Westby, meeting the gushing welcome of his hostess with his habitual grave smile, but feeling by no means so indifferent to the flattery as he looked.

There was really nothing of the charlatan about him, but it would be unreasonable to suppose that he did not act with the idea of increasing his fame and popularity in giving to the world simultaneously three such entirely different works as this complacent lady mentioned. His novel had been written some time ago, and his poems were the accumulated thoughts of years, but he had kept both back until the completion of his great scientific work, in order that all should appear together, and place him at once on a pinnacle beyond the reach of those less fortunate beings who could only do one thing at a time—or, at the most, two. Having made his arrangements to this effect with absolute deliberation, he now, in the depths of his own heart, called the proceeding a tricky advertisement, and felt profoundly disgusted with the bad taste of it.

Fortunately, however, no one else seemed to view the matter in this light. Compliments were showered on him. Literary men, to whom he had long looked up as his superiors in art, treated him frankly as an honoured equal; professional men, of wider experience and deeper learning than his own, received his scientific opinions with respect; mothers with marriageable daughters paid court to him, and the daughters themselves smiled kindly. He was famous.

He had not a great deal more vanity than the generality of mankind, but he had quite as much; and, in spite of his misgivings, his grand triumph was very pleasant to him. Only one thing was wanted to crown it, and that one he had some idea of securing on the spot.

Cicely Mellicott was standing only a few yards off, surrounded by admirers innumerable, but keeping persistently close to the side of her chaperon, waiting, as he hoped, for him. She was not only one of the most beautiful girls in the city, but one of the richest too; and she was also clever and well bred—altogether exactly the kind of wife that Dr. Westby wanted, and perhaps modestly felt that he deserved.

He thought—no doubt with some justice—that he was choosing a good moment to approach her. If the world was not at his feet, at least that little corner of it in which his interests and hers were bound up had assumed a very respectful attitude towards him; and he knew that Cicely was not without the last infirmity of noble minds.

Perhaps if he had loved her more passionately he would have preferred to stand before her without the aid of those very accessories which smoothed his way; he might even have been guilty of the extreme folly of wishing himself obscure and unknown, so that he might be quite sure she loved him for himself alone; but he stood proudly superior to such foolishness and sentimentality, and questioned very little as to the share which the opinions of others might have in winning her for him.

Yet it was a marriage of affection as well as of convenience that he was planning; and it was with a pang of disappointment and chagrin that he saw his chosen fair move away with one of her attendant swains just as he approached the party.

He turned to her aunt, Mrs. Greenwood, and cut short a profusion of congratulatory speeches, asking in a low voice—

"Why does Miss Mellicott avoid me?"

Mrs. Greenwood took his arm unasked, and led him away, ostensibly to get her an ice.

"My dear Dr. Westby," she whispered significantly, "you may be a wonderfully clever man, but you don't understand women."

"So far am I from being wonderfully clever that I must ask you to explain yourself," he said, in not the friendliest of tones.

She gave an uncomfortable laugh, and began to fidget and fiddle with her great black fan.

"You have evidently never made the discovery that it is not in woman's nature to march straight to the point, as you do."

"I am discovering it now," he said, "and also the truth of the saying that 'Example is better than precept.'"

She glanced sharply at him, and he added suavely—
"After what you have just said, you can hardly blame me for falling in with your ideas."

"Possibly not," said she; "but if you want your question answered you had better treat my grey hairs with respect."

"I shall certainly do so, Mrs. Greenwood—when I see them. But you will not, surely, require me to wait until then for an answer?"

She laughed good-humouredly, and began to look more confident.

"I know you are dying to say that my dearest foe could not accuse me of inconsistency with my theory; only you are afraid to be too impertinent, even though lions are privileged in that respect. However, my remark was made more with regard to Cicely than myself: and, if you were not the densest of lions, would require no explanation."

"I fear that bad eminence is mine. Pray go on—if, indeed, you have begun."

"They are the best friends who chaff each other, are they not? But now I am going to talk seriously, and you must not take that as a sign of enmity. Do you know Cicely so little that you expect her to rush at you, and load you with compliments, like the rest of the people? You have not overwhelmed us with attention lately—oh yes, I know you are a busy man, but still— Then to-night you arrive late, when some of the guests are already leaving, and yet you feel injured because the child shows a proper spirit, and keeps you at a distance. Well, there is no other man whom I would treat so frankly, but I know you care for her, and I do not mind telling you for your comfort that I am quite sure she would have greeted you like the rest if she had no other feeling for you than one of indifference."

"You are very kind," he said coldly; "but I do not think such speculations are fair to Miss Mellicott. I merely thought that you might be able to point out to me some definite offence of which I had unconsciously been guilty."

Mrs. Greenwood was prevented from having the last word by their hostess, who came to carry off her lion to fresh fields and pastures new. She could not afford to give Mrs. Greenwood a monopoly of him.

"Who is that youth talking to Miss Mellicott?" he asked, as they moved away together.

"Oh, don't you know?" she said. "That is a person of some consequence among our beauties: a young English viscount. Between ourselves, I think he looks rather silly, don't you?"

"Well, rather. But then, so many of us look to be even greater fools than we are. Is this gentleman a favourite with Mrs. Greenwood and her niece?"

"All society knows there is a still greater favourite," she answered, with a meaning glance; "but for holding in reserve, a lordling is not to be despised."

"Oh, the divine charity of women!" murmured Dr. Westby. But the bitter little remark chimed in only too exactly with his own opinion of Cicely's aunt.

III.

A FEW weeks after that, it happened that Dr. Westby paid a visit to the Smiths a little later in the day than usual, and he found the mother and daughter sitting at their small tea-table in all the comfort of simplicity. He was very tired, their tea was excellent, and he sat down and joined them, to their infinite delight.

He knew that he was pleasing them, but not how much. His natural modesty, although it did not cause him to disclaim the homage of his social equals, was still sufficiently great to blind him to the fact that these two poor women regarded him with a most extravagant measure of hero-worship. He would have laughed incredulously had anyone told him that the chair he sat on and the cup he drank from would henceforth be held as sacred objects, and that all future tea-drinkings at the Smiths' would be as mystic rites performed in his honour rather than necessary meals taken for their own sustenance; yet such statements would not have been very far from the truth. Mrs. Smith's cure was now complete, and her gratitude was boundless; and as for Emmie, if this great man had saved her own life as well as her mother's sight, her feelings of devotion could not have been more intense.

"This is my last professional visit," he said, as he rose to go away; "but if you will let me come to see you sometimes as a friend, I shall be very glad."

"Oh, you will come again?" asked Emmie, with a little gasp. "Perhaps you would even come in some other evening, and have tea with us?"

"Most gladly, indeed. One does not get such tea as this every day."

Mrs. Smith instantly favoured him with some precepts of her grandmother's on the subject of tea-making, which, she said, entirely accounted for her own proficiency in the art. When she had quite finished, Emmie put in a little word:—"Every evening a place shall be set for you. We shall always be ready; always expecting you." And her eyes shone strangely as he took her hand, and promised that he would come.

Dr. Westby had not proposed to Cicely Mellicott, after all. Not that he had given up all intention of making her his wife; but he was a prudent man, and Mrs. Greenwood's remarks had disturbed him. That astute lady had been just a little too managing, and she had shown her cards too plainly. Her game was clearly exposed to Dr. Westby, and he was not a man to allow himself to be played for with impunity.

Mrs. Greenwood wished him to marry her niece, but she was anxious that he should declare his intentions at once, because it was just possible that he might not be serious, and in that case no time was to be lost about securing the delectable young Englishman. Naturally, Mrs. Greenwood's scheming was nothing in the world to him, but the chance that Cicely might lend herself to such a game was much. Perhaps, again, if he had loved her very passionately his prudence would have been less; but as it was, he felt no inclination to run the risk of taking to himself a wife who might in time develop into a likeness of her aunt. Going home that evening, he tried to fix his mind on Cicely's charms; but always there came between him and his chosen bride a vision of the little dressmaker's sweet face, and her shining eyes drew him on insensibly to a comparison of social humbug, as represented by Mrs. Greenwood, with retired simplicity, illustrated by the Smiths. He was a long way off from having his mind made up.

There were letters waiting for perusal when he reached home, and among them one that was to decide the question for Cicely and him.

It was a sad letter.

"Years ago," said the writer, "when I saved your life, I said you should repay me by coping to me if ever my sight were in danger. Little as I then expected it, that time has come. I can hardly see the words before me on this sheet of paper, and I doubt if you will be able to decipher them. But, dear old fellow, don't for a moment suppose that I mean to hold you to your promise. It would not be very civil—possibly not true—to say that where others have failed you would not be likely to succeed; but here, in New Zealand, I am beyond your reach; and to leave a flourishing practice in New York for an infinitesimal chance of mending me, would be a degree of Quixotism of which, I am sure, your own good sense will at once show you the absurdity. It is just because the thing is so completely out of the question that I am talking unreservedly to you about it. I wish I were like you, without wife or child depending on me; the coming helplessness would not then be so hard to bear."

This pitiful story came from his oldest friend, a professional brother, who had once in their student days nursed him through a dangerous fever, when his life had been despaired of by all his other attendants. Dr. Westby did not hesitate for a moment. He sent in hot haste for the young practitioner who had been in the habit of taking charge of his patients during a few occasional short absences.

"Your chance has come, Robertson," he said, smiling pleasantly. "I am going away for at least a year; perhaps longer. You have nothing to do but to step into my shoes. I suppose it will depend on yourself whether you have to step out of them again or to keep them on for good."

The younger man flushed with pleasure. This was just such a chance as he had been longing for. He felt very happy, and even grateful—temporarily.

"You will have to explain matters for me," Dr. Westby went on; "for I find I must start in twelve hours if I would catch the next Australasian mail from Frisco. Come into the surgery, and help me to leave the books as straight as I can for you in the time."

When Dr. Robertson had gone, he sat down to write a note of farewell to Cicely. There was very little in it but a short explanation of his sudden disappearance, and the question, "Might he hope to be remembered?" He made no effort to bind her to him even then.

"If she loves me," he thought, "she will wait for me. If she does not, we are both saved much future unhappiness."

Then he lay down to snatch an hour's sleep before it should be time to start; but in all the hurry of preparation he never gave a thought to little Emmie.

IV.

NEARLY two years passed before Dr. Westby saw New York again. He arrived unexpectedly, and felt a little hurt that Robertson should appear rather more surprised than glad to see him.

"I have cured my patient in New Zealand," he said; "and as to the future—events must decide it for me. Can you dine with me this evening, Robertson? I have a great many questions to ask you."

Robertson could not. He was bound to honour with his presence a large and fashionable assembly, and could only suggest that Dr. Westby should accompany him. Westby agreed, feeling not a little amused at the idea of going among his own old set, under Robertson's wing, to a house to which, two years ago, Robertson would have had about as much chance of an invitation as the cabman who drove them.

"I suppose," he said, "it is going to be a big crush affair, so I shall not be observed in the crowd; and I want you, like a good fellow, not to mention my name too distinctly. I have a fancy to try how many of my old friends will recognise me without assistance, in spite of my beard."

"All right," said Robertson. "Your beard has certainly altered you immensely, and I daresay you will be able to act the prince in disguise entirely to your satisfaction."

It happened that one of the first persons with whom Dr. Westby had an opportunity of conversing at the reception was the lady at whose house he had met Mrs. Greenwood and her niece on a memorable evening in the past. He addressed her as an old acquaintance, but although her courtesy did not allow her to make a deliberate betrayal of her ignorance, it was soon plain to him that she had not the least idea of his identity.

Dr. Robertson was mentioned, and he asked her tentatively if that young man was considered to be as good an oculist as his predecessor.

"I know that he is very much the fashion," she answered; "but I am really not quite clear as to who his predecessor was."

"Dr. Westby?" he answered, feeling very like a sneak and a spy as he pronounced his own name.

"Oh yes, of course! He died, or something, didn't he? But was there anything particularly remarkable about him? I don't exactly remember."

"He had a good name in his profession, and some little reputation as a writer, I believe," he answered, recollecting, as clearly as though they had been spoken an hour before, the words of flattery and adulation with which she had received him at that other assembly only two years ago.

"Really? What are his books? I forget completely."

Dr. Westby told her the names of his own books, and felt thankful that his newly acquired whiskers helped to hide his blushes.

"Dear me!" she said thoughtfully; "I am so glad I asked you; because, do you know, I actually had got into my head an idea that it was Dr. Robertson who wrote 'Modern Optics'? And I might have made a stupid display of my ignorance to some professional swell. As for the novel and the poems, one cannot reasonably be expected to remember anything about light literature that came into being such a long time ago."

"I suppose not," said Dr. Westby. "Is not that Mrs. Greenwood over there? Is her niece here this evening?"

"Which niece?"

"Miss Cicely Mellicott."

"Oh, you mean Lady Montrevor. I had almost forgotten that Mrs. Greenwood was related to her. The Montrevors were here for a short time about six months ago, but they have lived for the most part in England since their marriage."

"And when did that take place?"

"Nearly two years ago—perhaps not quite so long since. But, dear me! this is like talking to Rip Van Winkle. You must have been a long time away from New York!"

"Yes," he said; "I have been in New Zealand for two years; and I find a good many changes—small and unimportant, no doubt, but still changes, and not altogether easy to be realised."

He thought he would go away without waiting for Robertson. As he made his way towards the door, a few former acquaintances addressed him, and at first he felt glad to think he was not quite forgotten; but the comfort was short-lived. One man said—

"How do, Westby? Been away for a month or so, ruralising, haven't you? How on earth did you manage to grow such a respectable beard in the time?"

And this was the only one who, having by chance a keen eye for faces, recognised him through his hirsute disguise. Another mistook him for a celebrated African explorer, and began to make depreciatory remarks about Mr. Stanley; and another mystified him completely by allusions to some pending law case of which he had never heard before.

All the next day he shut himself up, and thought things over; and when evening came he had almost made up his mind to go back to his friend in New Zealand, and stay there.

But another experiment remained to be made. He went out in the gathering twilight, and took the old familiar turnings in the direction of the Bowery. He wondered if the Smiths had left their old lodging. He wondered if Emmie had taken on the hue of her surroundings as she grew older, and if she had married one of the numerous lovers of whom Mrs. Smith had spoken so contemptuously. He tried to persuade himself that was what must inevitably have happened; and the more he argued against himself, resisting the persuasion, the more he felt inclined to laugh cynically at his own interest in the question.

Well, he was at their door, and he would soon know all about it.

Yes, they were still living there ; and he went up to the old room, and tapped at the door.

Emmie's clear voice answered, "Come in" ; and as he entered, he heard a quivering sotto voce remark from her mother to the effect that some folks didn't know when to stay at home.

The light was too dim for them to see more than that their visitor was a tall man ; but he spoke, and then no light was needed to tell them who he was. Mrs. Smith clasped both his hands, wept over them, dried her tears, and assured him with the utmost cheerfulness that she had firmly believed him to be dead. But he understood it all, and the old woman's welcome came to him like waters in the desert.

Emmie had not moved. She was leaning against her mother's chair, white and trembling, and feeling thankful for the darkness.

After all, perhaps it was only the mother who cared. Emmie had no welcome for him ; and it was with a sigh of disappointment that he turned to her.

"Light the lamp, Emmie," said Mrs. Smith. "The doctor will take tea with us once again."

And when the lamp was placed on the table, which was already laid, Westby noticed that a third place was set, and wondered if it was for one of the lovers, countenanced at last by Mrs. Smith.

"I shall be in the way," he said. "You are expecting someone."

Emmie's glance followed his to that third place at the table.

"Yes," she said ; "we have been expecting you for two years, and we have been always ready."

Then he looked into her bright honest eyes, that shone just as he had seen them shine before—and he understood.

An hour later he said "Good-bye !" to Mrs. Smith, and Emmie came, as she had done once or twice long ago, to open the front door for him, and say a last word. A Bowery doorstep is not a romantic spot, but the moonlight flooded it impartially, and showed clearly to each other the faces of the two who stood there.

"If you had met me in the street, Emmie, would you have known me, notwithstanding my beard ?" he asked.

"Oh yes ! I should have known you anywhere."

"After all," said he, "it is not so very long since I went away ; and yet I was quite forgotten—not missed, nor wanted by anyone—except by you."

"Oh, always by—us," she said, and looked up at him in the clear, pale light.

He held out his hand—not exactly as he had ever held it out to her before ; and she laid hers in it with a prayer in her heart.

THE SIN OF LISTLESSNESS.

BY THE VEN. ARCHDEACON G. R. WYNNE, D.D., CANON OF ST. PATRICK'S, DUBLIN.

"The years when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them."—ECCLES. xii. 1.

THE Book of Ecclesiastes is a perplexing one. So long ago as the time of the forming of the Jewish Talmud we find disputes among the rabbis whether the book should be received as part of Holy Scripture. The Jewish Church decided that it was so, but that it was better that the young should not read it. Did they fear that the young would get too sad and morbid a view of life from its gloomy pages ? There is no fear for the young from that source. They will not be made sad by a book, unless it be the passing sadness when a hero of fiction dies. These tears are soon dried. It is not from reading, but from living, that the young by degrees find their sky becoming overcast. Long may it be bright for them ! Long may health and happiness be theirs, all made the brighter by the blessing of God ! Guard the young, you who have the care of them, from sadness as long as you can. Show that your faith makes you happy. Do not make your moan before them. Do not say things to damp their ardour or to cloud their skies. Give them time to be happy ; leave it to the years to introduce them to sorrow.

In the Book of Ecclesiastes the saddest phrase, perhaps, is that which tells of years "when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them." The writer was primarily alluding to old age ; but middle life and even earlier years may, in many cases, be so described. Perhaps some of us have days when we say, "I have no pleasure in them." They may be only occasional days—days when the east wind blows, or when we happen to be lonely, or when our nerves are unstrung, or when we have had bad news or disappointments, or when we see quarrels going on which we cannot reconcile.

But it is likely this writer was referring to a more permanent state than this. There are not a few now, and perhaps there have always been some, who have lost too soon all zest in life, and who find the power of enjoyment rapidly declining. Let me suppose that they are persons to whom the truths of religion are of great importance, who have long trusted in the Lord, and tried to live prayerful and useful lives : for I do not speak of persons whose lives have been utterly careless or given up to self-indulgence. By some strange combination of circumstances, inward and outward, they seem to grow weary and dissatisfied. They read their Bible with reluctance; they pray without fervour, or desire, or faith. They never are lifted up by genuinely thankful thoughts. They feel a growing indifference to the progress of the Gospel and to religious effort. And at the same time their own spiritual state becomes clouded. Doubts visit them more frequently; they may even take little healthy pleasure in friendships, and become indifferent to society. They think, What a weariness is this daily round of eating, sleeping, working, visiting, resting! To summon up their energies for earnest effort and to throw their hearts into it seems impossible. And this is not a question exclusively of age. You will see men and women of eighty full of vigour, interest, and power of work. You will see others of thirty or forty complaining already that pleasure is gone out of life, that "the grasshopper is a burden," and that all they care for is a sunny day, a quiet corner, and an interesting magazine. And still they scorn themselves for having fallen back on merely physical comforts for any pleasure they have.

This unwholesome state generally has lying at the root of it bodily weakness. The effort should be made, under good advice, to brace up the nervous system, and live a strictly healthy and temperate life, and get change of scene, if possible. But it is a mistake to suppose that bodily causes are always at the root of this apathetic and heartless state. You will find men and women whose health is good suffering from it at times, and no change of scene does them good. "I have no pleasure," they say, "in living: no strong feeling about anything." There are many who owe this state of apathy to too much brooding on painful social questions, too much reading of unbelieving literature, too much pondering in secret over the insoluble questions of our human life.

Listlessness is often the offspring of uncertainty about faith or about duty. "What is the good of effort, when I do not know for certain whether the cause for which I work is really true? I observe endless efforts made to win the world for Christ, and they seem to be made in vain. I find the Church hopelessly split up into factions. I observe sin wielding much more power than holiness, drink a stronger lever to move men than the Bible; and the characters of professing Christians I find full of self-seeking and littleness."

I shall not spend more time in describing the state of pleasureless indifference or morbid sadness which is a real fact in these days, though it is often hidden by a forced smile and hollow levity of talk.

But I am sure it is the duty of preachers and writers to recognise that this tone of mingled pessimism and apathy is not an uncommon one, and to suggest some ways by which it may, as a spiritual disease, be healed. Can you not imagine how our Lord Christ would have met such a person, and said, with that brave and earnest voice of His, "I charge thee, thou gloomy and morbid spirit, come out of the man!"

Now, what should be done if any person prematurely comes to say, "The days have arrived when I say, I have no pleasure in them"?

First of all, let it be well noted that to indulge and permit willingly this habit of mind to become fixed is unquestionably to commit sin. One of the so-called seven deadly sins noted in the Middle Ages was of this kind. They called it sloth, but it was the sloth of spirit, springing from such causes as unbelief, prayerlessness, or discontent with one's lot, and leading to inactive sadness, apathy, and unhelpful indifference.

And now for some remedies. It is well for any tempted to this state to begin the day with a mental tonic like this:—

"Awake, my soul, and with the sun
Thy daily stage of duty run;
Shake off dull sloth, and early rise
To pay thy morning sacrifice."

These wholesome words of Bishop Ken's may well meet us every morning, and help to give a tone to the day.

The will must not consent to be apathetic. It is a sin to yield to apathy. Can we conceive Jesus Christ without feeling pleasure in good and pain in evil? It is impossible. Then, having made up your mind not to give way willingly to this sin, brace yourself by such bodily acts as shall give tone to the system, to the skin, nerves, and brain. Avoid all forms of luxurious ease and dependence on stimulants and narcotics. Then, with an effort to lift up the heart in prayer, set yourself to see the bright side of things. Instead of wearily thinking of the Church's failings, fix your mind on its successes. How steady a growth of energy is being shown in all directions! No form of misery is known which some kind hand is not stretched out to relieve. Think of the growth of the missionary spirit in the nineteenth century, of the vast increase of the numbers of Christian workers. Choose your reading on a plan. Read the lives of men of energy, who have risen from little to great: who, though few or feeble, have brought about great reforms. Read of heroes in English history—heroes of discovery, heroes of philanthropy, heroes of the faith. Throw aside sentimental and sensational books and morbid poetry. Read science, read history; above everything, read the Bible, and obey it.

Bear in mind that there must always, from the nature of things, be a number of questions about religious truth and God's ways in Providence which anyone can ask, and no one can answer. But remember that none of these overthrow the proofs or evidences that Christ's religion is a fact, a truth. For example, if you cannot understand why God should not at once answer your prayer to restore a sick child, say, "I must submit; I am not competent to judge His wise and secret ways." These difficulties do not overthrow the historical evidence that Christ rose from the dead, and that many witnesses laid down their lives for their testimony to His miracles, death, and resurrection.

And there are further wholesome counsels. Think of others. It may make you sad to see others suffer in a far more real way than you do, but that keen sadness is itself a better thing than your apathy. And if this sadness drives you to work for others, it has done you good. If you hear of children neglected or ill-treated, say, "Here is a call for me to do something for some neglected child." If you hear of back streets and filthy garrets where life is in danger from foul air and want of sanitary arrangements, rise up and do something, at least for one person. You may begin on a small scale; but do not despise the small effort. You will do good to someone else, and certainly you will do good to yourself. Instead of saying, "Another dreary afternoon!" and sitting at your window with your chin in your hand, watching the dull twilight die away, go out, taking a gift with you, and visit someone who is equally sad, and with much better cause than you, and cheer him up a little.

There are many other things which help to chase away this irreligious spirit of listlessness. Let me mention but two. Seek the company of children. "Trailing clouds of glory do they come from God, who is their home." The freshness of their spirits is infectious. Their eager engrossment in their actual surroundings, however trifling, is wholesome. If they enjoy the present moment, and take no thought for the morrow, are they not nearer to Christ than you? Anyhow, their healthy spirit often acts like a charm on the morbid. And if you go a step further, and actively minister to the happiness of children at your own fireside and elsewhere, you will be both doing and receiving good. Instead of sitting in your arm-chair, looking into the fire and brooding over your want of pleasure, give them pleasure by reading stories to them or making things for them. Give up your time and strength to them now and then. You don't know how much good it will do to devote an hour each evening to children.

And again, make friends with Nature. Possibly the warm sunshine on a sheltered bank may be the one thing you do still truly enjoy. Sunshine is dear to everyone, even to the apathetic. But consider what sunshine is doing for the world. Study the habits of plants, which owe their existence to God's sunshine as His instrument. Cultivate the closest friendship you can with birds and flowers, with rocks and sand, with sea and clouds. Continually observe Nature, and associate Nature with its Maker, your Saviour, your Master, your God.

And lastly, look up and look forward. "Passing away" is written on every earthly thing. But these are passing that those things which are eternal may remain. The scaffolding is being taken down, but the temple will stand. The generations which have gone by have left each one its mark. Men have lived and loved, struggled, hoped, and trusted, and laid down their lives. You now take your part in the long procession, but it is not an aimless procession, leading to nowhere. It is making its way towards "the one sublime event to which the whole creation moves." Christ is gathering out of this strange perplexing world a great family to set forth His eternal praise, to enjoy with a keenness beyond conception Himself, His Father, His Kingdom, and His works. And you should say, "Shall I cut myself off from that bright hope, by miserably yielding to temptation to caring for nothing earthly or heavenly? Shall I not rouse myself and resolve to be brave and strong and useful now? and then at last, for the merits of the Redeemer, who with such intensity loved and lived for me, He may grant me to take some lowly place near His feet in that wondrous City of God?"

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

JUNE 17TH. THE WOES OF THE DRUNKARD.

ver. 31.

INTRODUCTION. Lessons for last half-year have shown the spread of sin. Disobedience to God in Paradise punished by expulsion; widespread forsaking God followed by the flood; later on Pharaoh's defying God caused plagues of Egypt and the king's destruction in Red Sea. One sin very common in all lands at all times is the sin of drunkenness. It also must be punished. This the lesson to-day.

I. EXCESS OF WINE. (29—31.) Notice:

Who are the persons here condemned?

Those who go on drinking wine too long.

Those who mix it with myrrh and spices, to make it stronger, instead of with water to weaken it.

Such strong wine is not even to be looked at.

Nor must it be poured out freely like water.

For wine was intended by God as a blessing.

Was used as a drink from the earliest times. (Gen. ix. 21.)

Was drunk at feasts. (Isaiah v. 12; St. John ii. 3.)

Was used as a drink-offering in worship of God.
(Ex. xxix. 40.)

With corn denoted temporal blessing. (Ps. iv. 7.)

Given in plenty to the Jews when obedient.
(Zech. ix. 17.)

Taken away as a punishment. (Is. xxiv. 7.)

Said to cheer God and man. (Judges ix. 13.)

Used to illustrate Gospel blessings. (Is. xxv. 6.)

Made by Christ at marriage-feast. (St. John ii. 11.)

Why then denunciation of it in this passage?

Because of its use in excess—its awful abuse.

Its excess condemned all through the Bible.

See effects in ver. 29. Leads to woe and sorrow.

Causes quarrels, fights, wounds, and disorders.

Infuriates the temper (xx. 1); impairs health
(Hos. iv. 11.)

Inflames the passions; leads away from God.
(Is. v. 12.)

Therefore drunkenness condemned as terrible sin.

No drunkards enter God's Kingdom. (Gal. v. 21.)

II. PAINFUL RESULTS. (32—35.) Too much drink brings disaster both to body and soul.

Body feels as if bitten by a deadly serpent.

The man is inclined to other sins of the flesh.

He rolls about unsteadily, like those at sea.

He talks foolishly and wickedly when tipsy.

Yet when awake he seeks drink again.

LESSONS. 1. God's gifts abused lead to sin.

2. Refrain thy feet from every such evil way.

3. Cultivate the opposite virtues of temperance, sobriety, and chastity.

4. Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.

JUNE 24TH. REVIEW OF QUARTER'S LESSONS.

Golden Text—Deut. xxxii. 2.

INTRODUCTION. Have had three lives this quarter—viz., Jacob, Joseph, and Moses. What have they taught us about God and ourselves?
Golden text says that God's doctrine (or teaching)
"shall drop as the rain." St. Peter tells us that "all Scripture is profitable for instruction in righteousness."
The eleven lessons have been about Jacob's prayer before meeting Esau; Joseph hated and sold by his brethren, his forgiving them when ruler of Egypt; Moses' childhood and his deliverance of Israelites after the first Passover.

I. TRUTHS ABOUT GOD. 1. His sovereignty.

In bringing about Joseph's exaltation (xli. 40).

In making Israel enlarge under affliction (i. 12).

In destroying the Egyptians in the sea.

2. His faithfulness. In fulfilling Joseph's dreams.

In delivering Israelites from bondage.

3. His justice. In the punishment of Joseph's brethren for their cruelty to him.

In the plagues of Egypt—because in almost all the objects of idolatry were used for punishment.

In the overthrow of Pharaoh in the Red Sea.

4. His mercy. In hearing Jacob's prayer for help.

In subduing Esau's anger towards Jacob and turning his heart towards him.

In sending seven years of plenty before famine.

In permitting Jacob to see Joseph again.

In providing for Jacob's family in Goshen.

In inclining heart of Princess to rescue Moses.

In looking on the affliction of the Israelites.

In sending Moses to them as a deliverer.

5. His condescension. In wrestling with Jacob under the form of an angel. (Gen. xxxii. 30, &c.)

In speaking to Moses at the burning bush.

II. TRUTHS ABOUT MAN. From Jacob.

Earnest prayer will receive an answer.

The blessing of reconciliation and brotherly love.
(Ps. cxxxiii. 1.)

From Joseph's brothers. No sin can be hidden.

God will punish all sin sooner or later.

Conscience makes cowards of us all.

Evil is often overruled for good.

From Joseph. Let brotherly love continue.

I will not fear what man can do unto me.

In all thy ways acknowledge God, and He shall direct thy paths.

From Moses. Even a child is known by his doings.

Blessed is the man that feareth the Lord.

Before honour is humility.

From the Israelites. Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth.

Man's extremity is God's opportunity.

From the Passover. The duty of household religion.

Children are to be instructed in God's ways.

God's mercies are to be had in remembrance.

LESSON. Whatsoever things were written afore-time were written for our learning.

THIRD QUARTER, 1894. LESSONS FROM THE GOSPELS.

JULY 1. THE BIRTH OF JESUS.

To read—St. Luke ii. 1—16. Golden Text—ver. 11.

INTRODUCTION. Have had six months' lessons from Old Testament; now turn to the New. Has been well said that the "New Testament lies hid in the Old, and the Old is made clear by the New."
Remind how coming of Christ was foretold in the Old Testament lessons. In Paradise God told of the "Seed of the woman" who should "bruise the serpent's head." To Abraham He gave the promise that in his seed "all nations should be blessed."
Isaac—offered up—foretold in figure a suffering Saviour. Moses delivered Israel from their enemies, and now the time was come for the birth of the world's Saviour from sin and death.

I. JESUS BORN. (1—7.) The time.

Herod the Great—now old—King of Judaea.

Roman emperor had ordered universal census.

Each family to be registered in its own original city.

The place. Bethlehem, as prophesied by Micah.
(Micah v. 2.)

A little village ten miles from Jerusalem.

Therefore Joseph moved there from Nazareth.

The circumstances. Joseph and Mary arrive at the wayside inn.

Crowded with people—no room for these poor and humble travellers.

They lodge in the stable, with cattle around.

Christ is born there at night and laid in a manger.

All is comfortless, mean, poor, and bare.

What a contrast to birth of an earthly prince !

No outward joy, ringing of bells, festivities.

But this Prince was to bring joy to whole world.

LESSONS. 1. Christ poor—poverty no disgrace.

2. Christ lowly—therefore can sympathise with such.

3. Christ endured suffering—learn contentment.

II. VISIT OF THE SHEPHERDS. (8—16.) Notice :

The time. Midnight. Shepherds watching sheep.

Same fields in which David kept his flocks.

Wild beasts to be feared as when he killed lion.

(1 Sam. xvii. 34.)

The vision. Suddenly a bright light appears.

Shepherds crouch together in great fear.

Angel in bright array comes near and speaks.

The message. Good news ; no need for fear.

God sends to them and all a message of peace.

God's Son is born—a Saviour, King, Deliverer.

He will be found in the manger-cave of the inn.

The song. The air suddenly all full of sound.

An angel chorus bursts out into praise.

Glory to God in the Highest for His love.

Peace and good-will on earth to His people.

The journey. Shepherds hasten to see the sight.

They find all true. They break out into praise.

LESSONS. Christ's coming affects us all.

1. He is Saviour—came to seek and save the lost.

Therefore lay burden of sin before Him for pardon.

2. He brings peace. Therefore live in love.

Love, joy, peace are marks of His disciples.

(Gal. v. 24.)

JULY 8TH. PRESENTATION IN THE TEMPLE.

To read—St. Luke ii. 25—38. Golden Text—ver. 32.

INTRODUCTION. Jesus was born of a Jewish mother, and must therefore undergo all ceremonies ordered by the Jewish law. When eight days old was circumcised in the Temple, and the name Jesus was given Him as revealed by God to Joseph. (St.

Matt. i. 21.) When forty days old He was brought to the Temple, according to Jewish custom, to be presented to the Lord as holy, being Mary's first-born son. This is the scene of to-day's lesson.

I. THE AGED SIMEON. (25—35.) Who was he ?

A devout man of God, living at Jerusalem.

Daily praying and watching for Christ to come.

Had received a special revelation from God.

His life should be spared till he saw Christ.

Led by the Spirit, he came to the Temple this day.

He sees the Holy Family : Joseph, Mary and the Babe.

He takes Christ in his arms and blesses God aloud.

He praises that he has seen the Saviour Christ.

He asks that he may now depart in peace.

He tells how Christ is for all people everywhere.

A light to bring the Gentiles out of darkness of ignorance and sin.

A glory to Israel in fulfilling the promises made to their fathers.

No wonder that Joseph and Mary were amazed.

They hardly realised yet the greatness of Jesus.

Then Simeon prophesied again to them.

Christ would bring many sons of Israel to glory.

But Mary must suffer in seeing Him suffer.

For He would be despised and rejected of men.

LESSONS. 1. Early dedication to God's service.

None too young to be blessed by Him.

2. All are called by Christ to His service.

Gentiles, Jews, and all are to come to Him to be saved.

II. THE AGED ANNA. Notice :

She was a prophetess—learned in God's Law.

Probably accustomed to teach it to others.

Now in old age could do no active work.

Could only pray and watch and worship in Temple.

Was present as usual this day in God's House.

Saw what was going on—heard Simeon's words.

Realised that this Babe was Christ—object of her hope.

At once goes and tells the glad news to all friends.

The Saviour has come—to set His people free.

LESSONS. Try and copy Anna in—

1. Love for God's House.

2. Faith in God's Word.

3. Zeal for the good of others.

MRS. LEONARDS NURSES.

"WHO is that?"
 "A friend."
 "What friend? Your voice ain't like any o' my friends."

"But I am a friend; I am come to nurse you a bit."

"Oh, a nurse! That's why you wear those queer clothes."

"Not very queer, are they? Just a plain, useful uniform of black and white. And now, how are you to-day?"

"Very bad."

"Why, what is the matter? Tell me all about it! But first let me see what your temperature is."

"Eh! That ain't no good."

And the patient looks askance at the little clinical thermometer.

"Oh, yes; it is a great deal of good. Because if the heat of your body is higher than it ought to be, we can tell better how to act. Come, now, just let me put this under your tongue—it won't hurt you in the least."

So, with a little coaxing, the patient submits to have the bulb of the thermometer placed under her tongue.

"Is it—is it much wrong?" she asks, when presently it is removed and the nurse reads off the number of degrees.

"Well, not so good as it might be," says the nurse; "but you will soon get better. I shall bring you some nice nourishing things, and help to take care of you every day."

"Every day?" says the patient in surprise.

"Oh, yes; every day. I have to go round and see another patient in another court close by, so——"

"What yer doin' now?" interrupts the patient, as she sees the nurse writing something on a paper she has taken from her bag.

"I am writing down your temperature," replies nurse. "This paper we call a chart, and I shall put the temperature down every day, and other things too—such as what medicine and food you have; and the doctor——"

"Yes; the perrish doctor—he comes sometimes."

"Well, the doctor, he can write down his instructions and pass his remarks on the paper; so if I can't be here to see him, he can tell me about your case, you know, and can see what I have done."

"Oh, yes," says the patient feebly; "but the medicine don't seem to do no good."

"It will soon," says the nurse encouragingly. "Now let me see if I can wash you a little—you will feel so much better—and then we will have something nice to eat."

"I don't want to be washed," complains the patient.

"Yes—yes, just a little; I shan't upset you. Now, have you got a bowl or basin?" and the nurse pauses and looks around.

"Oh, how you do worry!" means the patient. "No, I don't think we 'ave a basin."

"Anything that will hold water?" perseveres the nurse.

"I think there's an old cracked pie-dish somewhere."

"Well, that will do," says the nurse gaily. "Where I have just come from, I washed the baby in the half of an old butter-tub, and it did famously."

"Yus, the pore has to put up with a lot o' odd things," whines the patient.

A remark as to the comparative merits of crockery-ware and gin trembled on the nurse's lips, but she forbore. Just then her mission was to soothe and comfort; so she found the pie-dish, warmed some water over a neighbour's fire, and commenced to gently sponge and wash her patient.

The skilful ways of the nurse, acquired by thorough hospital training, caused the operation to be less irksome to the sufferer than she had feared, though it did not quite conquer her lurking aversion to soap and water all at once.

Much more appreciated was a warm little meal of beef-tea and bread which followed, and then, much

Talks of going to work again refreshed, the patient wanted to know who the nurse was, whence she came, and who had sent her.

In a few words we may put the answer. She is one of the nurses of the London Bible and Domestic Mission, founded some years ago by the late Mrs.

THE LATE MRS. RANYARD.

(From a Photograph by W. and A. H. Fry, Brighton.)

Ranyard. At first the Mission only employed Bible-women, but in the course of their visits they found so many sadly sick persons with no one to attend to them, or with ignorant attendants only, that Mrs. Ranyard determined to introduce nursing among the operations of her mission. This branch of the work has now increased so much under the direction of Mrs. Leonard, Mrs. Ranyard's niece, that there are about ninety-three nurses constantly at work, while their numbers gradually increase every year.

They overflow into the country, too—that is, into here and there a town or village in the counties near London—for there are close cottages, and poor, sickly persons, in picturesque Surrey hamlets, as in London slums. But London—large, densely crowded London—is the nurses' proper sphere; and into many a lowly place their skilful ministrations come like a burst of bright sunshine, cheering and reviving in its wholesome influence.

How ignorant the poor are! Yes; and so, no doubt, are some of the rich; but they have the money to provide nurses and attendants and medical advice for themselves, while the others have not; and a terrible price in pain and misery is sometimes paid because of ignorance.

There is a woman who dwelt with her husband in one of the tenements in a block of model buildings. She was standing near the fireplace one day, when, turning suddenly, her dress caught the projecting handle of a saucepan, and over dashed its scalding contents on the good woman's foot.

It was terribly scalded, and a huge blister arose as if in protest of such unnatural treatment. Now comes in the ignorance. The woman's husband—whom the report describes, from the height of superior knowledge, as well-meaning but ignorant—pricked the blister with a needle. That rough-and-ready surgical instrument was apparently dirty, or the blood of the patient was not in a healthy condition; but apparently blood-poisoning supervened, and the poor woman had a dreadful time.

The nurse of the Mission found out the sufferer, and poulticed the foot with linseed-meal and oil. The patient refused to enter the hospital because she would have to leave her infant, and she had lost a child previously when she had been obliged to leave home; so she kept to her room.

"And I don't know what I should have done without nurse," she exclaims. "At night time! I used to think I should go mad with the weight of the clothes on my foot."

The nurse, however, had been quite equal to this emergency. Seizing the little basket-work chair of the child, she turned it triumphantly over the suffering foot, and there it was carefully protected. One shudders at the torture the poor creature must have suffered for want of that simple remedy. The scalding was bad enough, but the puncture with the dirty needle, and the absence of the simple "cradle"—as doctors and nurses call protectors for injured limbs—made the original hurt ten thousand times worse.

Glance we now into another room which gives us another glimpse of London's lowly life. Here is a boy-and-girl couple; you would never guess his business in life. At first your judgment might be hard, for it is broad daylight and he is sound asleep.

"Drunk last night," you will say.

Nay, nay; not so fast. He was out all last night, truly, but not drunk.

"After no good, I'll be bound."

On the contrary, he was engaged in a useful and lawful occupation. Have you ever thought, my dear sir or madam, how it is that often London streets present such a neat and tidy appearance in the morning?

I daresay you have not; but it is true, nevertheless, and it is due to the bands of night scavengers who are employed for the purpose. And this boy lying there fast asleep in broad daylight is a night scavenger; that is his work—a humble, but, under the circumstances, a useful occupation.

"He is just a child," says the elderly nurse; "and when he was ill last winter I used to kiss him like one of my own boys."

"You need to be very friendly to get on," says the nurse; and no doubt she is right, for genial sympathy is a key which will usually unlock every human heart.

Apparently she has that key, if one may judge from the manner in which the children crowd about her when she takes her walks abroad in her district.

Their greeting in words is queer; it generally consists of one word only—

"Hullo!"

But the manner in which it is uttered, the bright looks and friendly faces, and the actions of the young assembly generally, speak more eloquently—as actions proverbially do—than mere words.

"I should like to be a nurse," exclaims some young woman. "How could I be one?"

We may imagine she is asking one of the staff. She has seen how much good these nurses are able to accomplish, and how much liked they often are, and she feels she would like to be one of them.

"Well," replies the nurse, "you must apply at the office—2, Adelphi Terrace—and you will receive a paper of questions, which you must answer."

"What kind of questions?"

"As to your age and occupation; if you are married or single; your reasons for applying for employment; your experience of Christian life and work; if you are strong and able to stand all weathers, walk well, and climb stairs; also if you are sound in the chest with three of the nurses—a week with each; and each nurse has to answer a number of questions about you as to whether you have tact in dealing with others, whether you are sympathetic and kind, whether you mind dirty work, and whether you are neat and tidy.

"Then, if you show yourself willing to learn, and the answers are satisfactory, and you are definitely accepted for work, you are sent for a year to one of the general hospitals in London, then to a maternity hospital, and finally you are sent for some weeks with one of the nurses to learn district nursing.

"This last is very important, because in a hospital you have every convenience, but in a poor district you have to use makeshifts for all sorts of things."

"But you carry some things about with you?"

"Oh yes. Every nurse has to take a bag furnished by the Mission, and containing certain necessities; but we often have to manufacture things, so we must learn to be handy."

"I say! What a lot there is to learn!"

"Takes you about a year or fifteen months. Mrs. Selfe Leonard is determined to have really capable and efficient women."

"Hullo!"

and heart and back; if your eyesight and hearing are good; if you are a total abstainer—"

"Oh! what a lot of questions!"

"Yes, are there not? But not more than are necessary, I think. And, of course, you will have to say if you have had hospital training and other experience of sickness or nursing."

"Oh dear! it seems very difficult to be a nurse."

"Not so very difficult, if you really give your mind to it. Then you will probably have to see Mrs. Selfe Leonard, or the Hon. Miss Kinnaird, and if they accept you so far, you will have to go out for a week

"Of course, that is quite right. Then how do you manage about your districts?"

"We each live in our district, in our own apartments, easy of access to the parish doctor; and we are always supposed to be there unless we have permission to be away. A nurse costs, with her salary, uniform, and medical stores, more than a pound a week, and this sum is often partly or wholly guaranteed by a church—of whatever denomination—with which we may work. Sometimes an independent person gives part of the salary—for, as you can see for yourself, to pay nearly a hundred nurses a pound a week soon runs into money."

"Yes, I should think so."

"We are not allowed to receive any gratuity or payment from a patient, nor to take any refreshment in a patient's house; but we may carry nourishment to our patients; and, of course, we must have some stores, and these come from the store-room at Adelphi Terrace, and are paid for by the Mission. So you see it must be an expensive business."

"And how long are you supposed to be at work?"

"About seven hours a day, to be divided either between morning and afternoon, or morning and evening. But Mrs. Leonard does not like us to take much night-work."

"She is the head, I suppose?"

"Oh yes; and we are called familiarly Mrs. Leonard's Nurses. One of our staff met a medical student at a case in South London, and he asked her who she was, and where she came from. She said she was one of Mrs. Leonard's Nurses, and his face brightened up at once, and he answered, 'Oh! we have two of Mrs. Leonard's Nurses working with us' (mentioning the hospital), 'and I should have sent one on here, only they are at a bad case.'

"Oh yes; Mrs. Leonard is our superintendent. Our reports go to her; and our lady visitors or local superintendents, they report to her at the headquarters also."

"You see various kinds of life among the poor, nurse?"

"Oh dear, yes. And not all are dull and depressing. There is one little family—they live in model dwellings—where the husband makes picture-frames, and overmantels, and imitation stained-glass blinds for the rooms, and has actually put on the electric light to the bed-room!

"He, it is easy to see, is a handy man and clever mechanic. Then, not far off, is another comfortable couple in a clean and neat dwelling. They are teetotalers, and, says the report, 'in consequence, have all they want.' But some of the rooms are dirty and disagreeable enough: and the drink and dirt appear to be in many cases most depressing."

"You meet with gratitude sometimes?" asks our would-be nurse again.

"Oh yes. There was a poor woman very ill with dropsy in one of our districts. Her name was given to our nurse by the curate of the church one Sunday after service. And so our nurse went.

"She found a fair-sized, neat room, where everything spoke of tolerable comfort, except the condition of the poor patient. She, poor thing, was enormously swollen with the dropsy, but her face looked thin and flushed and anxious. The people in the house had been afraid to touch her, and she had been neglected until the curate found her out and sent the nurse.

"'I did pray for you last night, nurse,' she said. 'I have seen you pass the window. Thank God for sending people like you to help the poor. I do feel so comfortable now. I am so grateful.'"

"Yes, and there was a very touching case I had," chimed in another nurse who had now joined the two, for they were approaching Parker Street, where a meeting of the nurses is held periodically. "A poor man in my district was ill for a long time with a dreadful, dreadful leg. And he and his wife did not like to send for me, because they were better-class people, but very poor. But at last the curate found them out, and told me of them, and I went and I had a sad time with them. He was so ill. His devoted wife thought he was going to die, and we all did, and his wife arranged every detail of his funeral, and then—what do you think? She took the influenza and died herself quite suddenly! Now the poor old man is getting on quite nicely, and talks of going to work again. But I don't think he ever can do that, and I do not know what will become of him!"

Yet another case, which will further indicate the varied character of the nurses' work.

In a large room, on the top storey of a house in a respectable street, lies a tall woman on one side of a double bed, quite unable to stir. She is suffering from inflammation of the joints, and every jar and movement causes pain.

She is an intelligent woman, and, judging from her conversation, must have had a fairly good education. A niece lives with her, as also does her husband, and a little nephew whom they have adopted. For two years and three months has she been ill, and for weeks she has not been off the bed. Imagine the long, lonely, weary hours, she passes lying there!

The nurse comes in at times to attend to her back and limbs. Remembering that every movement causes pain, the nurse can only accomplish this treatment by very gently passing her hand beneath the patient and refreshing her body with a piece of lint soaked in carbolised oil.

"No one could be more gentle than nurse," says the patient, but there is still a deal of pain.

The doctor—who has a dispensary not very far distant, and often attends poor persons gratuitously—has placed the patient on a diet of fish, fruit, and nuts and forbidden all starchy foods. This diet cured a similar case, and he hopes it may at least reduce this patient's pain, a result which we trust has ere now been accomplished.

Sometimes the nurses perform other services for their poor clients than those strictly belonging to their vocation. One morning a nurse, visiting a patient she expected to find convalescent, discovered her sitting spiritless and dull, and coughing, by the bedside.

"Why, what is the matter?"

"Oh! I've 'ad such a hupset."

"Why, what is the trouble?"

"Well, you know I take in manglin'; and when I was ill, o' course, I couldn't do it; so I had to send out a basket, and what do you think? That wretched man as I got to carry it, he pawned the lot for sixteen shillin'!"

"Shocking!"

"We've traced the clothes; but we can't get 'em out o' pawn cos we ain't got the tickets. The owners 'ave mostly been very kind and 'ave told me not to worry, and one man has achally sent me three shillin' for the bundle he ain't 'ad back. But one cross-grained woman is worritin' for the price of her garments, and puttin' a high cost on 'em—much more than the things is really worth. We got summonses out agin the man, but nothin' can't be done just yet."

The nurse duly sympathised, and put the woman back to bed again, for her coughing betrayed an attack of the "bronkiters;" and then she promised to endeavour to conciliate the angry and cross-grained creditor. But she did more: she went to the office of the Mission at Adelphi Terrace and procured a few shillings wherewith to tide the distressed family over that terrible week.

So from day to day these trained nurses pursue their useful calling. How many weary rooms have been brightened by their presence, and how many sufferers relieved by their skilful touch! A medical man, speaking of his experiences among the sick-stricken poor of London, particularly mentioned the long, lonely hours they wearily spend when all their friends and relatives have gone to work; and it is to these, among others, that Mrs. Leonard's nurses come. Quietly and unostentatiously they pursue their way, with no sensational sound of trumpet or of drum; but their work is none the less efficient and reliable, and, indeed, it appears to have become quite a feature in certain parts of the huge Metropolis.

A GOOD-FOR-NOTHING COUSIN.

BY MARGARET S. FAILL.

CHAPTER V.

DEPARTURE.

IT was early in the evening, and Ruth and her cousin were strolling slowly down the glen in the twilight. They had both been rather silent, apparently absorbed in their own thoughts; when all at once Archie seemed to wake into sudden life.

"I tell you what, Ruth," he cried briskly: "you don't reach those trees till ten seconds after me."

This assumption of superior fleetness was too much for Ruth. The trees were only at the other end of a field, and lay, moreover, on her side of the road; so, without a moment's hesitation, she darted through the open gate, and was speeding over the stubbly ground, bent on proving to Archie the rashness of his boast. She reached the goal, breathlessly, almost simultaneously with her cousin, who, however, did not appear at all blown.

"Well done! I'm fairly beaten," said the latter; but his tone did not sound crestfallen.

Ruth had thrown herself down on a tree-stump, too much out of breath to speak or to notice the condition of her companion at first.

"There, you see, you shouldn't boast!" she ejaculated triumphantly, when she had recovered sufficiently. "You can't run quite so well as you thought."

"No." Archie assented meekly; but something in his tone made Ruth glance quickly at him. He was vainly trying to suppress a smile, but the laughter dancing in his eyes betrayed him.

"And so he was gone!"—p. 601.

"I don't believe you tried to win!" Ruth exclaimed, with a mortified conviction that she had triumphed foolishly. "What made you suggest a race at all?" and then, as his guilty look suddenly enlightened her, and made her divine the truth, she demanded: "Did you see somebody coming you wished to avoid?"

Archie's would-be gravity relaxed into a hearty laugh as her accusing eye met his.

"You're far too clever, Ruth," he declared. "What made you guess?"

But she ignored this, as too obvious to need any reply.

"Who was it?" she demanded, although she already knew.

"That fellow Gordon, of course," returned Archie, somewhat nettled at her tone.

"Did he see us?"

"Yes; I suppose he did."

"Then I think you were exceedingly rude—and for the second time to-day—to Mr. Gordon," said Ruth, with asperity.

"Rude!" cried Archie indignantly. "Rude to that solemn prig of a fellow! Hang it! I couldn't stand any more of him to-day. I've had more than enough."

"But you might have left me the option of being decently civil," Ruth pointed out, with dignity.

"Oh, if I had known you wished for his society," Archie hastily interposed, with angry emphasis, "I should certainly not have interfered."

"I decidedly did not wish to look ridiculous;" and Ruth sat erect, averting her head in a displeased manner.

They both looked flushed and angry: Ruth partly with annoyance at having appeared to be flying from Gordon, and partly with exasperation at herself for having been so credulously "done" in the matter of the race; and Archie because Ruth resented his treatment of the other man.

"I should like to know," he burst out, after a few minutes' pause, "why you accuse me of being rude this afternoon? I suppose he was perfectly polite?"

"I didn't say so," Ruth said calmly; "only you began."

"Well, I like that! Didn't he seize the seat next you, and then give out his orders that we were to sit down—and, I suppose, look at him?"

"Oh, if you take offence at imaginary things——" And Ruth almost smiled at Archie's way of putting it; but she suppressed the inclination, and merely shrugged her shoulders expressively. He looked at her, expecting her to proceed; but as she did not, they both remained silent again.

It had become perceptibly darker now, which Ruth noticed, during the pause. Her brief anger had already evaporated. She felt she had been rather cross, and was revolving in her mind some suitable neutral remark to make, when Archie's voice broke the silence. Apparently his anger had been even shorter-lived—had, indeed, been only a flash—and not a trace of resentment lingered in his tones. On the contrary, his voice sounded quite penitent.

"Ruth," he said, taking a step nearer to her, "I'm awfully sorry that I vexed you, and behaved so badly.

Please forgive me, and let us be friends again; for I must go away to-morrow."

"To-morrow?" she echoed, in consternation.

"Yes, I'm afraid so," he said regretfully; "so we won't quarrel on my last evening. We are friends, are we not?" and he held out his hand.

"Yes, indeed, I hope so," and Ruth put hers into the offered palm. "I am sorry we quarrelled; but why must you go so soon, Archie?"

"I have already stayed much longer than I intended," he replied. "My leave is up in a week, and they expect me at home. My mother would be dreadfully disappointed if I didn't turn up. You've no idea how fond she is of such a worthless fellow as myself; so it would be too bad if I didn't make some return."

"Well, Archie, I mustn't say anything, after that," said Ruth, rising. "You know how very, very sorry we shall all be to lose you; but I couldn't ask you to disappoint your mother."

"No; I'm afraid I do it often enough as it is," he said, with a half-sigh.

Ruth looked at him as he stood in the dusk, with a graver expression than usual on his face, and she wondered if he were thinking of some particular cause for disappointment which he had given his mother. Perhaps his thoughts had wandered off to the letter he had read with so much interest—the love-letter Mr. Matthew had called it; and Archie had not contradicted him. Whatever it was that occupied his mind apparently was of a serious nature, for he leant against a tree, plunged in a reverie, his brows slightly knitted together, and his eyes on the ground, silent and preoccupied for a longer time than Ruth had ever known him to remain before. At last, becoming aware of her fixed look, he raised his eyes and met hers.

"Have I been in a brown study, Ruth?" he asked, his face relaxing into its more familiar expression. "I was thinking over a letter I got this afternoon, and which reminded me of something that I had almost forgotten. But I mustn't waste my last evening;" and he gave a little impatient movement, as if to throw off the troublesome thoughts. "Ruth," he went on, as they began to recross the field, "it will be so long before I can see you again, I think I must send you my photograph, in case you quite forget me."

"As if I should do that!" Ruth said. "I haven't so many cousins—indeed, you are the only relation beyond our own household that I know."

"Ah, it's well to be remembered for something," said the young man, in a dissatisfied tone; "but one of these days you'll know the others; so, if that is my only distinction——"

But Ruth interrupted him with a smile.

"You know very well," she said, "that I didn't mean that. We shall miss you dreadfully! What can I say more?"

"Then, if I take a run up at Christmas," he asked, "should you be glad to see me again?"

"Very glad," she assured him; and evidently the tone was convincing enough, for his face brightened up.

If he had been in any doubt about his popularity, the outcry with which the news of his departure was greeted would completely have reassured Archie when they reached the house. Everyone expressed the greatest regret, and besought him to stay a little longer. They could not make enough of him, this last night. He himself seemed hardly in his usual spirits. He was much more thoughtful and quiet, and was, as Katie afterwards complained, "no fun at all." The evening wore away only too quickly, and the morning also. It seemed as if Archie had only just arrived; and now they were standing on the pier again to see him depart. It was only Ruth and Katie this time, and they stood, somewhat dejectedly, under dripping umbrellas as the steamer approached. It was a dismal day, cold and wet, with the mist shrouding the mountains, and everything looking its worst.

"See, the very skies are weeping at your departure," said Ruth, with a faint attempt at a smile.

"But you are not," said Archie, looking reproachfully at her through the rain. "You are laughing."

"Indeed, I never felt less inclined," Ruth declared, with perfect truth. "I feel as melancholy as the day."

"So do I;" and Archie pulled up the collar of his ulster with a shiver. "I'm awfully sorry to go, Ruth, and you've been so good to me, and given me such a jolly time——" But the steamer was already, and Archie was the only passenger going on board, so there could be no elaborate leave-takings. Katie, who was at the frank age of ten, began to cry, and threw herself, in an abandon of grief, into the arms of the young man, kissing him heartily, and utterly oblivious of the interested looks of the few passengers who stood on deck. Archie returned the little girl's embrace, patting her affectionately on the back, and saying, "There, there, don't cry, Katie dear;" but this took up time, and he had only a hurried moment to bestow upon Ruth.

"Good-bye, Ruth," he said, retaining her hand as long as possible; but if the spectators expected another embrace, they were disappointed. "Good-bye—until Christmas," and with one more squeeze of the hand, he was gone.

He jumped on board quickly, and then for a few moments they saw his tall figure and smiling face, as he stood on deck, waving his cap, while the rain beat down on his fair hair, when the steamer took a bend round the island, and was lost to view. And so he was gone—fairly gone! Ruth only began to realise it when the boat vanished out of sight. What was the use of standing looking at the track of the steamer?—which was all the trace that was left. How dull and melancholy everything appeared!

This last week had been the pleasantest in the whole summer; but now it was over, and there was nothing but the dreary autumn days to look forward to. Ruth and her little sister walked slowly up the village street, feeling that it was blank and empty without Archie, with their feelings pretty legibly written on their countenances, when they encountered the artist and Gordon. These two gentlemen looked much as usual, with quite every-day expressions of cheerfulness, in spite of the depressing state of the weather.

"Why, what's the matter?" Mr. Matthew asked briskly, when they had shaken hands, looking from the weebegone face of Katie to that of her elder sister, which was not a great deal brighter.

Before Ruth could reply "Nothing," or put it down to the penetrating chill of the rain, Katie was explaining the cause of their melancholy with great truthfulness, and in a tone of the most profound sorrow.

"Oh! don't you know?" she said, almost tearfully again. "Cousin Archie has gone away, and we're so sorry!"

But this tragic announcement, far from producing the effect she anticipated, only caused an involuntary smile to appear on Gordon's; face and even Mr. Matthew, vainly trying to look the sympathy that was clearly expected from him, barely succeeded in keeping his gravity.

"That is very sad indeed," he managed to say, with commendable seriousness; but it was too much for Ruth to have the two men standing laughing at them like this.

"Oh, don't mind laughing, Mr. Matthew," she said, while a smile crossed her own face. "It is really too much to expect that you should cry, although Katie seems to think it is a universal calamity."

"Well," said the artist, taking advantage of the permission, and allowing the muscles of his lips to relax, "it might have been worse; but I don't wonder you miss your cousin: he is a fine fellow."

To-day Gordon did not offer to join them, as he had generally done during the past week; and to-day he would have been much more welcome than on the previous occasions. Ruth remembered the episode of the evening before, and thought that perhaps he resented her seeming rudeness: but she was not aware that Miss Lewis had invited him to tea, and that the two men were on their way there at this moment. It was too wet to stand long in the rain, so with a few more remarks they separated, the girls making their way up the glen, with ever-increasing dampness of skirts. This did not tend to raise their spirits, and by the time they reached the school-house, where Lance did his lessons with the village schoolmaster, they both looked and felt rather blue. Mr. Wilson, the young schoolmaster, who came to the door to ask them to come in and wait, and who felt the most profound and respectful admiration for Miss Douglas, wondered why that young lady seemed so distant and so different from her usually pleasant self. How could he know—poor young man!—that the mind of Miss Douglas was taken up with the vision of a tall, graceful figure, with perfectly-fitting clothes, elegantly-shaped hands and feet, and the easiest manner in the world, and that all other men appeared coarse and common in comparison. Besides all this, Ruth was tired and wet, and impatient at being longer delayed. She refused to go in: but when she read the disappointment in the young man's face which her curt refusal gave, she repented of her abruptness, and said pleasantly—

"You see, Mr. Wilson, we are dreadfully wet already, so I think we had better hurry home now, Lance can run after us."

Why should she be so unreasonable as to be cross with other people, she asked herself, because Archie had gone? She was ashamed of allowing herself to be so depressed, and resolutely shook off the feeling. No doubt the young man would very soon forget about his short stay in the Highlands and the relations he had found there. He had made himself very charming while he was among them; but Ruth had an impression that they might very quickly fade out of his mind.

However, he remembered sufficiently to keep one part of his promise. In a day or two his photograph arrived, enclosed in a letter. Ruth tore off the envelope and studied the familiar face for several minutes before she read the letter. How handsome Archie looked, dressed in his uniform, and holding his head erect in the manner she knew so well, with a frank, half-smiling expression about his eyes and lips! Ruth studied each finely shaped feature, the straight nose and firm chin, all of which, with the curly hair and fair moustache, she knew so well by heart already. Then she turned to her letter, which was very brief.

"MY DEAR RUTH" (it ran)—"Enclosed is a copy of my unworthy self, which I present to you, hoping for an occasional notice. In a few days I get into harness, when I shall often think of the jolly time I had in Scotland—thanks to you. I wish I could run up again to-morrow; but 'duty before pleasure' must unfortunately be my motto.

"Maud and the boys are all at home at present, and they all think your courage in braving the storm and rescuing your humble servant was a deed worthy of reward. My kindest regards to Mrs. Lennox and the youngsters. Adieu till Christmas, my dear Ruth, and believe me, always your affectionate cousin,

"ARCHIE DOUGLAS."

CHAPTER VI.

IN TOWN.

EARLY in November Ruth went to town to spend a week with Jack, and do the winter shopping for the family. The crowded streets and gay windows proved irresistibly attractive to Ruth's country eyes; and she found quite sufficient excitement and occupation during the day in making her purchases and visiting her friends. In the evenings Gordon was a pretty constant visitor at their lodgings, and Ruth was surprised to find how greatly he seemed to have improved. Here, on his own ground, so to speak, he appeared more alert, and less solemn and immovable than formerly. Indeed, it would have been most ungrateful for Ruth if she had not appreciated him, as it was mainly owing to his exertions that she spent such a pleasant time. Jack was guiltless of unsettling his sister's mind by plunging her into a whirl of gaiety; his idea being to sit in the house with her or to go out by himself, according as the fancy took him. He had no idea of making a stranger of his sister, and, to be sure, she would be most comfortable seated by the fire, with a book. Thus, poor Ruth might have fared rather badly had it not been for the constant suggestions and arrangements of her brother's friend.

The principal event of the week was an "At Home," given by an art club, to which Gordon had procured them invitations. Jack protested that it was a bore to get into evening dress, to stand in a crush, and attempt to look at pictures or listen to music. Ruth, however, did not find it a bore. On the contrary, she felt a pleasurable excitement as she found herself ascending the broad flight of red-carpeted stairs in the art galleries, amidst a stream of gaily attired people. When they reached the landing, and were passing into the first room, her attention was attracted towards a gentleman who stood by the entrance, intently regarding her. Ruth was not at all vain, and it did not occur to her to consider the stare one of admiration. Her first thought was that there must be something amiss with her appearance; but a hasty glance round assured her that she was attired much like other people. She would have given something for a friendly mirror; but there was no such thing, and she turned with some idea of appealing to Jack. However, she thought better of it, and refrained, prudently reflecting that if there were anything much wrong her brother would quickly notice it; otherwise, it would be a pity to suggest the idea to him. Certainly, her gown of pale primrose could in no way be considered remarkable. In her heart she had privately thought it rather becoming to her dark hair and eyes; but now she felt slightly uneasy about its effect, after the disturbing scrutiny by the stranger at the door.

But as the crowd swept her along into the largest room, those girlish apprehensions quickly vanished from her mind. At one end of the long room, on a raised platform, a band was stationed, giving forth the strains of some Hungarian rhapsody. Ruth would have liked to go forward to hear the music more distinctly; but Gordon drew her attention to the pictures on the walls.

"We must go through them systematically," he said, in a tone of decision. "It will be your only opportunity of studying them."

Ruth would willingly have foregone the opportunity, as she would infinitely have preferred to study the people; but she felt powerless to resist the tone of authority; and, besides, it would seem very ungracious to frustrate Gordon's evidently pleasurable intentions of instructing her ignorance. Accordingly, she turned her back on the fascinating living pictures, and obediently regarded the painted ones, as her companion was saying briskly—

"Now, what is your opinion of the Impressionist school?"

Ruth might truthfully have replied that she had none; but, as this was clearly not the answer expected from her, she conscientiously studied the somewhat bewildering specimen of shadowy blue and grey paint in front of her, but failing to make anything of it, she replied dubiously that it looked rather unfinished to her.

"Oh no," Gordon assured her; "it is considered a splendid study; but you ought to look at it from a distance."

Ruth accepted the verdict in silence, privately wondering if this knowledge was second-hand, or if he really knew about painting. She was hurried on to another "study" of the same school, although she attempted to linger and admire some pictures which to her uneducated eyes seemed really pretty. Gordon smiled patronisingly when she expressed her admiration of these works, and he proceeded to extol the superior merits of the one he had pointed out. Ruth looked at him, and thought ruefully that he seemed primed up to "do" the whole collection. As he was busily discoursing in artistic language, she glanced surreptitiously over her shoulder at the moving panorama behind her, and became so interested in what she saw that she forgot to turn round again, until by the cessation of her companion's voice, and the silence which followed it, she was dimly aware that she had been asked a question.

"Yes," she said vaguely, bringing her eyes back to the pictures, quite unconscious that this was hardly a satisfactory reply to the inquiry: "Which of the two do you prefer?"

Her abstraction being thus plainly demonstrated to Gordon, that gentleman promptly suggested that they might go in search of a seat: which proposal was at once complied with. It was no easy matter, though, to find the seat. Within hearing of the music it was impossible; but finally, in a small side room, a space which admitted of one squeezing on to an ottoman was discovered. Ruth took possession of this, but as there was no room for her companion, he was obliged to stand in front of her.

"I must take you back to the large gallery, Miss Douglas," he said, looking down at her with the same authoritative air, "to hear the Intermezzo, which is the next item but one on the programme."

"Oh!" and Ruth looked up with a slight gleam of amusement in her eyes. "Is that something which one ought to hear?"

"Yes, decidedly; it's the piece of the evening, and everybody will try to hear it," Gordon returned, with gravity.

Ruth was about to remark saucily that she did not wish to do only what everybody else did; but a movement on Gordon's part prevented her.

"Excuse me," he said hastily, with his eyes on the door; "I see a man to whom I wish to speak. I'll be back in time to take you to hear that piece. I'll find you here."

"I hope you won't," murmured Ruth inaudibly, as she looked after the retreating figure of her cavalier striding importantly through the crowd, leaving her feeling very much like a parcel labelled, "To be left till called for." It was rather provoking to be deposited in an out-of-the-way room, especially as her seat did not command a view of the entrance, but faced an uninteresting corner, where very few people passed, except some enthusiastic art-lovers, bent on studying the whole collection. She had very soon examined all the pictures within her range of vision, and was looking over her shoulder at the constant flow of promenaders, in the vain hope that Jack might make his appearance, when she joyfully beheld an acquaintance bearing down upon her.

"How do you do, Miss Douglas?" said the newcomer, holding out his hand smilingly. "I saw your brother in the distance, but didn't expect to have the pleasure of meeting you to-night."

"I came with Jack," Ruth responded, with a return smile, and the satisfied conviction that her friend meant to stay; "but I haven't seen him for ever so long."

"Well, that's too bad of him; he might have found you a better seat," said the young man, looking disparagingly at the works of art on the walls; "there's nothing to be seen here."

Ruth did not think it worth while to exonerate the guiltless Jack from the charge of leaving her alone in a dull corner, as her companion was talking away briskly.

"Wouldn't you like a turn through the rooms?" he suggested; "unless you are tired. I hope, though, you don't want to look at the pictures, for I'm an awful duffer at pictures, and never know one from another."

Ruth was truly thankful to hear this, and disclaimed all desire to look at anything but the people.

"That's all right, then," the young man said, in a relieved tone; adding confidentially: "I can't think why people come to a crowd like this to look at pictures—they're mostly rubbish, any way."

Ruth did not quarrel with this sentiment, although she could hardly forbear a smile at the difference of opinion expressed by the two men. Her present companion, however, seemed perfectly content with his own ignorance, and was very far from posing as an authority on any musical, artistic, or intellectual subject whatever.

"Before we go any further," he remarked, "I must get you a cup of tea. The first thing in a crush like this is to secure something to eat before everything is finished. The feed here isn't usually up to much, but we ought to be able to get a cup of tea and a sandwich, at least."

As he was speaking they reached the refreshment-room, and this practical young man soon espied a sheltered nook, which had evidently been overlooked by the crowd.

Some tall palms stood near the door, and behind them, half-hidden by the broad leaves, were a couple of chairs. This made a delightfully cool and comfortable seat, and Ruth willingly took possession of it, while her partner went in search of the tea. She had barely seated herself when she heard a voice, which sounded quite close, remark languidly—

"How hot those rooms are!"

"Yes," assented another voice; and Ruth concluded the speakers were leaning against the doorway, although she could not see them, owing to the looped-up curtain and thick screen of palms.

"And so you are going in for the pretty heiress?" continued the first voice, still in the same languid drawl.

Ruth hoped they were not about to exchange confidences so close to her ear. She moved her chair slightly, and tried to give a little cough; but apparently it had no effect.

"What do you mean?" asked the second voice, which sounded familiarly in her ears.

"Oh, nothing, of course, old fellow," laughed the first speaker, in what seemed a very meaning tone.

Then, after a moment's pause, he added—

"But she's the most arrant little flirt I ever met."

"Of whom are you speaking?" demanded the second voice; and this time Ruth was sure she had guessed rightly.

But the other passed this over as unworthy of notice. "She cut me dead this evening," he went on; "looked me straight in the face, as if she had never seen me in her life, and turned away. Rather cool, I call it, after being so friendly at a tennis-party last September."

"Might I ask whom you are talking about?" again repeated the familiar voice.

"Oh, come! What's the use of humbugging?" said the other derisively. "I suppose you haven't been devoting yourself to her the most of this evening?"

"Of whom were they talking?" Ruth felt inclined to repeat the question herself. "To whom had Mr. Gordon been devoting himself to-night? Was the pretty heiress the 'man' whom he had been so anxious to see?" But evidently he desired more explicit information himself.

"Look here," he said calmly: "never mind about my trying to humbug you, but just oblige me with the lady's name, will you? then I can make no mistake."

"Miss Douglas is the lady's name," replied the other, in an exaggeratedly polite tone, to the complete bewilderment of Ruth. "Does that surprise you?"

"Indeed it does," said Gordon emphatically. "I have certainly been speaking to Miss Douglas this evening; but as to calling her an heiress, you are very much mistaken."

"Mistaken? Not a bit of it. The old lady has no end of money, and the girl is quite admitted to be her heiress. It's no use pretending to deny the fact, for it's well known."

"Ah! I think I see what you mean now," said Gordon; and Ruth understood too. "Miss Douglas has a twin sister who lives with an aunt in England. I suppose you have confused the two together."

"You don't say so!" said the other; "but now I come to think of it, I see the difference. I only saw her in passing; but as I heard someone call her Miss Douglas, it made me quite sure."

"You see, you were too sure, and too knowing," Gordon pointed out, ready to improve the occasion.

"Well, I was just going to warn you that it was no use going after the fortune, for I fancy it is booked already," was the unabashed reply.

"Indeed! Who is the fortunate man?"

"Know a Captain Douglas in the army? Some relation or other, I think."

"Yes, I know him," and Gordon's voice took a decided tone of interest; while Ruth, forgetful that she was eavesdropping, eagerly listened to catch every word.

Somewhat she had almost expected the last reply, and yet it came as a slight shock to her. Had Archie been engaged to Rachel all the time? Was this the reason why he had never talked about her? Ruth hoped that her escort would not return before she had heard all.

"Is this Douglas a conceited fellow?" Gordon asked: "gives himself no end of airs?"

"Rather—might be a prince at least; and he's a regular bad lot, too," returned this free-spoken individual. "I believe he is the most extravagant man in his regiment, and they're a pretty go-ahead set."

"How is it that he gets the heiress, then?"

"Oh, a family arrangement," said the other lightly. "He's a good-looking chap enough, and the old

Ruth thought she caught the sound of a word like "champagne," murmured in Gordon's voice.

"Exactly," went on the narrator. "The young fool made an exhibition of himself at some regimental sports; quarrelled with another man over the heiress, and kicked up a regular row."

Ruth remembered how Archie's face had flushed at lady has a sneaking fondness for him. He was to have had the money at first; but they quarrelled, and I think the marriage was arranged afterwards to square matters. I don't know that it is quite a fixed thing, though, yet. After his last outbreak, I expect he's been rather in disgrace."

"What was that?" Gordon asked, in a tone of such evident pleasure that Ruth longed to shake him. She listened with a sort of sinking of the heart for further revelations. Was it true what this man was saying? But he could have no motive in telling untruths.

"Oh, the usual thing," said the stranger easily; and Gordon's remark about the public behaviour of the men of his regiment. No wonder! Of course Gordon would remember it too.

"Some of his friends got him to leave the place," went on the ruthless voice, "and the affair was hushed up. Then his lordship got sick-leave, and went off to some out-of-the-way corner, where, I suppose, he repented, and promised to turn over a new leaf. I've no doubt he'll come round the old lady again; women are so soft where a good-looking chap is concerned; and this young scamp always was a favourite with them. It's my opinion, though, that they ought to give him up, for he's no good, and the girl is a pretty little thing," he added, patronisingly.

"I'm not at all surprised at what you tell me," Gordon remarked, in what sounded to Ruth like a tone of satisfaction. "I never thought much of the fellow."

Ruth leant back in her seat, feeling a lump rise in her throat. She was surprised; indeed, she had a bewildered feeling that she must have somehow misunderstood. Could it be true? she kept repeating to herself. Was this the sort of man whom they had all thought so charming? Almost unconsciously she had placed him on a pedestal, and to have him thus suddenly dashed to the ground was a great shock.

CHAPTER VII.

WILL HE COME?

IT seemed to Ruth that the two men in the doorway had taken up their post there for the rest of the evening. The Intermezzo had begun, too. She was aware of this, as she could faintly hear the band beginning again, after an interval of silence. Gordon seemed in no hurry to go and fulfil his promise, she thought, with some resentment. Even full as her mind was of what she had heard, this thought had time to pass through it. He imagined that she was safely stowed away in that dull side-room, all alone, and yet he did not hurry in the least. Of course, she said to herself scornfully, it was much more interesting to discuss the faults and follies of another man, especially when, as she shrewdly suspected, this other had been formerly an object of envy. She felt an unreasoning anger against both speakers. How they had seemed to enjoy their talk! As for herself, a chill, cold sensation of disenchantment had crept over her. How mistaken she had been in Archie, whom she had considered so thoroughly a gentleman, and so frank! He might, at least, have told them about his engagement to Rachel. Because he was handsome and had an attractive manner, she had credited him with all sorts of good qualities. How foolish she had been!

Her head was aching when the promised tea made its appearance, by which time the two men at the door had taken their departure.

"I'm awfully sorry, Miss Douglas," began the young man, proffering the long-delayed refreshments. "I know I've been away an age, but I really couldn't help it. By-the-by, are you particular about having a clean cup?"

"Ah, yes!" cried Ruth, hastily withdrawing the cup from her lips, and turning a horrified look upon the speaker, who began to laugh.

"It's all right," he said reassuringly. "I thought you would be: that's what made me so long. After I had secured the tea (which wasn't easy, with all that crowd), a great hungry fellow leant over me to seize something for himself, and spilt the whole of it. I'm glad to say he got the most of it over his own sleeve, though. Then I insisted upon the cup and saucer being washed over again—anyone might have thought they were washing two dozen, by the time they took."

"It was very good of you to take so much trouble,"

Ruth said, with a smile, as she sipped the tea which she felt she needed. She declined anything to eat, however, much to the regret of her companion, who had thoughtfully provided a large plateful of cakes and sandwiches. Fortunately, his regret did not interfere with his appetite; so Ruth felt it was unnecessary to reproach herself with her inability to eat when she saw him attack and demolish the large pile with as much gusto and boyish enjoyment as Lance might have displayed in similarly propitious circumstances.

This little repast occupied some time; but when they finally emerged from their comfortable corner and mingled with the crowd again, almost the first person they encountered, near the band, was Gordon.

"Oh, Miss Douglas!" he exclaimed, "I have been looking everywhere for you; and the music I wished you to hear is over."

He spoke with such a proprietary air that the other man felt himself dismissed, and took his departure.

"Oh," returned Ruth negligently, "I was tired of that little room, and went to get a cup of tea."

"Well, it is a pity you missed the music," Gordon persisted, not noticing her tone; "it was quite worth hearing. I looked up your brother too, but he hadn't seen you, either."

Ruth was not too well pleased to hear this, as Jack was sure to make a fuss; so she mentally noted down yet another mark to Gordon's already long list of offences.

"But I must show you this little canvas," went on the gentleman, quite unconscious of having given any cause for offence, and inadvertently laying himself open to a snub; "it is the gem of the whole collection."

"I don't care for it," returned Ruth perversely, looking in the opposite direction.

"But you are looking at the wrong thing," he insisted, with great toleration. "This is the one," and he touched the edge of the frame with his fingertip.

Thus compelled, Ruth slowly brought her eyes round to the place indicated. She regarded it in stony silence.

"Isn't it exquisite?" he remarked, more in a tone of assertion than one of interrogation.

"No; I don't think so," was the unexpected reply, delivered with great emphasis, and which made Gordon stare—as it well might, for the work in question was really a chef d'œuvre.

This flat contradiction, after her previous docility, was like a dash of cold water in Gordon's face.

"I can assure you, Miss Douglas," he said gravely, "that the critics all unite in praising it."

"Well, I prefer to judge for myself; and I don't like it," Ruth asserted unblushingly.

Gordon looked at her in some perplexity, as she stood with sparkling eyes, in which shone the light of battle, and flushed cheeks. Was she vexed with him for leaving her alone? he wondered dubiously. Yet he had not seemed to him a girl who took offence easily. He had observed her at home taking most untoward things with philosophy, only according to Jack's most dictatorial behaviour a saucy speech or careless laugh. But that he himself was now in her black books her next remark left him no room for doubt.

"She joyfully beheld an acquaintance bearing down upon her."—p. 603.

"Do you paint, Mr. Gordon?" she inquired, fixing her eyes full upon him, and throwing out her words like a challenge. "I didn't see you do any sketching in the Highlands."

"No," Gordon returned, his face flushing slightly at her unmistakable meaning. "I daresay you think I can't be much of a judge on that account; but I belong to the Art Club, and know pretty well which are the best pictures from hearing the artists' verdict upon them."

"Ah! I think that is a great mistake," Ruth asserted, bent on differing from every opinion the unfortunate man expressed. "I think everybody should go by their own taste. I hear Mr. Matthew talk a great deal about art, but I am never swayed by his ideas in the least."

It would really have been a great relief to her to sit down and have a good cry; but, as this luxury was denied her, she felt obliged to give vent to her feelings in some other way. She was out of tune now with her surroundings; she looked round on the crowd, and thought how meaningless were their smiles and empty their chatter. Surely they could not all be enjoying themselves so much? What was there to enjoy in this heated, close atmosphere, where a bad headache and strained eyes were the reward of gazing at the pictures, and weariness and aching feet the result of being jostled by the promenaders? What a strange idea people had of pleasure! she thought gloomily, quite forgetting how differently she had looked upon the same scene earlier in the evening.

After his last snub Gordon had relapsed into dignified silence; so Ruth had nothing to distract her from her melancholy reflections. The pair had every appearance of having quarrelled, Ruth looking bored and disdainful, while Gordon's sense of righteous displeasure was legibly written on every line of his countenance, when they came face to face with Jack.

"Hulloa!" exclaimed that young man, taking in the situation with his usual acuteness, and instantly pouncing on the real culprit. "Where have you been, Ruth?" he demanded, with an air of having spent his evening searching for her.

"Enjoying myself," his sister responded nonchalantly, but with a grim sense of the incongruity of her answer with the actual fact.

"Enjoying yourself? I daresay!" retorted her brother, who accepted the words literally, and was further incensed by them; "but what made you go and hide?"

Ruth elevated her eyebrows slightly.

"Dear me, Jack!" she observed, "I didn't think you cared where I hid, as you vanished at the beginning of the evening."

"I only went to speak to a friend; and when I looked for you again, you had both moved on," Jack declared, with an aggrieved air.

"Exactly," Ruth assented, with great suavity. "We all wished to speak to a friend; only somehow, nobody would be obliging enough to wait on the exact spot till we had finished our little conversations, so we were all at cross purposes."

"Well, I suppose we shall all be unanimous in agreeing to go home now?" said Jack grandly, not pursuing his investigations into his sister's movements any further, as she showed symptoms of a feminine inability to stick to the case in point, and an inclination to display an unwarrantable curiosity about his, Jack's, own private doings.

Nobody had the least desire to prolong their stay, so Jack's, motion was carried without opposition.

As Ruth was about to retire to her own room that night, her brother asked her abruptly—

"What was Gordon saying to you this evening?"

"His conversation consisted entirely in giving me artistic instruction," Ruth replied, without any hesitation. "No, stay—he also told me the piece of music I must listen to."

"Nonsense!" Jack ejaculated, with an incredulous air. "He must have spoken of other things. When I met you, you looked as if you had quarrelled."

"It must have been because I didn't admire a picture which he had been told was the correct one to admire. I assure you our talk was strictly limited to art. If you want a detailed account of it, though, I must refer you to the artists from whence it originated—I couldn't pretend to do justice to all the technical language that he used;" and with that, she gathered up her fan and gloves, and retired from the room, leaving Jack dissatisfied and nonplussed.

Next day Ruth's visit to town came to an end. Gordon appeared at the station, in company with Jack, to see her off, and presented her with some newspapers and magazines to read on her journey. Ruth was surprised at this mark of attention, and felt some compunction at the recollection of her behaviour the previous evening. She would have liked to make some amends for her rudeness; but she had only time to thank him for all the trouble he had taken for her entertainment. Then she shook hands very frankly with him, and, as the train moved off, waved a smiling farewell out of the carriage window. But she had not forgiven him in her heart for saying that Archie's misbehaviour was quite what he expected. How could he possibly have guessed it? It was only that he was glad to hear it. Still, although she could not like the man, he had meant to be kind to her, and she had scarcely been grateful enough.

When she got home she told them that she had enjoyed herself very much. She described the tournament for Lance's benefit; and explained at great length all she had seen and done. She told everything, in fact, except that which most filled her mind—what she had heard about Archie. She thought about it a great deal, although she told no one; and Katie was greatly surprised by the disappearance soon after of the photograph of the young man which had formerly graced their bed-room mantelpiece.

"I put it into a drawer," her sister informed her, in answer to her inquiries. "It was rather in the way, and often got knocked about."

"I'm sure I never knocked it down, and I think the mantelpiece looks very bare without it," Katie observed with inconvenient pertinacity; but her sister only busied herself in her unpacking, and took no further notice of her objections.

So the picture of the handsome face was hidden away; but if Ruth hoped by that means to banish the recollection of it from her mind, she found out her mistake. Every feature remained imprinted on her memory: his laughing blue eyes, his clearly cut lips, and his ever-varying expression and gay laugh. Ah well! even his detractor called him "good-looking enough;" but he was more than that: he was as handsome a young man as one could hope to see. No, there was no denying his good looks; but, after all, what were looks if they constituted his main recommendation? No doubt some of those men who had appeared so ordinary by the side of the elegant young Englishman were in reality greatly his superiors. Ruth was quite aware of all this, and was annoyed with herself that, as Christmas approached, the thought which was uppermost in her mind was, "Will he come?" Whether she hoped for it or shrank from it most, she could hardly have told. If he came, what particular enjoyment could she expect? She never could feel the same again to him as she had felt to the frank, gentlemanly, and open young cousin she had known. Such a person had only existed in her own mind; the real Archie was very different. No; she was sure he would not come. Doubtless he had long ago forgotten that he had ever promised to come. Perhaps Miss Douglas and Rachel had taken him into favour again. Well, well—Ruth caught herself up; what was the use of surmising about it? It did not concern her.

"Yes, in spite of all, she had expected Archie."—p. 609.

Christmas was fast approaching: a wet, drizzling one it seemed likely to be, too, with not a hint of frost or snow. Lance and Katie were looking forward to having no lessons, and Jack was coming home for a short holiday; still the season did not seem particularly festive to Ruth. The weather brightened up somewhat on Christmas morning. The rain ceased, and a fitful sunshine shone on the hills. Ruth found herself going with great frequency to the windows; and yet the interior of the room, with its blazing fire, seemed more inviting than the prospect without. Jack had arrived the day before, but still she appeared to be looking out for someone. At length she espied a figure far down on the winding road. It was clearly making for the house. Her heart began to beat a little faster as she stood and watched. Was it Archie? The figure drew nearer. It was a man, but surely not a tall one? That was never the way Archie walked! He was still a long way off, but Ruth could not deceive herself. She could have told the easy swinging gait at almost any distance, whereas this figure trotted briskly along, with little short steps, and was equally familiar. It was only the artist. She turned away from the window with a keen feeling of disappointment. Yes, in spite of all, she had expected Archie.

VERY RICH PEOPLE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "HOW TO BE HAPPY THOUGH MARRIED," "THE BUSINESS OF LIFE," ETC. ETC.

THE phrase, "in all time of our wealth," does not, of course, mean in the time when we have a respectable account at our banker's and plenty of change in our pockets. It means in all time of our well-being. From this point of view, what millionaires some people are who perhaps think that they are to be pitied because not over-burdened with £ s. d. I seldom see school-boys playing, or a regiment of young soldiers, without thinking how very well-off they are. They are rich in youth, in health, and in high spirits, and the gouty old millionaire who drives past in a fine carriage would give all the wealth he possesses for these. What are nuggets and millions? The French financier said, "Alas! why is there no sleep to be sold?" Sleep was not in the market at any quotation. The man who has a good digestion, a bounding pulse, and high spirits, is surely far richer than the possessor of millions, over whose mind chronic bodily disorder casts a gloom.

If the reader is astonished that we should speak in this familiar way about millionaires, let him know that we ourselves were millionaires for a brief period. Having paid a visit to the Bank of England, and seen its various monetary wonders, we were permitted to hold in our hand a small bundle of notes, value one million sterling. For thirty seconds, at least, we were the depositaries of that enormous sum, but, alas! for the fleeting character of human possessions; at the end of that time the clerk resumed his treasure, and we sank to our former condition of financial insignificance.

Now, when we had this money in our hands were we not as rich, or perhaps richer—for we enjoyed the novelty of the sensation—than are those people who have great incomes which they do not and cannot use? I believe that one day almost all very rich men, not in America only, but everywhere, will hold the same sentiments which Mr. George W. Childs, the late millionaire proprietor of the Philadelphia Ledger, thus expressed:—"As I have rarely in my life seen an estate administered as I know its owner would have desired, I think that all rich men, particularly those who have no children to inherit their property, should spend their money themselves, in order that they may be able to see with their own eyes the good which the judicious spending of money upon others can do. It is not generosity that has made me give money in many cases; it is in part selfishness. I want to see where my money goes. I want to know that it is circulating, that it is doing good. I sometimes feel that the only money I have is that which I have given away. The rest is just waiting. The money that I have spent upon other people has been that which I have most enjoyed."

Mr. Leland Stanford, who gave four millions of pounds to found a university, gave utterance to similar views recently. "It seems to me," he said, "the moral duty of every man to give to the public weal a liberal portion of his accumulations, and to do it himself in his lifetime. I'm going to see if I can't spend my money as well as anybody else could do it."

Happily, it is not necessary for enjoyment to have a note for a million in our hand even for thirty seconds, as we had. Great revenues have great anxieties attached to them, and it is quite possible to be rich in happiness on a small income if thrift be practised. Economy is a great fortune. "Who is the richest of men?" asked Socrates. "He who is content with the least, for contentment is Nature's riches." Those who have few wants, who can stand at the window of one of our monster shops and say with truth, "I want little or nothing of all the things that are inside"—such people are very rich.

We are not so foolish as to pretend to disparage money. We know the great power it is, and all the good things it can do. Still, everyone who thinks and observes must know that a person may be very rich without money, and very poor with it. The wife of Jerome Buonaparte consoled her cheerless old age by devotion to avarice. "When I was young," she said, "I had everything but money. Now, when I am old, I have nothing but money." Who does not think that this lady was richer in her youth than in her old age?

When Abraham Lincoln was a young man starting in life, it used to be said of him, "Lincoln has nothing, only plenty of friends." Plenty of friends—nothing! Why, the real wealth of a man is the number of things which he loves and blesses, and by which he is loved and blessed. Love is the only thing that will pay ten per cent. interest on the outlay, and those may best be described as rich people who most love. Unhappily, just as we only appreciate the wealth that is contained in health when we lose it, so many of us only love our friends when they have gone from us.

"Though all cannot live on the piazza, everyone may feel the sun." In some cases ownership is essential to enjoyment; in others, ownership excludes it, since the most beautiful things are, by nature, indivisible. What are the things that give the keenest joy? Those that belong to no one, such as national glory, the supreme works of literature and art, the beauties of nature. "To see is to have," says a French proverb. The owner of an estate may not be its real possessor; for he may be unable to enjoy it. A millionaire pays thousands of pounds for a gallery of paintings, and some boy or girl comes in, with open mind and poetic fancy, and carries away a treasure of beauty which the owner never saw.

A Scotch proverb says, "He that uses what he has will never be poor." We all would be rich if we appreciated at their true value the blessings which we receive daily from God; but unfortunately, these we too often despise merely because they are common. "I often think," says Archdeacon Farrar, "that most of us in life are like many of those sightseers who saunter through this (Westminster) Abbey. Their listless look upon its grandeur and its memorials furnishes an illustration of the aspect which we present to higher powers as we wander restlessly through the solemn minster-aisles of life. We talk of human misery; how many of us derive from life one-tenth part of what God meant to be its natural blessedness? Sit out in the open air on a fine summer day, and how many of us have trained ourselves to notice the sweetness and the multiplicity of the influences that are combining for our delight: the song of birds, the breeze beating balm upon the forehead, the genial warmth, the delicate odours of ten thousand flowers?"

People with good characters may well be called very rich: character is property—it is the noblest of possessions. Charteris, a notorious scoundrel of his time, once said to a man who was distinguished for his religious principles, "I would give a thousand pounds to have your good character." "Why?" inquired the other. "Because I would make ten thousand pounds by it," was the reply. If even the bad can thus appreciate the value of character, how much more should those who wish to serve God feel that "a good name is rather to be chosen than great riches"?

"There is that maketh himself rich, yet hath nothing; there is that maketh himself poor, yet hath great riches." Faraday once told his friend Professor Tyn-dall that at a certain period of his career he had definitely to ask himself whether he should make wealth or science the object of his life. When preparing his well-known memoir of the great master, the professor called to mind this conversation, and asked leave to examine his accounts; and this is the conclusion at which he arrived:—"Taking the duration of his life into account, this son of a blacksmith and apprentice to a bookbinder had to decide between a fortune of £150,000 on the one side, and his unendowed science on the other. He chose the latter, and died a poor man. But his was the glory of holding aloft among the nations the scientific name of England for a period of forty years."

Only the other day a friend of mine gave up a pleasant country living, with little work and good pay, in order to take a town parish with no endowment, because he thought that he could there do more good. Intellectual and spiritual teachers who sacrifice income in this way are not made poor, but very rich.

But the richest people of all are those who have a treasure in heaven to inherit after they leave this world, where riches are so liable to make to themselves wings and fly away. Would you be very rich? Then choose, as did Solomon, that wisdom which is beyond the price of rubies. You remember that when he asked for this true kind of riches, all the lower kinds which he might have asked were given to him. And so it is that those who ask for and receive the riches of Christ's Kingdom have all other things added. "He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver;" but "My people shall be satisfied with My goodness, saith the Lord."

Many of us grumble, and think that our poverty is much to be pitied, whereas if we honestly reckoned up our blessings we would find that we were very rich people. A merchant was very prosperous in his home and his business; a reverse came, and he failed. Returning home that evening, his face haggard and his heart apparently broken, he said, "I am ruined! I have lost my all!"—"All?" queried his wife. "No, for I am left."—"All?" said his eldest boy: "here am I."—"And I too," said his daughter, putting her arms round her father's neck.—"And you have your health left," said his wife.—"And your hands to work with," added his daughter.—"And your feet, father, to carry you about, and your two eyes to see with," said little Eddie.—"And you have God's promises," said the old grandmother.—"And a kind, good heavenly Father, and heaven to go to," again put in Mrs. Merchant.—"God forgive me!" said the man. "I have not lost all, nor indeed much, compared with what is left to me."

THE CONSECRATION OF THE THUMB.

BY THE REV. HUGH MACMILLAN, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E.

"Thou shalt take of his blood, and put it upon the thumb of their right hand." EXODUS xxix. 20

HIGH PRIEST WEARING THE EPHOD.

AARON and his sons were set apart for the office of the priesthood in Israel by a very solemn and elaborate ceremony. They were first washed from every speck of dust and stain of defilement, at the laver placed beside the door of the tabernacle, and then clothed with the sacred garments that belonged to the priestly office. When they were thus arrayed, the holy anointing oil was poured upon their heads. After that, a bullock was brought for a sin-offering; and Aaron and his sons having laid their hands on its head, in token that their sins were transferred to it, it was then slain, and its blood poured at the foot of the altar to make expiation for their guilt. Finally, a lamb was brought and slain in the same fashion, after having been personally identified with them through the imposition of hands; and Moses took its blood and put it upon the tip of the right ear, and upon the thumb of the right hand, and upon the great toe of the right foot of Aaron and each of his sons, and they yielded themselves, in this most significant rite, a living sacrifice to the Lord. They were henceforth not their own, but bought with a price, and therefore bound to glorify God in each of the members of their body, which belonged henceforth to God. Their ear was to listen only to the voice of God's commandments; their hand was to touch no impure thing, and to handle the sacred vessels with reverence; and their feet were to tread only upon holy ground, and to walk only in the shining path of the just. Thus the whole person and the whole life of each member of the Aaronic family were to be purified and consecrated for the service of the Lord.

But in this discourse I wish to separate one of the members thus consecrated from the others, and to confine your attention entirely to it. In this way

I hope to show you how full of meaning was this apparently simple and trivial act of putting the blood of the ram of consecration upon the right thumb of Aaron and his sons. The thumb is the most significant part of the human frame. The sense of touch, which belongs to the whole body, is concentrated in it and in the fingers; and this sense of touch is the very exercise and manifestation of life. While all the other senses are passive, and simply wait to be impressed by outward things, the sense of touch is active, and chooses the objects upon which to exercise itself. The absence of the power of touch means paralysis, and, in its extreme form, death. The thumb, in which this active sense of touch may be said to be concentrated, is therefore the symbol of the whole life of the body; and we can easily understand why, for this reason alone, it should have been selected to be sprinkled with sacrificial blood.

But its special form and function also mark it out for this significant consecration. It is by his thumb that man's body is chiefly distinguished from that of the lower animals which most resembles it. In nearly all the other organs and parts, the body of the lower animals is exceedingly like that of man's body. They are made on the same plan, and show the same pattern, and fulfil the same purpose. But the thumb of man is quite different. Its form and structure are absolutely unique. Compare the paw of a cat or dog, or even of a monkey, and you see how different it is from the human hand. The paw or the hoof of the lower animals shows at once that it was intended merely to support the body, or to seize prey, or to protect against enemies. But the hand of man was made for work, not only for holding things, but also for making things. It is adapted for fashioning and using tools, and cultivating the ground, and a thousand other purposes useless and impossible to any animal. It is separated from the other four fingers, and made quite distinct from and placed in opposition, as it were, to them. Were all the five fingers ranged on the same plane, and made precisely of the same length and shape, the whole five fingers would be, in this way, made useless; for in order to have a firm hold of anything, it is necessary either to grasp it all round, or to grasp it at two opposite points; and neither of these things could have been done if all the five fingers had been placed on the same plane. But these things can now be done simply because of the position of the thumb, which is so placed, and has exactly such a length and such a degree of motion as, by a slight inclination, to be easily made to work together with any of the four fingers, or with all together.

It is by this simple plan of differentiating one of the five fingers in the human hand from the rest that man has been raised immeasurably above the lower animals, and made a fellow-worker with God. In vain would man have possessed a reasoning brain if he had not a working thumb. In vain would God have placed man in Eden, and given him all its blessings and boundless capabilities; he could not have fulfilled the Divine command to dress and keep it if he had not had a thumb. But by giving man a thumb, different from the rest of his fingers, God has clearly shown that He meant the active brain and the active hand to work together, and that both were correlated to educate him to the highest rank of being. By the help of the thumb the hand can guide the plough and till the ground; it can touch the organ and harp, and bring the sweetest music out of them; it can wield the pen and write the most inspiring wisdom. It is by the help of the thumb that our railways and steamers and telegraphs have been constructed, which bring the ends of the world together, and annihilate time and space. It is by the help of the thumb that the ground is cultivated and planted with trees, and the seasons and the very weather thereby changed; and the regions which man inhabits have been converted into smiling corn-fields and pleasant homesteads. It is by the help of the thumb that all the other organs are made efficient when they are weakened and disabled. It makes the microscope for the eye to see an otherwise invisible world of wonders in a drop of water, and the telescope for the vision to behold undreamt-of glories in the remotest abyss of stars. When we think of what the human thumb has enabled the human race to do, during all these long ages of progress, we cannot but look at this little member with astonishment, as one of the most wonderful pieces of mechanism in existence. There is a story told of a Dutch anatomist, a sceptic, who had written a learned book on the hand. During a severe illness he saw one day his own pale wasted fingers lying listlessly on the cover of the bed, and was struck in a way he had never been before with the remarkable structure of the thumb in relation to the rest of the hand; and his meditations upon this subject ultimately banished all his former sceptical views, and brought him into personal relation with the living God.

After this explanation, you will understand what a very significant thing it was that the blood of the sacrificed ram should have been applied to the right thumb of Aaron and his sons, as the high priests of Israel. The blood consecrated to the service of God not merely the principal finger of the most active and useful hand, but that representative part of man's body which raised him above the animals, and brought out most distinctly the image of God. The thumb is the special mint-mark of humanity; and "the rule of thumb" is, indeed, the rule of man's sovereignty over the world and the sum of knowledge. And, therefore, when this member is made sacred by the blood of the sacrifice, it implies that all human nature and human life is made sacred by it. In ancient superstitious times the top joint of the thumb of the right hand was dedicated to God, and the top joint of the thumb of the left hand was dedicated to Christ, while the other joints of the right and left hand thumbs were dedicated to the Virgin Mary, and the rest of the fingers were dedicated to the apostles and saints. Thus people had a kind of instinctive feeling that the thumb belonged specially to God and to Christ, and had a sacred character connected with it. Tacitus, the great Roman historian, tells us that it was the custom of Oriental kings, in making a covenant with each other, to join right hands, and tie the thumbs together, and tighten them into a knot. Then, when the blood was thus pressed to the finger-tips, they drew it out by a slight cut, and licked it in turn. This they regarded as a Divine covenant, made sacred by mutual blood. They became in this way blood-brothers; and such blood was truly thicker than water—thicker even than that of natural descent or birth-relationship.

The form of marriage in Ceylon and other parts of India is by binding together the thumbs of bride and bridegroom; and the thumb was at first, in our own and in other countries, the finger upon which the wedding-ring was worn, which was only changed for the finger upon which it is now placed, because it was supposed that a vein of blood passed from this finger directly to the heart, thus connecting it with the very centre and seat of life. This part of the marriage rite is thus a vestige of the primitive covenant of blood. A survival of it lingered in our own country down to very recent times, and is still practised in remote localities: viz., to lick the thumb when giving a solemn pledge or promise. It is even recognised on our statute-book, and in the Scottish law-courts, that a bargain is legal if the parties to it had licked and joined thumbs when it was made. The thumb pressed upon wax was formerly regarded as a seal or mark of good faith; and swearing by pressing the thumb on the blade of a sword was the most solemn form of oath that could be administered. The Pope said that he could free a nun from the oath of the veil or a knight from the oath of fidelity, but he could not free any man who had taken the oath of the thumb. In fact, so binding was it that the Latin word pollicitare, and the English word pollicitation, which means to promise or engage, is derived from pollex, the thumb.

Now, all this shows to you what importance was attached to anything connected with the thumb. And when Aaron and his sons had the blood of sacrifice put upon it, it meant that they took a most solemn oath to yield this and all their other members which it summed up and represented in itself as instruments of righteousness. The priestly hand, whose right thumb was touched with the holy blood, had made a blood-covenant with God; and the member so specially distinguished was consecrated to perform all the functions for which of His flesh God gave Him a human body made in all things like that of His brethren, endowed with the same members and capacities. It was not the nature of angels which He assumed, but the nature of man; and as the children were partakers of flesh and blood, He Himself likewise it was so wonderfully constructed to the glory of God. It was to handle gifts and sacrifices with the purity which God's service required. Its skill and power were to be devoted to the cause of religion; and in that hallowed cause it was not to hold any bribes or to touch any unclean thing.

And did not the blood of the ram of consecration point to the blood of the Lamb of God, which fulfilled all types and exhausted all sacrifices? Jesus realised in His own person the typical character of the consecration of Aaron and his sons to the priesthood. He passed through the same solemn rite, not in shadow, but in reality. In the days took part of the same. He was differentiated from the lower creatures in the same way that man is by his human brain, and human hands, and human feet; and on these distinctive parts of His humanity was sprinkled the blood of consecration to the office of our great High Priest. And that blood was not the blood of bulls and goats, but His own precious blood. It touched His hands and His feet, for they were nailed to the cross, and touched His ear, for His head was wounded by the crown of thorns. And when He appeared to His disciples after the resurrection, He said to them, "Behold My hands and My feet!" It was the same flesh as before, now glorified and made immortal, but still bearing the marks of the nails. He had passed through His baptism of blood into His new life in heaven, but even on the throne the marks of His consecration are seen upon Him; and throughout all eternity He will appear "a Lamb as it had been slain." And in Him the wounds of the cross, as our great Intercessor within the veil, are an ever-present and ever-prevailing plea with God for the pardon and justification of the repentant sinner. He has an abiding witness in Himself in heaven in the blood on His right thumb, and on His right toe, and on His right ear, of His entire consecration, all His human body, and human nature, and human life, to the work of human redemption.

And upon everyone who believes in Him He puts the marks of the Lord Jesus. He enters into covenant-relationship with you by touching with His own blood your right thumb, and right toe, and right ear, in token of your entire consecration; and you can say with adoring gratitude, "Unto Him that loved us and washed us from our sins in His own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and the Father, be glory and dominion for ever and ever." What a wonderful thought, that the blood of the highest Being in the universe touches that part of your body which proves your high birth and great destiny—touches it in order to make you of one blood and one nature with Him, in order to make all that your right thumb represents holy to the Lord! In the Colosseum at Rome, when a gladiator obtained the victory over his fellow, he looked up to the throne of the emperor to know what he should do with his conquered opponent, who lay at his mercy. If the thumb of the emperor pointed upwards towards the sky, his life was to be spared; but if the thumb pointed downwards towards the earth, then he was to be put to death. When the fatal movement of the thumb was seen by the spectators, the wild cry, "Habet!" rang through the amphitheatre, and the doom of the gladiator was sealed. This was not the cry that rang through the universe when we were wounded and vanquished by sin, and Death claimed the victory over us, and we lay at his mercy. The thumb of God, as it were, was not turned to the earth in condemnation, but upward to the sky in deliverance, as the voice of the Intercessor has heard: "Save him from going down to the pit; I have found a ransom." The Saviour's hand was nailed to the tree of shame; and the blood that flowed from that pierced hand has been applied, as it were, to the hand of man to undo the evil which it has done since the fatal hour when our first parents plucked the forbidden fruit, and so brought all its sin and misery into the world. And now He says to every one of you who wishes to be His disciple, "Reach hither thy finger, and behold My hands, and reach hither thy hand and thrust it into My side; and be not faithless, but believing." And thus convinced and satisfied, thus conquered by His love, and marked, as it were, on the thumb by this contact of faith with the wounds of the cross that effected your deliverance, you are thenceforward no longer your own, but His—united to Him by blood-relationship. And surely it is your highest distinction to be so consecrated. What an instrument for good the thumb so marked ought to be! What noble work it ought to do in the world! Even when handling the things of common life, it should do so in righteousness, and so invest them with a sacred character. The most ordinary every-day actions which the worldly man performs for selfish earthly purposes, you should perform to the glory of God.

Surely for the thumb that has on it the blood of Christ, that is joined by blood-covenant to His thumb, as it were, the injunction is hardly necessary: "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." The hard horny hand of the day-labourer or handicraftsman, with such a blood consecration on it, must be as clean and noble in its own way as the soft white hand of a queen that holds the sceptre. The right hand whose thumb is thus marked should use the saw, and guide the plough, and wield the hammer, and drive the spade, and ply the oar, and employ the pen, more faithfully and honestly and efficiently than those who have not that consecration, or that high and holy motive to make all their labour—labour in the Lord. "What is that in thine hand?" God says to all His people whose right thumb is marked with the blood of His Son. And when you attempt any task to which you are called by God, He will teach you so to use the means at your command, however slender they may be, and however humbly you may think of them, and He will endow them with such a power that they will do as much good for yourselves and others in their own way as Moses accomplished by his miraculous rod. He will establish the work of your hands upon you—yea, the work of your hands He will establish it. And, faithful in little things, you are qualifying yourselves for the higher parts and the greater things of life.

Elihu says, in a very remarkable passage in the Book of Job, "He sealeth up the hand of every man, that all men may know His mark." That is to say, God places a mark on the hand of every man, so that you can tell from it what kind of work he is best fitted to do. You see one man's hand, and you say at once, "That is a painter's hand; it is fitted only to hold the brush." You see another kind of hand, and you say, "That is a musician's hand; those long supple fingers are made to strike the keys of the organ or the piano." You see a third person's hand, and you say, "That is a mechanic's hand, the hand of an inventor or of an artisan, who does clever things in wood, or iron, or brass." And you see another kind of hand still, and you know from its delicacy, and yet firmness and precision, that it is the hand of a surgeon, made for operations so vital and critical that the deviation of a hair's-breadth in the searching knife would be fatal. The hand is a most expressive member ; and it would seem as if God had predestinated each man from his birth to the work for which he is best adapted by the type of his hand.

We know the character of the hand from the nature of the handiwork, and vice-versâ. A man's hand becomes like the kind of work he does—as Shakespeare says, the dyer's hand is like the stuff he works in. When Raphael's tomb in the Pantheon of Rome was opened, sixty years ago, some doubted as to this being his last resting-place, but all uncertainty vanished when the thumb of the skeleton hand was exposed to the light. It had the characteristic roughness which constant holding of the easel gives even to the bone of a painter's thumb. The thumb-mark of each of you is perfectly distinct and individual in childhood, and manhood, and old age. Other marks of identification change, but the thumb-mark changes not. Its characteristic lines are preserved in all circumstances. So let it be with all the work of your hand. Let the hall-mark of the thumb on which the blood of Christ has been set, consecrating you to be a priest unto God and the Father, and to yield yourselves a living sacrifice to Him—let that hall-mark be clear, and distinct, and characteristic on all your work, so that it may be seen by everyone to be wrought in God. Let your commonest daily labour be Christian work. If you have the blood of your Redeemer on your thumb, it is the earnest of the redemption of your whole body for which you are working and waiting, and for the accomplishment of which your work as well as your worship here is a daily preparation. All that is “under your thumb,” as the common phrase puts it, all that is represented by your thumb and wrought by your thumb, will partake of your consecration. There may not be much in your hand, or it may not seem much, but you will make the best use of it, and you will find in your happy experience that to him that hath, and makes the best use of what he hath, more shall be given. Raised above every other creature on earth by the possession of a thumb, the right use of that thumb by the consecration of the blood of the Son of God, will raise you to a fellowship with Him nearer than angels or archangels can ever know.

But there is another side to this matter. You may not only refuse this consecration, but in a spiritual sense you may deprive yourselves of what is the distinction and glory of your humanity. Our Saviour spoke of the duty of even cutting off a right hand when it was a cause of offence ; for it was better to enter heaven maimed than with whole members to be cast into hell. But on the other hand, there is a mortal sin in cutting off a right hand when it might be made an instrument of righteousness for the glory of God and the good of man. So conscious were the ancients of the value and usefulness of the thumb, that it was quite a common thing for the Roman soldiers to cut off their thumbs in order to avoid being pressed into active service ; and in recent years young men have mutilated themselves in this manner to prevent their being chosen as conscripts in the French army. The way to render an enemy incapable of future resistance or harm was to cut off his thumbs ; and this was what Adonibezek did to the three-score and ten kings whom he had conquered, and what was done in return to himself when he was conquered by a mightier foe. The person who was thus mutilated was called a poltroon, from the Latin word signifying a thumb.

Now, there are spiritual poltroons, who thus maim themselves in a spiritual sense in order to escape service as good soldiers of Jesus Christ. Multitudes of lives with great possibilities have been utter failures because men and women have deprived themselves, by their unbelief, or indolence, or worldliness, of the power of doing the duty to which God had called, and for which He had qualified them. They were intended by the very type and character of their hand, as it were, to fill certain places and do certain work for God and for the world ; but when they were summoned to their work, they excused themselves on one plea or another, or they disqualified themselves for it by their own wilful faults. God forbid that any of you should be found among these spiritual failures ! Let the blood of your Redeemer redeem you from the vanity of your life, and consecrate your powers and faculties to obey every call of God. “Neither yield ye your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin ; but yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead, and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God.”

“Take my life, and let it be Consecrated, Lord, to Thee.
Take my hands, and let them move
At the impulse of Thy love.
Take my feet, and let them be Swift and beautiful for Thee.”

My God, my Father, while I stray.

Words by CHARLOTTE ELLIOTT, 1834.

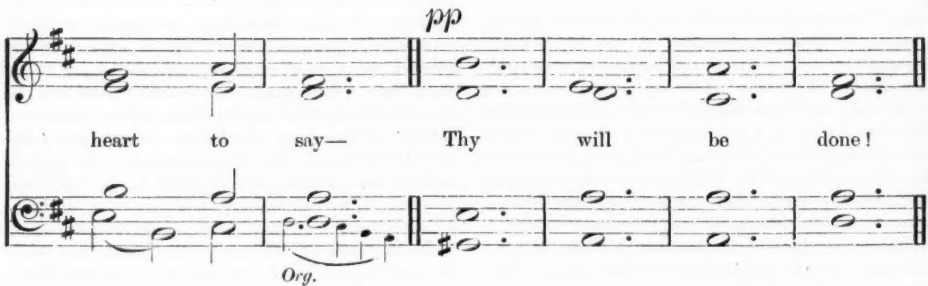

Music by W. H. LONGHURST, Mus.D.
(Organist of Canterbury Cathedral.)

1. My God, my Fa - ther, while I stray Far from my home on life's rough way, Oh, teach me from my heart to say— Thy will be done!

Org.

2. If Thou shouldst call me to resign
What most I prize: it ne'er was mine;
I only yield Thee what was Thine—
Thy will be done!

3. E'en if again I ne'er should see
The friend more dear than life to me,
Ere long we both shall be with Thee—
Thy will be done!

4. Should pining sickness waste away
My life, in premature decay,
My Father, still I strive to say—
Thy will be done!

5. If but my fainting heart be blest
With Thy sweet Spirit for its guest,
My God, to Thee I leave the rest—
Thy will be done!

6. Renew my will from day to day;
Blend it with Thine, and take away
All that now makes it hard to say
Thy will be done!

7. Then, when on earth I breathe no more
The prayer oft mixed with tears before,
I'll sing upon a happier shore;—
Thy will be done!

PENNYROYAL'S "MISSUS."

BY ETHEL F. HEDDLE, AUTHOR OF "STAUNCH," "A REAL HERO," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

PENNYROYAL.

HE really depresses me," Mr. Smith said—"makes me feel down in the dumps! And out on a pleasure-trip like this, it ain't pleasant—it really ain't fair!"

"You needn't speak to him, father."

Mr. Smith was quite aggrieved, and he went on carving the chicken with a depressed sigh.

They were out on the Lake of Killarney in the hotel boat, and they were all holders of Messrs. Cook's tickets for a tour in "the Emerald Isle." That gave them, as it were, an introduction to each other—or so Mr. Smith thought; and as he was the most sociable of men, it gave him positive annoyance to have one of the party sitting remote from the others, his back towards them, and his grave emotionless face seeming to look at nothing in particular. For if he did not attend or pay any heed to the people in the boat, he certainly paid as little attention to the scenery: and this annoyed the worthy alderman also.

Mr. Smith was in a perpetual state of exclamation. He seemed to regard the expedition as his own altogether, and his high spirits were really almost contagious.

"My dear, he has not had a holiday for ten years, he told me," the silvery-haired lady in the stern of the boat had whispered to her daughter. "He has a large tannery in the South of England—fancy the joy of this after a tannery, and a tannery odour in one's nostrils for ten years!"

To which Margaret Vibart had smiled—

"My dear mother, I am as willing as you are that he should enjoy himself; and he is most obliging to do all the carving——"

"And the tipping, Margaret."

"The man from Australia."—p. 613.

"And the tipping. But if he would only leave the man from Australia alone!"

The chicken was carved by this time, though Mr. Smith kept it near him on the seat, in order to press the ladies to have "just this last piece of the breast;" and then, lunch being over and the plates put away in the basket, the party were all rather silent, except the worthy tanner and his son-in-law.

They did not intend to make their mirth and their jests obtrusive; but Margaret, who was worn-out after a year's hard teaching, felt rather sympathetic towards "the man from Australia," who hardly answered, save by a brief word, when called upon for raptures.

The lake was so still and so sunshine-haunted, the mountains were so rich in verdure, so embowered in green, the shadows were so lovely in the ravines!

And then the purple heather and the wealth of ferns on every rock! She had fancied the heather would be over, and it was purple and luxuriant still. Autumn tarried long in Killarney, as if loth to depart. Margaret's lips were stained still with the blackberries, which hung in great ebony-hued clusters on their trailing branches by the roadside, and she had a great tangled bouquet of tawny leaves, and holly and ferns, and heather in her lap. Such holly! She had never seen such glorious red berries in her life. And when one was drinking-in health and beauty, anxious to steep one's soul in it and lay by a store for the long work-a-day winter, she did not greatly desire to talk about it.

No; she felt much sympathy for the grave man who said nothing. Why might one's appreciation not be taken for granted?

Mr. Smith, who was the kindest little man possible, amused her mother, and presently he was telling her all about the tannery, and his work-people, and the six children at home, with a simple delight in her interest and attention, which was, after all, rather attractive.

"Mother finds everyone interesting," Margaret thought; "I think her heart could take in the whole world. And the way that man is confiding to her his whole history! I wonder if that other man has a history?"

"My missus, she only let me go if I'd promise that," the old man was saying. "'You take care of cold, Stephen; and you don't forget that old bones can't do what young ones can.' How she does fuss over me—my missus! But, bless your heart, ma'am, we like it! Isn't that so, sir? I'll warrant if you have a missus in Australia——"

He paused then, and his hearty smile faded.

The man from Australia had turned his back suddenly, and Margaret caught sight of his face. Her quick instinct made her look away at once. She had no right—no one had any right—to see that shrinking look of horror. What had Mr. Smith said? Yes, certainly there was a story here.

They landed at Ross Castle in the afternoon, and the shadows were growing longer then, and her mother was a little tired. Margaret and she got into the car awaiting them outside the Castle, and they saw the rest of the party ascend the brake, the silent grey man mounting on the box; and he escaped their memory till later in the evening, when the tanner joined them in the big, dreary hotel drawing-room, where Mrs. Vibart was half asleep, with the Irish Times in her lap.

Seeing this, Mr. Smith sat down by Margaret.

"Are you a bit tired? My son-in-law is playing billiards, so I took a turn outside myself. It's a dirty place, Killarney; and I declare I hardly saw a woman with shoes on her feet! And I looked into the Roman Catholic cathedral. There was an old body bowing and crossing, and sprinkling herself all over with the 'howly water.' Wonder, now, if that comforted her a bit? I gave her a shilling, and told her to go home and take a cup of tea. It would do her a sight more good."

Margaret smiled. "Is it a fine cathedral?"

"Tawdry, I thought. By-the-bye, I met the gentleman from Australia—Pennyroyal is his name. I had a bit of a chat with him. He—he has lost his missus, poor chap!—lost her just before he came here. We were standing in the dusk there in the cathedral, and he told me. He was down in Sydney on business when the news came, and had left her in the bush; and—she—had been murdered by the blacks. He said he just took out a ticket and sailed next day. He said he'd have gone mad if he had stayed—stark staring mad! And on board he had a bad fever. He says he hasn't anyone else in the wide world—never had."

Margaret was listening in a kind of horror, and before she thought the words escaped her—

"Oh, I saw—I saw his face in the boat!"

"I know"—and the old man's honest face crimsoned—"I know! I begged his pardon for that. He said it didn't matter at all. It only gave him a bit of a shiver."

And then Mrs. Vibart roused, and they went off to bed.

But Margaret could not get the story out of her mind, nor the man's shrinking, stricken look.

CHAPTER II.

PENNYROYAL'S LETTER.

THEY were all at Muckross Abbey next day, Pennyroyal walking at their side, with his usual bent head and absent look, and he stood where directed, looked where directed, and tipped the driver and gave the children coppers, like a man in a walking dream. He even bought photographs in the Abbey, apparently because the others were doing so, and very much as if it was all part of the day's work, for he left them lying on the table later, and Margaret lifted them to give them back to him.

The party separated after a little, to wander round the ruin and look for shamrock, but Margaret was making a little sketch of The O'Donoghue's tomb, and she was seated on the base of the broken pillar when she became conscious that Pennyroyal's absent gaze was fixed upon her, and that he was standing by the side of the tomb.

She raised her eyes with such a depth of gentle pity, half reverential for his sorrow, that the man started. Since that awful day when he read the letter which told him that no woman's face had seemed to reach his vision. They were all dream-faces, phantasies —passing before his gaze like the silhouettes on the white sheet of a show.

She looked at him with such deep pity, and something seemed to start and strain in his heart for utterance, though he only said in his dull way—

"You are sketching!"

"Yes; I want to carry away a little memento. Look how these ferns are spreading all over that tomb! I never saw so many hart's-tongue ferns."

He looked at them absently.

"Things grow well here,"

"Wonderfully!"

There was a pause then, and he said slowly—

"Folks like to be buried here, I suppose. Some folks leave orders that they should be carried across the seas, so as to be in the old place. Do you think it would matter?"

Something in his eyes made her wonder what he meant.

"I should not mind," Margaret said. "After all, what does it matter where one leaves the garment one has done with? The soul, the spirit, goes straight home! I have sometimes thought, if they knew—I do not know if they do—that it must vex the happy spirits of those who are gone to see us grieve for them 'as those that have no hope'!"

Pennyroyal listened, and he suddenly took a step nearer, as if startled.

"You see," he said abruptly, "she used to say—my missus—that we'd come home together, and lie together, when we died, in the old churchyard near Barnstaple. I've wondered if I ought to go back, and find her grave, and bring her home. Seems like I'd go mad to see that place! What do you think about it? I think she'd a fancy—she'd like to be near me still—when we were dead."

"I think she would not like you to do anything that would hurt you," the girl's gentle voice said.

He looked startled, and roused again.

"Seems almost as if you had known her," he said; "she always talked like that—kind of low, too, like you! You mustn't think she was like me; she wasn't a bit. There never was anyone like my missus, never! She was all I had in the world. I felt like kissing the ground she trod on, miss, when she married me—and I never got over the feeling. I'd never like her to have done a hand's turn—and I'd scarcely let the wind touch her—and—and—when I was away—they killed her!"

His voice faded away, and his head sank again. Margaret felt as if words were swords to a story like this, and yet he was so desolate.

"Do not think of that part of it," she said. "Think only of her bright spirit waiting for you, and loving you—ah! how dearly still! If we can only realise the love of God, and how He keeps all those we love safe for us, and waiting for us, the mysteries and the pain of the world all seem plain. Life is so short. We have an eternity in which to be happy!"

Pennyroyal listened, and for the first time for six months his look lifted. But he said nothing at all.

"I should hear from Ruth to-day," Mrs. Vibart was saying that afternoon, as they drove home, Mr. Smith chatting gaily to his son-in-law, and Pennyroyal sitting, as usual, up beside the driver, his head bent. "How one does appreciate letters when one is away from home! Are you sure you asked at the office this morning, Margaret?"

"Yes, mother; there were none."

"A post comes in at five," Mr. Smith said; "we'll all hear by that. I expect a letter too; I'm longing to hear if James has passed his school examination. Bless that boy! how he did work!"

Once launched upon "James," the conversation remained in that channel till the huge façade of the hotel was reached, and then Margaret saw her mother go up-stairs, while she went to the office to enquire for letters.

Quite a number of people were waiting, and she could see Pennyroyal look at them dully as he strode past, a head taller than all the other men. He never even enquired; apparently no one wrote to him—now.

And then Margaret got near, and after finding the desired letter from Ruth, she suddenly caught sight of a square white envelope, very much re-addressed, and she read the name—

"John Pennyroyal."

"I'll take it to him," she thought; "how it seems to have followed him about;" and then, after giving her mother the long-wished-for epistle, she looked into the reading-room.

Pennyroyal was there alone, standing idly at the window, and looking out at a row of dahlias which were beginning to hang their heads. And Margaret held out the letter to him.

"I found a letter for you, Mr. Pennyroyal."

He took it listlessly, thanking her in his usual absent way, and then his gaze fell on the envelope, and he started wildly, as if pierced to the heart.

"It's a trick!" he cried: then brokenly, "a cruel trick! Her hand! Mary's hand!"

And then he tore the envelope open with a sudden wild energy, and he read, ghastly white, and with big drops on his forehead.

Margaret waited, and it seemed an hour till he looked up. And ah! the joy, the radiance, the glory in the dark face; and his voice was hoarse and broken still, and his strong hand trembled till the letter shook.

"It was all a horrible mistake!" he said. "It wasn't my missus at all! It was a poor woman she had got in to work. And they reported it was my Mary, and she was lying ill with fever at the station, and couldn't deny it! They told me she was dead and buried; and I took out my passage and set sail next day. And they have hunted me ever since, and through my travelling about like this, and leaving no address, they never found me; and she's waiting—she's waiting for me at Sydney!"

Margaret did not see Pennyroyal again that night, after he had dashed wildly from the room to cable to his wife; and he left early next day.

But before leaving she met him in the hall, and he came up to her eagerly—a new man—with such a light of joy and hope on his brown face, and he wrung her slender hand in his till Margaret winced inwardly, though she only smiled.

"I didn't thank you yesterday," he said; "maybe you thought I didn't hear—or take it in; but I did! My heart was like stone till you spoke like that, and I had felt like cursing God! And then, your voice was so like hers it made me think I heard her. And it was all true, miss! I've got her back, but death'll never seem so black to me again. I'll remember, and I'll tell her all about it. She'd thank you better than me for these kind words. And she isn't a bit like me —my missus—not a bit like me! Don't you think that!"

"Car is at the door, sir."

He wrung her hand, and he was gone.

And Margaret and her mother left Killarney next day, and they were seen off by Mr. Smith, beaming all over.

"Never had such an enjoyable time in my life—never! And we were a pleasant party, all except poor Pennyroyal. And now he is all right! Odd story that! Good-bye! good-bye!"

THE WATER-LILY WAY.

BY C. DI FERRARA.

OUR boat is moored by anchor at the bows to a grassy island, the home of blue forget-me-nots and pink-white comfrey bells, and at the stern she is warped on to a willow, over whose fallen trunk, covered with soft brown moss, I have just slipped into the boat through the willow-sprays and brambles.

It seems a week ago since we came up in the dusk of the evening from the yellow-white sands, purple seas, mauve and indigo striped mussel-shells, and green-grey rushes on the sand-hills at the river's mouth: since we passed the lights in the ferry-house, and the ferry-boat crossing over in the silent gloaming, and came up our water-lily way, between the tall, tall sedges and the long, long feather-tipped river-grasses, and the night-covered alders. The water is deep and lustrous dark as a gipsy's eye, but the round rafts of the lily-leaves lay over this darkness with splashes of silver-grey, dim-lit as with glowworm-light, and the lilies lay still in the shallows, with their white cloven cups raised to the grey night sky, and their golden hearts at rest; it seems a week ago, but it is only one day ago.

For last night, when the tide had come up and covered the lilies deep below their broad leaves, and the water-crowfoot leaves, and the filmy weed masses and floating tangles, we groped with our arms in the water for lilies to lay on our dead child's bosom, and searched the dusky corners of the stream with eyes that were swollen and burning with a long day's tears. Can one day have wrought all this?

The purple loose-strife waves in these silvery-green groves of the river-marshes, where the water-hen calls, and in the knee-deep meadow grass, where the ruddybrown bundles of windle-straw are stacked in sheaves, the giant white umbels of some big meadow-plant glimmer all down the field, till they lose themselves in the gossamer webs of meadow-sweet and hemlock, and the bowing brown heads of a thousand reeds shimmering in the afternoon sunlight. But the large, misty-dark baby eyes, that gazed so intently on to the white lily-cups—well, we know they are closed now, and "sealed safe from tears;" and no human sorrow, sin, or suffering—and, O God! how much there is of it all in this bitterly heartless, cold, cruel world of ours!—will ever stain that tender little flower-face with weeping. So this afternoon we gather the lilies and forget-me-nots from over the boat-side, in the rippling stream of our water-lily way, and bind them on to one long lily-stem with reeds, and place them by that little hushed white form indoors. Good-bye, baby, good-bye.

For the day will soon be over, and the minutes are of gold,
And the wicket shuts at sundown and the shepherd leaves the fold,
And the swallows sink in the reed-beds as the sunset roses go,
And the lilies at their moorings sway gently to and fro.

And white boats float at dusk-fall up the Water-lily Way,
When the darkened tide comes up and the Golden Gates unbar
To let the weary-hearted through, at close of weary day,
Beyond the trees, beyond the clouds, beyond the even-star.

May be those Golden Portals will unclose again for me,
And there, may be, soft baby-arms for me will open wide;
And Baby's smile will welcome us across the night's grey sea,
And holding his wee hand in ours, we shall be satisfied.

For white boats wait to take us up the Water-lily Way;

And the sunset means "Good-night to all," when we have knelt to pray;
"And the day will soon be over, and the minutes are of gold,
And the wicket-gate shuts at sundown, and the shepherd leaves the fold."

THE PLACE AND POWER OF "DISSATISFACTION" IN THE SPIRITUAL LIFE.

BY THE REV. P. E. POWER, M.A.

"I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with Thy likeness."—PSALM xvii. 15.

THE subject upon which I wish to speak to you for a few minutes is, "The Place and Power of Dissatisfaction in the Spiritual Life." And this I wish to speak of, in such a way, as that what I say may not be by any means in the way of an essay, but in that of absolute help to you in your spiritual life.

To some, a subject such as this may be of little practical importance; but so, in all probability, would any subject which dealt with any of the intricacies, or indeed the realities, of the spiritual life. But to others it may be of great moment; for this dissatisfaction felt, but not understood, is a subject of continual fret and depression with the soul.

And by dissatisfaction, do not think, that of necessity I mean disappointment. There may be a dissatisfaction proceeding by the way of disappointment; or, on the other hand, having nothing to do with disappointment; or disappointment and dissatisfaction may be existing together.

Looking for the moment at dissatisfaction in its worldly aspect, how often it proceeds from disappointment! We expected ever so much from this and that—from some relationship—from the possession of something—the attainment of some position; we got it all, and found that its pleasure was in expectation, and not in possession: it palled, or was simply worn out; and we were dissatisfied.

The huge jewel that blazed in the far-off landscape—a diamond like a sun—was, when we came up with it, but a sorry pane of dirty glass in a poor hut, which had caught beams which were not its own, and which glittered in it for a while. "Tis distance," says the poet, that "lends enchantment to the view;" verily, few things in the world can bear to be looked at too closely, enjoyed too freely, possessed too long.

And so it comes to pass that to the world, being full of people who cannot get, or who, getting, find that what they have got is not equal to their expectation, dissatisfaction, if not discontent, may be said to be one of the sad characteristics of human life. There was a poor lady—very poor—and she came in for a large fortune; and now she would so spend it that her poor lean soul should fatten in rich pastures; and so she built herself a grand house, and filled it with all sorts of things that she fancied, and called it Satis House (Satis being the Latin for sufficient), for here she would be satisfied at last. Ah, poor lady! she enjoyed it all for but a little while; then, one by one, the contents of Satis House ceased to give her pleasure; and at last Satis House itself became stale, and unprofitable, and flat; and in sheer misery, and disappointment, and dissatisfaction, in Satis House she killed herself.

I might do you a great deal of good by helping you to a larger measure of human happiness than any of you probably have, if I were to spend our time in trying to make you apply a true and not a false standard to human things: in asking you to go measuredly into your expectations of all of earth; but I want to speak of dissatisfaction as regards your spiritual life—that life which is the true and all-important one to many of you, and in which you realise this dissatisfaction; and by reason of that dissatisfaction (not understanding its place and power) you weaken instead of strengthen, and fret and vex your souls.

And now, brethren, how did it come to pass that there should be dissatisfaction in the world at all—that temporally or spiritually it should be in a God-made world and a God-made soul? It was unknown in Paradise, in the first beginnings of human life. Disappointment, of which it is so largely bred, had never been experienced. Man had enough in God's gifts for the body, and in God Himself for the soul. It came in with that almost deepest of all mysteries, the permitted work of a tempter and a destroyer, in the fair creation of God. Satan made man dissatisfied with God's ordinance as to the tree of the knowledge of good and evil; and from the moment that dissatisfaction took action, it separated man from God, and became his heritage up to the world's end. The first sin was not a physical act—the putting forth of the hand to take of the fruit of the tree; it was a mental one; and the form that it took was this very dissatisfaction of which we are speaking now. Eve was dissatisfied that she and her husband should not be as gods, knowing good and evil; and out of the mental act of dissatisfaction came the physical act of disobedience.

Now, blessed be God that He has made dissatisfaction the heritage of the human race! There are poisons which can be used as poisons and as medicines too, and dissatisfaction is one of these—it can kill and cure; it can be a dagger in the hand of an assassin, and a lancet in that of a physician; it can be used, according to a man's skill, to kill or cure. With the skill wherewith God works in bringing good out of evil, He has made dissatisfaction—the first element in our soul's death—to become one of the very first elements in our soul's life.

I have said "Blessed be God that dissatisfaction has stuck to us since the fall;" for had it not done so, the consequences would have been fatal. The soul had revolted from God, and now it could be happy and satisfied without God—it could be filled without Him, and would have been independent of Him. If this could have indeed been done, it would have been possible for man successfully to have materialised himself for time; and, so far as I can see, if only he could have got hold of the tree of life, for eternity also. And then, what should we have had—a man, made by God to find the fulness of satisfaction in Him, and in Him alone, able to find it within himself—in other words, to be independent, almost a kind of god himself.

God would not allow this; and though we poor ignorant creatures must not attempt to be wise above that which is written, can we not imagine how terrible an element of misery in the future would be (as a "worm that dieth not, and a fire that is not quenched") the gnawing and burning of a never-satisfied soul? Oh, what would it have been to be under the Law of God, that no man should be allowed to fill up his nature apart from God—and God to have withdrawn Himself and gone?

But now, leaving the world, and the world's people and the world's things, what is this dissatisfaction in God's people, and at the present time of which I speak?

It is dissatisfaction with ourselves, and not with God—not with Christ—God forbid!—but with ourselves, and with ourselves all round, whichever way we look. Look at yourself all round in your spiritual life, and can you find one spot in it upon which you can rest your foot and say, "I am satisfied; here I can rest." I know that many can say, "I can rest in Christ. I have experienced the truth of His promise, 'Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest'"—that is true; but we are still ourselves, and ourselves as inheritors of that first sin of our first parents—of its form, as well as of its punishment.

And so we have often many a weary hour, many a depressing thought, many a spiritual irritation when we see and feel what we are, when we look at our progress, look at our attainments, look at our powers of spiritual realisation, get a vision of where we ought to be, on, on, ever so far on; and we here—only here, on our poor low plane of spiritual life to-day.

Oh, how this sometimes irritates and vexes us! oh, how it depresses us! oh, what heavy sentences

It makes us pass upon ourselves ! and how it makes us for seasons go heavily all the day long ! Perhaps, some sudden temptation reveals to us a weakness that we never suspected, a meanness that we thought ourselves altogether above, a stupidity in something spiritual that we should scarcely have given ourselves credit for—but there it is ; and in our dissatisfaction with ourselves we become bitter against ourselves too.

But the dissatisfaction may not come by this road at all. It may come by a brighter path. It may be that God, by the Holy Spirit, is opening out to you something brighter in spiritual things, which you are not stupid about at all. On the other hand, you are keenly alive to it all, but you cannot work yourself up to do, or to be equal to, the occasion, or to the revelation at all. Just so. "Self" is never equal to anything of this kind ; and it was "Self" that wanted to get "Self" on. Poor "Self"—poor well-intentioned "Self"—poor God-pitied "Self"—that dissatisfaction with "Self" is God's tonic : it drives us to the Holy Spirit ; it takes its place amid the medicines of the Great Physician. God puts it in its place, God bestows upon it its power.

Then you know, brethren, how often you feel deep dissatisfaction with yourselves that you don't love God as you want to do—that, much as you appreciate the Cross, you don't do so as not only you know you ought to do, but as you want to do. Or it is no question of "ought" at all. The hunger of our soul does not say, "I ought to want the Bread of Life," but, "I do want some of the Bread of Life." And these wretched hearts are so languid, we cannot get them up to the mark of even as much as we do know. And surely there are some among us who say, "That's it ; I know it all. I am dissatisfied with myself indeed."

Well, poor soul, do you wish it were otherwise ? The law of God is that man shall be satisfied only with that which is perfect, and now I am talking of "Self." Do you expect perfection anywhere in "Self" ? If you want to be satisfied with "Self" in any form, then you are setting yourself another standard than God's. And so it comes to pass that dissatisfaction must be permanent as long as we are in the flesh ; for the standard must be always in advance not only of the realisation, but, speaking practically, I might almost say of the possible realisation. St. Paul considered not himself to have attained.

So what you are to do is this : You are to accept the situation. You are to see what God meant dissatisfaction to do with you and for you ; and, when you know this, you are to use it as His means—as a factor in the education of your spiritual life.

And what is it to teach you ? What is it to do with you ? It is not to make you querulous, and irritable with yourself, in your spiritual life. Wherever these are, there is weakness ; and there is a miserableness which God never intended to be the portion of His people. It is not to make you a self-tormentor, as it too often does ; but it is to teach you about God—how wonderfully He makes the consequences of sin the medicines for sin. And when consequences of your sin are upon you, instead of making you despair, and think only of God's anger and His justice, it will make you think of His wisdom and His love. You may talk to God and say, "O God ! I am dissatisfied with myself, and I thank Thee that I am."

For, brethren, all this dissatisfaction is a mighty power in the spiritual life. It is intended to drive us to the fulness of Christ. Dissatisfaction, under the instigation of the devil, drove man away and from God. Dissatisfaction, under the working of the Spirit, drives man to God. His soul yearns for fulness ; and, utterly failing to find it in "Self," he is driven to Christ.

"It pleased the Father that in Him should all fulness dwell"—in His presence there is the fulness of joy. All the imagery of Scripture points to dissatisfaction's being destroyed at last ; it is an intruder upon the creation of God, and must be banished out of it, and find itself at last located in hell.

The lying down in green pastures—the hungering and thirsting no more—they are all testimonies that dissatisfaction will eventually be destroyed. God grant that, whenever you look at yourselves while here below, you may always find it. But God give you grace to know its place, and to use its power, for it can lead you—it can drive you—to Christ : the beloved Son in whom the Father finds satisfaction—in whom He is well pleased—in whom, in the midst of it all, you can find peace here, and more than peace hereafter. A glorious future of full content lies before you who are dissatisfied in the present, and "I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with Thy likeness."

ONLY A CHILD!

A STORY IN TWO PARTS. BY MARY E. BELLARS.

CHAPTER I.

"You were infantine
When first I met you; why your hair fell loose
On either side."

BROWNING.

UT, Margaret, is not the whole thing rather absurd? Sybil is a mere child."

Mrs. Lansdale smiled as she made this assertion, and there was a touch of good-humoured contempt in her smile. Was not Margaret Henderson an old maid? And was not that fact in itself a confession of failure—an admission that she had been beaten in the great game of a woman's life?

Did it not argue some folly on her part as well as superior skill in another player? The matron felt scant respect for the spinster's opinion on anything connected with love and matrimony. What could she know of either? Now, Mrs. Lansdale herself had been twice married, and might be supposed to enjoy a double portion of wisdom in consequence. Undoubtedly, a grain of practical experience outweighs tons of theory.

"Providence tempers the wind to the shorn lamb," she continued. "If, for instance, we mothers felt half the tremors of anxiety about our children which you single women seem to expect from us, life would not be worth living. We should be worn to shadows."

She looked singularly unlike a shadow or even a shorn lamb at that moment, being, indeed, as comely a matron as any lover of his kind might wish to see. If he were hypercritical, he might hint that she was too substantial and prosperous-looking, but her forehead was smooth and fair, her rounded cheeks were brightly tinted, her brown hair showed no silver threads, and her undimmed blue eyes dared you at your peril to say she was nearing the forties. She had too much good sense to dress like a girl, but she emulated Dogberry in having everything handsome about her, and was distinctly the most decorative object in her husband's well-appointed establishment.

Margaret Henderson was thirty-eight, and thus had undoubtedly earned the title of "old maid." Time had not dealt so kindly with her as with her companion, for there were lines on the thoughtful brow, under the tender eyes, about the sensitive mouth. One felt that she had lived, and loved, and suffered, while the other had merely flirted, enjoyed, and been given in marriage. But she, too, neglected none of the minor social duties, so that her gown, and all those nameless trifles which help to make the perfection of a toilet, harmonised with the refined dignity of her face and figure. For those who could recognise an element of beauty in sober middle-age, the two women made a pleasing picture; but for those who could not, there was another picture outside. A young girl, with her dark hair floating loose upon her shoulders, was looking up with rapt attention at a man ten or twelve years her senior, who appeared to be discoursing of "moving accidents by flood or field." While her mother and Miss Henderson were comfortably seated in lounging chairs in the shadow of a deep porch, and were able to bestow a little of their attention on the blue sky, the quivering leaves, all the sights and sounds of an exquisitely kept garden, as well as on the subject of their conversation, Sybil was perched on a little camp-stool full in the sunshine, and seemed to see nothing either in earth or heaven but Captain Raleigh's face, and to hear neither the song of bird nor the tum-ti-ti-tum of the school-room piano—only the sound of one voice. If Margaret Henderson had not been an ignorant, inexperienced spinster, she might perhaps have been justified in feeling a little alarm. Then, on the other hand, it was patent that Sybil was, as her mother said, a mere child.

"I hope I may be mistaken," said Miss Henderson, quite aware of her friend's consciousness of superiority, and quite willing to forgive it. "I am very fond of Sybil."

She had a sweet voice, with an undertone of pathos in it, and she had kind eyes, which looked kinder than ever when they rested upon her young favourite.

"It is easy to see that," the mother replied. "Don't you think her very like her father?"

A faint flush rose in Margaret's face. She looked keenly at Mrs. Lansdale, but could detect no change of expression in the pleasant countenance, and there appeared to be no special significance in her remark, so that Miss Henderson quietly replied—

"She is very like him."

"Yes. It is the one thing that makes me just a little doubtful. I flirted when I wore short frocks, and had a proposal before I was seventeen—Sybil was seventeen in March, you know. But it was one man to-day and another to-morrow: I never lost a night's rest in thinking of the best of them. And then I settled down with a husband. But the child is not like me; she is like Gerald; and he was full of fancies. I don't mind saying at this time of day that he passed my comprehension altogether. You would have suited him better, after all."

"Looking up with rapt attention."—p. 624.

"I!" exclaimed her companion, startled. The faint flush rose once more.

"Well, my dear, it would be false delicacy to say you did not like him," observed Mrs. Lansdale, briskly. "Like a sensible woman, you did not break your heart about him; and he is dead and gone now, and I have married again. But Gerald would have proposed to you, if he had not seen me.

I don't quite know how I managed it—but there! I suppose my way with men was different from yours."

Now this last remark was profoundly true, and, for a few moments, Margaret lived through that bygone time again—remembered how her girlish heart had gone out to Gerald Charlton, recalled his chivalrous ways, his manliness, his charm. He had cared for her, she was quite sure; and he had been her hero, her one and only love. But Louisa Aylmer had come between them, and Margaret had had to stand by and betray no pain—no surprise even—while Gerald was first fascinated and then fired to passion by the beauty and the arts of a coquette. Henceforth her life had been pitched in a minor key; the keenest joys, the supreme pains of womanhood had never been hers; yet Major Chorlton's widow only waited the regulation year before she married again; and Margaret Henderson was an old maid—would be an old maid to the end. Life is full of these bewildering complications, only that some of us are too comfortable and too selfish to be affected by them. There is a better chance of our keeping our complexions, and there is less risk of prematurely grey hair, if we can thus ignore them; but it is not given to everyone to be obtuse. Those who are differently constituted may, if they please, get angry with Providence because life is so complex and they cannot find the path out of the maze; they may also visit their grief and their disappointments upon innocent persons who have never injured them, but there is a more excellent way than either of these. Margaret Henderson had chosen that better part. Her sorrow had not embittered her, but had endowed her with a breadth and depth of sympathy which gave her the joy of finding herself a comfort to many stricken hearts; and though this joy is different from the rapture of passion and even from the delight of true love given and returned, it is not to be despised in its way.

"He would have been happier married to you," continued Mrs. Lansdale, with candour. "He was always on stilts himself, and wanted me to be, too. I couldn't stand it, but it would have come quite naturally to you."

"What—to stand upon stilts?" asked Margaret, laughing.

"You know quite well what I mean. He was high-flown, poor fellow, and so are you. Now, Mr. Lansdale and I are on the same level; and that is why we jog along so comfortably together. There is no strain upon either of us."

"But what has all this to do with Sybil?" asked the other, who felt some slight delicacy in discussing the exact level—moral or intellectual—of her host and hostess.

The mother looked at her child once more. Sybil's serious eyes were still fixed upon her companion, and she was drinking-in every word that he uttered. Bewilderment, pleasure, trouble, pleasure again—all these expressions chased each other in turn across the lovely childlike face; but the interest and the faith with which she listened did not slacken for an instant. Margaret took up her parable once more.

"I am afraid he is just the man to make a deep impression upon the heart of a susceptible girl, and that, while he thinks of her as a child, he may unconsciously, and I am sure unwillingly, darken her bright young life."

Mrs. Lansdale laughed.

"For romance," she said, "give me an old maid—I beg your pardon, Margaret. Sybil knows nothing whatever of love and lovers. Her governess—Miss Penefather, you know—was not up to modern requirements in education; but she might be trusted to keep a girl innocent—that is, if such a thing be possible."

"I hope it is, I am sure," said Margaret, in response to this pessimistic afterthought.

"It is very difficult," affirmed Mrs. Lansdale, pensively.

"But if Sybil has never heard the topic of love vulgarised by silly talk, don't you think she is all the more likely to experience the real thing?"

"My dear friend, I don't think at all about it. I only know that Maud and Ethel are both, in their way, older than Sybil, who might be seven instead of seventeen. But if she gets a little moonstruck now, she will speedily come to her senses when she sees Arthur and his lady-love together. Fancy an unformed child rivalling Catherine Neale!"

"There is no question of rivalry between them," said Margaret. "Captain Raleigh is fathoms deep in love, as far as his senses are concerned. I don't quite see what such a heart and mind as his can have in common with Miss Neale."

"It is quite evident that you don't understand men," observed the matron, with a pitying smile. "After all, how should you—an old—a single woman? What on earth can a man's mind have to do with his falling in love? His heart may be a different matter."

"Well," said Margaret, good-humouredly, "I am not so much concerned about Captain Raleigh as about Sybil. I think she is an exception to the general run of girls. I acknowledge that you are often right, Louisa, in your estimate both of men and women; but you are not, I think, invariably right, for you fail to take account of the exceptions."

"For instance?"

"I have often heard you say that no man is ever faithful to his first love——"

"And it is quite true—fortunately for both sides."

"Yet your friend, Mrs. Hill, was telling me yesterday of a man who fell in love when he was quite young with her only daughter. They were separated for years; and in the meantime, Mabel married someone else—a wretched marriage it was—and died. That was between twenty and thirty years ago, yet he has never forgotten her, and he has never married."

"Mr. Ellis is quite an exceptional person," said Mrs. Lansdale.

"Just so. And this morning you declared that a man never married a woman much older than himself, except for money or because he was trapped into doing it."

"Of course," observed Mrs. Lansdale, decidedly.

"I am not advocating such marriages," said Margaret; "but surely you forget the Deanes, whom we both knew so well. She had no money, and it was only because he was so steadfast and so persevering that she consented at last to be his wife. Yet how he loved her—how he loves her, in fact—and how he mourns her!"

"Yes," said Mrs. Lansdale, rather grudgingly; "why, I cannot imagine—she was such an old frump!"

"Ninety-nine girls out of a hundred—perhaps nine hundred and ninety-nine out of a thousand—would forget Captain Raleigh in a week, especially if some other man appeared upon the scene. But I am terribly afraid that Sybil will not—in fact, that she is one of the exceptions."

At this point the conversation was interrupted by the arrival of afternoon tea. The table, with all its accompaniments of pretty china and quaint old silver, was set in the shadow of the porch.

"Sybil!" said her mother, very distinctly.

The girl started, and looked round. Captain Raleigh rose.

The spell was hopelessly broken.

"Come, my dear, make yourself useful, and give us some tea.—I think, Arthur, you at least must be thirsty, for you seem to have been making quite an oration. Are you often taken that way?"

"I don't often get the chance of such a charmingly sympathetic listener," replied the young officer. "Sybil—you know you said I might call you Sybil—I hope I have not been boring you unmercifully in the pleasure of hearing myself talk?"

"Boring me!" she repeated, incredulously.

Judging by the smile that lighted up the girlish face, and by the expression of the soft grey eyes, Sybil had certainly not been bored, any more than Calypso was bored when Telemachus related his adventures, or Dido as she listened to the tale of the pious Aeneas.

"Well, soon you will have a still more sympathetic confidante," suggested Mrs. Lansdale. "Don't you begin to feel awfully impatient?"

"I do, indeed," he replied. His eyes glowed as he spoke, and his colour rose. "If Sybil had not taken compassion on me this afternoon, and many afternoons, I think I should have gone mad."

"What!—are you so far gone as all that? See, you have frightened the child: she is turning quite pale.—Don't be alarmed, my dear; he is harmless, although a lunatic for the time being."

"What do you mean?" demanded Sybil.

"This is her first experience of the duplicity of your sex," said Mrs. Lansdale, in the same tone of airy banter.—"Sybil, my love, I have no doubt that he has told you many interesting stories during your short acquaintance with him; but the most interesting of all he has kept to himself."

"Have you?" asked the girl, shyly.

A flood of rosy colour stained her cheeks as she spoke.

"Yes, my little friend," answered Captain Raleigh very gently; "but only because the climax of it had not been reached. You will see the heroine to-night."

"Miss Neale is coming; is she the heroine?" asked Sybil, wondering why she had such odd sensations. She had felt perfectly well a few moments ago.

"Yes, she is the heroine, though it must not be spoken of except at Brockhurst. When the time for your story comes, Sybil, I hope you may have a better fellow for its hero."

"Oh, yes, I'm coming, Miss Smythe."—p. 629.

Margaret Henderson, for once, was remarkably clumsy. How it came to pass that she, with all her grace and self-possession, should be so awkward as to pour a cup of tea over her pretty gown, no one could imagine; but she declared she should have to retire to remedy the damage, and she asked Sybil to help her. Then she sent her on some small errand, and the girl did not return for a minute or two. When she reappeared in Margaret's dressing-room, she looked very pale, and there were dark shadows under her eyes.

"Is Captain Raleigh going to marry Miss Neale?" she said timidly.

"I believe they are engaged; but only a few persons are to know it at present. He was very much attracted by her when they were both staying with your Aunt Mary in the winter. Then, I did not think she would accept him. Sit down on this couch by me, love. You are quite pale with the heat: you should not sit in the sun, Sybil dear."

"Why did you not think she would accept him?" persisted the girl, passively receiving her kind friend's caresses.

"You are growing into a woman now," said Margaret thoughtfully, "yet I do not like to be the first to sow the seeds of distrust in your dear little soul. But you will see—you cannot help seeing—that Catherine Neale is a very worldly girl, as well as a very beautiful one. There was another man staying in the house at the same time, whom I think she would have preferred to marry."

"Then why did she accept Captain Raleigh?"

"Ah, Sybil darling," said Miss Henderson tenderly, "love is the most beautiful thing in the world, but fashionable people do not always take it into account. They think more of money, or rank, or a good position in society. I don't fancy Miss Neale loved either of those men. Yet it is an awful thing for a woman to marry without love."

"People who love are not always able to marry," said Sybil, in a low voice.

"No, that is true; but there is nothing to be ashamed of in love, even if it is not returned. There is something to be terribly ashamed of when we are false to the love we feel—when we marry one man and care for another all the time."

"Supposing the—person—marries someone else?"

"Then we must not allow our disappointment to spoil our lives, but pray and strive to forget and forgive it. In doing our best to brighten others, we gain happiness for ourselves; and sometimes, indeed, we find that we have been mistaken, and that what we took to be love was only a girlish fancy. We meet the real man later, and become happy wives and mothers."

"Miss Henderson, I wish you would tell me—don't, don't think me impertinent—but have you ever cared for anyone?" asked Sybil, gazing at the old maid with Gerald Chorlton's eyes, and speaking with strange echoes of his manly tones in her girlish voice.

"Yes, dear," replied Margaret steadily; "and I would not choose to lose that experience, in spite of the pain I suffered. For I did suffer, Sybil."

Was she wise in thus dealing with Gerald Chorlton's daughter? Would the child's life have shaped itself differently, if instead of treating her feeling for Captain Raleigh as a sacred thing, Margaret had laughed at it as an idle fancy?

"'Tis an awkward thing to play with souls," declares Browning.

Mrs. Lansdale considered Sybil a mere child, and might have teased her until she had grown ashamed of her girlish infatuation and speedily forgotten it; but she fell into the hands of a romantic old maid.

CHAPTER II.

"Love's a virtue for heroes!—as white as the snow on high hills,

And immortal as every great soul is that struggles, endures, and fulfils."

E. B. BROWNING.

CATHERINE NEALE was undoubtedly a very beautiful and a very fascinating woman. It is true that she was not a universal favourite, even with men; but when she wished to charm—which was not always the case—she usually succeeded, and more than succeeded. When she stayed down in Dorsetshire with Lady Mary Chorlton, she made the tactical mistake of encouraging two men at once. That particular manœuvre is sometimes crowned with success; in this instance it failed ignominiously. Catherine, like the British army, admitted no defeat, but it was well understood that she had done her best to marry Sir Rupert Silchester, and that the gentleman in question had availed himself of that discretion which is the better part of valour. In fact, he had retreated. In those days, the Dark Continent was not so fashionable as it is now, and he had never heard, for instance, of the gruesome forest so admirably described by Mr. Stanley. Thus, he did not try what dwarfs and poisoned arrows could do to make him forget the exquisite colouring and perfect figure of Catherine Neale, but with one or two other choice spirits set out to see life in Australia, and left a clear field for one who was less worldly-wise and much more in love than himself. Almost immediately after his departure it was whispered that Miss Neale had accepted Captain Raleigh. It was only a whisper—no formal announcement was made—but it silenced unpleasant remarks, and the lady seemed so well satisfied that the gossips were puzzled.

Perhaps, after all, Sir Rupert had an exaggerated idea of his own value. Perhaps Miss Neale was not so worldly as people thought. So society babbled, not knowing, and not really caring to know, the truth.

Mrs. Lansdale knew, but then she could scarcely be said to be in society at all, and she lived near Mirkchester, where Captain Raleigh's regiment was stationed.

It was convenient for the fashionable beauty to pay her a visit. Catherine arrived just in time to dress, and, naturally, Arthur dined at Brockhurst, too. Sybil, with her waving hair decorously twisted round her pretty head, and looking sweet and fresh in her white evening gown, watched them with amazement. It was hard to recognise her friend of that afternoon in the passionate lover leaning over Miss Neale's chair. He had eyes only for Catherine; he murmured tender words into her delicate ear; he touched her hand, and his own trembled; he caught an end of floating drapery and raised it furtively to his lips. Sybil tried to look in another direction, but she seemed to see these little details wherever she turned. And the languid beauty, who was accepting each evidence of passion with such superb indifference, suddenly noted the yearning grey eyes, and guessed the state of affairs at once.

Life became interesting to Catherine once more, for here was a rival. A poor little rival, truly—a girl of seventeen, who had not sense enough to know her own charms, or wit enough to make the most of them—but, at least, a rival who could feel. The red lips parted into a slow, seductive smile, and Catherine glanced at her lover.

"Tell me," she said, "have you been amusing yourself by making love to that pretty girl? She looks very forlorn. Ah, you men!"

"Making love!" he repeated. "I never did that in my life except to you, my queen."

"I can believe a great deal," she said, meeting his ardent gaze with eyes that thrilled every nerve. "I repeat that I can believe a good deal, Arthur; but I cannot quite believe that, at your age, I am your first love."

"Yet it is as true as that heaven is above us."

"Ah, but who knows that much? Heaven hasn't been discovered yet," put in a voice that was distinctly and dreadfully audible in every part of the room.

Maud and Ethel Lansdale had come down with their governess into the drawing-room; and, as this was the first opportunity they had ever had of studying the manners and customs of a pair of lovers, they were disposed to make the most of it. They had already a theoretical knowledge of the subject—perhaps not of the most edifying description—for Miss Penfeather's successor made up for the purity of her Parisian accent by being an industrious student of French novels, and for her excellent German and fine music by having no moral principle to speak of.

On this particular evening, while she had been interpreting Liszt and Chopin on the grand piano, Maud had pretended to read; but Ethel, with a strategical skill which, under other circumstances, might have made her a second Von Moltke, had so managed matters that not one of Arthur's tender whispers or Catherine's languid replies had escaped her sharp little ears.

But though an enfant terrible, and certainly no respecter of persons, she had one strong and genuine attachment. She loved her step-sister with all the force of her wilful and tenacious nature, and, as she did not approve of Miss Neale's remark about her dear Sybil, she took prompt measures for revenge. It could not be very agreeable for this pair of turtle-doves to realise that all their billings and cooings had been overheard, and would probably be reproduced before a schoolroom audience.

"You have never been to heaven," she continued, calmly, taking no notice of her mother's horror-stricken exclamation of "Ethel!"—"and very likely you will never go there. Oh, yes, I am coming, Miss Smythe," she said, leaving her corner and preceding the outraged governess to the door.

She had had no scruple in listening to a conversation not meant for her ears, and now she felt no repentance whatever. She was not even afraid of unpleasant consequences, feeling herself quite a match for Miss Smythe, and knowing that Mrs. Lansdale shrank from crossing swords with her strong-willed and original little daughter.

"I don't like Miss Neale," she told Sybil the next day. "No, I won't tell you why, but I don't like her. Yes, she is pretty, I daresay."

"Why, she is the beauty of the season," declared Maud. "Miss Smythe says all the men are wild about her, and that she dresses divinely."

"Oh, bosh! Who cares what she says? I would rather have Sybil's face any day than hers," said the child, climbing upon her sister's lap. "You have such dear little talking eyes, Sybil; one can look, and look, and look, and never see the bottom of them; they are like deep wells. And your hair is so pretty; you put it on the top of your head, now. You are quite grown-up—why do you look grown-up all at once, I wonder?"

Why, indeed? Ethel was not the only person who noted a change in Sybil—very slight, very subtle, but still a change. Her mother acknowledged to Miss Henderson that perhaps they had been rather foolish in allowing her to see so much of Captain Raleigh. "But, of course, the child will soon get over it, and feel very much ashamed of herself for being so silly," Mrs. Lansdale added. Margaret's heart ached with sympathy as she recognised that Sybil was succeeding to that heritage of pain to which we are all born, and which has come down to us from the pair who learned the knowledge of good and evil long, long ago. A new expression had crept into her grey eyes: she was no longer a mere child. The innocent unconsciousness of yesterday had fled for ever. She, too, had stepped out of Eden, having tasted the fatal fruit.

Arthur noticed no change in his little friend; but at that time he noticed nothing except what had reference to Catherine. He was not naturally selfish—indeed, he was usually chivalrously mindful of the feelings of others—but he was a man, and a man in love, and the woman who had inspired him with passion took very good care to keep it at fever-heat. She knew how to hold her lover in trembling expectation; she enjoyed seeing this brave man unnerved—nay, almost beside himself—in her presence. Perhaps

"So he is; but then he was not a passionate lover. He was calm and prosaic, and talked about settlements. He has been none the less satisfactory on that account."

"The barometer has been at 'Set Fair' since your wedding-day?"

"Do let us be sensible," she said.—p. 631.

she enjoyed Sybil's shocked and bewildered eyes as well.

"Upon my word," Mrs. Lansdale remarked one day, "I never thought Arthur would be quite so foolish. He was such an ultra-sensible young man at one time."

"But we have changed all that," murmured Miss Neale, idly.

"We have, indeed. Take care, Catherine; the matrimonial day of reckoning will come. These passionate lovers are apt to be exacting husbands."

"I am sure you don't speak from experience. Mr. Lansdale strikes me as being a model spouse."

"Quite so," said Mrs. Lansdale; "but I had my share of 'Stormy' and 'Change' with Major Chorlton; and Arthur always reminds me a little of my first husband. He will expect a great deal."

"Then he will be disappointed," replied Miss Neale with composure.

"Perhaps so; but, in that case, so will you. Don't deceive yourself, Catherine; men are never uncomfortable alone; they take very good care to have a companion in misfortune."

"What a cynical description of married life! Is it worth while going through so much to gain so little, I wonder? Sometimes I fancy it is better to be an old maid, like your friend Miss Henderson."

"Women such as you are never old maids," affirmed Mrs. Lansdale; "but I am not sure, after all, whether Arthur will be your husband."

"Neither am I," replied Miss Neale, indifferently.

"My dear girl, don't talk in that way," remonstrated her hostess.

"I only agreed with you, you know."

"Yes; but the poor fellow would lose his senses!"

"Not at all. Men don't do that nowadays. He would probably console himself with a well-jointed widow. What a pretty girl Sybil is! When will she come out?"

The triumphant beauty smiled as she asked the question.

"Poor child!" said Mrs. Lansdale, uneasily.

"But why 'poor child'?"

"Well," replied the mother, with a little embarrassment, "she seems rather out of health and spirits—I don't quite know what to do for her. I expect she has hardly done growing," she added, in answer to the amusement visible in Miss Neale's dark eyes. "Margaret Henderson wants to take her abroad; she thinks that will do her good; and it may be very much to Sybil's advantage to please Margaret."

"Miss Henderson may marry yet," suggested Catherine. "She is passée, of course; but while there is life, there is hope."

"It is not very likely. She had a disappointment long ago."

"My dear Mrs. Lansdale, don't all women have repeated disappointments? And does that ever prevent them from taking advantage of a good settlement?"

"But Margaret is different from most women. My husband was the man she cared for," added Mrs. Lansdale, in a confidential whisper.

"I am surprised! I should have thought Mr. Lansdale the last man in the world to have been a gay deceiver."

"But I mean my first husband—Sybil's father, you know," said the other, laughing. "And she is so like him—poor Gerald!"

"Ah, that explains a good deal," remarked Catherine; "I hope Sybil may never have a disappointment. And her friend proposes that she should travel until she has—done growing, and has recovered her health and spirits?"

"It will be an education for her to be with a cultivated, good woman like Miss Henderson," said Mrs. Lansdale, feeling, with Ethel, that she could not endure Catherine Neale. "And next year her aunt—Lady Mary—has undertaken to present her and take her out."

"Lady Mary is awfully nice," said Miss Neale, pensively. "I could not wish for a better chapron myself. How I enjoyed my stay at her place!"

"Yes; Sir Rupert Silchester was there. I wonder you allowed him to go off as he did, Catherine."

Mrs. Lansdale's spirits rose as she thus carried the war into the enemy's country.

"He may not stay in Australia for ever," said the other, calmly.

"Perhaps he will bring a bride from the bush."

"Perhaps he will. In the meantime, here comes Arthur, and with gloom written on his countenance. What is the matter, I wonder? I can guess: his regiment is ordered to India at last."

Miss Neale proved to be a true prophet. The trouble on Arthur's face meant that he wished to induce her to consent to a speedy marriage, and that he felt more than doubtful about the result of his pleading. Mrs. Lansdale, with commendable attention to danger-signals, speedily remembered some business elsewhere, and left the pair to fight their own battles. Catherine received her lover's greeting before his news, and it was with her hand in his and with his persuasive, ardent gaze fixed upon her beautiful eyes, that he said—

"We have our orders, my darling."

"Oh, Arthur!"

After all, she was a woman, and he was her lover. She was not capable of love in the real sense of the word; she did not know anything of that pure, intense emotion, which, when it takes possession of the human heart, impels it to pour out all its treasures—nay, its very self—ungrudgingly before the loved one. But she liked Arthur Raleigh better than any man she had ever known; she admired him, and was proud of him. She could not help being stirred by his passionate affection and his caresses—Nature exacted so much—and for a few moments the woman of society was lost in the creature of impulse, very much as a milkmaid might have been. Only the craving for a title, family diamonds, and a position in a "smart" set is apt to put a drag upon the more primitive emotions, and it came to pass that Arthur's tenderness and devotion palled upon Catherine at last.

"Do let us be sensible," she said suddenly. "Sit down there, opposite to me, and we will talk the thing over like rational creatures."

"It is so much more delightful to be irrational," he said, with a sigh, as he prepared to obey her commands.

"But it is excessively inconvenient. For instance, our foolishness seems to make you forget that our engagement was to be a long one."

"But, love, that was only because you were not quite sure of yourself."

"And do you think I am sure of myself now?"

Considering all that had passed a few moments ago, it was not unnatural that Arthur should think so; but he could scarcely tell her that. He only said, "I hoped you were."

"Arthur dear, it would not be right for me to marry you yet," she declared. "It sounds dreadful, I know; but I am not sure of myself. I am of the world, worldly, as I told you when you proposed to me."

She held out her hand, and when he had taken it and was looking reproachfully into her face, she continued—

"I might, if I married you now, before I had time to adjust myself to altered circumstances, regret that I had ever met you. You know, dear, you are not a very good match."

She smiled charmingly as she spoke, and Arthur ventured to take his former seat by her side.

"I know I am not, my darling," he said, humbly.

"I am quite sure I should not make you a good wife now," she affirmed, "and I want to be a very good wife. Don't you know that when you are gone and I am left alone——" Here Catherine found the pathos of the situation too much for her. Two genuine tears gathered in her beautiful eyes, trembled on her long lashes, and fell on her delicate cheeks. Arthur had to remove them by a process peculiar to lovers before she could falter—"When I am left alone to imagine all sorts of dreadful things, to fear the changes and chances of life out there, to wonder whether anyone else——"

"Catherine!"

"It does occur occasionally, dear, though I don't think it will with you—I have implicit faith in you. Don't you see, though, that naturally, you will always be in my thoughts, that everything will seem dreary while you are away, and that I shall long intensely for your return? I shall forget my worldliness, though I am indeed very worldly. I have always been taught to make the most of myself, and to secure, if possible, a good position by marriage."

For one who wishes to deceive, it is sometimes politic to speak the exact truth. Perhaps Catherine did not wish to deceive, but she was not acting straightforwardly, and knew it. Her avowal of worldliness was such an accurate description of the situation that, naturally, Arthur did not believe a word of it. He only admired the sensitive conscience which dictated the self-accusation, and was more in love than ever.

"I know," he said, "that I am wholly unworthy of you."

Catherine had the grace to blush as she replied—

"No, the unworthiness is on my side. You think only of love, and I believe you would cheerfully lay down your life for my sake. But I have been brought up in a different school. Wait for a little while, Arthur; I believe I shall only be too ready to marry you when you claim me after a short absence—you will be disgusted with my forwardness, instead of looking at me reproachfully as you do now."

He shook his head incredulously, but she went on—"You would be so pained if I began to regret——"

"I should indeed!"

"And I might, you know, if I were not allowed a little time in which to realise how necessary you were to my happiness."

Of course he gave in. Perhaps Delilah is as dangerous now as she was in the days of the Judges, and doubly dangerous, if she can manage to deceive herself as well as Samson. Catherine felt absolutely certain that she meant to be faithful to the lover whom she was dooming to a long probation. Not even the Silchester diamonds should tempt her to forget Arthur Raleigh.

So in due time he sailed to the mysterious East. In his grief at leaving his beautiful betrothed, it did not occur to him to think of a girlish face, framed in masses of waving hair—the face of Sybil Chorlton. But she remembered, though she was "only a child."

THE CAT THAT PREACHED A SERMON.

A TALK TO YOUNG PEOPLE.

BY THE REV. J. TELFORD, B.A.

Did any of you boys and girls ever hear of a cat that preached a sermon? It may seem rather strange at first; but we have a lovely black-and-white Manx, that once taught us all a good lesson. He came to us at first in great distress. Our neighbours had gone away, and left the poor fellow without a home. He was so lonely and so affectionate that he soon won our hearts. A saucerful of milk and a bone were ready for him when he came to ask for them; thus we became friends, and the stray cat found his way to our hearthrug, and was soon one of the happiest and most contented members of the family. We christened him Paws, and had many a laugh over his quaint ways. He used to jump up against the handle of the door when he wanted to get in, and generally came up to our bedroom in the morning to tell us that he was eager for breakfast. When we moved to the other side of London, Paws was safely put in a basket, and soon settled down happily in his new home. He sniffed all round the room, till at last he took stock of his new surroundings. Then he was perfectly content.

One day Paws got into the dust-bin. He had found some mouldy bone there a little while before, and had enjoyed an unexpected feast. The truth must be told even about those we love; and the fact is, Mr. Paws was rather too fond of a good feed. He sometimes reminded us of the prayer that we heard one Christmas: "Lord, have mercy upon those whose God is their belly at this time." He did not know better, but his failing got him into trouble.

We had had a deluge of rain, and a little pool of water was standing in front of the kitchen door, so that when our maid came out with a shovelful of ashes and refuse to throw into the dust-bin, she did not see puss groping after a bone. Down went the ashes. There was a pitiful little cry, and out sprang Mr. Paws. The ashes were hot, and the whole shower of refuse had fallen on the cat. It was really a grotesque sight. The family pet, that prided himself on his clean and glossy coat, was all covered with ashes and smuts, which turned him into a disreputable-looking object indeed. The maid was quite startled to see such a woebegone creature emerge from the dust-bin. She seized a duster, and began to groom puss vigorously. The worst of the dirt was wiped off, but it was long before Paws would set to work to clean himself. He seemed as if he could not bear to lick his fur, and it was three or four days before he gathered courage to wash his face and become a respectable and creditable cat once more.

Thus Paws preached his sermon. Like a good old-fashioned homily, it had three points. It said as plain as deeds could speak: "Don't get into a dust-bin, for you may find a nasty shower-bath poured down on your head, and it will be many a day before you get over that unhappy experience." Hosts of boys and girls, grown-up men and women, would be wiser and happier if they would ponder that sermon. Low tastes lead us into nasty places. They take people to music-halls and race-courses; they make them mix with low companions; they lead them to read books that pander to the lowest passions. Are those who indulge such tastes any wiser or more refined than the cat that got into the dust-bin? Boys or girls that have been taught to pray, to read the Bible, to attend Sunday-school, will find that if they are to keep out of mischief they must not allow what Browning called "the ape and tiger" within their breast to rule. "Keep out of the dust-bin," said Mr. Paws, as he urged us to profit by the sharp lesson he had learned.

Many a foolish youth goes there, little dreaming what is in store. Our cat would not have ventured into the dust-bin had he dreamed what was coming. You would have laughed if you had seen his plight as he emerged from the depths; but, happily, he was not hurt, though he was all stained and grimy. I have seen boys and girls get out of the dust-bin. Perhaps they ran away from home to escape its restraints and to indulge their own low tastes, and came back again tattered and spattered, without a penny in their pockets, a far more pitiful sight than the cat who sprang with such eagerness from the dust-bin. They little thought where their evil hearts would lead them. We cannot always see the stain which is made on character by bad books and bad company, but they leave a nasty taste in the mouth, a black scar on the life. People say, "I will only stay a minute," but they sit down and forget where they are. They think, "I am no weakling; I can take care of myself," but almost before they know, the shower of filth has fallen on them.

But perhaps the best part of the sermon preached by Paws was the last. He had been "overtaken in a fault," but how disgusted he was with the result! He had scarcely any patience with himself; he could not bear to lick his fur. It brought back the memory of his fault, and filled him with disgust and shame. He went about hanging down his head, and saying in every gesture, "How sorry I am that my low tastes led me so far astray." That sorrow is not always a sign of better feeling. There are people on whom you can see the marks of the dust-bin. They are out at elbows, tattered and dirty, with shaking hand and a furtive look, which tell you plainly that they have been there, and will soon be there again. They don't think of their faults and sins; they only bear a grudge against Society, and complain that they have been badly served by others. If you could go, as I have gone, to the "Supper for the Criminal Classes," which is held every winter by the St. Giles' Christian Mission, and could talk with the men, you would find out how some of them gloss over their faults. They have been unfortunate, not guilty of theft or forgery. Things have gone hard with them. They are angry with Society, not with themselves. When I heard a man talk like that, I knew he would soon be in the dust-bin again. His heart was yet hardened; his fellows who had truly repented did not cloak their faults, but spoke of God's grace and forgiveness. The real penitent has one voice of humble confession: "Mine iniquities have taken hold upon me so that I cannot look up; they are more than the hairs of my head; therefore my heart faileth me." His helplessness makes him cry: "Be pleased, O Lord, to deliver me; O Lord, make haste to help me!" That is the spirit which God loves to see. We may get into trouble through sin, but if we loathe the sin and turn to our Father for pardon and cleansing, we shall not come in vain. Grace can wash away all our stains. David had learnt that secret when he prayed: "Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean; wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow." We who have come "to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel," have a fountain opened where every stain may be washed away. Let us come for Christ's pardon and grace. Then when we have found it, let us keep the devil's fingers off our lives. "He that is begotten of God keepeth himself, and that wicked one toucheth him not." Shun every place, every thought, every book, every companion, that would leave a stain upon your lives. We are all weak, but our Saviour is mighty, and will surely give us the victory if we humbly trust in Him.

MRS. GLADSTONE AND CONVALESCENT HOMES.

N a day or two you must leave the hospital!"

"Oh, dear! must I really? I don't feel near well enough yet."

"Unfortunately there are so many sufferers waiting to come in; and they are much worse than you."

The patient sighed heavily.

"I shall soon be ill again if I go back to that stived-up room," she murmured. "I don't feel near strong enough for that yet; and all the worrit o' the fam'ly on the top of it."

"Yes, it is bad for you," replied the doctor thoughtfully. "I do not think you are really well enough for that. But unfortunately we cannot keep you here. Try and get as well as you can by the time you leave."

And he passed on to another patient, who needed his attention more.

"Why, you are not looking quite so well this morning," said a cheery voice to the woman he had just left. "What is the matter?"

"The doctor says I must leave very soon, and I don't feel well enough just yet. But there are many worse, he says, waiting to come in."

"Cannot you go for a week or a fortnight to the seaside or to a healthy farmhouse in the country?"

The poor patient smiled—a wan, weary smile, like sickly sunlight on a dull December day.

"You might as well ask me if I couldn't go to the moon, ma'am; we've scarce money enough to buy bread, let alone excursions."

"Well, well! we must see what can be done."

Half an hour later, the lady visitor was talking to the doctor on the subject.

"Yes," said he, "there is no doubt a great need for what may be called Convalescent Hospitals—places where patients, not sufficiently recovered to return to their homes and to their usual occupations, may find rest and suitable treatment. I fear," he added, "that many of our patients die on being discharged from our hospital and returning to their own unwholesome dwellings. I know that such has been the case in some instances."

"In the meantime, we must see what can be done for this poor woman—Mrs. Peters, I think her name is."

"And there is another—Mrs. James—in the same position. She needs sorely to go to a Convalescent Home or Hospital—if we had one."

And the lady went thoughtfully away.

In due time she arranged that poor Mrs. Peters should find a resting-place for a fortnight or so by the seaside, to recruit her health and complete her cure. But on the same day that she returned to her home, bright and happy, with healthy cheeks and active step, surrounded by her family carrying from the railway station bundles of luggage, tied up in red-and-white pocket-handkerchiefs, that same day another and quite a different little party set forth from the same court. It was the funeral of her fellow-patient. She had not been sent away to complete her recovery.

It was in some such scenes as these, we imagine, that Mrs. Gladstone's well-known Convalescent Home at Woodford had its origin nigh thirty years ago.

At that time such institutions were almost unknown. One at Walton-on-Thames, with branches for children at Mitcham and Hendon, had been established in 1840, but what were these for the needs of the London hospitals? Mrs. Gladstone, therefore, assisted by Miss Catherine Marsh, proceeded to found a new establishment.

Its origin was, as the lady herself has declared, in the cholera epidemic of 1866. Mrs. Gladstone was then visiting the wards of the London Hospital, and met there Dr. (afterwards Sir Andrew) Clark as the senior physician of the hospital.

She was much struck by his great ability and his tenderness for the sick; and when she determined to found the Woodford Home, Dr. Clark rendered her invaluable assistance. He gave much time and attention to the scheme, and prepared the rules for its management which have been in force ever since.

The meeting with Dr. Clark at the London Hospital ripened into a great friendship, and the doctor became the highly valued friend and physician of Mr. and Mrs. Gladstone.

That lady's Convalescent Home is, and has been, for the service of the poor, more particularly of East London; and convalescents from their own homes, as well as from hospitals, are received free of cost. It is, of course, quite unsectarian; and there are, moreover, no privileged tickets. The cases of admission are determined each on its own merits. The expenditure amounts to about £1,200 to £1,300 per annum, while the patients admitted number nearly a thousand in the year.

Since then the numbers of Convalescent Homes have largely increased. Their beneficence must be very great. Not only do they relieve the pressure on the hospitals themselves, but they afford means whereby, for a small fee, or gratuitously, the victory over disease may be decisively won; and as Mrs. Gladstone's Home was one of the earliest, that lady may be regarded as one of the pioneers in the movement of founding these important institutions.

SHORT ARROWS.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

MISTAKEN JUDGMENTS.

HE world is full of mistaken judgments, and a great deal of mischief have they done. If the King of Prussia had acted on his mistaken judgment on one occasion, he would in all probability never have been Emperor of Germany. He used to tell the following story against himself. One day amongst his troops he saw an untidy-looking lieutenant. "Who is that man?" he asked. "An officer," he was told, "who has just left the Danish service, and joined the Prussian."—"That man will never get on in the army," said the monarch; and he used to add, in telling the story, "the man was Moltke! and my judgment of him gives you the measure of my insight." Sometimes, as in this instance, we judge by appearances only; and form a very important judgment on very slender grounds. The greatest worth and talent are often hidden under a very unprepossessing exterior. Thanks be to God that He does not judge by appearances only, but judges righteous judgment. He knows what is really in man. He makes no mistakes. But when we have been hasty and wrong, the Emperor sets us the good example of acknowledging our mistake.

"YOU WON'T BE ALONE."

A railway man was appointed signalman in a box with seventy cranks. The man was afraid of taking the care of the lives of hundreds of travellers, and told a friend that he thought he would decline the post. The friend answered him in one sentence: "My good fellow, you won't be alone." The meaning of the few words was understood, and comforted the man's mind. Our Lord has promised to be always present wherever two or three of His faithful servants meet together to pray; but He is also present when they work, even though the work be the ordinary so-called secular work of the week. One night, when their Master was absent, the disciples went out fishing, but they caught nothing. The next morning, when Jesus came to them and told them to put down a net, they were not able to draw it for the multitude of fishes. So it is that in the ordinary business of life we are not alone, and that the best partner we can have in it is Jesus Christ.

HAY-MAKING.

To those who have to work all day in the heat of the sun the joy of hay-making is not so very apparent, but there is no doubt that amateur hay-makers get a great deal of fun out of it. Young people may bury themselves in the hay, but thoughts of sickness and death are far from them. They throw away every worry and anxiety as easily as they do the hay. And they are quite right to make hay when the sun shines, for their days of darkness may be many; and to store up the sunshine of innocent happiness in youth is to prepare for the cheerful discharge of duty in after-life.

EATING MUD.

Mr. Douglas Hooper, in his account of missionary work in Eastern Equatorial Africa, mentions one curious custom which seems to have as strange a moral effect as opium smoking, namely "eating mud." One woman had eaten away the whole side of her house. She had often tried unsuccessfully to break herself of the bad habit, but now, by claiming the strength of the Lord, she has overcome it, and her husband made her plaster the whole side of the house which had been eaten away. "Just fancy," said Mr. Hooper, "the devil being able to keep anyone from the joy of the Lord by the love of eating mud! But it is a fact." Surely it is not only in far-off East Africa that we find the devil doing this; the Gospel has as great hindrances here as it has there, and as strange. It is the merest trifles that are keeping some men from Christ—perhaps just some one root of bitterness, which, springing up, defiles them: some one thing, and that a miserable one, which they will not give up for Christ. We cannot tell what may be another's hindrance. What is abominable to me may be delightful to another, and so be his hinderer. In truth, Satan descends to any instrumentality, no matter how base or low, if only he can by it keep a man from Christ. And let us remember that "mud" may be eaten in many different ways. There is social mud, and mercantile mud, and religious mud, and family mud—the mud is to be found in all conditions of life. "He feedeth on ashes," says the prophet. The Persians describe a man who has said or done wrong as "a man who has eaten much dirt." One of the strangest revelations of hereafter will be the miserableness of much that kept men from Christ.

"TO WIND-UP HIS AFFAIRS."

"Where is your husband?" I asked a lady friend of mine, the wife of a lawyer. "He has been sent for," she replied, "by Mr.—" (a very rich man), "who cannot live more than two or three days, to wind-up his affairs." These words, "to wind-up his affairs," made me think. Even our temporal affairs cannot be properly wound up in the last day or two of life if they have been previously kept in a disorderly condition. And what shall we say of the affairs of the soul, of the things that do not remain behind in this world, but which enter into that which is beyond?

THE WINDOW-PANE AND THE BURNING-GLASS.

A lens chanced to lie on a window-sill, and was thus addressed by the glass in the window: "Friend, I notice that Providence has dealt with us in most unequal fashion. You have a power I often envy, of transforming light, which passes through you, into heat, so that things whereon it falls are set on fire."—"Truly," said the lens, "this is a great power: and it lies in concentrating the rays of the sun into a focus. Light passing through you is diffused; and you are old enough to know that in every grade of being there can exist no power of any kind without a corresponding concentration of force."—"It is hard," continued the window-pane, "to possess only mediocre gifts."—"Surely you forget," answered the lens, "that objects seen through me are altered and distorted in shape. Through you the form of every object appears as it is. You have an advantage I lack, since you must also know that a great power like mine carries with it the risk of making all else in Nature seem awry." Moral.—The enthusiast is apt to become the victim of his own enthusiasm.

"IT'S TOO FINE A DAY."

On the sands at a popular seaside place the child of a poor woman who had been brought by his mother a long journey in a tiresome excursion train began to cry. The child cried because he was tired, but his mother, as is the unfortunate way with such mothers, beat him. This increased the volume of sound proceeding from the boy, and attracted the attention of another boy two or three years older, the son of a friend of the writer. Thereupon this rather precocious youngster went up to the child of the poor woman and said: "Little boy, why do you cry? It's too fine a day." The day was beautiful, and the sea and everything else looked its best; so my little philosophic friend thought that when there were so many things to enjoy, it was a pity to allow ill-humour to spoil sport. Shall we be less wise than this child? Some little vexation causes us to grumble, which is grown-up crying. Well, but God has smiled upon us in many blessings. We are in health, and the flowers in beauty, and the birds in song, and altogether the day is too fine for us to cry.

"REMEMBER."

As King Charles the First knelt down upon the scaffold at Whitehall and placed his head upon the block, he uttered one last word to Bishop Juxon, who was standing by his side. That word was "Remember." Another King, not a poor weak one like Charles, but the King of Kings and Head of the human race, was executed. Those who have with the true eye of faith looked upon His Cross can never fail to remember the message it proclaims.

TRUE RICHES.

We know a young woman who, though almost totally deaf and blind, yet, by her knitting, used to be able to support herself, and help to support her widowed mother. Music was her great pleasure, and though she could not hear the choir, yet she managed to act as organist in a church. One evening when coming to service, the poor blind girl was knocked down and nearly killed by a careless boy riding along the road. In the hospital to which she was carried, her chief sorrow seemed to be that she was more of a trouble to her nurses on account of her deafness than were the other patients. For the rest, she was always rejoicing, even when in great pain. "God is so good. He has done this for the best," she used constantly to say. As we left the hospital after visiting her, a string of carriages swept gaily past from some afternoon party. "Ah!" we thought, "One would rather be Jessie than any one of these smart people. Sorely afflicted in body she may be, and poor in this world's goods, but God has given her the true riches of a thankful, happy heart."

A DESERT WONDERLAND.

The land of Sin may seem to be a paradise, but it is in truth a desert—and none the less a desert because it can show what seems beautiful. It is like rounded and beautifully polished. The northern part of the desert is paved with the most wonderful pebbles in the world; the most skilful mosaic-worker could not imitate it. These pebbles are polished brilliantly as if with oil. The whole surface of the plain is a combination of myriads of reflectors, each pebble being so highly polished by the loose sand. But horned toads and rattlesnakes abound there, and scorpions and other unpleasant things; but no vegetation is to be found except a few thorny cacti, and mosquito bushes. Surely, this place is an apt

THE MOUNT OF OLIVES AS IT IS AT THE PRESENT DAY.

(From a Photograph by Bonfils.)

the Jornada del Muerto, or "Valley of Death," of the Mexicans, which covers 9,000 square miles. It is the hottest spot on the face of the earth—the Sahara being nothing to it. It is said that its surface is strewn with the bones of human beings who have lost their lives there, expedition after expedition being lost in attempting to cross it. On any fine day—and in that region all days are fine, because there is no rain—one can behold beautiful lakes, tempting verdure, and even towns with houses and churches, within apparently short distances. The scenes are ever changing, and it is a desert wonderland. The hills of sand, which travel about with the wind, are not like common sand, but are made up of grains, some transparent, some translucent, while many are of rainbow hues, being in fact small gems of red carnelian, green chrysolite, and vari-coloured garnet. Under the microscope many of them are perfect spheres, emblem of the sinner's paradise of pleasure—the beautiful phantasmagoria accompanied by the bleaching bones of ruined men!

THE CHILDREN'S HOLIDAY.

"I should like to stay here for ever," was the wish of a child sent from dreary Canning Town for a summer holiday in the country. And the appreciative longing, that found utterance in that little visitor, was doubtless echoed by all the rest of the 28,589 London children who enjoyed a fortnight's change during last summer's hot months, under the auspices of the Children's Country Holidays Fund. And what a grand work it is which the treasurer of this fund (the Hon. Alfred Lyttelton) and his friends are doing. A noticeable feature of the work is that the parents of the children benefited are asked to pay part of the expenses; and last year their contributions amounted to upwards of one-third of the whole cost. The wife of a carman, whose child had greatly profited by a holiday in the previous year, when the father was out of work, last year came to the officers of the fund with a sovereign, that represented the difficult savings of twelve months, and asked that the little girl might again be sent away for a holiday, and that the balance of the money might be used for a needy child. Was ever a better illustration found of the poet's line, "For all the poor are piteous to the poor"? It may seem strange to some of us, accustomed to more expensive holiday-making, that there should be any credit balance from the sovereign after paying the expenses of a fortnight's holiday in a country cottage, together with railway fare from and to London. But so economically managed is this fund, that any of our readers who will send ten shillings to Mr. Lyttelton, at 10, Buckingham Street, Strand, will have the satisfaction of knowing that each such contribution will ensure a fortnight's real holiday and change for one of London's little ones. And here is a suggestion, of which we should be glad to hear that many readers of THE QUIVER had availed themselves. It is the custom in many of our Church and other organisations to suspend operations for some weeks or months in the summer, in order that the workers may take their holidays. May we suggest a collection on behalf of the London children's holidays at the last meeting before our favoured readers' vacation? In this work, as in so many others, the early gift is of double value.

SOME NEW BOOKS.

Probably no preacher of our own or any other time made more effective use of anecdotal and other illustrations than the late pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle. A special interest therefore attaches to the third series of his "Lectures to my Students," published by Messrs. Passmore and Alabaster, which is devoted to "The Art of Illustration." The lectures not only explain how and when such illustrations may be used, but give useful clues as to where they may be found with the minimum of trouble and the maximum of profit.—The latest volume in Messrs. Sampson Low's "Preachers of the Age" series is "The Cup of Cold Water, and Other Sermons," by the Rev. J. Morlais Jones, of Lewisham, who well deserves the position in this series which has been accorded him by the inclusion of this earnest and helpful collection of discourses.—The Rev. W. J. Dawson, formerly of Glasgow and now of Highbury Quadrant, has been heard of so frequently during the last few years that many readers will welcome a volume of sermons from his pen, published by Messrs. Isbister, under the title of "The Comrade-Christ, and Other Sermons." Perhaps the sermon which will attract most attention and interest in the collection is that with which it concludes, and that was the last Mr. Dawson preached in Glasgow before his removal to London, entitled "Measuring a Ministry."—An interesting biography of "Gawin Kirkham, the Open-Air Evangelist," has been written by Mr. Frank Cockrem, and published by Messrs. Morgan and Scott. This record of a well-spent life will surely be of interest to many who were his fellow labourers in London and elsewhere. —Special value attaches to the critical work upon "Tennyson," by the Rev. Stopford Brooke, by reason of the experience as a literary critic of its author. This is hardly the place in which to enter upon any elaborate discussion of the work, or we might feel tempted to complain that we often lose sight of the subject in the criticism. Still, whatever such an authority says about the late Laureate is worthy of all consideration, and should be helpful to all readers. To Messrs. Isbister, the publishers of the volume, a grateful word for its readable pages and great portability is certainly due.

THE FIRST WORD.

Writing of the Malays, Miss Bird says:—"On the birth of a child, the father puts his mouth to the ear of the infant and solemnly pronounces what is called the Azan or 'Allah Akbar,' the name of the one God, being the first sound which is allowed to fall upon his ears on entering the world, as it is the last sound which he hears on leaving it." What a suggestive symbol this of God's presence pervading the whole of our life! But instead of foolishly whispering into the ear of a new-born babe, who could not possibly understand, how much better to gradually instil it into the mind of the growing child! It is, indeed, a lesson that cannot be too well learned. Our lives would be happier, nobler, and more useful, did we always realise our complete dependence on God, our responsibility for the right use of all He gives us—had we a perpetual consciousness of His presence.

A NOVEL NURSING HOME.

The distinctive feature of the bright little Nursing Home for Children, founded four years ago at Barnet, is its surgical character. We believe we are correct in stating that it was till quite recently the only convalescent home near London where children of the poor who have undergone operations successfully in our great hospitals can receive the careful surgical nursing and appliances, combined with fresh air, abundance of pure sweet milk, and country diet, which, in the majority of cases, are absolutely necessary to complete the cure and determine, whether the future life of the little patient shall be one of continual suffering, ill-health, and incompetence for work, or one of health, happiness, and usefulness. It is obviously impossible that hospitals can keep their poor little patients for an indefinite time. The pressure on their space in this vast city is too urgent; but the shock to the nervous system of a little child who has undergone a serious operation is one that requires long and careful tending to obviate. To return the poor little wan, emaciated creature to a close, unhealthy home, with its noise and racket, its pinching poverty, and often unpreventable neglect, is to minimise the beneficial results of the hospital treatment, and often to render them practically nil. This crying need for the children of the poor was the dominant thought in the heart of one who determined to devote her life to the attempt to supply it. Friends gathered round her. Some eminent physicians and surgeons caught the enthusiasm which this simple but great idea inspired; and so the Home was started. Beautifully kept, full of brightness and sunshine and sweet fresh air, it has pursued its life-giving career for four years. Anxious ones—as any work depending principally upon subscriptions and donations must bring—but years of large reward to the generous workers, medical, surgical, and administrative, who have such a large percentage of cases discharged “quite well” to point to. Rickets, hip-joint disease, spinal complaint, abscesses, and all kinds of unpronounceable diseases, necessitating surgical appliances and sometimes amputation of a member, are in the list of the sixty-two cases treated during the past year. Sometimes, of course, when a case has gone too far, all the advantages of the Home have failed to bring about the desired result, but this is quite the rare exception. The blooming faces and bright eyes of the little ones when they leave the Home (where they are kept as long as the medical officers think necessary—not any fixed time) are a striking contrast to the pale, wan faces of the new-comers. Sad to tell, this beneficent work is restricted by lack of funds. Surely the children-lovers among the benevolent public will not long suffer this to be so! All we would say to them is, Go and see the Home. The matron, Miss Pawling, will welcome you at any time. It is only five minutes’ walk from High Barnet station, which is easily reached by train from King’s Cross.

THE HAUGHTY TREES.

The Trees quarrelled, and there was a mighty hubbub in the wood. The river flashing by laughed to hear the discord, and carried the news along that Holy Drift Wood was shaken with dissension. Now, the cause of dispute was an assertion made by the Oak that it was supreme in strength and utility. “Of me,” said that tree, “are made the ships which sail over the trackless ocean. I find a place in churches, and assume shapes of wondrous grace and beauty under the hand of the artificer. Not a purpose, indeed, for which timber is fit am I not able to fulfil.”—“Without me,” interrupted the Pine, “the vessels built of you would lie idle in the dock. I form the masts which enable them to sail. I, too, find a place in churches, for of me are the benches fashioned whereon they sit who come to worship.” And thus the tale was taken up, the Elm, the Beech, the Willow, and all the trees, each named some special point of usefulness they each of them possessed, and they each claimed supremacy amongst the trees. That night the sky grew thick with clouds, and a tempest broke upon the wood. The Oak was shivered by the lightning: the Elm was broken by the wind: the Pine lay prone before the blast: the Beech was stripped with the hail. There was not a tree in all the wood unharmed by the furious storm. Then was heard a faint rustle of reproof from the rushes by the river’s brim, as to and fro they gently moved in answer to the morning breeze. “Oh, trees, what profit is there in stubborn strength when adversity moves abroad? The pride that hindered you from bowing low the head has proved the occasion of your ruin. We, in obedience to every dictate of the wind, bent this way and that to our salvation, and so we stand whilst you are shattered.” Moral.—Humility is a form of strength. Or, There are other tests of strength than those we dream of.

ACTINISM.

Some strips of coloured glass adorned the roof of a conservatory, and they fell into conversation about their own respective merits. "What a pity it is that the roof is not all the same colour as myself," said the blue glass. "On the contrary," said the red, "I think it would have looked much nicer were it all like me."—"At any rate," replied the other, "we are agreed that our colourless cousin, who monopolises nearly all the space, is singularly plain and unattractive. I wonder what he has to say in defence of his position." Thus appealed to, the white glass answered: "For the plants at least, it is a good thing that all the roof is neither red nor blue, for both alike intercept some rays of the genial sun, and let through other rays in undue proportion. So that with the one no leaves would grow, and with the other no buds would blossom. Through me the light passes just as it falls, each ray without abatement or exaggeration. The plants are therefore nourished in all their parts. The pure light of heaven is essential to their proper growth." Moral.—That which is delivered from above must be received as it comes.

CHAPTER I.

"MONA dear, I think those things are nonsense," I expostulated—mildly, perhaps, for it was too hot to be otherwise. She was chanting a fragment of something or other about les oiseaux ne pleurent pas: French, of course. She turned from the piano and laughed.

"It's very pretty," she argued.

"The words are ridiculous," I persisted. "Fancy birds weeping! It is useless for writers of songs to inform us on such an undisputed fact or to confirm what we never doubted. And as to inviting mankind in general to follow their example of tearless existence—why, who wants to be told to model his emotions on birds' or insects'?"

"You are branching out into satirical philosophy, if you know what I mean by that," she said. "Why, Nora, of course it's 'nonsense'; but then, 'if you stick at everything because it's nonsense, you wonna go far in this life.'"

She was just kissing me when Auntie Sibyl came in. After her came Drake, with tea, so we left the question of nonsense, and applied ourselves to appreciation of the celestial herb, with appurtenances thereof in the way of strawberries and cream.

The long old-fashioned drawing-room was comparatively cool, shaded as it was from the June sunshine by dull blue silk curtains—very ancient, like everything else (excepting, of course, the people) in the old room. Auntie Sibyl, as she sat in an old oak chair, pouring tea from an old silver teapot into old teacups, looked quite young amidst such overpowering antiquity. She was not old: only a little over fifty; Mona was nearly twenty, and I was nineteen.

Mona and I were cousins. Our fathers had been brothers, Aunt Sibyl their sister. Mona's father was Henry Talbot, of St. Alvers' Abbey, in the county of Devon; my father, Owen Talbot, captain in the —th Hussars, and killed in a South African skirmish when I was a baby. Henry Talbot had married an heiress; he was rich himself, and the elder son, so Mona was wealthy. I was not. Aunt Sibyl married John Venner, but he died soon after their marriage, and she was a widow.

And so, my parents having died, and Mona's likewise, we lived with our aunt in the old Abbey which was a part of Mona's heritage.

It had been the home of the Talbots for generations. They were proud of it, and not without reason. It stood on a gently rising eminence, amid green fields and rich foliage, grey and venerable, like a father to the cottages in the village, like a haven of rest. Ah! we loved our home.

After tea on this day Mona and I strolled out into the garden. All Mona's lightness had vanished; she was dreamy and musing.

I had become accustomed to her changing moods. At times wildly energetic, she would alternately have periods of languid dreaminess. She lived by fits and starts, some people said; but they all adored her, nevertheless.

Perhaps it was her beauty. Yes, she was lovely. I looked at her, with the reddening sunshine lingering on her tawny hair and lighting her creamy skin. Hers was such an uncommon style. Her mother was a Spaniard, or descended from a Spanish family, and the southern tinge had showed itself in her graceful movements and long dark eyes. Yet her skin and hair were wholly English. She was tall, for a woman.

"Nora," she said, "does it ever come to you, almost painfully, how beautiful the world is?"

"Why painfully?" I asked her wonderingly.

"That I do not know," she replied; "unless it be that it makes one think how little we appreciate it."

We sat down under the shadow of a giant beech-tree on the edge of the smooth, velvet-carpeted lawn, where we could see the Abbey to its best advantage, the diamond-paned windows shining with the reflection of heaven's own glory until they were transformed to burnished gold. The enervating fragrance of heliotrope, which grew in this mild climate of South Devon, mingled with the heavy odour of roses, and created an almost too potent perfume. I have always held the day's decline as my favourite hour. It is so victorious—its glowing, triumphant departure; the embracing of light by darkness, their gradual happy union, in which night is all-conqueror for a season, until, in its turn, it is again compelled to succumb to day.

"Mona," I said at length, breaking the silence, "do you know that we go to Methenton to-morrow?"

"Yes, I know," she replied. Methenton was our market-town, five miles away. It was our one field for dissipation—dissipation of an essentially mild character, considering its limited resources.

"I have heard," I went on, "that Lord St. Alvers is staying at the St. Alvers Arms."

"Why does he not come to the Castle? It's time he did. Fancy having a lovely place like that, and never coming near it!"

"Mr. Keverne says he is coming home," I responded; and then we went in.

The next morning was fair and lovely as it could be—as only a day in June can be. Mona and I were to drive into Methenton to make a few purchases. We set off in the low carriage with the pair of lively chestnut ponies, which Mona drove so skilfully. We had a most pleasant drive along the green lanes, by the hay-scented meadows, where the grass lay drying in the favourable sunshine. I wondered vaguely whatever the agricultural mind would do, in the absence of bad weather, for something to rail against.

We entered Methenton in faultless style. Nearly everyone we saw had a greeting for us. All eyes smiled kindly on my fair cousin.

"Perhaps," I ventured, "we may see Lord St. Alvers somewhere in the town." I felt somewhat ashamed of my curiosity. Mona was so sublimely indifferent to such things, and I always considered her as a type.

"We may do so," she replied, in a tone that denoted that her thoughts were far away from the reprehensible young peer who had neglected his home for so long. He had not been near since his father's death, ten years ago.

"There are lots of people about to-day," I remarked presently, as we drew up at the draper's shop, where we generally succeeded in getting most things quite opposite to what we wanted.

"You should say the town is less dead than usual," she said, with a sweet smile which took any depreciation of Methenton from her words.

She left the reins in my hands. I always felt relieved when she came back to take them again. I did not like to be at the mercy of two wayward ponies. This was a fear I never confessed or conquered.

I sat still, looking away down the old High Street, at the farmers and their wives as they talked and laughed gaily and loudly, or remarked on the wares displayed in the windows. Suddenly I saw the public "bell-man" coming along. I knew him well by sight. What evil spirit prompted him I cannot imagine, but he came to a standstill just by the side of the restive ponies. Then he commenced his deafening peal. I felt the ponies straining; I had a dim notion that I was losing my power over them. Then I saw Mona coming out of the shop. She must have seen, by my despairing countenance, the plight I was in, for she made a rush for the ponies' heads. But before she reached them I had lost all my control over them, and felt them conquer me.

"Sit still, Nora," she called quickly.

Then I have a confused recollection of her, as she caught the reins, striving to hold them, as they madly pranced. I remember her once more beseeching me to keep my seat. The struggle seemed to last for minutes, when in reality it could only have been seconds.

"Old Jan had made the boat ready."—p. 650.

Then, a man's strong young form came out from the St. Alvers Arms, which was the next house to the draper's; a man's firm hand held the ponies' heads. He quieted them at once; there was something subduing in the way he commanded them to stand still. When a groom from the hotel had taken charge of them, and I had alighted, a trembling figure, on the hot pavement, he turned to Mona.

She was very white, and I observed she held her hand in a peculiar manner.

"I hope you are not hurt?" he inquired politely.

"Thank you," she responded, "I am not. At least, I believe my wrist is sprained, but only slightly."

"You must come in and have it bathed," he quickly urged.

Mona protested at first, but eventually we went in to the St. Alvers Arms, where the comely landlady, Mrs. Tregarth, busied herself in a kindly fussy way in bathing Mona's wrist.

"Eh, my lord, but 'en might ha' broked Miss Talbot's arm!" she cried, with an apparent pride in the seriousness of "what might have been."

The gentleman smiled and turned to me.

"You found the ponies unmanageable?" he interrogated; and I noted his strong, firm-looking appearance, and fine tall form. His eyes, deep brown, had that mute, strange eloquence lurking in their shadows which made me think how irresistible their soundless language would be. His hair was very dark, and he was a handsome man. I felt that he was a good one.

I believe I responded but curtly to his kind inquiries. I was full of chagrin to view the result of my craven spirit.

"I must thank you for your prompt action in coming to my assistance," Mona said, in her sweet, slightly haughty manner.

"It was nothing," he averred lightly. "I am only sorry I did not see the ponies earlier."

"It's all on account of the bell," Mona laughed. "If the bell-man had reached his oration, I don't know what might have occurred." It was her way of turning an accident into a jest, especially—dear, unselfish heart—if someone else were to blame. "Has he gone?" she asked.

"Do you mean the 'orator'?" our new friend inquired. "Oh, yes; he went away when he saw what he had done."

I stood by the window, looking into the street, where the two ponies stood quietly enough now. I had guessed who "my lord" was. Peers were not so common about there as to leave much field for speculation as to this one's identity.

"I am going to St. Alvers," he said; "and if you will allow me to drive you home, I shall be glad of the lift. Perhaps this young lady," turning to me, "scarcely feels able to drive at present."

He guessed rightly. I did not feel able to drive. So it ended in our accepting his offer.

We found him to be a courteous, well-bred young man, about seven- or eight-and-twenty. He was a pleasant companion, and I almost forgot my inglorious part in the morning's adventure in giving him a short sketch of everyone's history near his home. He showed an interest in these matters which rather surprised me, for I had pictured him as having concern only in subjects connected with foreign lands. His life had been so restless, and his career one of perpetual roving.

"How do you know we live here?" I exclaimed, as he turned in at the Abbey gates.

"I know this is the Talbotts' home, and I know you are Talbotts from hearing Mrs. Tregarth address you as such. It's a simple solution."

Aunt was quite alarmed when she saw Mona's bound-up limb. It looked so formidable. Lord St. Alvers remained with aunt, explaining the case, whilst Mona and I went away to reduce the monstrous bundle to arm-like proportions.

I know that sprains are painful. I had several myself in my younger days, the outcome, principally, of climbing rocks and trees. But Mona said nothing, and only the weary look in her dusky eyes showed that she was suffering. All the reproaches in the world could not have been so touching as her silence.

St. Alvers remained for luncheon. He needed little pressing; but then, the long walk in the noonday sun was not a pleasant alternative.

"You are settling at the Castle, Lord St. Alvers?" aunt said interrogatively.

"Yes," was his reply; "I think so. Will you come up one day and view the ruins? A lady's advice would be of great value to me, for the rooms need entire renovation. The gardens are in fairly good order."

"You can hardly call your beautiful home a 'ruin,'" Mona's quiet voice interposed. "It is only out of order through long neglect."

"I will disparage it no more," he assured her, "since I find you admire it."

He ignored the latter half of her remark. Mona was very cool in her manner towards him. I believe she blamed him greatly for that "long neglect."

"I hope your arm will soon be well," he said as he was leaving us. Mona thanked him.

"I fear it was all my fault," I said regretfully.

St. Alvers smiled.

"It has been an easily forgiven offence, then," he said. "If it were not for the sprain, I could almost say I do not feel any sorrow for a misadventure which has been the means of informally introducing me to such charming friends and neighbours."

It was only an ordinary society compliment, but his voice and manner were so sincere as to impart even originality to the words.

"Do you like him, aunt?" I asked, when he had gone.

"He is extremely agreeable," she replied.

That was high praise from aunt.

He came the next day to see how Mona was, as we sat under the beech-tree having a cup of tea.

"May I give you some tea?" aunt inquired; for he had sat down.

"Thank you," he said. "I am afraid, if I refuse, that it will only be accounted against me as another spark of foreign customs. But I have been so long away from your tea-worshipping country that I have almost ruined my taste for the beverage."

His eyes rested on Mona's face. He had guessed already that she reproached him for his absence.

The Abbey, covered with ivy and roses, stood glorying in the radiance of the reddening sunlight. The smooth velvet of the lawn, the dense luxuriance of the foliage—dark elm-trees side by side with lighter shades of oak, myrtle, and orange-blossom, and the scent of a thousand sweetnesses, made perfect surroundings and inimitable loveliness.

We lingered long outside, chatting freely. At least, St. Alvers and I were talking principally, and Mona was enjoying the glory of nature and the adieu, the evensong, of the trilling birds. Her heart ever went forth to the birds, who know no restraint—to the flowers, who owe to no man their gorgeous hues—to the sea, which waits for no human will.

Aunt Sibyl enjoyed it, too, as she lay back gracefully in her easy-chair with her calm, sweet face in repose and her dark eyes half-closed. She was the perfection of middle-age. In the wild imagination of my childhood, I hoped I might, one day, be as she was then. I know now that such a hope was built on sand.

I was not quite so tall as Mona, with hair of a duller shade and blue eyes. The colour of my eyes was a source of great annoyance to me. But Mona said that whatever colour they were I should dislike them. Well, I had a straight nose and good teeth, and I suppose I was passable—sufficiently so to hear the comfortless motto that "Beauty is only skin-deep" without feeling that its solacing assurance was at all personal.

"There is a boat down in the bay—Queen of the Waves," St. Alvers remarked. "I saw it yesterday. Is it owned by someone in the place?"

"Yes. By us," I replied.

"Do you often use it?" he asked. I told him we often went out in it.

"We can manage it ourselves," I added.

"Do you mean to say you go alone?" he exclaimed in wonder.

"You are thinking of yesterday's escapade," Mona's voice broke in. He laughingly assured us he was innocent of such malignancy.

"But I don't like them to take it out unless they take old Jan, a pensioner of Mona's, a superannuated idler who can manage a boat very well," aunt said. "Those sailing-vessels, all of them, are so liable to capsize."

"Ours never does," I said, defending our favourite amusement.

"The first time has to come," aunt declared.

"We never go far away, and we can swim," Mona said. "There is no danger."

"It's better not to take Jan," I said, "for if anything serious happened I'm sure he could not swim, and he would be drowned."

St. Alvers laughed at me, and aunty alluded disparagingly to me as a "little goose." But no one could deny that there was reason on my side.

"Will you come to-morrow up to the Castle?" St. Alvers asked as he was going. Aunty promised readily that we should all go. We knew every nook and corner by heart, but of course he did not know that.

"Do you like him?" I asked Mona, after the last glimpse of his tall figure was lost to view.

"Him?" she questioned vaguely. "Whom do you mean, dear?"

"St. Alvers, of course. How many people do we know who are male and liable to be liked?"

"Quite plenty. He's very well—for a young man. He looks able to do more than lounge about the Continent."

"Well, he's very handsome, at any rate," I argued, as if that made up for endless shortcomings. "Why are you always so indifferent to men?"

"I assure you I think them very interesting and a necessary portion of society," she laughed. "In fact, they are the foremost subject in some young ladies' minds."

"If you are throwing out nasty hints——" I began, in mock offence.

She smiled.

"Your conscience is not quite callous, I perceive," she retorted, leaving me worsted, as usual.

Then we went in together, our arms entwining, and in loving conversation. We were real friends.

CHAPTER II.

LORD ST. ALVERS came to fetch us himself, in one of his own carriages, to go up to Castle St. Alvers.

Mona still had to give him her left hand in greeting. Her sprain was obstinate.

The Castle was a fine old place, in an immense park, whose boundaries were miles round. There were some red deer in the park, and plenty of little Devon kine, lively and strong, disporting their bronze-coloured bodies under the shady oaks or grazing in the warm sunshine.

The entrance-hall was magnificent, only rather dusty. It is quite wonderful what small things make a difference to the effect of a whole. Perhaps St. Alvers did not notice it; only I felt quite an authority on the matter, since I had made it my duty to dust the drawing-room at home every morning. I might compare myself to the servant who exclaimed, "What a lot of windows to clean!" when she first saw the Crystal Palace.

The great rooms looked desolate—the furniture was covered up with dust-sheets and light covers. There was a great deal of old oak about—all the principal floors were of that wood. How often I had had a day's entertainment in sliding on the smooth floors! There was even a cut in the large saloon where I had attempted to skate in years gone by. I looked at the mark quite lovingly. It was a milestone of my girlhood, and it was like travelling over again the untraversable road to stand and think over the scenes of the past. I could smile now at the remembrance of Mrs. Simmons the housekeeper's righteous indignation when she beheld the marks of my skate. I did not smile then.

Mona, as a matter of course, went to the windows. The castle was on a rising ground, and the views were very lovely, not reaching sublimity or grandeur, but appealingly beautiful. The fresh air seemed to sing of the sea in the drowsy hum of summer. The gentle zephyrs sighed of the silvery ocean, smiling now in the June noontide. They were the only sadness coming from the water, and seemed born of its sweetness. It looked so glad and happy from the glimpse we caught of it between two wooded hills.

We were standing in a small octagon room, which had been the boudoir of the past Ladies St. Alvers. It had a turret-window, from which the sea showed in the distance like a diamond set in deep emerald and surrounded by azure blue.

"This is my favourite room," Mona said to Lord St. Alvers. "I always think the departed ladies of this house must have possessed good taste, for until you come to be here for some time you can never imagine why they chose it for their own."

"No," he replied, "it does not strike one as being particularly favourable."

"I always like a room," she said, "from which you can see the sunset. I am particularly fond of this room."

"I am glad you like it," he said, looking at her. And then a thought struck me, a wild, strange fancy on which I often reflected in the days that followed.

He had a perfect little lunch prepared for us in the library, which was the most habitable room in the house. How often Mona and I had sat here, perusing the dusty volumes! I felt a sort of right to the place. Mona, after we had finished our lunch, strolled round the room, lovingly looking over the familiar books. I saw Lord St. Alvers observe her closely. He had been watching her, more or less, all through the morning; but who could help admiring her grave sweet face with its marvellous eyes and aureole of tawny hair?

He walked, apparently unconcernedly, to where Mona stood.

"You are fond of reading?" I heard him ask.

"Yes, I am," she replied, without turning.

Then followed a silence, broken by St. Alvers.

"I hope you will not scruple to take any book you would care to read," he said. "I believe it is considered a good collection."

"I have read a great many of them already," she said, turning to him.

"I am pleased to hear it," he replied. "Which have you read—I mean, which kind?"

"We used to come here in wet weather and take possession of the house, forgetting that we did not own it," she answered, evading his question. I think she did not want to get into anything personal, and she was always shy of speaking on the subjects she had nearest to her heart. She had been educated by Mr. Keverne, our rector, and he had taught her according to his masculine notions. And she was very clever.

I always considered learning useless. A volume of essays took me months to read. Once Mona gave me a course of reading, but when I revealed to her the small quantity I got through in a week she gave me up as hopeless. I recognised that Bacon must have been a very wily old person, and I had more sympathy with the despotic knight, Sir Roger de Coverley, especially in church, when I often longed for his peculiar fashion of rousing the snoring flock.

So, while she read Homer in his own noble tongue, studied the stoical Brutus and Roman mobs, criticised the material philosophy of Diderot or Voltaire, I revelled in my ignorance—and thrived, too, on it.

"Mona," I said to her, later on in the evening, when we were back at the Abbey, "can you remember St. Alvers before he went away?"

"No," she replied. "He went away when we were at Nice with mother. I remember hearing people say what a fine boy he was. I believe," she added, with faint sarcasm, "he once horsewhipped a village lad, and gained great glory by that."

"Perhaps the boy deserved it," I said. "I cannot fancy St. Alvers doing anything cowardly or mean."

"He went to Oxford and then abroad. I was quite young then—only about nine when I came home."

I knew. She came home, an orphan, to her inheritance. At the same time my own father was away, fighting, in Africa, and the year following I had seen my fair young mother die—die as she read of the brave husband who was killed—killed in the thick of the battle, his life given up for a comrade. Then I had come to St. Alvers, my home ever since.

I loved Mona passionately. I gave her all the devotion which might have gone to parents. She had loved me, comforted me, guided me. Motherless herself, she had almost taught me what a mother's love might be; and yet she was but a year older than I was myself.

She was my ideal, my star. As she governed everyone, she governed me. No one ever dreamed of opposing her.

The next morning we went to the rectory.

"I have been idle for so long," Mona said, "I must do some work."

Mr. Keverne, our rector, was a tall, thin man, with a slight stoop. He was a widower, childless. He was pleased to see us, and, naturally, we discussed the event of the day—Lord St. Alvers' return to the Castle. We, or rather I, told him all about the accident at Methenton and the history of our informal meeting with the young lord. I described him most minutely, Mona sitting silent the while.

"Mr. Keverne will expect a paragon," she remarked, when I had finished. "I hope he will not be disappointed when he sees him."

He looked round at Mona, sitting there in her white summer dress, looking lovelier than ever. I wonder if it were more in my eyes that she was always so beautiful. If she had been as fascinating to others as she was to me, she would have been a dangerous element to introduce into the society of the male sex.

"Do you not like him?" he asked, in surprise.

"Oh yes! He's just the same as anyone else, I suppose. If he had been a Satyr instead of Hyperion Nora would have gone into raptures over him. I believe the little goose thinks he is making a grand sacrifice in coming home to St. Alvers, away from the seductive delights of Paris or Brussels, or from the seven hills of Rome and the art galleries of Florence. I think St. Alvers is worth all the Italian villages there are, and England dearer than the most beautiful Southern land."

"I was compelled to lose my gravity."—p. 651.

I looked at her with a shaken belief in Lord St. Alvers. Still, I could not give it up all at once. So I made a doubtful defence.

"But, Mona, one can see St. Alvers in a day. Then it's the same thing over and over again. Think of the lovely places we read of abroad. Imagine Venice——"

But she was laughing at me, and I weakly ceased to condone St. Alvers' offence in caring more for silent, blue-domed Venice than for his own lonely castle by the sea.

Mona and Mr. Keverne began to study a piece of some ill-treated old person's writings, Thucydides, or something like it. For the life of me I could not imagine why it mattered to us if he were so very forgiving and unmalicious. I felt no infection of that same spirit when I saw what an utter waste of time it caused. What a lovely day for a sail, with Thucydides overboard!

I thought of our old governess, Miss Stayne. She had left us eighteen months since. She found Mona a perplexing puzzle from the first day she came until the morning we had driven her to Metherton Station and bade her good-bye, little dreaming how we should next meet.

Poor lady! she was methodical, a phase of character particularly obnoxious to Mona, who liked to study when she "felt like it." It was useless for Miss Stayne to argue. Mona soon silenced her. It was worse than useless to appeal to aunty. Aunty "left it" with Miss Stayne. And Mona, whose perfection in studying was only equalled by her perfection in laziness, was soon far beyond the governess's doubtful French and love-song Italian. It is wonderfully important for a girl to learn how to conceal her ignorance—it is an accomplishment, and should be an "extra." Miss Stayne made it a speciality.

So the governess devoted her valuable time to me, and Mona took lessons from Mr. Keverne.

It happened as I had anticipated. Mona, after the visit to the rectory, stuck to study, despite the invitation of the bees to saunter forth to enjoy the wealth of June-tide fragrance and delight in the summer air. St. Alvers called several times, and Mona would see him or not, as she felt inclined. He was apparently puzzled by her quietness, and one day he spoke to me about her.

"Your cousin is very reserved," he remarked.

"Just now she appears so," I admitted. "She is very busy."

"Busy?"

Perhaps he wondered why she was so much occupied and I so lazy.

"She is studying," I explained.

"Has her education been neglected?" he asked, in some surprise.

I smiled.

"Does she give you that idea?" I inquired, severely.

"Well, no," he confessed. "But she gives me no ideas whatever. She is so silent, and never speaks to me. I cannot think I have offended her, for I have had no chance."

"I don't think Mona would trouble herself to be offended with you," I said, exaggerating her indifference (to prevent his growing conceited).

"Do you imply that Miss Talbot is cold by nature?" he asked.

"Mona cold!" I gasped. Then I caught the twinkle in his eye. I turned away with a grand unconcern.

"Then you must mean that I am not of sufficient importance to quarrel with," he said, laughing.

"I shall soon let you see that I do not mean anything of the sort," I retorted. He laughed at me with such heartiness that I was obliged to join him.

"Anyhow," he said, "you are a regular little champion. I almost wish I needed one."

"Your necessity might not command my services," I told him—womanlike, intent on securing the last word.

He must have found the Castle very lonely. I accounted for the frequency of his visits to the Abbey on that ground. A gregarious creature, he must have intercourse with others of his kind.

I met him one day in the village. He was going to inspect some cottages which Mona the day before had told him were sadly in need of repair. Poverty and picturesqueness, unhealthiness and antiquity, are so often linked that we hesitate to destroy the one for the sake of the other, and these thatched dwellings with little gardens looked quite innocent of typhoid germs or any other germs at all.

I walked back with him to a cottage in which a child lay sick.

"Well, Dicky," I said, "are you nearly well?"

He smiled feebly.

"Where is Miss Mona?" he asked weakly.

The mother came forward.

"'En asks for Miss Mona oftentimes," she said.

"I will tell her," I said, "then I know she will come. She has been very busy lately."

"Miss Talbot is interested in these people," Lord St. Alvers said to me. "She told me of the repairs needed here."

"Blez 'en!" Mrs. Polwyn exclaimed. He looked surprised.

"Thee wonders, my lord," she said, "as why I luv 'en zo. Eh! if 'ee 'd zeen 'en, as I have, zitten up wid my lad, when 'en were nigh death, watchin' wid us, 'ee 'd know an' mebbe understand. There be never a lad i' St. Alvers but wad die vor 'en."

"They have unlimited faith in Mona," I remarked, as we left the cottage after St. Alvers had pressed something into the woman's hand to buy wine and other comforts for Dicky. He performed this action in the most delicate way, for which I felt glad. The villagers were proud and sensitive, and somewhat peculiar to deal with.

"Yes," he replied to my remark, "they place her on a pedestal."

"She has grown up with them, and understands their ways so well," I said.

"And I have not," he said, supplying my unspoken thought. "Is that a reproach?"

"Reproach!" I gasped, in confusion.

"Yes," he said. "I can see that you—and your cousin—blame me for my long neglect of home. I am much to blame. Believe me, if I could undo the past and begin my life again, I should do much differently in many things. Circumstances have been against me."

"I am sure I have no—I have never thought you were very wrong," I assured him, rather cross that he had read my mind so easily.

"Mona," I said, when I reached home and had told her of my encounter with Lord St. Alvers, "he may have had some very important reason for staying away."

"I never doubted it," she agreed.

"But outside his own pleasure," I persisted. "Some heroic reason."

"He may have been slaying dragons," she replied, with a slight smile.

CHAPTER III.

ABOUT a week after the events recorded in the last chapter, Mona proposed a day on the water. I was delighted. She was always so quiet when she studied, and returned the vaguest answers to our questions, that I am sure Aunt Sibyl was often inclined to think, as Festus did of St. Paul, that much learning had affected her reason. But aunt did not understand Mona, and never would do.

Aunt was a dear, sweet creature, but rather "proper"; she agreed, I feel sure, with the "conceal your ignorance" theory I have mentioned. As for cleverness in women, I believe she regarded it in the light of a minor sort of indelicacy. She never alluded publicly to Mona's abilities in learning. Of course, we heard of the advance of women, of the "sweet girl-graduate," but aunt shook her head at such things, and wondered what women were thinking of, to make themselves into caricatures of men. As for a lady doctor—why, she must have discredited altogether any rumour as to the existence of such a monstrosity.

Yet I am sure Mona was her favourite. I could see it in the love-light in her eyes. I read it, times without number, in the loving solicitude of her voice. I was often touched by the manner in which she would seek to dispel from my mind the idea of favouritism. Dear aunt! She need not have hidden her preference so affectionately and kindly. I was quite accustomed to Mona's being always placed first.

As I said, I was overjoyed by the prospect of a sail. We went through the customary ceremony of inviting aunt to join us. We heard her regulation thanks and refusal, her admonition not to get drowned, as if it were a matter in our hands, and as if we could, by some not mentioned means, arrange the drowning, or safety, to our minds. So, all these preliminaries being satisfactorily gone through, we started off with a basket of provisions.

The day was very hot, but the air was pleasant, and there was a soft landward breeze. The sea glittered and gleamed like a living thing, lying in the little bay so quietly sparkling, and appearing as one mass of sheen away out to the horizon, where sea and sky merged in happy union miles away. The tiny waves sang a sad dirge as they dragged back from the shingles; they took to unknown depths their untold secret, the secret of the sea. The shaly cliffs showed a thousand shades and lights, the mossy stones at their feet, green-covered, were cool and damp in the shadow. The sea-birds skimmed the shining waters, with weird cries.

Old Jan was smoking his pipe on the beach. We had sent to tell him to be there; and he had made the boat ready.

"I think," Mona decided, "as we have such a lovely day we will go to Trevordell. It's not too far."

It took us no little time to get outside the bay. When we were out, there was just enough breeze to take us along.

It was perfect out on the water. I had a book, and enjoyed reading under a large white sunshade. Mona simply watched, from her long dark eyes, the cliffs and the sea as we passed along the coast to the bay where we were to land. Occasionally she held the sail for Jan. Mona and I were both quite capable of lending him a hand.

It was not far to Trevordell, and we landed quite easily. Leaving to Jan the care of the boat and something to eat, we went across the beach, rather slowly, because it is not easy to walk quickly on large pebbles. It is almost impossible to walk gracefully; but as no one was there to see us, we gave up any attempt to do so.

We set out our lunch in the usual spot we occupied on these picnics. It was in the dell, near to the rushing streamlet which threaded its way between the gorge. Mona was in high spirits.

"Nora," she exclaimed, "it is really the only place to live in, when the weather is so fine."

"What is?" I asked her, pausing as I uncorked a jar of cream.

"The open air, of course," she responded, smiling at her own vagueness.

"It's very well in the daytime," I agreed, "but not at night, Mona. Fancy sleeping here!"

"Is this a cucumber?" she asked, ignoring my unpoetic suggestion entirely.

"Yes," I replied; "you might cut it."

She was just complying with my request, with some laughing remark, when I was startled by the shrill signal of a long whistle from the heights above. Mona started to her feet.

High up on the summit of the gorge were two horsemen. I saw at once that one was St. Alvers. Mona had recognised him too.

They tied their horses to a tree and commenced to descend the hilly path to us. With a crackling of thorn and briar and a rustling of leaves they reached us.

St. Alvers introduced his companion as "my friend Mr. Callan."

"We were riding and saw you; we thought we should like to pay you a visit in your novel dining-room," he said, laughing. Then he inquired if Mona's arm were right again. She replied in the affirmative, and Lord St. Alvers explained to his friend the mystery of the sprain, and how it had introduced him to us so informally.

Mr. Callan was a tall, well-built man, but not so tall as Lord St. Alvers. He had a kind, rather thoughtful face, and bright dark-blue eyes. His hair was curly and chestnut. I guessed him to be of about the same age as Lord St. Alvers. Afterwards I discovered that he was a little younger.

I was all the time in a fever of anxiety. I wondered if they would expect to join us or to be asked to do so. There were two reasons why I hoped they would not stay—first, the amount of our eatables; secondly, Mrs. Grundy.

St. Alvers had practised doubtful etiquette when he drove us home from Metherton on the day we first saw him. According to the slavish rule of "good form," he should have raised his hat and politely left us to the mercy of my bad driving or Mona's inability to drive at all. At the outside, he could have procured a perfumed stable-boy from the St. Alvers Arms to act as groom. Reflecting on his previous doubtful behaviour, I thought it highly probable that he might repeat it on this occasion.

He seated himself on the outgrowing root of a giant oak. He looked alarmingly at ease and resembled a fixture. I grew more and more uneasy; moreover, I was hungry.

At last Mona was compelled to do it.

"I am not sure," she said, in her queenly way, "if we have sufficient to invite you to partake of. But if we have anything you would like you are quite welcome to it."

Of course, it was what they had been waiting for. I could see that by the quick acceptance of Mona's offer. But, after all, it was not a bad arrangement for all of us; and we had, as usual, much more to eat than we should ever need by ourselves, so we managed that part.

Mona forgot her reserve under the influence of the pleasant surroundings. I could see that St. Alvers was quite fascinated by her.

We had to gloss over, as well as we could, the scarcity of knives and forks. I was compelled to lose my gravity when Mr. Callan tried to convey some cream to his mouth with a fork. I laughed.

"What are you laughing at now, Miss Nora?" Lord St. Alvers inquired.

"I cannot quite tell you. You might not see the joke," I replied, still laughing.

"I think I know," Mr. Callan interposed. I grew crimson, because I had known him for so short a time. Somehow, I felt as if I had known Lord St. Alvers all my life.

They both talked to Mona a good deal. One of them must have been rapidly losing his hypothetical surmise as to her neglected education. I was always proud of Mona when she made a conquest.

After our lunch, we cleared up our things, leaving them packed in a hamper which our two guests carried to the top of the gorge for us.

"We have time for a stroll," St. Alvers suggested, looking at Mona. So we went through the fishing-village of Trevoran into the woods beyond. Now that St. Alvers had discovered that Mona could be agreeable, he, with the selfishness peculiar to his sex, took possession of her in the coolest way. They went on in front, and I could see his dark, handsome head bent as he talked to her. I could see that he was talking a great deal at first.

We passed the old familiar cottages, the homes of fishermen, for the most part. The gardens were all aglow with the profusion of June flowers. The scent of roses was all-pervading.

Men and women sat in the gardens, mending nets, some of them, the men, smoking. Some of the women were making lace.

"Have you seen much of Lord St. Alvers since he came down here?" Mr. Callan asked me.

"Yes," I replied; "he has been to the Abbey a great deal. Castle St. Alvers is so fearfully lonely for a young man."

"Ah!" It was all he said, but it sounded very expressive. I stared at him.

"Your sister is——"

"My cousin," I interrupted, correcting him in Irish fashion. I explained our relationship, enlarging on Mona's worth and my own worthlessness very considerably.

His eyes strayed to where St. Alvers and Mona wandered on. He watched them with a shade of anxiety in his face. And yet how handsome they looked together—she so tall and graceful, and he so strong and noble.

Mr. Callan answered quite absently some of my attempts at conversation. He was occupied in contemplation of the back view of the two in front. Why should he watch them so? Even if St. Alvers did bend his head so suggestively to Mona, what mattered it? In fact, a very charming little romance it would be if these two should love each other.

I felt nothing but the utmost complacency when I beheld St. Alvers' barely concealed admiration of Mona. I knew instinctively that he was a good, true man, and worthy even of my cousin. And she whose life was one melodious song of shedding love around deserved the adoration of a noble heart. I felt very much inclined to resent Mr. Callan's uneasiness.

They saw us safely into our Queen.

"We shall be back long before you," St. Alvers said to Mona. "I shall come down to see you land."

It was a splendid evening. We sailed home through a red-gold sea with a sky of pale, dull grey streaked in the west with great dashes of orange colouring above a background of vivid crimson, like a revelation of the sunless brilliancy beyond the clouds. Mona was very quiet.

St. Alvers and Mr. Callan were there on the shingly beach of St. Alvers Bay.

"I have seen your aunt," St. Alvers said, as we stepped ashore. "I think when she has seen your uninjured persons once more she will feel relieved."

"We will hurry back," Mona said; and we fell into the old order. I looked up at Mr. Callan, and saw a distinct frown on his brow. Very complimentary to me, I thought.

"I was glad when I saw your sail round the point," I heard St. Alvers say to Mona. "It is getting late."

"Surely you were not alarmed!" Mona exclaimed, looking at him in wonder.

He turned his dark eyes to her face.

"We are over-anxious for those we——" he began, but did not finish. And Mona gazed away over the fields. Mr. Callan's frown had developed into a positive glare. I wondered what the next stage would be.

He showed a strong inclination not to be far behind the others. To punish him for his rudeness, I walked very slowly.

"I am afraid you are tired," he said at last.

I smiled inwardly.

"There is no hurry," I returned, in such superlatively innocent tones that I must have overdone it. A minute later I looked to see if he were still glaring, and found his eyes bent on me with an amused gleam in them. I grew quite hot, wondering what he thought of me.

After a reception from aunty which was suggestive of the return of Crusaders or a rescue from the jaws of Death, we had supper, for which Mr. Callan and Lord St. Alvers remained. The former was not so disagreeable as when alone with me. In fact, he seemed quite civilised, and showed no symptoms of "glaring." That is, over supper he was all right. But afterwards, when Lord St. Alvers proposed a stroll on the moonlit lawn to Mona, he began again, and lapsed into his usual restless ferocity.

"Will you come for a turn or two?" he asked me, as the two figures on the grass strolled slowly to and fro.

"I am tired," I replied shortly.

He turned away without a word.

I caught the murmur of the low-toned conversation between Mona and St. Alvers. If anything could be gathered from outer appearance, he was surely very satisfied with his companion. Ah! many a time after I wished that his reluctant adieu that night had been an everlasting farewell—to one at least of us—my cousin Mona.

In the time following, we saw a great deal of our two friends. At least, Mr. Callan was compelled to be friendly with me whether he liked it or not, for St. Alvers always chose to monopolise Mona.

Sometimes I would catch a sort of appealing look from Mr. Callan to St. Alvers. Once I heard the former say in a low voice, "Guy, what are you doing?" and St. Alvers turned away with a sort of reckless defiance which astonished me. Surely no one could think a man doing any wrong in loving Mona! Why, a king was not too good for her.

"Perhaps Mr. Callan is jealous," I reflected, the other thought being too ridiculous to entertain.

We went to many places of interest round about, with aunty for the most delightfully indifferent chaperone.

"Mona," I said one day, "do you like Mr. Callan?"

"Yes, dear, very much," was her ready reply.

"Why do you ask?"

"I think he is a most peculiar person," I replied.

"He seems to think St. Alvers is in need of care. He reminds me of a keeper——"

But Mona was laughing, and I stopped.

"He is a clever man," she declared. "Lord St. Alvers thinks a great deal of him. He praises him continually."

"Do you like St. Alvers?" I went on.

"You are growing like a confession-book, Nora," she said, with a slight flush.

"That's no answer," I retorted, smiling.

"I have answered that question several times already," she declared.

"Yes," I admitted. "But you did not know him then."

"It takes a long time to know some people," she continued evasively. "I want you to call at the rectory for the notes I left behind yesterday. Will you, dear?"

I kissed her and left her. All the way I was thinking of her occupied in the doubtfully blissful way of dreaming of her love. It seems to be the correct thing to do in a case like hers. In novels the heroine always appears to find it very interesting, though I think I should be ennuyée in an hour spent in the meditation of any man. But, after all, "Delia is the ivy"; she clings to the oak, Damon, or, as Thackeray satirically foresees, "the post."

"Man's love is of man's life a thing apart;
'Tis woman's whole existence."

After I left the rectory, I went to the cliffs. There was a little cave just under the overhanging rock where Mona and I had often sought shelter from sun and storm. I descended to it by a steep path, and sat lazily watching the ever-changing sea. Its faint murmur was borne to me from the shore below, where the tiny, sunny waves were breaking in the ebbing tide. Away, far away, was the misty horizon where land and water blend.

Gradually I became conscious of a distant sound of voices. As they came nearer and nearer, I decided to remain silent and let them pass above my head. But they paused just over where I sat, and at first I felt too lazy to move. I had recognised the voices as belonging to Mr. Callan and Lord St. Alvers.

I was untidy, I reflected. My hair was breaking from its coils. I was hot, dusty, tired. In a freak caused by vanity, I resolved to remain in ambush. That I might overhear what was not intended for my ears never occurred to me. But the sound of my own surname surprised me. I could not help hearing what followed.

"You know, Guy," Mr. Callan was saying very earnestly, "all this must end. Why not at once! Much better to give up this fancy before it grows too closely to your heart to be torn away."

"Fancy!" St. Alvers exclaimed scornfully. "I only wish it were but that! Clifford, I cannot give it up. Ah! you cannot know how I—love her," he ended softly. For the life of me I dare not move then. I was always a coward.

"It is shameful," he began again, "that I should be tied as I am. Oh! why was I so blind as to consent to such a fool's scheme."

"Guy," Mr. Callan interposed, "you are bound in honour there. Do not forget that beyond where you can redeem it."

There was a pause. St. Alvers broke it.

"Lucine must see reason. She will surely not hold me to an arrangement so obnoxious to myself. As to honour——"

"From what I know of Miss Darrel," his friend said, slowly and reluctantly, "she is the last in the at once. I wish——" and then they moved away, and I caught only the indistinct murmur of their voices before they died away altogether.

I sat stunned and helpless. What could it mean?

Mona! how shall you bear your pain? "But perhaps," I thought, "she does not care——" world to give up anything advantageous to herself. The worst part of it all is, that I am afraid Miss Talbot——" he stopped.

"I could not help hearing."—p. 62.

"Don't!" St. Alvers exclaimed hoarsely. "I have been a contemptible coward. I must tell her all. I will go to Lucine and risk her revenge."

"The latter course will be of no avail. It will leave you deeper than ever in despair. You must go away

Ah! vain sophistry. I knew she did care. I knew that she loved him with a deep unconquerable love such as would rise from a heart like hers.

And he? Was he a common deceiver? No; never! Dear love, dear cousin! perhaps I was mistaken.

I resolved to wait and see. And, in the meantime, who was Lucine?

IS FAMILY PRAYER DECLINING?

BY THE REV. W. GARRETT HORDER, AUTHOR OF "THE SILENT VOICE," ETC. ETC.

THE Editor of "Casell's Book of Family Prayers" has been collecting the opinions of "those who can speak with authority as to whether the use of family prayers in the household is on the increase or decrease." The answers received, with two or three exceptions, go to show that the practice of family worship is declining. The exceptions to this come chiefly from ministers in Scotland; but even from across the Border replies come expressive of the opinion that there, too, the practice is declining.

Personally, I am persuaded that if the entire ministry of the British Isles could be polled on this question, the vast majority would point to decrease, rather than increase, in this hallowed practice.

Nor is this decline confined to Protestant circles. A like declaration reaches us from within the Roman communion. Cardinal Vaughan, in his Lenten Pastoral, says:—"During the simultaneous mission, attention will be called in every church to the necessity of establishing and maintaining in our Catholic homes the character of the Christian family. Such as the home is, such will be the children. The spirit of the age has in great measure broken down the ideal of the Christian family. Formerly children not only loved, but respected and obeyed, their parents; the parents trained their children to piety; family prayers were said in common every night, and a meditation or consideration was read to feed the mind with holy thoughts and affections. . . . It is considered an inconvenience, an interruption, a restraint, to say night prayers in common. The sacred character of the home which everywhere used to supply family prayers in common has faded away until the idea of any special sanctity attaching to the home has become almost extinct. Father, mother, children and household go each their own way, as though their Heavenly Father had sent a message that He was no longer pleased to receive their united prayer and praise. Thus graces diminish, faith weakens, charity grows cold, and the generations deteriorate."

From this we see how that even the Roman Church, hedged in though it be by all kinds of restrictions and "safeguards," is not, any more than the Protestant Church, free from the influence of the Zeitgeist—the spirit of the age—which bears both alike in the same direction.

I am not disposed, on account of the decay of a special practice, to say that "the generations deteriorate," for I remember Lowell's pregnant words—

"New occasions teach new duties;
Time makes ancient good uncouth."

The decay of a particular practice is not proof positive that piety is declining or the age deteriorating. Pious feeling may run in new channels. Formerly, it may be, it was too bent on personal and family edification, and somewhat indifferent to the needs of those without. Formerly, it may be, it took the form of service to God which made it a trifle careless of the service of man. Just now it is swinging from the one extreme to the other—from a Godward to a manward attitude; but presently the balance will be reached. For let it never be forgotten that Christianity is not shut up within a set of rules or practices, however good; but is rather a spirit running through and sanctifying life at all points; but, in spite of this, the wisdom of many generations is often enshrined in ancient practices, and these should not be lightly permitted to fall into disuse.

Does family worship enshrine such wisdom of the past? Is it, therefore, worth the effort to preserve or, if lost, to re-establish? I have no hesitation in replying in the affirmative to this question. Indeed, I rather fancy that our Lord may have had some such practice in view when He said—"Where two or three are gathered in My name, there am I in the midst of them." The old Rabbinic rule made ten the minimum of a worshipping company. Christ reduced the minimum to the lowest possible point, for you cannot have a gathering with less than two, and so He made a worshipping company possible in the smallest of families. His words have usually been quoted in reference to gatherings in the church; I am disposed to think they have in view still more the "church in the house."

Can anyone doubt that the home is sanctified by the Word of God and prayer—that is, if the reading be devout and the prayer trustful and childlike? All other relationships find some kind of expression within the home circle; why should the highest of all be left without expression? All other emotions struggle into expression; why should there be silence where the emotion which is deepest is concerned?

Then, too, is it well that the keenest desires of godly parents for their children should remain hidden within the heart, or spoken of only in private by the father to the mother, or the mother to the father? Is it not good for these deep feelings to find expression, not direct to the child—the parent usually finds it hard to give them this kind of utterance—but that they should go up in the form of prayer to the great Father of all? Thus the parent's heart may be revealed in the most sacred way to those dearest. Is not this likely to lend a new sanctity to the relationship between parents and their children—to hallow the earthly with the heavenly? May not the whole home circle thus catch glimpses of that which is deepest in the parental heart?

I venture to assert that in the past, in a multitude of cases, the children have thus been drawn into more sacred fellowship with their parents—seeing thus feelings which otherwise they would never have known, of which, it may be, they would never have even dreamt. There are men and women scattered over the world, far away from their childhood's homes, whose most sacred memories cluster around the family gathering in which their father poured out his heart to God on their behalf, and so revealed his inner feeling to his children.

No practice is to be lightly cast aside which in the past has lent any sacredness to the home; for on the character of the home depends, more than on aught beside, the character of the Church and even of the Nation.

Then, too, this practice of family prayer has another advantage in that it brings within the circle of sympathy those who serve in the home. Such are the caste feelings that too often prevail in English households, that the domestics, as they are called, though living within the same walls are often a class apart, with little of that sympathetic contact which should bind all human souls together, no matter how different their work and position. There ought to be some point where the equalities are acknowledged and the inequalities fall into the background. Where can that be save before the Father of all, Who is no respecter of persons? A poor man once went up to the communion-table at Walmer to partake of the Holy Supper. On reaching it, he found the Duke of Wellington kneeling there, and was about to withdraw when the duke laid his hand upon the poor man's arm and whispered, "We are all equal here." And the family altar may, if rightly used, bring to light the underlying equality of all within the home circle, and knit together with stronger, because tenderer, bonds those who are too much separated by mere class distinctions. I have personal reasons for knowing that servants greatly appreciate the opportunity of family worship, and feel its gracious influence. A mistress tells me that some of her old servants assured her that there was nothing they had so missed since they left her service as the family prayers, in which they had been accustomed to join.

Space forbids the consideration of other advantages—its calming influence after the toils of the day—the peace which it brings upon troubled spirits—the sense it wakens of the nearness of the great Father.

But surely no rightly constituted Christian mind will deny its manifold advantages.

Why, then, has the practice fallen somewhat into disuse in even Christian families?

There are many reasons for this—circumstantial, personal, intellectual—of which I can speak only in the briefest way.

1. Circumstantial. The conditions amid which many, especially in our great cities, live, render the practice difficult. The heads of families, and, indeed, all the bread-winners, have, as a rule, to leave home for office or factory or shop very early in the morning, and often return very late at night; so that it is difficult, save by very early rising, to find time for morning or, by introducing it immediately after the return home, for evening prayer. In earlier times families lived where the parents' business was carried on, and so the time now spent in railway or omnibus was saved, and could be utilised for family worship. What the railway or omnibus claims was formerly, in many cases, given to home worship. But all that has changed. And here lies a real difficulty in the way to the family altar—a difficulty which is likely to increase rather than diminish.

2. Personal. In certain directions our religious life has grown more shy and reserved—less free in its expression. We are so afraid of saying more than we really feel, that we end by saying nothing at all. We are so fearful of seeming better than we are, that we often seem worse than we are. This tendency has had its effect on prayer, especially before or with others. To have family prayer seems to many like setting up to be saints, and this is a thing they hate. In reality it is the reverse; for prayer is not a claim that we are good, but only the longing to be so. True prayer is the sign of humility, not of pride; a confession of weakness, not the assertion of strength. But just now the reverse is the current feeling, and not till we get this corrected is there much chance of the family altar being firmly re-established.

3. Intellectual. Behind even the feeling of which I have spoken is the thought of the day about prayer itself. This takes two directions. In certain minds there is the idea that the universe is governed by law; and, the law being good, it is neither possible nor desirable that our prayers should alter it. With this we are not now concerned, since those who regard the universe as under law, with no Fatherly heart behind it, will not pray at all, either in private or in the family. In other and more religious minds there is the feeling that if God be, as they believe, the Father of men, He will give all that is good without being asked. I am not now discussing prayer itself, and so cannot deal with the root of these objections; but, even granting this position, room is still left for prayer. For prayer does not begin and end with asking. Equally essential, perhaps more so, are thanksgiving, contrition, fellowship—elements which find a place even in our relationships with our earthly parents, who do not wait for our asking to give us good things. These all find a place in a true child's life in relation to his parents. One of the most saintly men I ever knew told me that on one occasion his child came into the room when he was very busy, and, looking up from his work, he said, "What do you want, Minnie?"—"I only want to be with you, papa!"

And we children of larger growth, if we are in our right mind, will desire to be with our heavenly Father; and prayer is the way thereto. If we will only let our hearts, not merely our heads, have their way, we shall pray; and if we do, we shall want to pray, not merely alone in our closets, but with those who are dearest around the family hearth. This is the vital matter. Let there be the true filial feeling, and out of it will spring prayer, both in the secret place and in the family.

And now for a word or two on the difficulties which stand in the way.

The time difficulty caused by early departure from, and late return to, the home is a real one, and may render the daily practice very hard. But if it be thus with most of the days of the week, there is the Sunday, and it maybe the Saturday, when, in many cases, work is over by mid-day. Could not the altar be reared on Saturday evening, preparing mind and heart for Sunday worship? and what more blessed close to the Day of Rest than the family gathering for prayer?

Then the feeling of reserve may surely be overcome in one of two ways: either by the use of simple forms, or by even more simple and brief prayer from our own hearts. We often think that uttered prayer must be lengthy or well expressed, whereas the most blessed prayers are usually the briefest and simplest. If we could only get the right idea of prayer, we should see that it is within the capacity of all. The shortest, simplest prayers recorded in the New Testament were the most effective.

Even if courage fail for such short, simple utterances, there are forms which may be used; or, if even these be objected to, the best of our hymns are full of the essential elements of true prayer. Could not these be sung together, and form the vehicle for our thanksgiving, our confession, our longing for fellowship with our Father? No mean altar would that be on which we laid devout reading of Scripture and the singing of psalm and hymn and spiritual song, whilst we make melody in our hearts unto the Lord.

In some way or other let us sanctify our homes by the Word of God and Prayer. So we shall make it a Bethel, where, like the patriarch of old, we shall often feel, "Surely the Lord is in this place."

AMONG THE STREET CHILDREN.

BY F. M. HOLMES.

"WELL, Tommy, and what do you want?"

"Most everything, sir."

"Well, well, that is bad; and who told you to come here?"

"Jemmy Rattles, sir; 'e said as 'ow you 'ad give 'im some boots and some brekfustes; and teacher, sir, 'e give me this stiffket."

The certificate produced was well thumbed, and proved that Tommy's fingers were frequently acquainted with dirt.

"Signed by M— D—, eh! That is your teacher in the Board-school?"

"Yus, sir."

"Well, you have come to the right place, my lad. You want 'most everything,' as you say; and the Ragged School Union supplies 'most everything' for destitute children."

"Yus, sir. Pheemy Bodgers went away to one of yer 'Ooliday 'Omes in the summer for a fortnit, and come back quite well. Her cheeks looked as if they 'ad bin painted. Could I go to one of yer 'Ooliday 'Omes, sir?"

"Oh well, well, we must consider. We must learn more about your circumstances; but just now your teacher says you want badly some new boots and a new coat?"

"Yus, sir—please, sir."

"Well, I daresay we can find you these."

"Oh, thank 'ee, sir; and could ye—give me a ticket for dinners?"

"Why! what do your parents do?"

"Mother, sir, she goes out 'awkin' fish, or it mout be water-creeses, and there ain't much 'angin to it, sir."

"You mean she does not make much profit?"

"No, sir."

"And what does your father do?"

"Goes to the docks or wharves, sir."

"Ah, and does not often find much work there?"

"No, sir. Please, sir, you give Madge Simpkins a pair o' crutches."

"Oh! did we? Madge is a cripple then, I fear?"

"Yus, sir, and you give her a lot o' toys and picture-books!"

"Well, some were lent, you know; and after she had used them, they were passed on to others. There are so many cripples and suffering children we try to help."

"And you taught her brother carpentring."

"Oh! did we; what! at one of our Industrial Classes?"

WANTS "MOST EVERYTHING."

"Yus, sir; so I've heered about you."
 "You seem to have done so. Well now, come and try on a coat."

With thin white face wrinkled into smiles, the little ragged urchin steps into the room, and energetically thrusts his fist down the arm of a coat offered him.

"Too long, ain't it, sir? Maybe there's a chap with a longer arm nor mine as it 'ud suit better."

Another was too small, so he tries a third; and thus he continues, devoting himself with much energy to getting inside coats and boots, until at last he exclaims—

"There! that'll do a treat, won't it, sir? A fair treat! My heye, ain't they warm!"

Poor little fellow! This is probably his first experience of wearing new and warm clothing.

"Now, you must understand," says the superintendent of the ragged-school, firmly, "that these clothes are only lent you to wear. They are not yours, for your parents or anybody else to pawn or sell. In law they are our property, and we lend them to you, and we can punish people who sell them. Do you understand?"

"Yus, sir—cert'nly, sir."

And, in the exuberance of his delight, he spins round sideways on feet and hands like a wheel.

This scene is illustrative of much of the work of the Ragged School Union in its jubilee year of 1894. Whatever may be the needs of ragged and destitute children, those needs the Union seeks to meet; and so it is now a Poor Children's Aid Society—of which branch Mr. Diggle, Chairman of the London School Board, is president—a Country Holidays Fund, and a succourer of suffering and crippled little ones, as well as an educational agency of a religious, industrial, and "secular" character.

Fifty years ago, when the Union came into being, it was no doubt chiefly educational; but its managers have always been ready to adapt its methods to the changing circumstances of the times; so that now, when the School Board reigns supreme and performs much of the former work of the Union, its day-schools number but thirteen, while it maintains in affiliation 264 Sunday afternoon and evening schools, with numbers of bands of hope, institutes, clubs, industrial classes, etc., and the distribution of food and clothing.

And who, it may be asked, was the real originator of the Ragged School movement?

As in some other enterprises, it is difficult to say that any one individual was the sole originator; but John Pounds, the poor Portsmouth shoemaker, is usually credited with starting the idea of the ragged-school. He was wont to gather the ragged urchins of the neighbourhood about him as he cobbled his shoes, and he taught them gratuitously.

Some of his methods would perhaps be thought too rough-and-ready to-day. He might ask his young scholars, for instance—

"What is in that pail?"

"Water."

"Spell it, then."

And, when this difficulty was over, he would charge his scholar to empty it.

Then he might ask—

"Have you been to the docks to-day?"

"Yes, and we saw a ship going to Aberdeen."

"Where is Aberdeen?"

This question formed a peg for a lesson, while the cobbler cobbled his shoes and his ragged urchins fidgeted around him, but listened.

But, whatever methods Pounds may have employed,

EARL COMPTON, M.P.

(From a Photograph by Russell and Sons, Baker Street, W.)

he was successful in keeping his "ragged-school" together for a score of years, until his death, which occurred in 1839, and his success induced others to undertake similar work. So far, then, as one man may be said to have originated the Ragged School movement, that man was the poor cobbler of Portsmouth.

But about 1843 much agitation occurred concerning education; and a prison inspector, writing on the statistics of crime, showed that ninety-two per cent. of prisoners were quite ignorant, or so poorly educated that their education was almost useless for social or moral elevation.

Further, Lord Shaftesbury—then Lord Ashley—drew the attention of Parliament, in this year, to the need existing for “diffusing the benefits and blessings of a moral and religious education amongst the working classes;” and his speech aroused great attention.

It was about this time that some gentlemen, already practically engaged as teachers, were wont to meet together and talk on the topic of “special schools for the poor;” but they had no scheme, and they hoped to find some existing society to take up the matter.

No society would do so, though the British and Foreign School Society would co-operate by voting school materials.

“If anything is to be done, then, we must do it ourselves,” they said.

“But what are we to do?”

“Well, we might find out the schools already in existence which admit the most destitute children, and discover if the teachers will join with a central body to support their particular interests.”

“Yes, that is the plan, and we will act upon it.”

It was in this spirit the few teachers received the discouraging intelligence that no society would take up their work. Like true Englishmen, they did not know when they were beaten; and at length the visitors were able to report that they had found about a dozen schools, in the whole of London, of the character described, and that these schools were agreeable to the plan of forming a union.

So that, four years after the death of Pounds, his idea had spread in the Metropolis to the extent of about a dozen schools.

This information having been gained, communication was opened up with Lord Ashley, and in the year 1844 the Ragged School Union came into existence, with his lordship as chairman, the present president being Earl Compton, M.P. So that, if Pounds was the originator of the idea, yet, among the founders of the Union, who did so much for the movement, were those few gentlemen who, acting on the principle of “doing for themselves,” formed the Society of 1844. Among these were Mr. Joseph G. Gent, who for long was its secretary, and died in its jubilee year; Mr. S. R. Starey, who is still living; Mr. W. Locke, who for about twenty years acted as hon. sec., and the Earl of Shaftesbury, both of whom have passed away.

The new movement owed much to Charles Dickens. He was greatly interested in ragged-schools; and, indeed, the name ragged-school was, it has been said, largely due to him. He thought it very expressive of the character and aim of the new kind of schools, and distinguishing them also from all others.

And what was the chief work of the new society?

Well, among its principal efforts was the formation of new schools; and so successful was it in this respect, that in ten years it had an average attendance of over 13,000 waifs and strays in its schools. Fifteen years later, the year before the School Board commenced its work, the numbers had reached 32,000.

FITTED OUT.

OFF TO THE HOLIDAY HOME.

"Yes," says Mr. John Kirk, the energetic Secretary, "and I have to keep hammering away at the fact that though the School Board has undertaken part of the work which we used to accomplish, yet we have still a distinct mission to perform. We so adapt our efforts to the ever-changing circumstances of the time that now the Union is a comprehensive machine for doing everything for poor children."

He hands you the last Report, which, in appearance, is agreeably different from many reports, being copiously illustrated. The summary of operations forms quite a long list of numerous agencies, from Sunday-schools to industrial classes, and from penny banks and school libraries to the sending away of some thousands of children annually for a fortnight's holiday, and the discriminate distribution of blankets and coals, food and clothing.

"Here is our clothes store," says Mr. Kirk, leading the way to an apartment at the back of his office. "Here we are, you see! Coats, boots, shirts—all kinds of things. We have a bill to pay now for boots."

Applications for grants come from all quarters, and any person may send an application; but it must be accompanied by a recommendation from, say, a School Board visitor or teacher who has personal knowledge of the circumstances of the case, and who also will undertake that a receipt shall be given acknowledging that they continue the property of the Society.

"And these bags, what are they?"

"They are full of clothes for our own schools, and are distributed there. Oh, the testimonies we receive as to the value of these garments are most touching. We sometimes get fifty applications in one morning!"

"Then you distribute your benefits not only through your own affiliated schools, but through Board-schools or other agency?"

"Certainly, and through workers among the poor, so long as we have a properly recommended application; and this is really no new departure on our part, for, from the earliest days of the Union, we used to collect clothing. Then we have helped many to emigrate, though there is not so much of that work now done as formerly, when the Government assisted the Council in this respect; but we may say that recent developments in this movement owe their beginnings to the efforts of the Ragged School Union. Indeed, the same might be said of industrial schools; they owe their origin to this Union."

"Then what is your Drift Branch, Mr. Kirk?"

"It is twofold in its operations; one, intended to bring under religious and benevolent influences those poor children who do not come into ordinary Sunday-schools; and then, secondly, to visit crippled children at their homes, giving special instruction to those who cannot attend school, exchanging books and toys among them, and bringing to the notice of the Surgical Aid Society and Invalid Children's Aid Association those suffering children in need of their assistance. The Council is grateful to any lady who will undertake to visit and interest herself in one or two of these crippled and ailing children of the poor. Last year no fewer than 291 Drift Meetings were held, attended by 59,920 children; and among other gatherings we had no fewer than 95 separate Weekly and Sunday Teas to Cripples, representing 3,718 attendances, and also a Cripples' Excursion to Wimbledon."

"Then there are, apparently, far more maimed and crippled children in London than might be supposed?"

"Yes, indeed, unfortunately there are."

So, then, it appears that at its jubilee the Ragged School Union finds itself full of work, if of a somewhat different character from that which occupied it at first. Frankly recognising the great change wrought by the School Board, so far as education is concerned, it seeks to supplement the work of the Board by religious teaching, and by social, industrial, and philanthropic efforts of various kinds, feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and visiting the sick.

KATY TREWARTHA'S WAITING.

CHAPTER I.

THE evening began to darken over the downs; the lights shone out one by one below in the little Cornish village, that crouched in a valley between the mighty cliffs that faced the Atlantic. Out of the misty ocean distance the great rollers came heaving in, a mile long, to break at the foot of the rocks in clouds of spray, and the mass of Tintagel grew faint in the dimness. Katy Trewartha looked at it all with melancholy eyes; it had never occurred to her that St. Treven was beautiful, or that there was anything particular to look at in the cliffs and sea that she had seen every day of her life. But to-night the vastness and majesty of it suited her mood—she was full of pain and trouble; the sea quieted her down. She sat quite still on a rough seat on the great headland, and waited. Katy was always a very quiet girl. She was tall and slender, with a sort of bend and sway in her figure, and her hair sprang up from her forehead in thick dark waves.

She sat and waited until someone came lightly up the downs behind her, and hurried up to where she sat—a tall, good-looking young fellow, with all the look of a sailor.

"I'm late, Katy, ain't I?" he said, with a cheerful laugh. "But I couldn't help it, my dear; I couldn't get away from 'em before."

"Don't, Tom," said Katy, drawing away from the arm he put round her waist. "I want to speak to you."

"Well, and can't 'ee speak so well that way, then?"

"No," said Katy, with a shiver. "I've got to tell bad news, Tom."

"Bad news, eh?" said Tom, with a long-drawn whistle. "Well, tell away, then. Maybe I shan't think it so bad; you're easy frightened."

"Oh, but it is terrible bad!" said Katy earnestly; "and the sooner I say it the sooner it'll be over. There's promise of marriage between us, but I'll have to take back my word. I can't marry you now."

"You can't marry me, can't 'ee?" said Tom, after a short silence. "You don't think I'm going to believe such a tale as that, Katy?"

"You've got to believe it, because it's true."

There was silence between them again for a moment; then the young man said, in a deep voice—

"Seems to me that when a maid gives her promise to wed, there ought to be a good reason for giving a fellow the go-by. I'm not going so easy, Katy. If you're tired of me, tell me straight, and I'll take it like a man—but I don't think so bad of 'ee. You're not like that, eh, my dear?"

Katy said nothing. She buried her face in her hands and sobbed. Tom Chynoweth rose impatiently, and began to walk up and down, with his hands thrust deep into his pockets; but he came back presently and sat down beside her again.

"Why for, then, Katy? you can trust me, my maid. There's nothing that shall come between us if so be as I can help it. Why, think a bit; it's only to wait six months longer, and I shall have enough to marry on. You ain't tired of waiting—eh, Katy? And I love 'ee as true as ever—you're sure o' that?"

"I'll tell 'ee just what 't is, Tom, and you'll think the same as me." Katy lifted her head and looked straight out to sea, or over the downs—anywhere but at the handsome face beside her. "Maria's dead. We heard it last night; and we've got to take the three children to look after: they were sent this morning. And mother's not so strong as she used to be; the washing's getting a bit beyond her already. So there's only me; and you see, Tom"—Katy's voice almost bro'ed, but she steadied herself bravely again—"you see, I can't get married."

"I don't see," said Tom sturdily. "What would they have done if you wasn't there, or if us was married already? I wouldn't ha' had a lot of brats about. Where's their father?"

"He left Maria two years ago, and went somewhere. We don't look for him to come back again."

"Send 'un to the workhouse, then."

"Mother would never do it; and I wouldn't, either," said Katy stoutly. "There's nobody else to take 'em, and they're such little things. Maria worked so hard for them, and kept 'em so nice, poor dear soul! And how can I leave mother to do all by herself, and her getting on in years? It's no use telling, Tom, I must bide at home; I musn't think of myself when my duty's clear."

"And what about me, then—eh?" Tom jumped angrily to his feet, and came and stood before her. "Do 'ee mean to say, Katy Trewartha, that you're going to throw me over just for a parcel of children? Do 'ee mean to make me the laughing-stock o' the place, just when I've settled as this voyage shall be the last, and I can settle down on shore? Children! what's the children to me? Send 'un to the workhouse, and you come along o' me, as you promised faithful. If you cared a pin about me, you wouldn't think of such nonsense, and so I tell 'ee."

Katy clasped her hands tight.

"Oh, Tom! oh, Tom!" she cried.

"Oh, Tom, indeed! Now, I tell 'ee what it is, Katy; here's your choice. Here's I, been waiting for 'ee six months, and been faithful and true to 'ee—so I have. You take me or leave me. If you say 'good-bye' to-night, 't is for always; you can't call me back again just when you want. I won't stop to St. Trevan's to be laughed at; and there's plenty of maidens other places as I can have for the asking." He turned to walk up and down at the edge of the cliffs.

The wind blew cold; Katy shivered as she drew her cloak close around her. She watched her lover striding up and down, in silent misery. Suddenly he turned and came back again.

"Katy, dear, you don't mean it? Don't be in a hurry. Wait a bit, and see, my maid." His arm was round her now, and he spoke softly in her ear. "You'll never give me up, will 'ee now, Katy?"

Katy sat still a moment. How strong his arm felt around her, and how resting it was to lean against his broad shoulder! The wind blew her cloak and hair; far off in the obscurity the revolving light on Trevoose Head gleamed out a minute, and then vanished again. Then a tremendous breaker broke with a sudden crash at the foot of the cliffs, and she started with a cry.

"Don't 'ee be frightened," said Tom, laughing; "ain't I here to take care of 'ee?"

But Katy pushed him away with trembling hands, and burst out crying.

"'Tis a poor tale for me, any way."—p. 662.

"No, no!" she sobbed. "You mustn't take care of me; 't is me as has got to take care of o' her people. The children, and mother—I've got to look after 'em all; and I can't be happy myself. But don't be angry—don't 'ee be angry, Tom!"

Tom Chynoweth set his elbows on his knees, and stared hard out over the dark sea.

"But I think all the world of 'ee, Tom, and I always shall. I'll never, never marry anybody but you. I don't hold you bound, but I hold myself promised to you: if so be as you'll want me, Tom."

"You give me your word for that, Katy," said Tom, looking up suddenly.

"Ay, that I do. I'll always be here if you want me, Tom. And maybe Abel may come back and take the children, and then I'll be free. I give you my word I'll wait for 'ee, if 't is years and years."

"'T is a poor tale for me, any way," said he moodily.

"Ay, and so 't is, Tom," said Katy sorrowfully; "and I'll never blame you if you get tired of waiting. But I can't help it."

Tom shrugged his shoulders incredulously. He still stared moodily before him. Katy looked at him a moment, and then laid her hand upon his shoulder.

"Good-bye, Tom," she said, in a choky voice.

"Good-bye, then," he returned gruffly, without turning his head; and Katy dropped her hand and went slowly away.

She went slowly over the downs, and down the steep path that led to the village. She stopped now and then and listened, but no quick footstep followed her. It was quite dark by this time, but she knew her way well. The wind blew her skirts and cloak about, and made her progress difficult, and it cut Katy to the heart when she met a couple, lovingly intertwined, coming up the hill in the face of the wind; it was Molly Yeo from next door and the young fellow out of the grocer's shop.

"Eh, Katy Trewartha! Is that you, and all alone?" called Molly after her, with a laugh.

"Yes, it's me; and I'm all alone," cried back Katy through the dark; and she laughed too, that Molly might think nothing of it.

She went up the little steep street, where the women were hanging about the doors, gossiping with each other. Two coasters had come into the harbour that day; the "One and All," was full of riotous merriment. "Good-night, Katy," called a voice to her here and there as she went up the hill. The church clock struck eight; and as she neared her own home the crying of a little child struck upon her ear.

She hurried on and opened the door. The firelight shone cheerfully in the little room, and showed her mother sitting by the fire, with a little crying child in her arms, which she rocked and hushed. Two others, a boy and girl, played and scuffled together on the floor.

"Well, so you've come at last, Katy?" began her mother, in a high, fretful voice. "Whatever do 'ee stop out to this time for, and me wanting a cup o' tea so bad!"

"I'll get it in a minnte," said the girl, as she took off her cloak.

"No; you come and take the child. Maybe it'll hush with you, and I'll make the tea."

Katy came obediently, and sat down with the baby in her arms. The crying stopped. Katy's arms were tired with her day's work, and her eyes were heavy with the tears she would not shed; but the little soft weight in her arms soothed her, and she stooped and kissed the soft little baby hand that fell so helplessly on hers. And when her mother had got her cup of tea—that panacea for all woes in Cornwall—and came and sat down, Katy told her news.

"I'm not going to get married," said she, looking straight into the fire. "I told Tom this night that I'd have to stop and look after the children. And he was very angry."

"Well—you're a good girl, Katy," said the old woman. She stared at the fire too for a little while, silently. "I niver thought much o' Tom Chynoweth, an idle good-for-naught. He'll have forgot all about 'ee in a month's time."

"No, he won't," said Katy firmly.

When the children were put to bed, she went to a drawer and took out a little box. It had originally contained fancy biscuits, and had a highly coloured portrait of Emin Pasha upon the lid; in it Katy kept all her treasures. She took out a little photograph of Tom Chynoweth, dressed in his best, and looking very stiff and uncomfortable. It was a dim, badly coloured little picture; but it was beautiful to Katy. She looked at it admiringly through her tears. All the house was still, and the heavy sound of the sea came upon the wind; the little children breathed softly in their sleep.

"My dear, my dear!" sobbed poor Katy, rocking herself to and fro upon the floor. There was no need to keep back her tears now.

CHAPTER II.

LIFE was very dull in St. Trevan's after that.

"Have ye heard that Tom Chynoweth has gone off to Appledore?" asked the eager neighbours of Katy, with a pleasurable anticipation that perhaps there had been a quarrel, and Katy's lover had left her. They wished the girl no harm; they had always known her simple and hard-working; but Katy had always kept to herself a good deal, and if her pride was to have a fall, they might as well see how she took it. But Katy took it very simply: she had known that he would go.

And from that time she set herself to her life without looking back. Other girls might have lovers, and pride, and pleasure; it was different for her. She toiled at the washing that her mother let slip little by little; she filled up all the odd corners of time by working to keep the children neat and clean. Katy had little time for fretting, and still less for talking with the neighbours.

But now and again she would hear a scrap of news which brought the colour to her cheek and a quicker beat to her heart. Tom had got a ship at Appledore, the Charlotte Ann. No, he was at work on one of the coasters that ran to Cardiff. Then she heard that he was taken on in one of the ship-building yards at Appledore. But he never came back to St. Trevan's.

So the years went on, storm and sunshine; drought and plenty; life and death; until Katy was twenty-six years old, and the fever came to St. Trevan's, and the little ones of the place went down before it. One by one Katy's charges sickened; one by one they slipped away from the little cottage on the wind-swept Cornish coast, and went out to the happiness beyond, and Katy found herself free at last. Free indeed, but with a dreadful yearning in her heart for the little faces and voices, and an aching longing for the little children that had filled up her time, and called on all her efforts, and had been a drag and responsibility upon her.

Johnny had been such a manly little fellow; how proud Katy had been of him when he started off for school every morning! And Emily was just getting to be such a clever little maid about the house; while baby was the darling of Katy's heart, and the clasp of her little fevered fingers burnt yet upon Katy's hand. But they were all gone, and the house was very silent, and Katy worked on still; and Tom never came. The last she had heard of him was that he had shipped on board of a vessel bound "foreign," but that was last year, and she knew nothing of where he was now. But Katy waited still.

CHAPTER III.

"It's hard that you'll have nothing to say to a fellow, Katy! And all because of Chynoweth, who has likely forgot all about you by this time," grumbled Parker, the coastguardsman. "You'll never see him again. I know what those fellows are. He's forgot you by this."

"No, no," said Katy, a beautiful faith shining in her eyes; "Tom hasn't forgot. I don't look for him to come just yet, either."

Parker looked at her admiringly. He was from the east country, and the soft Cornish voice and pretty Cornish face of Katy Trewartha had captivated him as soon as he came to St. Trevan's. He was a square-built, sturdy man, with honest blue eyes and a short fair beard. All the little children in the place liked John Parker, and so did Katy—but, as she said, she held herself promised to Tom, and thought of no one else.

"But if he never comes, Katy? And how long will ye wait for him?—for just so long I'll wait for you."

"Don't talk to me so," said she softly. She had been taking in the clothes that had been put on the furze-bushes on the downs to dry; the great basket lay at her feet. "There's plenty of maidens in the place would make 'ee happier than me. And I'm promised, and I can't go back from my word. Why, Tom might come any day. He might be in that ship out yonder."

She pointed to a little speck of sail in the heaving sea.

"And if he is," said Parker seriously, "I'd advise him to steer farther out to-night. There's bad weather coming on, or I'm much mistaken. It's a bad coast to be off."

It was a terrible coast. Long jagged reefs of rock ran out from the great cliffs, sharp-edged fragments reared themselves everywhere; where the sands had been swept away by the sea, the grim substratum of rock appeared in long ribs and sharp-pointed ledges, ready to destroy ships and men. The night was coming; it darkened already over the sea, which lay sullen and leaden, heaving in long rollers towards the cliffs.

That night the wind rose almost to a hurricane. It blew straight on the land, and the shriek and roar of it kept Katy and her mother awake for hours.

"Ay! God pity they poor souls on the sea to-night!" moaned old Mrs. Trewartha; and Katy shivered as she wondered where Tom was. But at last she fell asleep, to be wakened suddenly by a loud report.

Katy sat up in bed startled. It was quite dark still, and in a moment she heard a sharp hissing rush, and the glare of a rocket lit up the tiny square of the window. She ran to the window and looked down towards the ocean, and as she looked, a faint blue light burned and flickered in the darkness.

The girl burst out sobbing and crying. "Mother, mother, 't is a ship on the rocks!" she cried. "I must go down to shore to see."

"Lord save us, Katy! Put your cloak on, child!" cried the old woman; "and come you back and tell what ship she is, and if there's men."

Katy huddled on her clothes and ran out of the house, panting and sobbing with excitement. She found herself soon in the middle of a crowd of women, all wild with excitement, too. The mighty wind blew them back—the sand, whirled up from the shore, struck and stung their faces—great masses of solid foam flew past them—the roar and howl of the wind and sea deafened them. The women shrieked and screamed to each other as they fought their way along; all the village was afoot, and the faint grey of the earliest dawn was chill upon them all. They hurried on to a sheltered place near the shore, where they could see the black outline of the ship tossed up against the grey sky, at the end of a long reef of jagged rocks.

The men were all clustered in a dark group on a little stretch of wet sand; they had got the rocket apparatus down, and Katy saw the long black lines of the ropes hanging in the air above the boiling sea. Even as she looked, the dark figure of a man came sliding down from the ship—was lost in a cloud of foam—caught and tossed by a huge wave, and finally dragged in to the land by the united rush of the coastguardsmen. It was all confused in the faint light; it seemed like a dreadful dream to Katy. The little crowd of women shrank together and watched, and now and then a figure would struggle up from the shore, to be hailed with anxious questions. The ship was the Endeavour, bound for Appledore; there were eight men on board—four were got off already.

"Eh, my dear!" screamed a stout woman, "it might be our men like they poor things, one day!"

The men on shore worked up to their waists in water. They fought with the waves for each rescued man, and as the half-drowned sailors came ashore, a cheer was raised from all the onlookers that could scarcely be heard above the uproar of winds and sea.

The light grew stronger over the grey sea and the pitiful spectacle of the broken ship; and more stragglers began to come up the steep path from the beach.

"They'm all took off now!" shouted a woman who came up drenched with spray, and a shawl held tight over her head. "They'm going to take 'un into the 'One and All'—poor half-drowned souls they be!"

It was Parker, the coastguardsman, who came up the steep behind her, and he stood still and beckoned to her as she turned and ran back. He had been hard at work with the rocket apparatus, and was drenched with sea-water; there was a great cut across his forehead, and the blood dripping from it had stained his flannel vest red in places.

"Tom's eyes opened slowly and looked at her again."—p. 665.

"Are they much hurt?" called Katy through the wind.

"All a bit shaken and bruised, and one hurt bad," shrieked back the woman. "The doctor's down there with 'un. And the ship's breaking—she'll go next tide!"

Katy turned and ran homewards. She had to get her mother's breakfast, and the old woman would be eager to hear all about the wreck. She sped back over the cliff path and down to the village as well as she could for the wind. The day was broadening now, and the sun shone stormily now and then from between the driving clouds. As she hastened up the street she heard a shout behind her.

"Katy! Katy Trewartha!"

"You're hurt?" cried Katy, anxiously, as she came up to him.

"No, no—nothing to speak of. But he's down there—Chynoweth!"

Katy gave a gasp and caught at his arm. All the world seemed to go round her in that moment.

"Ay, it's Tom Chynoweth. "But, my dear"—and Parker took hold of both her hands firmly—"he was the first man that come off the ship, and he's hurt."

Katy shut her mouth tight, and drew a long, sobbing breath.

"After all these years!" she said, wringing her hands, and the sailor watched her anxiously. But Katy did not cry.

"Take me to him, quick!" she said, clinging to his arm. "I can't walk against the wind; it mazes me so. And did he ask for me?"

"Well—no," said Parker reluctantly. "He didn't ask. But I thought you'd like to know. Just as he was getting near enough for us to catch him and pull him in, a big wave took him and must've dashed him right smash on a rock, poor fellow! The doctor's with him, and he says he's hurt inside."

Then Katy burst out crying as if her heart would break. She never knew how she got to the "One and All," a humble little public-house that was generally the centre of all the St. Trevan's dissipation. To-day it was surrounded by an excited crowd, who could scarcely be kept from entering, though the inside was crowded already. In the kitchen the rescued sailors were being attended to; the sanded floor was wet in the passage with the drippings from their clothes. Everybody hurried to and fro, and talked in subdued whispers. One of the men had broken down completely; he sat in the little parlour with his head on his arms, sobbing hysterically.

"Do 'ee take and eat summat, now do 'ee, there's a dear man," said the landlady sympathetically. She was frying eggs and bacon for their breakfast, and the odour of it filled all the little house; and through the bustle and confusion Parker led Katy to a little room at the side.

It was a small low-ceiled room, with a tiny window looking out upon the sea. On a settle lay somebody with closed eyes; the doctor had bandaged his head and one arm; from all his clothes the water dripped on the floor.

Katy stared at him, pale and perplexed. Was it Tom? Had five years changed him like that? But when he opened his eyes and looked at her, Katy knew him, and ran forward with a little cry, and fell on her knees beside him.

"What's this? What's this?" said the doctor sharply, turning round from the table, where he was busy with bottles and glasses.

"T is me, sir—Katy Trewartha that was promised to him," said Katy simply, with tears running down her face.

"Ah! yes, yes, of course," said Dr. Thorne. "Well, you must be quiet, you must be quiet." He was a fussy little man, with a nervous fidgety manner. "Now, can you stay with him a minute while I look after some of the other poor fellows, eh?"

"Yes, sir," said Katy; and the little doctor bustled out. There was a strange smell of some medicament in the room; a clock ticked loudly on the little mantel-piece. A longing came over the girl to stop it: it seemed as if it was ticking away the minutes of Tom's life. She found herself counting the ticks as she knelt there, holding his hand. His eyes were shut again, and Katy looked at him with a strange feeling. His hair lay in a wet mass on his forehead; his hand was very cold and heavy in hers. And outside the sunlight grew and broadened, and the wind rushed and tore at the little window.

Tom's eyes opened slowly and looked at her again.

"T is Katy," he said, in a thick, shaking voice.

"Yes, my dear, 't is me," she said softly.

He spoke with painful effort. "I want 'ee to write a word for me."

"Yes, yes, Tom; but you mustn't talk," said Katy anxiously. "Wait a bit, do."

"No, now. I don't know when I may go. I'm bad." He lifted his hand to his breast, but let it drop again with a moan of pain. Katy rose and bent over him. There was a little coarse bag tied round his neck by a string.

"Do 'ee want me to take it off?" she asked, controlling herself by an effort.

His eyes looked up into hers appealingly. Katy cut the string with trembling hands and took off the bag.

"T is four pound," went on the shaky voice. "You send it—her—at Plymouth."

"Send it—who?"

"My wife—tell her—the rocks—"

His voice died away, and his eyes fell shut again. The ticking of the clock sounded louder than ever to Katy as she stood there, holding the bag in her trembling, toil-worn little hands. She heard the rough murmur of voices in the kitchen, like something very far off, and the scent of the medicine in the room sickened and confused her. She felt as if she had been struck.

"It ain't much. Poor Bess—and the little 'un!" Katy still stood silent; something in her throat would have choked her if she had tried to speak. But as Tom moaned, and murmured again something about the "little 'un," all Katy's heart melted in a passion of pity.

"Don't 'ee fret, now—don't 'ee fret," she sobbed, kneeling down again beside him. "I've saved some money, and I'll send it 'un too, so I will."

He lay quite quiet now, and Katy watched beside him as quietly. And at the turn of the tide her watch was over, and she went away silently through the curious crowd, and went up the street and home to her mother.

That was the end of Katy Trewartha's waiting; but as time went on other interests grew and multiplied in her life, and made up to her for what she had lost. She kept her word, and sent her savings to Tom's wife at Plymouth, but she never heard anything more of her.

And when John Parker was moved to another station further down the coast, he asked Katy once more to marry him, and this time met with no refusal. So she began life again in a new place, and left behind her at St. Trevan's all the memory of her sorrow and waiting.

Holy Ghost, on Thee I call,
Friend and Comforter of all,
Hear my earnest prayer, oh, hear me!
Lord, Thou hearest, Thou art near me.

"YE SHALL NOT BE AS THE HYPOCRITES."

AN ADDRESS TO LITTLE BOYS.

BY R. SOMERVELL, M.A., ASSISTANT MASTER OF HARROW SCHOOL.

IN the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus first spoke to His disciples about the Kingdom of Heaven.

For a long time there had been no Jewish kings. Persians, Macedonians, Syrians, Egyptians, and now at last Romans, had ruled over Judea. And when those who were listening to Jesus first heard Him speak of a Kingdom, many of them fancied that here at last was a leader who would restore the ancient line of David. Galilee was full of young men, ready to join anyone who would help them to throw off the hated Roman yoke, who would drive out the Roman soldiers that garrisoned Jerusalem, and kill the Roman procurator who governed them.

But these listeners were disappointed and puzzled, for Jesus did not say what they expected. When we hear of a kingdom, we think of a nation inhabiting a territory; of its size, its army, its wealth, its trade, its population, its conquests. On these topics Jesus said nothing. He passed them all over in silence, and spoke only of one thing—the subjects of the Kingdom; and he said nothing of their numbers, or their occupations, or where they were to be found, but only of their character. "The Kingdom of God," as He afterwards said, "is within you." Wherever there is a man living in obedience to the Spirit of Christ, there is the Kingdom of Heaven. It is not bounded by any sea or river, and its government is over the hearts of men.

This, then, is one of the sayings of our Lord about the subjects of the Kingdom of Heaven: "Ye shall not be as the hypocrites." Hypocrite is a Greek word, and means an actor. An actor on the stage, to amuse his audience, pretends to be Hamlet, or Becket, or Wolsey. This is professed "acting." It is play. But there is a great deal of acting not on the stage of theatres only, but in real life. This is full of harm; it is not play at all. "Ye shall not be as the actors."

To show exactly what He meant, Jesus drew three pictures of actors, or hypocrites, in real life: the man who acted generosity, the man who acted worship of God, and the man who acted fasting.

(1) The first wishes to be thought generous, and announces with a trumpet the fact that he is going to do somebody a kindness. He is not thinking of the kindness, but of the admiration he will get for it.

(2) The second acts worship. He wishes to show how strictly he keeps the Jewish rules for daily prayer at fixed times. He is in the street at the moment of prayer. He stops his business, and stands with eyes upturned and repeats the sacred words, but his heart is not with God. It is in the street, where he fancies his neighbours are wondering at his piety.

(3) The third picture is of the man who fasts. He denies himself some of the ordinary meals or comforts of life. But what is his object? That he may give himself to prayer? That he may conquer the lusts of the flesh? No; he wants to be thought a man of high principle and of a self-denying spirit, and so he appears with face unwashed and haggard, and head unanointed, and men admire his austerity, and, as Jesus said, "he has his reward."

When we read these words of Jesus, I think we are apt to feel a little self-satisfied. We do not boast of our generous deeds; we never dream of standing praying in the streets; we do not fast; and if we ever perform some act of self-denial or some piece of unusual generosity, it is not our nature as Englishmen to make a noise over it. We do not want to be thought more religious, or more generous, or more high-principled than we are. We do not act goodness.

Well, suppose this is all true! It is not quite true, but it is partly true. These are not the temptations of boys.

But there is a lesson here for us too, just as pointed as for the acting Pharisee of nineteen hundred years ago. "Ye shall not be as the actors."

The Pharisee thought to get credit and popularity by acting generosity, by acting religion, and by acting high principle.

Our temptation is still to be actors, only in a different way and from different motives. We are tempted to act so as to hide our principles, to smother our generous feelings, and to conceal our religion. The Pharisee's temptation was to act a goodness that was not really in his heart, that he might win praise of men. Our temptation is to act—shall I say a badness, that is not in our hearts, to pretend we are unprincipled, or ungenerous, or careless about religion, in order to avoid what we fancy may be the contempt of other boys?

And to pretend to be bad is in some ways more dangerous than to pretend to be good. The man who acts generosity from mean motives may perhaps some day learn that "it is more blessed to give than to receive."

But the boy who stifles the voice of conscience for fear he should be thought to be setting himself up as a saint, will soon cease to hear the voice of conscience at all.

Let me give you one or two familiar illustrations of the way this temptation may come to you at school.

(1) Take high principle. You may find yourself at school with boys who do their work unfairly; who copy other boys' exercises, and show them up as their own work; or use a crib, and pretend they have done their translation themselves. You know these things are wrong. Left to yourself, you would not do them. But perhaps you will be tempted to hide your principles, to pretend that you see no harm in copying and cribbing, to become a hypocrite of the baser sort, to "act" the part of a dishonest boy, though in your heart you despise dishonesty.

(2) Now think of generosity. There is, in your study or your form, a boy who, from some misfortune of appearance or manner, is unpopular, is a little bullied, is made the mark for unfeeling or unkind treatment. At heart you are sorry for him. You know he has his good points. A little exertion, even a few half-playful words, might turn the tide in his favour; but it is easier to swim with the stream than against it, and you will be tempted to conceal your kindly feelings, to say nothing, or even to join with the ungenerous and thoughtless tormentors. You will "act" the bully to save yourself trouble. Before long it will cease to be "acting," and the generous impulses that once moved you will be dormant or dead.

(3) Lastly, to complete the parallel, think of religion. The hypocrite painted by our Lord acted prayer. You may be tempted to act neglect of prayer.

Or suppose you have formed the good habit of reading your Bible at bed-time. You are in a room with a boy you have never seen before. He shows no signs of reading his Bible. Will you act a carelessness you do not feel, sooner than know that for half a moment he may do—what? Perhaps look to see what you are doing! And, alas! perhaps he too is waiting to see what you will do; and if you had only dared to be, not a miserable actor, but your true self, both of you might have been kept from breaking off a wise and helpful practice.

For this is the case over and over again in life. Other boys are acting as well as you, and are ashamed and tired of the farce. It needs but one brave spirit to throw off the mask, to dare to be himself; and he may save not himself only, but others, from the misery of a violated conscience.

Poor cowardly Reuben dared not say a word for Joseph at the pit, but formed a secret plot to save his life. And all the while Judah had an uneasy conscience, and would have backed him up; but Judah dared not do more than suggest slavery for Joseph instead of death; and so all Reuben's good resolutions came to nothing, and he had to join in the lie with the rest.

There is a lesson for us in our Lord's words, little as His illustrations seem to touch us: "Ye shall not be as the actors"—not as the actors, but as yourselves, with all the generous instincts God has put in your young hearts, with all the memories of your mother and your home, with all the lessons of honesty and manliness you have learnt here. Be true to your best selves: that is, be true to the spirit of Christ that is in you. This is what we wait at the great schools to which you must soon go; this is the great need of the Church and of the world—not actors, but men.

HOW TO BRIGHTEN LIFE.

I.—HINTS TO TIRED WORKERS.

"Tired out we are, my heart and I.
Suppose the world brought diadems
To tempt us, crusted with loose gems
Of powers and pleasures? Let it try.
We scarcely care to look at even
A pretty child or God's blue heaven.
We feel so tired, my heart and I."—E. B. B.

PERHAPS, from a woman's point of view, there is no poem of all the century's expressive of such utter prostration as that of Mrs. Browning from which this verse is taken. The lines run through the whole gamut of that heart-weariness which, with a highly strung woman, is inseparably connected with physical exhaustion, and then culminates in that curious apathy to the good things God has given us—a pretty child or a stretch of blue sky—which is the infallible sign of being absolutely overdone.

A tired worker—a woman who has kept on and on, with nerves at stretch, and with fuller claims upon her bodily powers than they ought ever to receive. A brave, spirited attempt to do one's ablest, and to keep her little kingdom, be it the blessed home-life or a wider sphere of action, as well cared-for as lies in her power. Then an inertia following on this brave feeling, and a cui bono wonderment which saps her energies, and makes a labour out of duty. And lastly, this painful apathy, when the responding to the daily calls upon her becomes merely mechanical and an affair of usage, and the one desire of her life is to lie down somewhere and have a lengthy rest. A tired worker—a very, very tired worker.

And yet life goes on the same. Whether we dance or fret through it, go nobly or ignobly, still the day's work comes to an end, and the sun sets alike on the evil and on the good, only to rise again upon the morrow. And so it is surely of importance that, as we have to go on whether we like it or not, we should try to arrive at how to brighten this life which work has absorbed for its own, and how to make existence easier, both for ourselves and for those around us.

And here let two things be duly noted. First, that this modest little paper has no intention of entering into vast questions, or of dealing with the amelioration of the lot of the many, but aims at merely suggesting a few practical hints for the saving of the individual. Secondly, that it is not its province to dispute with those who hold the depressing notion that so long as duty is done, no pleasure should be sought for. There is the unanswerable argument that as God saw fit to create much beauty and delight for the mere perfecting of His work, we can hardly think to support a tenet more godly than God Himself; and with that let the vexed subject be ignored.

To start with, then, cultivate as much beauty as is possible in your daily surroundings. I know a woman at the present moment who, debarred from more active service—being, indeed, unable to move from her couch—has taken a couple of rooms in one of those East End parishes which a ghastly dreariness and monotony have marked for their own, on purpose to make her home a harbour of refuge to tired workers by reason of its prettiness. It is the most artistic and cosy nook in the world, this rose-curtained room, though probably a very few pounds of actual money would buy its contents, and to it the over-worked clergy, the busy doctors, the nurses, and the visitors amongst the poor come throughout the day to snatch a few minutes' relief from that moral and physical greyness with which they are hourly battling. If you were to ask this little knot of workers how this cheap comfort, added to the richness of the unpurchasable welcome, can so refresh and strengthen them, their replies would, I think, prove to you beyond doubt that fatigue can be either vastly accentuated or vastly relieved by one's surroundings.

There is no difficulty about the matter. To a person of ordinary intelligence it is just as simple to place the furniture at angles which delight the eye, as to range it all round the walls with work-house-like precision. Then, again, few of us are so poor but we can afford a few pence for those hardy ferns which flourish famously within doors; and when it comes to buying fresh belongings—well, it is a popular fallacy to believe that the pretty things are necessarily the dearer.

Again, make a point of discovering "whatsoever things are lovely;" for they, too, will rest you. I was in the train once when it came to a standstill between the stations. It is not a beautiful spot, that stretch between Battersea and Chelsea; but on that particular afternoon there was a most gorgeous sunset. It really was of extraordinary beauty, and though I lack the power to describe it, its exquisite radiance was too perfect ever to fade from my memory. I glanced round at my fellow-passengers—a white-faced girl, holding a roll of music, a couple of navvies, and a harassed-looking man, who was probably a clerk—and it is hardly credible that they were all staring persistently the other way out on to the grey roofs of the dismal houses. On the one side God had spread such magnificence that no one with any tender memories of days that are gone, or with unspoken hopes for the distant days to come, could gaze at it unmoved. On the other was a colourless panorama of man-raised hideousness, and they deliberately chose the latter. I fancy that many "workers" would be less "tired" at times if it occurred to us that there are invariably two outlooks on which to turn our eyes.

Another great assistance towards brightening life is to manage a ten minutes' rest in the middle of the day. This is a point equally insisted upon by medical men, those doctors of the body, and by the clergy, those doctors of the soul, and yet it is a point to which not one worker in a hundred will pay the slightest attention. We all know perfectly well that in the long run a ceaseless strain injures the nerve-system, and consequently affects our powers of self-control, and yet we behave as if the knowledge in no way concerned us, though possibly our home belongings could tell a different tale. If you—you individually, who are skimming this paper—would make it as much a matter of course to lie fallow for ten minutes at a stretch once in the twenty-four hours, and other than when you are in your bed, you would find the accruing benefit incalculable. To the objection that the time is packed too closely to admit of any such leisure, common sense would instantly affirm that if so, the sooner the time is unpacked the better, for such a state of things ought not to be.

Honestly, it helps one. Not at first, of course, for when a woman is over-wrought—and since the normal condition of work is healthy and natural, it logically follows that to be "tired" in the performance of it proves that she is over-wrought—she is very apt to imagine that the universe will fall to pieces if for one instant she relax her endeavours. But when that feeling has been conquered by the negative strength of refusing to be influenced by it, then its advantages will make themselves felt. Don't try to read, or even to pursue any sequence of thought; just try to vegetate. That "change of occupation is rest" shares the fate of many another wise saying in being appropriated by the wrong class of people. It is for those who are bored such a proverb holds true, though the word rest might be more accurately rendered as relief; while for those who are genuinely weary it is a mischievous, because a too bracing, doctrine.

And the same warning may be applied on a bigger scale. At holiday seasons it is a very common error to map out what sights shall be seen, what places shall be visited, what fresh interests shall be created; and this manner of proceeding for one who is sorely flagging is foolishness itself. What is wanted is opportunity for recuperation; and to go on the Continent or elsewhere "abroad"—which vague address implies that even usually lazy folk are working like galley-slaves—or to go to a fashionable seaside place, where one meets the same friends, eats the same foods, exchanges the same little round of ideas as in town, is, I say again, mere foolishness.

No; if you wish to gain good, don't pursue it; let it come to you. Go for a week to some thatched-roofed village hostelry, and spend your time sitting in a field, gazing at nothing in particular, and thinking of nothing at all. By the third day, granting no disease but lassitude, you will have recovered sufficiently to take a healthy interest in the arrival of the one daily post, and to compliment your smiling landlady on the snowy whiteness of her lavender-scented sheets.

Or if your tastes lie in another direction, go on the river; for solitude and nothing whatever to do are the sole objects in view, and for all practical purposes they can be come at as easily at Cookham as in Surrey or Hampshire. To lie flat on one's cushions, idly watching the sunny rippling of the water from the leafy refuge into which the boat has been drawn close under the bank, is a prescription for tired workers which has seldom been known to fail.

If you demur that home ties bind too closely, and cannot be loosened for even so short a space, then it is to be feared that you have been fastened upon by that gravest of faults to which, probably, the more conscientious amongst us can be liable: you lack sense of proportion. Which is better: to allow those we love to be somewhat less comfortable for a few days, or to ensure to them the considerably greater discomfort of nursing us through a nervous fever? Which is better: to wilfully push aside this chance of recuperation God has placed in our way, or to lower our pride to the extent of asking some kindly relative or friend to fill our place in the house while we go in search of health?

This same teaching ourselves to lie fallow bears fruit in other ways as well. I once read a clever essay on "The Enforced Pauses of Life," which, if my memory serve me aright—for the book is not here to verify it—was written by "A.K.H.B.," and in it was pointed out that from these pauses, as with almost everything in this life, good can be gleaned or ill, according to the predilections of the gleaner. The truth of this contention is undeniable. For instance, take the sudden stoppage of a train. The delay is most vexatious; the behaviour of the officials is disgraceful; really someone should be hanged, pour encourager les autres. It is very easy to lash oneself into what is popularly known as "a state of mind"—which means an inflamed and irritable state of mind—over the mishap. It is at least as easy to take it philosophically. This enforced pause means an extra breathing-space; the paper that was being hastily coned can now be finished in peace; it is undoubtedly pleasant to feel that one's safety is being cared for, and the signals properly regarded.

It is entirely a matter of training, which rapidly develops into a matter of habit; but the difference to the nervous system is enormous, and when a worker can go through the day without worry, fuss, or fume, the tiredness which comes at the end of it is largely discounted.

The stoppage of the train is, of course, but a single case in point; but a multitude of opportunities over which, if we choose, we can save ourselves, occur daily in the lives of most of us.

To conclude. The axiom that as we face the world—be it with a brave front or a despondent one, in a friendly spirit or in an unfriendly—so will the world face back again on us, holds eternally true.

We may work so hard that amusement is an unknown quantity in our lives, and yet, if we so will it, we may gather more enjoyment than do the majority of people. We may be kept so unceasingly to the "musts" of existence that its gentler phase of inclination is absolutely beyond our ken, and we may feel (as a friend once worded it) as if half our powers and creations had died within us from pure lack of usage. And yet, if we so elect, we may be fresher, sunnier: in a word, we may be happier than even possibly those kindly hearts which pity us for the drudgery of the daily routine.

And this is so because, by God's great goodness, we are permitted in this particular to do our sowing and our reaping at one and the same time. Sow kindly smiles; small courtesies; do

" . . . the little kindnesses,
The rest leave undone, or despise," and for which no one is ever too busy, and on every hand you will reap a rich harvest of kindness and comfort.

But if you will go on year after year—not from hopes of reward, and not from strong personal love, but just because you know how hard life can be at times, and because you would soften it, if possible, for those around you—then, by the beautiful gratitude there is in the world, you will find that you, in your turn, are being helped over stony places, and that though things may tire, people are often restful. Babies look at you with sunshine in their blue eyes; children's outspoken affection is a panacea for greater woes than mere fatigue; casual acquaintances seem to be in league with actual friends to spare you on every possible occasion. In short, though the work remain, thank God! the tiredness, thank God again! has almost totally vanished.

Does this seem too blissful for prosaic fact? Indeed, no. Such blessedness is very real in some hard-worked lives, and the teaching is very enduring that as we sow we reap.

THE LANGUAGE OF DUMB ANIMALS.

GOD'S HAND IN THE BOOK OF NATURE.

BY THE REV. E. G. JOHNS, M.A.

BRIAN.

"Come here, come here."

O F all God's gifts to man, that of speech is the most wonderful, not simply because of its value to himself, and the power which a mastery of it bestows on him in his intercourse with others, but because the gift was to him alone, as distinct from all other living creatures. The whole world of Nature, indeed, is full of sounds; the earth, the sea, the very sky, the trees of the woods have a voice; and all the creatures that inhabit field, wood, desert, and plain utter their own cries of want, pleasure, pain, love, or anger and fury, which others of their kind recognise and understand. But not one word of articulate speech is to be heard among all the varied sounds, whether sweet as the song of the nightingale, harsh as the cry of the raven, or savage as the roar of the lion in the forest by night. Long ages ago, when, at the Creator's command, they first sprang into being, they uttered these same sounds, fraught with the same meaning, uttered in the one same fashion as now still prevails far and wide over the earth. Some of these creatures, indeed, may have wandered from land to land, and undergone many changes of climate, from heat to cold or from cold to heat; but, wander as they might, no change has befallen them as to instinct, habit, or cry, or mode of making known the passion of the moment, whether of joy, anger, hunger, or love.

bee that hummed

"Let me out, please."

among the flowers of Paradise sang her quiet happy song, as her far-off descendant now sings it in the cottage garden or among the white clover on the hill. The lark that with a burst of melody hailed the first dawn that broke over the Garden of Eden uttered the same joyous strain that every village child may now hear as morning shines over the hills. The music is unchanged and unchangeable. The voices all abide as God made them, and fill the earth with light and beauty in many a place that would otherwise seem dull and dark. Thus the world of Nature, in her own tongue, heard a thousand times, again and again speaks to all who will listen and hear the message, and echo it with heart and lip.

And yet, too, there are times when that same world of Nature speaks by silence, so deep, so unearthly, so full of living thought, that none may escape from its pleading voice :

"Night reigns in silence o'er the pole,
And spreads her gems unheard ;
Her lessons swift may pierce the soul,
Yet borrow not a word.
Noiseless the sun emits his fire,
And silent pours his flashing streams ;
All silently the shades retire
Before his rising beams."

Thus, alike by countless sounds and by the deep sway of silence, things animate and inanimate breathe the message with which they were charged by Him who gave to each its own place in the world, its own power, and its own work. And all these are unconscious of the message they bear, and know not what speech or silence mean. To man alone, as the lord and master of the earth, did the Creator of all give the supreme gift not only of speech, but to know by slow and happy degrees the meaning of the words that flowed from his lips, whether for good or evil, darkness or night.

We may, indeed, teach a parrot to prattle a few broken scraps of broken sentences—to call herself "Pretty Poll," or her mistress "Sweet!" A starling will learn to chatter, and even a canary has lately been trained to whisper a string of shrill words as cleverly as his teacher. But all these, and a score of other such tricks, are but empty sound to the utterer, and convey the same meaning whether repeated backward or forward, having in them no more reality than the cry of the cuckoo clock.

The language of "DUMB ANIMALS," as we call them, is a far different and better thing : full of meaning—meaning which the utterer knows and understands right well : full of sounds which he never uses but when he has something to say. My dog Brian, for example, a highly bred, well-trained fox-terrier, has a very good vocabulary of his own, which he uses sparingly, with infinite tact, and so cleverly that I am beginning to understand what he says and means. He has a dozen different kinds of bark, each having its own tone, key, and expression. When I catch up my hat and stick, and say the words, "Out," or "Go, Brian?" his tail quivers with excitement, his brown eyes sparkle with joy, and his three short happy barks answer as clearly as words can : "All right ; look sharp ! I'm ready !" Half an hour later he is chasing a rabbit across the down or the field-mice along the edge of the clover ; but his bark then is totally different, though full of joy. All at once we come upon a poor tramp who is lying face downward in the thick grass, sound asleep. Brian walks very slowly up to, and once round, him : tail erect as a ramrod, but not a word ! Then, as I also stop, he gives one short, sharp, peculiar bark, which says as plainly as possible, "Now then, my man, move on!" I hold up my finger, and away he goes again after a rabbit, with a whole string of happy barklets as he gains upon bunny, and thinks perhaps of a savoury supper. Not long ago he got shut into the green-house, and for a time could not be found. No one chanced to go that way until his dear friend little Violet went in search of him, and heard his piteous bark of entreaty : "Please, let me out, out, out!" Very seldom indeed is his voice raised in anger; but that same night, when we were all sound asleep, and the whole house was wrapped in silence, he suddenly woke us all by a series of short, sharp, angry ejaculations—linked together by a slow growl—that showed that something was going wrong, indoors or out, of which he did not approve. Until the next morning nobody knew what was the matter; then it was plain enough. Some vagrant boy or man had dared to come down across the paved garden-path, and carried off a towel hung out on the hedge to dry. Brian had heard his footsteps, though we did not, and faithfully uttered his protest. He often has long talks with our black kitten, Sally, with whom he has been brought up, licks her face, and whispers all sorts of idle chatter in her ears, which she perfectly understands, and answers in her own fashion by loud purring or an occasional angry ejaculation, to which he pays careful attention.

"Night reigns in silence."

A PERFECT UNDERSTANDING.

Precisely by the same instinct, and in her own special dialect, the hen talks to her chickens as they wander about the lawn. By one note she calls them out to feed in the morning, to be good children and follow her steps. By another, if Brian chases them, she says, "Come here, come here, and be safe under my wings!" By a totally distinct cry, or cluck, she tells them of some special dainty found in the grass or among the dead leaves. Or if a hawk suddenly sweep down across the garden, she cries out in wild alarm, "Fly to me for your lives, children, all and every one, or you are lost!" But to us only, creatures in the image of Him who created all things, by whom alone we live, and move, and think, and have being of body, mind, and soul, to us comes the Divine gift of speech in intelligible and intelligent words, of which we know and can measure the meaning, the beauty, and the power. So that, as the Master teaches and saith to each of us: "By thy words thou shalt be justified, or by thy words condemned."

THE BOOK OF RUTH.—IV.

BY THE RIGHT REV. W. BOYD CARPENTER, D.D., LORD BISHOP OF RIPON.

WE have seen three acts of the little drama of Ruth; now for the fourth. But in order that we may be intelligent spectators of its scenes, we must be content to master a little piece of Jewish law.

That sounds dry; but, fortunately, the law of ancient days was more primitive and picturesque than in modern times. Now we have old tomes, withered-looking parchments, and men whose faces partake of the hue of their documents, gathered into a stuffy, uncomfortable building, yept a court; and the proceedings are dreary, through the endless reference to legal precedents and the jargon of strange technicalities. Then, the law-courts were held in the open air, beneath the clear blue of heaven, and in the public ground at the city gate, where the varied dresses of the Orientals of town and country gave brightness and life to the scene; and the law, which was the application of some custom or distinct precept, was administered by the grave Easterns—the aldermen of olden days.

To understand the customs out of which the special law in question arose, we must bear in mind the exigencies of early human society. In the times of more primitive civilisation, when central government and its great machinery of social balances was not understood, and was, in consequence, weak to protect the people from local oppressions, the feelings of family sympathy and obligation were strong. People might be living under one ruler and united as one nation, and yet be exposed to grievous tyranny on the part of some local or provincial magnate; and there were no police to appeal to. Consequently, families and tribes held close to one another, and recognised the obligation of mutual protection; and the head of the family or chief of the tribe became a kind of leader, who was bound to afford redress and safety towards his kindred. Out of this feeling of the need of a strong clanship among those of one blood arose in very early times the custom of Goel: a Hebrew word, which is translated kinsman. In any difficulty or injustice the weak had a recognised right to appeal to their Goel. The cases in which this appeal was most frequently made were three. In the case of a murder or manslaughter, the Goel was expected to do the part of the avenger of blood. In the rudest times, the duty of the blood-avenger was exercised in the most reckless manner. When it was known that one of a family had been slain by the member of some other family or tribe, the next of kin, the Goel, was bound to exact the penalty of death. No opportunity of explanation was sought, and the unfortunate and unintentional manslayer might be struck down unawares by the Goel, who had tracked him and watched his opportunity of revenge. In certain tribes, as a recent instance in North America has shown, the law of retribution required death, even though the actual manslayer was not found; and thus often an innocent member of a tribe was sacrificed to the bloody spirit of family revenge.

Another duty was marriage. The Goel, on the death of his kinsman, was bound to undertake the duties of husband towards the widow of the deceased. The women on the estate were treated as little more than a part of the goods and chattels which passed over into the hands of the next of kin. The women were in those days bought by their husbands, and consequently were regarded as Real Property.

These two offices of the Goel existed before the time of Moses. There was much that was immoral in both of them; the customs, however, were too strong to be abolished altogether, and the simple duty of Moses was to impose upon them such limitations as would remove as far as possible their demoralising tendency. He limited the law of revenge by establishing ten cities of refuge, and ordering a fair legal investigation. He limited the law of inherited wives by ordering that the Goel should be bound to undertake the duties of husband towards the widow when there was no heir, and that then the inheritance should be retained in the nominal possession of the original branch of the family. A third duty was the redemption of land. If from any cause a family fell into straitened circumstances, and were obliged to sell their estate, the property was not to come into the open market, but was to be offered to the Goel for sale; and his right over it only extended till the next jubilee, when all estates passed back into the hands of their former possessors. Such was the law of the Goel; and according to Mosaic institution and Jewish feeling, it was a disgrace to any man who refused to fulfil the duties of Goel when called upon—nay, the account in Deut. xxv. 5-10 shows us that the man who refused to undertake the marriage duties was liable to indignities which in every age would be resented, and which, among Eastern peoples, would be regarded as peculiarly offensive. In the presence of the assembled elders of the city, the wife, or rather widow, of the kinsman deceased was allowed to pull off the shoe of the reluctant Goel, and to spit in his face, and to brand him with the nickname of "Bare-sole," or "Shoeless Fellow"—or, as we should say, "Shabby Fellow."

Such was the ancient law; but custom seems to have mitigated its asperities, as we shall see in the case of Boaz and Ruth; but the principle of the law still remained in force, and this law is to be the instrument through which restored property is to come to the house of Naomi.

The first scene in the last act presents us with a bright picture in the East. The reaping is nearly over, and the work of winnowing is in full progress. The fresh evening breeze is favourable for that purpose. The threshing-floor is formed by beating down the ground and rendering the centre as hard and smooth as possible; then the sheaves are spread out and the grain is trodden out by cattle. A large wooden fork is used for turning over the straw, or holding it up, or tossing it across the wind, to separate the grain. It was a busy and an anxious time; in the work, all, from the masters to the lowest, took part, and as the fields were filled far and near with the roughest and loosest classes, the greatest vigilance was exercised, and prudent masters would not leave their corn all night; but when the threshing or winnowing for the evening was over, they could take their simple meal and sleep on the threshing-floor. All around, the fields were filled with the labourers slumbering beneath the open sky, among the straw or beside the sheaves. Boaz, industrious and prudent as he was, slept out among his own work-people. This is the time chosen by Naomi when Ruth should claim his protection. The busy day, when the labourers were working and the master's attention was required in one part of the field and then in another, offered no fitting opportunity; but in the quiet night she may gain an opportunity of putting forward the claim. Ruth accordingly goes to where Boaz is lying, with his head resting upon a heap of corn and his long robe gathered round his feet, and lifting the skirt of the ample robe, lies down at his feet. A man who is sleeping out of doors purposely to watch his corn and protect it from robbers would soon become dimly conscious that someone was near. Boaz turns; there is someone there; he reaches out his hand; there is someone; and seriously he asks, "Who's there?" "I, Ruth," is the answer, "come to seek your aid, for you are one who has the right to redeem," i.e., the land; but Boaz knows that the duty extended to marriage as well as the buying of the land. Was there any secret sorrow in the life of Boaz? Had he met with bitter experience of womanhood? Is there not the ring of an ancient sorrow in his words? (Ruth iii. 10.) Has he found women self-seeking and frivolous? or is he one of those men who, though rich, has such a lowly opinion of himself that he thinks no young woman will care to cast in her lot with his? and why should they, when there are young and warm-hearted men around them? Something of this kind seems to be suggested by the glad way in which he welcomed Ruth's claim. He felt that there was some sacrifice on her part, and valued the gentle goodness and loyal obedience which Ruth had displayed.

Accordingly, while Ruth, laden with corn, trudges back to Naomi, Boaz is on his way to the city to put the law in motion.

Act iv., Scene 2.—It is the early morning, and the stir of city life is just beginning in Bethlehem. If we wish to see it in its fulness, we must go to the "gate." The gates of ancient cities served the purpose of markets, law courts, public meetings, kings' levées, military rendezvous. What the market-place is in the small country towns in England will only give a partial idea of the various uses to which the gates of Eastern cities were applied. Here the news was told, bargains were made, causes were heard, Cabinet councils were held, and public proclamations were made. A very few Bible references would show us what places of public resort the gates were. Absalom repaired to the gate when he sought to gain popular support (2 Sam. xv. 2). David sat in the gate to hear the first news of the battle against Absalom (2 Sam. xviii. 24). Here all gossip was circulated (Ps.

lxix. 12). Here public audiences and levées were given (2 Sam. xix. 8). Here deliberations took place and embassies were received (1 Kings xxii. 10, and Jer. xxxviii. 7, and also Ps. cxlvii. 5). A relic of the same use of the gate is to be found in the word so common in our ears now—the Porte, used as a name for the Ottoman Government.

In the gate Boaz took his place. He had hardly done so before one passed by whose presence was essential to the settlement of the matter which Boaz had undertaken. Boaz was a kinsman, and ready to redeem the land of Naomi and marry Ruth: or, in short, perform the duties of Goel; but he was not the nearest kinsman, and therefore, according to Hebrew law, the opportunity must be given first to the nearest of kin. It was the only man who stood between him and Ruth who was passing by, and therefore, using what has been thought to be a legal summons, a kind of subpoena, Boaz hails his kinsman: "Ho! such an one, turn aside and sit down." And the kinsman turns aside and sits down; but the little court has to be summoned, and so Boaz and the kinsman wait till they have been able to press into service the ten men—aldermen of the city—to serve as a kind of jury upon the occasion.

Then Boaz opens the case. He is acting on behalf of Naomi; and as her agent, he has to offer for sale the land which was formerly Elimelech's, and which perhaps was heavily mortgaged. The option of purchase is formally offered to the kinsman; his answer is that he is quite willing to buy the land; it will quite suit his interests to become the possessor of some more property. Perhaps Boaz heard this with dismay, for he had fallen in love with Ruth, and Ruth went with the land; but at any rate we can admire the straightforward way in which he dealt with the whole affair. He simply therefore states that the duty of the Goel in this case involved marriage with Ruth as well as the redemption of the land. On hearing this, the kinsman demurs. "Land, property, that is all very well; but the woman, and she a Moabitess" (and it may have been with an interested feeling that our friend Boaz laid a little emphasis on the fact that the young woman was a Moabitess; but still, this was quite right, as many a Jew might have felt that, however willing he might be to do the duty of Goel, he was not bound to do so in the case of a foreigner, as there was a law against marriage with strangers: two laws met in conflict); so at any rate the kinsman felt that the woman spoiled the whole affair, and he was unwilling to mar his own inheritance. But how would it mar his inheritance? Either because he had a superstitious dread that a marriage with a foreigner would bring bad luck, or because he did not wish to run the risk of a second family, which would be a burdensome charge on his whole property. As long, in fact, as he thought there was a nice little profit out of the affair, he was willing to undertake it; but when he discovered that it was only to be an act of duty, with little or no profit, and probably some loss, he declined to have anything to do with it. He is an example of the hundreds who will take up religion for the profit of it, but who don't care to saddle themselves with its duties. If religion is a little addition to their respectability, or a little guarantee of their professional integrity, or a warrant of ultimate safety in the next world, they are all for religion; but when it is the expenditure of thought, labour, or money: when it makes a strong and lasting claim upon man's whole love, and attention, and conduct, then they will have none of it. But the kinsman's refusal opens the way to the fulfilment of Boaz's wishes. Ruth is not there to pluck off the kinsman's shoe and to spit in his face: those rough ceremonies have passed into desuetude; but the custom prevails of taking off the shoe, and giving it in token of a transference of rights. This was the custom, says the historian: plainly intimating that this custom had ceased at the time he wrote. So he narrates the old custom with the glee of an antiquary, and tells how the kinsman handed Boaz his shoe in sign that he gave over his claim; and how Boaz calls the ten grave aldermen and the crowd to witness that now all rights in the land and in Ruth the Moabitess have become his. And then the good-natured people, who know and respect Boaz, wish him every happiness; and so the little court breaks up.

Act iv., Scene 3.—One scene more the historian gives. It is the home, and the gossips of Bethlehem are crowding in to see the "baby;" and Naomi has seized upon the child and constituted herself its nurse; and all the amiable old busybodies have found out (Oh! funny world, that finds out people's merits in their prosperity, but is very blind to the merits of the needy) that Ruth is "such a dear good creature;" and so the story, like the good old-fashioned tale that everybody abuses, yet everybody loves, ends by telling us how they married, and lived happily ever after.

I.—OBSERVE THAT SIMPLE FAITH AND SIMPLE DUTY SELDOM GO UNREWARDED.

Few lives have been governed more in little things by the simple sense of right than those of Ruth and Boaz. "Is it right? Then it must be done." This is the word of duty; and faith comes in with another word: Then it must be best, too. It is not right to leave Naomi to go to Bethlehem alone; therefore Ruth goes. It is not right that we should live by begging; therefore Ruth works for her living. "I might glean, but is it right?" so, to make sure, she asks permission of the bailiff. It is right to claim the protection of Boaz, so that Naomi may be provided for; therefore Ruth claims it. It is right to give the kinsman the chance of redemption; therefore Boaz gives him the offer. All through the story the under-current is—Is this right?

See the reward. Ruth wins the love of a good man, the joy of a happy home, and that which makes such joy deep and lasting: the knowledge of the eternal and all-gracious God of Israel. Boaz wins a loyal and true wife, the merry prattle of children in his home.

II.—THE IMPORTANCE OF THE LESSER LINKS IN HISTORY.

The Bible has certain peculiarities over other books, and these must be noted before the drift and structure can be understood. The Bible is a collection of different books, but these are bound together by much more than the covers of the volume: they are bound by the unity of purpose which pervades them. Book after book opens upon us; but they are as the galleries and ante-rooms of a palace, all of which are leading us to the throne-room: histories, ceremonies, types, shadows, heroes, prophets—all point onward to Christ. "The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy." And this little Book of Ruth—so different from other books—so simple, and so apparently unconnected with the great Christ-witnessing books of the Bible: it is a simple pastoral story, but it supplies a needful link in the larger history. It would not be quite true to say that the raison d'être of its appearance is explained in the genealogy with which it closes, for the story has its sweet natural lessons; but the pedigree it gives is of value, showing as it does that the family of Boaz was that from which the noblest of Jewish kings sprang. It, too, is linked with the genealogy in Matthew, which reminds us that the rich reward—the richest of all rewards—is this: that Boaz and Ruth find their immortality in being included in the ancestors of Christ.

People will be great—in the far future—only as they are linked with God's greater purposes. The selfish kinsman is forgotten: a nameless thing, a mere piece of driftwood on the ocean of being. But these, Ruth and Boaz, because thus linked with the family of Christ, are lifted out of the sphere of provincial obscurity into the gaze of the world. So always: they as ancestors, we as children, will find the best and noblest honours in being sons of God—heirs—joint-heirs with Christ.

III.—THE INGATHERING OF THE GENTILES.

Ruth—Ruth the Moabitess. It is a wonder to find her honoured, her story told, and the book named after her, by a people who scorned the alien; but the book is the witness of the free love of God. God is no respecter of persons: in every nation he that feareth Him and worketh right is accepted with Him. St. Peter was surprised into the admission—even the apostles found it difficult to believe that God had granted unto the Gentiles repentance unto life; and when St. Paul spoke of it, he spoke of it as a mystery which had been kept secret till the Gospel came to proclaim the Gentiles fellow-heirs in the privileges of Divine mercy and love. Yet the Book of Ruth had given the hint beforehand when it had shown how the stranger and the foreigner was made a fellow-citizen with the holy people and adopted into the household of God.

And did it not hint also the deeper moral truth, that the age of privileges generally brought about a time of insouciance, and that the moral power, zeal, and devotion of the less privileged put the possessors of privilege to shame? Such faith—no! not in Israel—was Christ's witness. The Kingdom of God shall be taken from you and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof—i.e., using their opportunities, and so valuing their privileges. And Ruth had borne witness to it. She had been the Israelite indeed in the hour of Naomi's need. Out of the foreign soil had sprung up the purer and holier growth of love, self-forgetfulness, devotion—the type of the many who should come from east and west, and sit down with the Father in the Kingdom, while the children of the Kingdom should be cast out. The branch which blossoms out of the ungenial soil is the strongest witness against the unfruitful boughs growing in the richer ground. It is reasonable to say more is expected from those to whom the more is given, but the commentary of facts is often against our expectation. Witness Thessaly, the house of the gods, the richest land in Greece—a barren name, a cypher in history—nothing god-like ever sought by her. But lo! the contrast—Attica, with her hard and churlish soil, foremost in the race of glory—ruling in her day, and ruling in the thoughts of men till this very hour.

And what, then, of ourselves? See, upon us what magnificent gifts of God are bestowed: a land free, rich, lighted with the radiance of glorious memories, dowered with the pure light of celestial truth; but are we foremost in the race of love, beneficence, evangelisation?

And what of each upon whom the opportunity of grace and truth has fallen? In distant lands thousands are glad who hear of Christ, but we hear with dull ears.

And when every alien is welcome, not Ruth only will be received; we are sure of love and rest in the family of our God.

ONLY A CHILD!

A STORY IN TWO PARTS. BY MARY E. BELLARS.

CHAPTER III.

"So pure and innocent, as that same lambe,
She was in life and every virtuous lore."
SPENSER.

THE months passed quickly away, although everyone did not think so. While Captain Raleigh was broiling in India, doing his duty according to the expectation of a sanguine country—while Sir Rupert Silchester, bored with the bush, as he had long ago been bored with civilisation, was coming to the conclusion that marriage would at least be a not more uninteresting experiment than any other—while Miss Neale was leading the usual life of a beauty of the period—little Sybil Chorlton was enjoying a new experience. Miss Henderson gave her her first glimpse of Swiss mountains and glaciers, and showed her many a lovely spot immortalised in poetry and prose. They lingered by Italian lakes, and they wintered in the Riviera. Sybil saw Venice—the dream-city—with its canals, its palaces, and the great square where St. Mark's rises in all its glory. She wondered at the masterpieces of old John Bellini, of Giorgione, of Titian, of Paul Veronese. She went to Florence, and missed neither "the startling bell-tower Giotto raised," nor the soaring dome of Brunelleschi. She mused in San Marco with its memories of heroic martyr and artist-saint; she explored the Pitti and the Uffizi, and thrilled before Buonarroti's "Night and Morning" in that "small chapel of the dim St. Laurence." And she spent Easter in Rome—Rome, with all its revelations of a world-wide empire fallen into ruin, its cypress avenues and ilex-trees, its treasures of art, and its wide Campagna. The despoiled Miss Penefather, justly considered by Mrs. Lansdale to be "not up to modern requirements in education," had yet known how to inspire her pupil with a thirst for knowledge, and to kindle in her a bright intelligence. Sybil looked, inquired, listened, and learned. She naturally gained a great deal of useful information—nice hard facts which would have counted in a companion who could appreciate and sympathise, whose brain and heart were alike trained, disciplined, and cultivated. So that travel, with Margaret Henderson by her side, continued Sybil's education. It could not complete it, because life itself is the great competitive examination—but she also gained insight, discrimination, and sympathy, which are perhaps even more valuable than a knowledge of facts and figures. For wherever she wandered—whether she sailed over the blue waters of Lake Lemano and gazed at "sky-pointed peaks," or revelled in the vivid colouring of the Cornice, whether she glided in a gondola over slumbrous canals, or traced the footsteps of Dante in Florentine streets—she had with her a teacher, and the process goes on indefinitely. But she was no longer "only a child" when she went to stay with Lady Mary Chorlton and prepared for the ordeal of her first season, though she was still charmingly fresh and simple. She had not acquired the art of flirtation, though she had had several admirers during her sojourn abroad. But Margaret had taught her that love is the great gift of human life, and is to be prized and revered. Now, reverence, as we all know, is incompatible with desecration. The memory of a certain soldier who had told her of heroic deeds the summer before, and whose own career, though he had said little about that, had not been undistinguished, was still kept green in her faithful little heart.

" 'You don't mean that he is dead?'—p. 681.

She did not sigh over it or allow herself to be unhappy about it, but almost unconsciously she set him up as a standard by which to judge other men she met. Up to this time, all of them had seemed to her to come short of it. She was not ashamed of that past feeling of hers, for, on looking back, she believed Captain Raleigh to be worthy of her girlish enthusiasm. She remembered nothing ignoble either in his character or conduct—all was chivalrous, true, and high-principled. Only one thing jarred upon her. She hated to think of that evening when he had hung over Catherine Neale's chair and had kissed the ribbon hanging from her waist. Something in these demonstrations to such a woman offended her delicate feminine instinct. What Arthur never detected, for he was a man and was caught in the meshes of Catherine's beauty and fascination, the undimmed vision of the simple girl discerned at once.

One bright day in June, Miss Neale, who was very intimate with Lady Mary Chorlton, found Sybil alone. She felt no contempt for the latter now, for there was not the same difference between them that there had been a year ago. Sybil was pale and slender still, but she had acquired grace and distinction, and the frock she wore that afternoon would have done credit to Miss Neale's dressmaker. That means much to the initiated.

"Well, little one," said Catherine, meditatively, "so you have been presented. You have done your duty—always a refreshing, if a rare, experience. And now you must be shown off, and, if possible, well married."

"What do you mean?" asked Sybil, with pardonable indignation.

"You will know in time. Yet, though I feel it to be inevitable, I don't like the idea of a fresh little creature like you coming down to the level of a veteran like me."

"Captain Raleigh——" began the girl, eagerly.

"A charming, but quite an impossible person," said Catherine; "a true Paladin, in fact. I can only regret that he lives in the Victorian era instead of the days of Charlemagne."

"How can you, of all people, say that?" asked Sybil.

"Why, I am just the person to do it. He is certainly sans peur et sans reproche: but I am excessively modern myself, and know what is suited to modern requirements." Then, seeing that Sybil looked bewildered, she added, "I hope, my dear, that you don't intend to overwhelm me with confusion by continually reminding me of that little affaire de cœur. It was madness, and nothing will ever come of it. Captain Raleigh himself has forgotten it by now."

"He has not forgotten it," asserted Sybil, in a low tone. She felt almost choked with indignation.

"Does he say so? You were a great favourite of his, and I daresay he writes yards to you," suggested Catherine, indolently.

"I have never heard from him in my life."

"And yet you vouch for his remembrance of an old flirtation. Be wise, Sybil, and vouch for no man. They are never to be depended upon."

"And women?" asked the girl.

"Oh, worse than the men, if possible," replied the other. "You see, my poor dear, into what a world you have been introduced. That reminds me—did you not meet another old friend of mine—Sir Rupert Silchester—in Rome?"

"Yes," said Sybil. She blushed as she spoke, and Catherine watched her closely.

"Did you like him?" she asked, after a moment's pause.

"Perhaps he was a little too modern for us," answered Sybil, catching up her companion's own phrase and trying to appear at ease. "Miss Henderson and I were distinctly old-fashioned."

"Ah, but you were not too antique or even too mediæval for him! I heard a wonderful tale, do you know, of little Sybil Chorlton—a mere child when I first saw her a year ago—who yet had the strength of mind to refuse the best parti in England."

"Who could have told you?" cried Sybil, aghast. The older beauty had cleverly drawn a bow at a venture, which had hit the mark. For Sir Rupert Silchester, visiting Rome on his way to England, had indeed met Sybil, had been attracted, and had finally come to the conclusion that Lady Silchester must be a girl in her first youth—all freshness and enthusiasm. He followed Sybil to all the sights of Rome, and never once felt bored. True, he studied neither painting nor architecture—he only listened to Sybil's lively comments and watched the changes of her expressive face. And then one day he asked her to accept his hand and name, with the privilege of wearing those magnificent diamonds so coveted by Catherine Neale.

She refused him absolutely and promptly, with the utter want of appreciation of the good things of this world which is the privilege of extreme and unspoiled youth.

Sir Rupert could hardly believe his own ears. That he, with his historic place in Monmouthshire, his shooting-box in the Highlands, his villa at Nice, and his house in Park Lane, should be rejected by a provincial banker's chit of a stepdaughter, was bad enough. But Sir Rupert was a very handsome man, and was supposed, not without reason, to be a dangerous one. More than one fair woman had looked into his bold blue eyes, half-fearing and half-hoping for some fresh excitement in the weary daily round of social dissipation, and had had cause to rue that idle glance for the rest of her days. No wonder, therefore, that he felt disgusted with this stupid little girl, who showed so plainly that he had not the slightest attraction for her. He did not love her, for men of that stamp do not know the meaning of the word; but he vowed that, after all, he would win her, and then—woe to the vanquished! Whether he married her or not, Sybil should suffer for her unflattering rejection of his suit.

But Sir Rupert had reckoned without Catherine Neale. She had seen something, and she had guessed more. Now, Sybil's dismayed exclamation turned suspicion into certainty. "My dear child," she said, feeling a decided element of comfort in the situation, "everybody knows everything in this wicked world, especially if it is a question of someone else coming to grief. But how Sir Rupert must hate you! There is not another girl in England that would have done it. It is too funny!"

She certainly seemed to think so, for she leaned back in her chair and laughed until the tears came into her eyes. Sybil was quite relieved when Lady Mary appeared and visitors arrived, though it was embarrassing enough to find that Sir Rupert Silchester was one of them. But she sheltered herself behind Margaret Henderson, and the gentleman, though he threw a good deal of expression into his handsome eyes, did not address himself very much to either of them. Then he looked at Catherine Neale, and realised afresh what a beautiful woman she was. She was more brilliant than ever, and there was a touch of mockery in her smile.

"So you enjoyed your wanderings?" she said, as he took a seat by her side.

"Not particularly. The whole thing was rather a bore."

"What! both the Old and the New World?"

"Ye—es, both. The New World was, I fancy, a shade more fatiguing than the Old. Don't care, you know, for bushranging, myself."

"Yet I should have thought that more to your taste than doing pictures and antiquities in Rome with a little girl fresh from the schoolroom," she remarked, audaciously.

"What do you mean?" he asked, considerably disconcerted.

"Did you really think a little provincial chit like Sybil Chorlton could have refrained from telling everyone that she had refused the honour of becoming Lady Silchester?" said Catherine. "If so, I am sorry to disenchant you. You ought to have remained in the forest primeval, or whatever they call that sort of thing."

Sir Rupert glanced savagely at the "provincial chit" in question, who was talking to her beloved Margaret. She looked just what she was—a modest, refined, and lovely girl—a lady in the best sense of the word. Then he turned to Catherine Neale, who, though only twenty-four, was a finished woman of the world. There was magnetism in her slow smile and in the glance of her strange and beautiful eyes. Sir Rupert made his choice in that moment.

"Do you believe," he whispered, "that I made that little girl an offer?"

"She mentioned it just now as an amusing incident of her travels," replied Miss Neale, with a light laugh. She was triumphing, and she knew it. "Certainly, I could never have imagined it."

"I want to speak to you," he said, impatiently. "Can you see me presently? What time will you be at home?"

"I will ask my mother. She was to call for me, and no doubt the carriage is here by now."

Mrs. Neale was merely a lay-figure in the estimation of her daughter's intimates, and did not even pretend to control her daughter's movements. It was therefore in a very chastened, not to say humble, frame of mind that Sir Rupert followed Catherine down the stairs, and saw her to her carriage. Meek Mrs. Neale, however, assured him that they would be in Bruton Street by six.

"And I may call then?" he said, brightening up.

"If you are in the mood," answered Catherine, with that slow smile of hers. She drove away with exultation in her heart, and Sir Rupert turned aside, haunted by the magic of her glance and thrilled with the touch of her hand. Yet just then, men and women through the country were reading and discussing bad news from a remote corner of the far East.

It was not more than a year ago since Arthur Raleigh had parted from Catherine Neale with all the tenderness of an affianced lover; yet such are the changes and chances of this mortal life that at that very moment he was lying desperately wounded, unconscious of anything but the supreme anguish of pain and thirst, and she was eagerly looking forward to giving herself to another man in exchange for a position, a good settlement, and the Silchester diamonds. Margaret Henderson, who had time to study the telegrams in the evening papers, wondered whether Miss Neale had yet heard of a certain treacherous outbreak in the remote hill-country. She wondered, too, whether Sybil Chorlton—a mere child only last year—had a sufficiently tender remembrance of her soldier friend to be seriously affected by the news that he was only reported "missing," while some of his comrades were known to be dead.

Strange to say, the child heard nothing. She was at a concert that evening, and drank deep into the divine harmonies of Beethoven and the haunting melodies of Schubert. Some quaint, fanciful strain brought before her mind the Brockhurst garden, bright with sunshine and gay with flowers. She saw her old self perched on the little camp-stool, and, with a curious thrill, she saw Arthur Raleigh's kind and manly face, as he told her of perils by land and by water. "God take care of him, wherever he is!" she breathed.

Lady Casterton gave a garden-party at her villa by the river next day. She was one of the best hostesses in society, and her place was a lovely one at any time. But on that never-to-be-forgotten summer's day it was looking its best; and Sybil, as she gazed at the blue sky above and the green-sward below, as she noted the spreading cedars and the exquisite flowers, as she watched the gay throng and listened to the murmur of the river and the fitful music of the band, thought that fairyland itself could not be more delightful. And people were "so kind." Indeed, it would have been strange if that bright, girlish face had not excited a good deal of interest and admiration; and Sybil, in a quiet way, was quite a success.

"I fancy I have never enjoyed a garden-party before," said Guy Torrens, as he walked by the side of Lady Mary Chorlton's pretty niece.

"How strange!" exclaimed Sybil in astonishment. And as Mr. Torrens was the most popular man of his set, perhaps it was rather strange.

"Hardly fair to praise one lady to another, is it?" he said. "But how well Miss Neale looks to-day! Silchester is looked at last."

Sybil suddenly became aware that Catherine Neale was very near her, and that Sir Rupert Silchester was in close attendance. If for a brief period Sybil's simplicity and freshness had attracted him, there seemed no doubt that he was subdued now by a more potent enchantress, and that the spell was a powerful one. Never, surely, had Catherine looked more beautiful, and many times in years to come, Sybil felt again the thrill of admiration mingled with repulsion which she experienced, as she watched her deliberately, by look, and smile, and word, enchain Rupert Silchester's senses as she had done Arthur Raleigh's in days gone by.

"This is a queer world," observed Mr. Torrens, with pensive philosophy. "I don't know why it should affect me particularly on this occasion, though. After all, men die every day after one fashion or another—perhaps it matters little which. But then, don't you know, the last time I met poor Raleigh was at Lady Mary's Dorsetshire place, and no one knew whether he or Silchester would win the beauty. Now Silchester has it all his own way, while poor Raleigh——"

"You don't mean that he is dead?" gasped Sybil.

"As a mere child she fell in love with you."—p. 683.

She clutched the young man's arm, and her eyes dilated as she waited for his answer.

"Why, Miss Chorlton!" he cried, thoroughly frightened, "I did not know—I thought——"

"What is the matter, Sybil?" asked her aunt, as the girl almost fell into a seat by her side. "Are you ill? —Is she ill, Mr. Torrens? —Do speak, my dear child."

"Tell me," Sybil said, in low, unnatural tones, "do you say he is dead?"

She heard it all at last, and to her dying day will never forget that sheltered seat by the river, with the light laughter and the sounds of music which came like a mocking refrain between the confused, stammering explanations of Guy Torrens.

"He may not be dead," said he; "only one would always rather die than fall into the hands of those wretches."

This was the last straw. Sybil heard no more.

CHAPTER IV.

"The dire years, whose awful name is Change."

GEORGE ELIOT.

DAYS and weeks followed of dreary illness; and when at last she recovered her strength, Sybil shrank from another appearance in the gay world. She knew by that time that Arthur had not been murdered. His was one of those stories which redeem our modern life from a charge of universal commonplace and insipidity. Far away, among the wild tribes of the hills, there lived a dusky girl whom he had once rescued from insult and danger, and who had straightway loved him with Eastern passion. She would fain have followed him wherever he went, and she neither comprehended nor appreciated his chivalrous efforts to place her where she could be fed and taught, and kept from evil both of body and soul. And when that treacherous outbreak took place—when his companions were murdered, and the two or three English ladies who were in the station escaped from awful peril by forced marches, by heroic endurance—Arthur Raleigh, dangerously wounded and left for dead, was saved by the devotion of the girl he had befriended. Margaret Henderson, with tears in her eyes and with faltering voice, read to Sybil such details as were allowed to appear in the newspapers—only Arthur himself could have told her all. And on the very day when the Lord Bishop of the diocese united Sir Rupert Silchester and Miss Neale, a poor girl in the far East, finding that the Sahib whom she had saved had only gratitude and kindness wherewith to repay her devotion, put an end to a life which had no longer any value for her. She was only a heathen, and knew no better; but perhaps the contrast between the two women was not all in favour of Catherine Neale.

Years passed on, as years have a trick of doing, until Sybil woke up to the fact that it was her thirtieth birthday. She did not regret her vanished youth; she had learnt some of Rabbi Ben Ezra's lessons, and she felt that "Our times are in His hand

Who saith, 'A whole I planned; Youth shows but half; trust God; see all, nor be afraid.'"

Yet her eyes were dim with tears as she pondered over the past. There were faces "loved long since," that were now "lost awhile"—notably one, the kindest and the dearest. After Sybil's illness she had lived almost entirely with Margaret Henderson, and had been to her as a daughter. But Margaret had gone before into that Better Land which holds so many of our choicest treasures in safe keeping.

Amongst Miss Chorlton's most valued friends she still reckoned her old governess, Miss Penefather. This lady had considered that Girtton and Newnham might furnish her with Leutenants of light and leading, while she undertook the not unimportant task of making girls as bright, as happy, and as good as she could. So she had opened a school, and "Highfield," as it was called, had become a great success. As Sybil's thoughts turned affectionately towards Miss Penefather on her own thirtieth birthday, she little thought that on that very day the crisis of her fate would be decided at Highfield.

She had never seen Arthur Raleigh since he left Brockhurst as Catherine Neale's lover. He had been very little in England: he might, indeed, almost have been dead, so far as Sybil was concerned. And though between the most distant earthly country and that undiscovered one "from whose bourne no traveller returns" there is a supreme difference, yet she was too sensible and too dignified to dwell much upon the remembrance of a man who never gave a sign that he recollected her existence. But on that eventful day Colonel Raleigh happened to go to Highfield, for he had promised some anxious parents in India to look up their little Mabel and Kitty, confided to Miss Penefather's care. He was shown into a pretty, home-like room, and began idly to examine the books and photographs near him. With a sudden shock, he became conscious of a face he knew. There was a water-colour sketch of a girl's head resting upon a draped easel, and though it was exquisite in workmanship, it was not on account of its artistic merits that it produced such an effect upon Colonel Raleigh. It was because it was a ghost from the shadowy past—that past which he strove so earnestly to forget, full as it was of bitter memories and broken pledges. But, in spite of its association with the woman who had darkened his life, Sybil's face, with its earnest eyes and the waving masses of dark hair falling on either side of it, appealed to him strangely. What had become of that little girl? he wondered. He was full of the idea when Miss Penefather came into the room, and he asked her if the picture on the easel did not represent Miss Chorlton—doubtless she was no longer Miss Chorlton; but he had been absent from England so long.

"She is not married," said Miss Penefather.

"What is she like now?" asked the Colonel abruptly.

The governess showed him a cabinet photograph. "It is a beautiful face," he said, "and it looks like a face with a history. She was a charming girl. Is she as good as she looks?"

"She was my pupil," replied Miss Penefather, smiling, "and no doubt I am a partial critic. But I once read an epitaph which a man of genius caused to be written on the grave of one whom he loved and mourned. Two or three lines of it will describe Miss Chorlton."

The Colonel bowed, and looked at her inquiringly.

"When the eye saw her, it blessed her, for her face was sunshine, her voice was melody, and her heart was sympathy," repeated Miss Penefather.

"I can believe it," said Raleigh, looking once more at the photograph.

He was still gazing at it intently, when the sound of carriage-wheels was heard. Then the bell rang, and presently the Colonel found himself face to face with the past in quite another fashion, for the servant announced Lady Silchester. She had come to visit her two little girls at school, and thus was confronted with the man whom she had cruelly injured years ago, and whom she had not seen since they parted as betrothed lovers. It was a dramatic situation; but the nineteenth century does not easily lend itself to stage effects in real life. The lady did not swoon, and the gentleman never thought of striking an attitude. Neither one nor the other exclaimed, "It is he!" or "she!" and their voices did not tremble with pathos or vibrate with tragic meaning. They exchanged commonplace words in courteous, if frigid, fashion—in fact, they remarked upon the weather. But Lady Silchester noticed Colonel Raleigh's eyes straying in a particular direction, and she said, with a curious smile—

"A charming portrait, is it not? Very like little Sybil yet, though, like the rest of us, she has not grown younger."

"I wonder why she is still Sybil Chorlton," he answered, scarcely knowing what he said. How beautiful this woman was! Could he ever have felt intense joy and overpowering misery on her account? Now, he had no regrets—he experienced neither anger nor contempt—but he did feel absolute indifference.

"I believe I can tell you," exclaimed Lady Silchester, with sudden resolution—perhaps by sudden inspiration.

"Can you?" he said, mechanically. He did not care very much to hear.

"Yes," she replied. "As a mere child she fell in love with you."

Probably Lady Silchester was mistaken in so rough-and-ready an explanation of Sybil's single-blessedness. There were many secondary causes, as well as that primary one to which she alluded. But whether she was actuated by malice, by a natural dislike of a person she had deeply injured, or by a sudden impulse to do him a kindness, she certainly influenced the rest of his life. He was confounded by her want of delicacy, but he could not forget what she had said. He remembered her words well when he met Sybil once again. She was lovely, gentle, and good—any man might be proud to win her, and doubtless many had tried. Yet she had never married—could that possibly mean that she had not forgotten the hero of her young days? It was a fascinating thought, and it had its natural result. When Lady Silchester read the paragraph announcing their marriage, she smiled, and perhaps, on the whole, she was not displeased. But a woman's mind is a complex thing, and it is difficult to unravel the mysteries thereof.

If in that union between Arthur Raleigh and Sybil she gave him what he could never give her, we must remember that it is they who give, rather than they who receive, who are "more blessed." At least she had from him real and increasing affection and reverent admiration. She told him all—from those days in the Brockhurst garden when she stole her girlish heart to the day on which he asked her to be his wife. So, they went down the hill of life hand in hand.

OIL ON THE WATERS.

THIS said that sailors, in the Southern Seas,
In danger's hour,
Throw oil upon the seething waves, and these Lose half their power.
Our lives are vessels on Time's restless tide,
And, day by day,
The surging billows, rolling far and wide,
Disturb our way.

And oftentimes in fell distress we lie,
Stranded almost,
Lashed, helpless, by the wind and waves, and, nigh,
A rockbound coast.
Oh! if in that dread peril we could throw
Faith round our barque,
The waves would sink, the winds less fiercely blow,
Light follow dark.

A MODERN CHEROKEE.

NORTH AMERICAN Indian!

What a picture the name calls up of a fierce savage in feathers and war-paint, with tomahawk and scalps at his belt! And how unlike is the reality! "Clothed and in his right mind," the modern Indian presents a very civilised and nineteenth-century appearance — considerably less romantic, perhaps, than his earlier guise, but also a good deal less alarming. Here, in a recently issued United States Census Bulletin, is the portrait of a gentleman wearing a frock-coat, silk-faced and stylish, a "four-in-hand tie," and a neat pin. Could anything be more correct and up-to-date? This is Nimrod J. Smith, otherwise "Cha-la-di-hah," "Charles the Killer," chief of the Eastern Band of North Carolina Cherokees: perhaps the most civilised of all the North American tribes.

The whole of the Cherokee nation is not comprised in this "Band;" a considerable portion emigrated westward early in the century, and became known as the Cherokee Nation West. Attempts were made to induce, and later, in 1836, to force, all the Eastern Cherokees to remove west. Troops were employed, and the Indians were hunted like wild beasts over their own land. But the survivors clung to their homes, and ultimately were allowed to remain and settle. From this little company grew the Eastern Band of Cherokees, who were incorporated under that name in 1889 by the General Assembly of North Carolina. They now number 1,520, and appear by the censuses taken within the last forty years to be on the increase. Little or no attention has been bestowed on them by the National Government; they receive no aid from the State beyond a small grant for educational purposes, yet they have steadily developed into a self-sustaining and self-reliant little community, fairly progressive in many ways, yet preserving some of their earlier traditions and customs. They have attained the status of citizens of the United States, and voters and tax-payers of North Carolina; and North Carolina has no better citizens.

Unlike that of so many other Indian tribes, the territory of the Cherokees is not "reserved" for them by the State, but is held by them in fee-simple. It is known as the Qualla Boundary, extends over portions of the counties of Cherokee, Graham, Jackson, and Swain, in South-western North Carolina, and it covers an area of about 65,000 acres. "No section of country in the United States," says General Henry B. Carrington, special agent for the collection of Indian statistics in connection with the Eleventh Census of the States—"No section of country in the United States combines a greater variety of inland scenery than that occupied by the Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians." It is indeed a beautiful and a fertile land. The climate is healthful and invigorating; water flows freely over its length and breadth; the Indian corn crop rarely fails; fruits of all kinds abound, and the supply of timber is ample and varied. Small wonder, then, that the chief occupations of the people are farming and lumbering, the former occupying far and away the first place. That the methods of farming employed are somewhat primitive is due not so much to want of progressiveness on the part of the Indians as to the nature of the country they cultivate, with its steep hillsides and narrow valleys. These same steep hillsides present many difficulties to the maker of roads, and a considerable amount of engineering skill has been displayed in overcoming them. Taken altogether, the roads (especially the principal highways) and drainage of the settlement are excellent: better, in many cases, than in the neighbouring settlements of white people. Wages are low, and the average earnings of male Indians above the age of twenty-one only amount to about one hundred and sixty-six dollars, or little more than thirty pounds, a year. This looks a very small sum; but, on the other hand, the cost of living is low. The ways of the Indians are simple, and they appear contented without riches.

Their houses mark the simplicity of their habits. These are nearly all "block-houses," with an occasional log-house here and there, and mostly consist of one room only, which is unprovided with windows. Where a second room exists, it is an attic, which is used for sleeping or storage purposes. No better glimpse into the home life and hospitable instincts of these interesting people could be obtained, perhaps, than that afforded by General Carrington's description of his visit to the old Indian Chitolski. "On Straight Fork of this creek, at the very verge of the line of the Cathcart Survey in the last Indian house in that direction, lives Chitolski (Falling-Blossom), a Cherokee of means and influence, whose name is expressive of the condition of the corn when the pollen, dropping into the silk, is supposed to bear some part in fertilising the ear. His home is a new and spacious block-house, very comfortable, with the usual piazza in front. Upon accepting an invitation to dine, the water was turned upon the wheel of the mill close by, and fresh meal was soon served in the shape of a hot 'corn-dodger.' 'Long sweetening' of honey or molasses gave a peculiar sanction to a cup of good coffee, and this, with bacon and greens, supplemented with peaches grown on the farm, made a most excellent meal. This mill is one of many, alike simple in construction, where neighbours deposit their toll of grain, turn on the water, and grind their own meal. Some of these mills have only a slight roof over the hopper, and are open at the sides. Chitolski's house is said to be one of the best in the country, and very few houses of the white people upon Indian lands or lands adjacent, approach it in comfort. Some large peach-trees were loaded with safely developed fruit, and a vigorous young orchard, carefully planted, gave promise of as prosperous a future as those of advanced growth, which bore the pledges of a good autumn product. A horse, several heifers, and chickens and ducks, imparted life to the scene; and the host and his wife, whose grown children have sought independent homes, are preparing, with every indication of success, to spend their latter years in contentment and comfort. Chitolski is building a new path out from his snug valley 'wide enough for wheels,' so that visitors will not be compelled to unhitch and mount harnessed horses to share his hospitality."

Education is by no means neglected among the VALLEY OF THE SOCO.

Cherokees. The Government grant in aid of education is carefully expended, and they have several schools, as well as a training-school. These schools are well attended, and the number of Indians who can read and write English is rapidly increasing. Moreover, the Cherokees have a written language of their own: an important factor to reckon in calculating the prospects of their rapid intellectual advancement. Their alphabet consists of thirty-eight characters, and is syllabic; it was invented by a half-breed, named George Guess. The training-school was founded by a member of the Society of Friends, and is a most useful institution. In it the boys are taught industrial work, including farming, fruit culture, and so forth, and the girls are put through a regular course of housewifery, and learn also plain sewing and other needlework. Appropos of the peculiar Indian fancy for suggestive names, a quaint little story is told of one of the scholars of the Birdtown school. This school-house is a "block-house," but it has been weather-boarded; and on hearing the Bible description of the Pharisees, an Indian boy, rejoicing in the euphonious name of Willie Muttonhead, asked "if their school-house wasn't a hypocrite house." By the way, the Cherokees seem to have rather a pretty taste in names. Such elegant cognomens as those of James Walkingstick, Nancy Mumblehead, Lazy Bigmeat, John Mullethead, and Leander Hornbuckle are to be met with in the pages of this Census Bulletin.

In character the Cherokees are industrious, peaceable, moral, law-abiding, sociable, and contented. They have lost almost entirely their superstitions, and the religious extravagances of earlier days have died out. Theoretically they are Christians, but practically the Church among them is in a somewhat languishing and backward condition: due partly to the sectional squabbles and jealousies existing amongst them. Their several churches are all in a more or less dilapidated condition, and as a rule the school-house serves also as church and meeting-room. In Birdtown, indeed, the people hold their Church and Sunday-school services under a huge oak, which stands in the centre of the highway.

It is curious to notice that, although they have been in intimate contact with white races for more than a couple of centuries, this people still retain the physical features of the Indian race unmodified. Pictures of Indians, young and old, show the same full heavy jaw, high cheekbones, etc., of the old North-American savage of history and romance. It seems, in fact, almost as if the white people of America, under the influence of unexplained causes—partly climatic, possibly—were reverting to this type. Chief Nimrod J. Smith, with his hair flowing picturesquely on his shoulders, looks, for instance, not unlike Buffalo Bill of shooting fame. Nor does the typical Brother Jonathan of caricature—tall, lank, lean, lantern-jawed, keen-eyed, and goatee-bearded—differ in many respects, save his white skin, from the typical North American Indian of ancient and modern times.

WOMAN IN THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM MURDOCH JOHNSTON, M.A., VICAR OF EAST TWICKENHAM.

(1 Cor. xi. 10.)

THIS is the first instance in Christianity where the relations between man and woman had to be settled. What was really at issue often happens: it was the contest in the application of two great principles. Of these two, one was clearly before the mind of the Corinthians; while both were clearly before the mind of St. Paul. One was the equality of the two sexes in the eye of God—for "there is neither male nor female;" the other was the distinction, absolutely inalienable from the race, between man and woman. Both could be reconciled only by an appeal to the higher principle which contained both.

This frequently occurs in life. We fall upon events which seem to present no opening, and upon interests that lie interlocked in deadly contest. We shall always find the solution in some great principle, fact, or law of life; and these are never far from us.

Let us look first at—The difficulty in Corinth.—It lay within the narrowest compass: how ought a woman to dress herself for public worship? It was a new thought that woman should be equal to man in relation to God and holiness. It was natural that this truth should be grasped rashly, and held at the cost of others equally valuable. The excesses of the world, either in religious thought, in politics, or in revolutions, have been due to the acquisition of truths or privileges of which men had been deprived. And amongst the Greeks, a woman of character and reputation never appeared without the veil, sometimes covering her face like a Moslem woman of the present day, but always covering the head; and any who appeared in public without this were regarded as people of no character. Amongst the Jews the women in the synagogue were uncovered, only because they sat within a screen by themselves; and the men in the synagogue up to the present day wear their hats. But St. Paul was writing to a Church composed chiefly of Gentiles, existing within an intensely Gentile city. He therefore accepted the Gentile customs as they bore upon character, and he declined, for the sake of a new application of a great truth, to endanger the character of the Christian women.

How, then, could his advice be reconciled with his old doctrine? He appealed to the history of man and woman, and to their condition from the beginning, and he found these facts—that woman was created after man; that the woman was created for the sake of the man; that they two live together, each for the other.

Hence he concluded that the man is the head of the woman, just as Christ is the head of the man.

The covering of a woman is thus expressive of that supremacy, and of her own pure and holy relation to man. And this becomes of greater importance if we look back to the very earliest records, when the angels, in the sixth chapter of Genesis, under the name of the sons of God, fell through the influence of woman. If the daughters of men should thus tempt the high spiritual beings that always behold the face of God, it was doubly necessary that they should henceforth place upon themselves the symbol of self-restraint, and live, not for their own conquests, but in the spirit of self-sacrifice and holiness. This seems to be the meaning of the very obscure passage in the tenth verse, "For this reason ought the woman to have power on her head, because of the angels." That veil—so slight and worthless a thing, that seemed to contradict a deep and valuable truth of the Gospel—was, nevertheless, the protection of a truth more valuable still, namely, the purity of womanhood and its lofty influence on man.

Having thus cleared the ground, we can perceive the great inclusive principles upon which St. Paul relied.

1. The permanence of the distinction between the nature of a man and that of a woman. This is a mystery of human nature that no investigation can solve. It is so delicate in texture, so subtle in operation, that it eludes discovery. Only in the relation of each to the other can the mystery in the least degree be understood.

2. The glory of man consists in the fact that he came forth from God, the incarnate image of the Eternal. Once again in time should the ravages of the past be obliterated, and in the Incarnation of Christ should the perfect man be revealed. But if man, with his shorn locks and uncovered head, stands there, the nearest representative of the Creator, how true ought he to be to the Hand which fashioned him and to the Heart which loves him still. As Moses went up into Mount Sinai to look God in the face and live, and to come down agleam with the glory he had seen, so ought every man's face to reflect the radiance which he has gathered in the vision of the Eternal, in meditation and prayer, in the battle for the right, and in the achievement of noble deeds.

3. And woman has her glory, of which no one but herself can disinherit her. It is the glory of modesty, of purity, of self-control and self-sacrifice.

Woman has civilised the world. The emancipation of woman has been one of the triumphs of Christianity combined with the influence of the Germanic race. But woman is never seen at her best, save in her home, or in the many ministries of beautiful self-sacrifice, where she reigns without a rival.

4. Lastly, the Church has its glory, too. It does not consist in the rash and disproportionate exaltation of single and individual truths. This has been the temptation of every age, and the curse of the Church since the day of the Ascension. The ideal of personal purity gave birth to the excesses of Montanism in the second century; and the ideal of fidelity, to the schism of the Donatists in the fourth. The ideal of apostolic origin and unity was the argument of the Popes, and the foundation of the false and tyrannical claims of the Papacy.

The glory of the Church consists in the recognition of the fact that she has come from God through Christ: that adoration and worship are essentials of her life: and that all her operations, as well as her faith, must exist in due order, and in fidelity to the eternal nature of things. The God of creation is the God of the Church. And the Church errs the moment she places a principle of religion which she regards as important in antagonism with the universal principles upon which God made the world. Within these, the widest principles of all, will be found the solution of lesser difficulties; and in the wider view from that mountain-top all the lower hills, however rugged their sides—all the currents of the valley, however crooked and errant, will fall into their places. Man ceases to be puzzled in proportion to the distinctness and the fulness of his vision of God.

A WORD UPON LOOKING BACK.

BY THE REV. W. MANN STATHAM, RECTOR OF IVER-HEATH.

TOOK from my bookshelves to-day some old volumes of THE QUIVER, reaching back to more than thirty years ago; then I began to read some early "Words Upon" written by me in those early days when "time was young," so far as manhood's literary work was concerned. With the perusal of these came quick and keen memories of some dear fellow-writers who have one by one entered into the blessed rest. Memories, too, came to me of many "words" from others far over land and wave—at home and abroad—who were kind enough to write and say "Thank you" for papers which had comforted and helped them. It is foolish and vain to like flattery, but it is neither foolish nor vain to welcome words of inspiration, which help one to buckle on the armour again. I cannot say concerning them "What an audience!" for although I have spoken the glad tidings and tried to utter the comforting word to many hearts, I have never spoken to the yet larger circle, the thousands upon thousands of readers of THE QUIVER. Still, in "looking back" there comes to one a mingled sense of responsibility and pleasure in thinking of the far-away faces one has never seen, and the far-away hearts one has had an entrance into. I have travelled in railway-trains with unknown fellow-travellers opposite, who, I could see, by the pages, were reading "A Word Upon," and I have sat as "the unknown" opposite them, and in time they have kindly lent me "myself" to read.

"Looking back" is said to be often a melancholy business, but I do not find it so. Friends and fellow-writers who have gone to join the great majority are with Christ, and, if we believe our own creed, are in the enjoyment of that life which is "far better." It is want of faith that produces alike the pessimism that is the child of doubt, and the depression that comes from want of trust in God. Of course, looking back is a very humbling exercise; and so it ought to be, for no one reaches his ideal, literary or otherwise; the author is in himself more than any book he ever writes—the artist is more than any picture he ever paints, and I suppose that even Pheidias viewed more in the rough block of marble than ever he moulded into forms of beauty. The angel "sleeping in the stone" did not come forth in the ideal and perfect loveliness that existed in the sculptor's mind; even so, "not as though I had already attained," is the confession of St. Paul, and of every heart conscious of its own errors and imperfections.

And "looking back" is surely not only a humbling but also a grateful experience. It suggests at once gratitude. "Be ye thankful," is an apostolic injunction; and surely, through an era of doubt to remember some Hymenæus or some Philetus, and in an age of worldliness to look back upon some Demas deserter who has "loved the present world," must quicken a sense of thanksgiving for our own preservation, and our deliverance from manifold temptations. Tender gratitude falls like dew upon our hearts whilst we exclaim, "By the grace of God I am what I am."

It awakens, too, a sense of humour to look back upon old ambitions and somewhat conceited endeavours to do some great thing, or to say some clever thing, which Mr. Ruskin so severely satirises; and such attempts have been followed by a sly hit from those quiet and wise friends who seldom make mistakes, and who have their joke out of yours. Peace be with them! Little arrows of criticism, or even of sarcasm, do no harm unless they are tipped with the steel of cruelty or dipped in the cup of poison. When you come face to face with an old mistake, you can laugh now; and it is right you should—although it worried you and kept you awake a quarter of a century ago.

Looking back. Yes: here is a bound volume of THE QUIVER of about that time before me, and here, too, lying beside it, is this month's QUIVER, with its charming illustrations. What a change for the better in the pictorial department! I wrote for THE QUIVER before there were any illustrations at all in it—I think it came out weekly then; but, ever since, the illustrations have been growing in power and beauty; and how many rising young artists, as well as rising young authors, has THE QUIVER helped on their onward way! I heard a very able man say once, "Life is in to-morrow." And so it is—in the sense he meant it—for we can never succeed in anything unless we make past efforts the stepping-stones of to-morrow's work. But life will always be in another sense largely in the past; all bright memories, all earnest and true and pure yesterdays make music within, and keep us from the depressing misery of sad reflections. The "looking-back" season comes to us all; and it is well if the past we gaze upon is the narrow and not the broad way.

In looking back, too, we see how "the good Hand" has led us all—yes, led "the blind by a way which they knew not." Nothing strengthens our faith in the Providence of the future more than contemplating the Providence of the past. "Because Thou hast been my help, therefore in the shadow of Thy wings will I rejoice," is an inspired deduction from personal experience. We go on our way hopeful and restful because the past is full of illumination, being all aglow with the merciful guidance and the gracious help of God. Of course, I know that "looking back" is not a favourite occupation with those whose lives are "crowded" with bustle and excitement, and vanities and flatteries, and intense worldly ambitions: as well tell the huntsman to look back in the chase of the deer! But I am not writing for such as these, but for those who, whilst they enjoy life, with its fellowships and its joys, its music and its song, its pleasant travels and its picturesque visions, yet keep a quiet, Divine side to lives which are filled with the daily consciousness of the presence of God.

But it may be said, Is not this looking back just what St. Paul tells us not to do? Does he not say, "Forgetting the things which are behind?" Yes, he does. But he tells us why— he would not have us look back so as to depress us or to hinder our energies in the great race. Once and again he himself stays to look back, on his bonds and imprisonments, that he may glorify the grace of God. He reviews his association with old friends, whom he lovingly greets and remembers when he was "present with them;" and in his prison dungeon he thinks of and prays for those who were yesterday co-workers with him in the Church of God.

But does not too much looking back feed a morbid tendency, and make us feel how old we are getting? Does it not make us count those few years at the most which we may yet have to live? Yes, too much looking back does. But too much of anything is bad—too much honey or too much vinegar are alike distasteful and injurious; we may deny the good anywhere and everywhere by putting in the little words "too much." Let it be admitted also that constitutional temperament has to be studied ; there are some minds where a certain "preying upon themselves" would be a very dangerous repast indeed ; some there are who need constant inspirations to energy and endeavour ; but then, again, there are minds who need also the sacred reminder, "CONSIDER how great things He hath done for you."

To come back to the old QUIVERS, so clean and crisp once, when the freshly printed page was in our hands—do we not feel what a surprise it would give us to meet ourselves and see ourselves as we were thirty years ago in the old waiting-rooms of "La Belle Sauvage"? Changed we are! Yes, in a way ; but it is a blessed thing if we keep young at heart. Of all the things to be striven against and prayed against is to die before we die—to live on, and have no ideals of joy and duty, of hope and endeavour. It is the glory of the Gospel that it feeds the immortal life within us, that its golden heights are ever before us, and that to our last breath we may aim to do good and to glorify God.

Certainly, in looking back we feel that it has not been activity so much as anxiety that has done us harm ; and this reminds me that my first paper was "A Word upon Anxiety." We marvel at the way we let nervous anticipations fret our minds. If any friend had ever told us half the falsehoods which our fears have whispered to us, we should never believe him any more. It is, therefore, possible that we may all learn by experience to bear troubles when they come, and not to ford the river or fight the battle before we come to them. We all forget those beautiful promises : "As thy days, so shall thy strength be ;" "My grace is sufficient for thee ;" and yet, as we look back, we must and ought to set our seal to the fact that God is true, and with every trial and temptation makes a way of escape. Perhaps even now, in reading this, you are bearing burdens of anticipation—perhaps under bright skies you are looking for the coming storm-clouds ; then look back, my friend, and learn the blessed lesson that your own yesterdays can teach you. When will goodness and mercy fall out of the cavalcade? Are they to attend you only on some days of your life? No ; they shall follow you all the days of your life.

It is not wise nor well to think too much of past troubles ; rather let us think of the mercies we enjoy. "Thank God, I ain't got no rheumatics to-day," one of the old men in my parish said to me a few days ago. That was a sentence worth remembering. Do not let us always be thinking of the pains and griefs of yesterday, but rather of the joys and blessings of to-day. How pleasant it is, in looking back, to be associated in love and thought still with those whom we have known for many, many years ; to hear from them now and again, and even to see from time to time the faces which have in them a history and a prophecy—a history of past friendship, and a promise of fidelity in the years to come. Now and then one finds in the beautiful forest of friendship an old human "oak," one who is really an old man or an old woman, and with what sacred influence the ancient reminder comes to us, "Thy friend and thy father's friend forget not!" Of course there are pathetic sides to our experience, and in looking back our own faults of forgetfulness and delay protrude themselves upon us : the letter which ought to have been written—the visit that ought to have been paid—before the last sleep came to those we loved. Also those many negligences which have to do with our Divine relationship. Yes, that must be a proud heart that does not feel humbled in looking back upon sad omissions : words that ought to have been spoken and deeds that ought to have been done. We hear and read of many wonders nowadays ; but what is so wonderful as memory? There the photograph never fades, there the instantaneous action of the mind without effort brings before you the clear pictures, one after another, of the past. Oh, subtle, secretive brain! "fearfully and wonderfully" are we made. Even when the eye grows dim and the book is laid aside, we have the picture-gallery of the mind. Perhaps I need scarcely say that a wise man looking backward will soon be conscious of a "looking up." He will feel that though "the lot is cast into the lap, the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord ;" the upward glance will express gratitude, trust, confidence, and hope, for the Saviour "will never leave us, nor forsake us." There are sure also to be memories of fickleness and change in others, in most lives. Our common humanity may not deserve all the criticisms that fall upon it for falsity in friendship, but at the old trysting-places we often stand alone, and too often sacred covenants are broken ; but one voice breathes a music of comfort always and everywhere : "I am the Lord ; I change not." Amidst our unbelieving days and hours Jesus abides faithful—He who has promised to be with us always, "even unto the end of the world." Perhaps I may be permitted to write a few more words upon "Looking Upward," "Looking Inward," and "Looking Onward," and so I will not trespass on these tempting themes in this page. It is never wise nor well to write on till there is no more ink in the bottle ; neither is it good to water the ink, or to water the thoughts. What we often feel and want in hours when we take up our QUIVER is suggestion that sets us thinking for ourselves, not any attempt at an exhaustiveness which too often exhausts the reader's patience, whilst the writer is attempting to exhaust his subject. What we often resented in some divines in our boyhood days was this : that after the cheering word "Finally," divines too often added, "One word more." Dear old faces and forms shaping themselves afresh to us out of the golden clouds of memory! We could perhaps listen to your somewhat long sermons better now, when we have learned how much holy inspiration there was for us in the earnestness of character behind the earnest words. Looking back, then, on others, as we hope to be looked back upon one day ourselves, we may and ought to feel that "we are debtors" to "many men and many minds;" and that we cannot better try to pay our debts than by living in the hearts and lives of others, and living less and less unto ourselves. Others will look back: we may be sure of that; and what kind of vision they will have, and what kind of speech they will hear, depend upon our life-speech and character to-day. "He, being dead, yet speaketh," applies to lives that have in them a warning and a curse, as well as to those that have in them a guidance and a blessing. "Therefore, namely," as our dear old German professor used to say in the Hebrew class, "therefore, namely," gentlemen, etc., you must draw the lesson for yourselves, for the "look backward" will be sure to come with children, friends, neighbours, parishioners, when you have entered into that great rest, where time will be no more. In writing once more for the dear old QUIVER, I cannot close without remembering, as I look back myself through the vista of the thirty years, how many kind friends I have made, and how many pleasant fellowships I have had, through the pages of this, to me, time-beloved periodical.

A GOOD-FOR-NOTHING COUSIN.

BY MARGARET S. FAILL.

CHAPTER VIII.

WAVERING.

CHRISTMAS week passed, and the New Year had set in. Jack had gone back to town, and on the last day of Lance's holidays he and Ruth had gone down to the village.

A slight mist hung over everything, obscuring the familiar landmarks, and lending an air of unreality to the figures looming through it. Not that many figures were to be seen at all, even in the village; and on the homeward way they did not encounter a single person.

It was almost dark when they reached the house, the short winter afternoon seeming even shorter than usual to-day. Ruth opened the parlour door, and in the twilight, brightened by the flickering fire, the room looked delightfully cosy.

"Ah, now nice!" she exclaimed, advancing towards the glow.

Someone rose from among the shadows and stepped over to her.

"Thank you, Ruth," said a voice, in a clear musical tone, which caused her to give a sudden start; and two hands took possession of her own.

It was Archie, and he stood smiling down at her with the frank bright look she knew so well. His presence seemed to fill the room. The others were somewhere vaguely in the background, and the cold was left outside; while inside the very air was full of a delightful warmth and excitement. Nothing was clear or distinct but Archie's smile, his warm hand-clasp, and his voice.

"Thank you, Ruth," he was saying again. "I was afraid you might have scolded me for not keeping my promise; but you are glad to see me, after all."

So he thought she had seen him when she opened the door. He took her exclamation of pleasure at the warmth for one of gladness at his arrival.

But she made no explanation, and only said, "Of course we are glad to see you," and then she withdrew her hands.

After the first minute she was thankful that the room was dim, lest he might read by her expression her change of feeling towards him.

Even to herself, and in spite of herself, her voice sounded different. She felt a sort of constraint in the presence of the young man with whom formerly she had been on such terms of easy friendship.

Archie himself seemed unchanged. Instead of a light suit, he now wore a dark one, and he was less sunburnt—but that was all. He sat down where the flickering light shone on his face, and it struck Ruth that he was even handsomer than she had thought. How well he carried his head, and how graceful all his movements were! Katie was pressed close to his chair, and he had thrown one arm around her while he leant forward to talk to Ruth. Ruth, however, was seated in complete shadow, and it is difficult to talk to an invisible person.

"Come nearer the light, won't you, Ruth?" he said persuasively: "I want to see if you are really glad to see me. I know by Lance's face that he is, and Mrs. Lennox said she was; and Katie ran and kissed me, and told me ever so many times how pleased she was, and I want to see that you are no exception."

"Archie's society enlivened the way."—p. 694.

"We all express our pleasure differently, I suppose," said Ruth, with a light laugh, as she edged her chair a degree nearer to the fire. "If you expect an ovation, please tell me how I ought to show my joy. I am afraid I am not demonstrative enough."

"Well," said the young man, with a twinkle in his eye, "I like Katie's way best, but I don't insist upon it."

"I was just scolding him," struck in Mrs. Lennox's voice, "for going to the hotel instead of bringing his bag here."

"To the hotel?" repeated Ruth in surprise. "Haven't you come to stay here, then?"

"I did not like to drop down on you with so little ceremony," Archie replied: "but as you are so very good as to ask me"—and he turned to Mrs. Lennox—"if you are sure I shan't be a trouble, I should like very much to send up my valise to-morrow, and come myself for two nights."

Whether Mrs. Lennox had expected to be taken at her word is doubtful, but Archie accepted in all good faith, and clearly had no misgivings about his welcome.

When he rose at length, he said quite regretfully—"I suppose I must be going now. I expect it is getting pretty nearly dark by this time."

But when they reached the door they discovered that it was not "pretty nearly," but quite dark, and a thick mist enveloped the house, making it impossible to see even the length of the garden.

"You'll never be able to find your way!" Katie exclaimed; and it was quite obvious to the others that she was right.

Archie stepped out into the garden, but did not succeed in keeping to the path even to the gate, so what chance had he of finding his way down through the glen?

He returned to the house, where they all stood grouped in the lighted doorway, and Mrs. Lennox told him he must not think of venturing out unless he wanted to pass the night on the hills.

"Just come away in and content yourself here," she said, "if you don't want to catch your death of cold in the glen."

"Indeed I don't," Archie returned, laughing; "I'm much too fond of life; but I'm regularly ashamed of myself. I seem always to be throwing myself on your charity, without a moment's warning."

Mrs. Lennox protested that he could not come too often, and hospitably led the way back into the parlour, Katie openly delighted at the turn events had taken.

"What if it doesn't clear by to-morrow?" her cousin asked her. "Then I shan't be able to go down and fetch up your Christmas present."

Katie looked rather daunted for a moment; then she brightened up, and said cheerfully—

"Well, the longer it lasts, the longer you'll stay; and it must go off some day."

Soon lights were brought in, and they were all seated round the tea-table, when it struck Ruth that there had not been so much merriment in the room since Archie's last visit. What a light-hearted young fellow he was, to be sure! How gaily he talked, eliciting great bursts of laughter from Lance and Katie, and even drawing Mrs. Lennox under his influence.

Ruth was the gravest member of the party, and now that it was light Archie was able to study her face, and he noticed that she seldom looked at him and made very few remarks, but remained much more silent than usual.

After tea she retired to see about a room being prepared for their unexpected visitor; and when she returned she picked up a piece of work which engaged her whole attention.

When Katie's bedtime arrived, Mrs. Lennox went with the little girl, Lance having already left the room to look out his lesson-books for the next day.

When they had gone, Archie rose up and came over to Ruth.

"Ruth," he said, putting his hand over hers which held the work, "please don't sew any more. I am sure there isn't any hurry for it; and I want to talk to you."

She let her work drop on to her lap, and shrank back slightly when his fingers touched hers, and then hoped he had not noticed the movement.

"Can't you talk while I work?" she asked, looking up and speaking quite gently.

She was not angry with Archie—indeed, why should she be? She had accidentally learnt that he was not so faultless as she had imagined him to be, but still, he had many good qualities left. Already she had begun to make excuses for him. Doubtless his faults had been exaggerated. As for his probable engagement to Rachel, if it were not definitely settled yet, he could hardly have spoken of it. Why should she not accept of him as she herself found him—a frank, pleasant young fellow—without taking another's verdict of him? Something of the old charm of his presence began to steal over her again.

"Ruth," he said, after looking at her for a few minutes in silence, "you have never asked me why I didn't keep my promise about coming on Christmas, and I know you are vexed with me. Don't you think it worth while asking? or don't you care to know?"

"Yes, I do wish to know," Ruth said, feeling remorseful that she had taken it for granted that he had forgotten them.

"My mother wished me," he said, "to spend Christmas with her. She is not very strong, and she and Maud are at the Riviera. I have come straight from there, travelling night and day—last night from London; so you see I did my best, and came as fast as the trains would bring me."

"Ah! how tired you must be," she said pityingly. "Why did you do it?"

"Because I wished to come, and my leave will be up in three days; so if I hadn't hurried I couldn't have come at all. I thought too, Ruth, that you would be glad to see me," he added, a little reproachfully, "but now I am not so sure."

Ruth blushed slightly.

"I am very glad," she said; but the tone did not seem quite satisfactory to him.

"You seem changed somehow," he insisted; "but you aren't vexed any more, are you, Ruth?"

"Certainly I am not vexed," she assured him, with a smile; and then the entrance of Mrs. Lennox put an end to any further private conversation.

The next day was clear and bright, and Archie suggested that they might go down to the hotel to get his valise. They accompanied Lance on his way to school, and Mr. Wilson, hearing the sound of gay voices, looked out, and beheld his pupil and his escort at the gate. His eye fell on the handsome young man talking with friendly ease to Miss Douglas, whom he could never address without a blush or some other sign of embarrassment.

He looked enviously at this fortunate man who was apparently so much at ease with the young lady, and who was making her smile and look more interested than he, Wilson, had ever seen her before. They did not stop long, but he watched them depart merrily down the hill, and then Lance came bounding in.

As Archie and the two girls proceeded towards the village, the former remarked carelessly—

"I suppose that fellow is still here? I didn't see him about yesterday."

"What fellow?" Ruth asked drily.

"Oh! that fellow who used always to be hanging about—Gordon, I think he was called," Archie said, with the sort of tone which Ruth was sure the other two men would have designated as "the air of a prince."

"They caught sight of Mr. Lewis."—p. 695.

"What do you suppose he would be doing here at this season?" she asked, in a tone of surprise.

"He always has been here before, so I concluded he would be loafing about as usual."

"He was here for his holidays, but he has his business to attend to. I daresay, though, you never thought of that?"

Archie looked at her in perplexity for a moment.

"Do you mean that I am such an unreasonable fellow?" he asked, a little reproachfully. "Come, Ruth; that isn't quite fair."

"Am I unfair, Archie?" she said, with quick compunction. "I don't wish to be;" and she thought, half sadly and half remorsefully, that perhaps she had been more unfair in her judgment than he knew. "I don't think you like Mr. Gordon," she added; "but we won't quarrel about it."

"That's all right, then," and he returned her smile and held out his hand. "Shake hands over it, and let us be friends."

They had quite a long walk along the shore of the loch, and then Archie insisted that they should lunch at the hotel, and drive home in the one wagonette of the place. This plan met with Katie's enthusiastic approval.

"Isn't it splendid?" she exclaimed, as they drove off in state. Archie looked at the little girl's radiant face with a smile of amusement.

"Isn't it!" he said. "Quite exciting! But I think, if the old stager keeps up this pace, we'll be home too soon!"

Ruth gave an involuntary smile as she looked at the old horse plodding leisurely up-hill; but if the drive was not exciting, it was pleasant. There were plenty of warm rugs, and some shawls borrowed from the hotel landlady, so there was no danger of being too cold; and Archie's society enlivened the way, which seemed much shorter than usual.

Their cousin had brought a present for everybody, including Mrs. Lennox, so Ruth found it impossible to refuse hers without making herself singular. She opened the little case which he had given her, and beheld the daintiest little brooch she had ever seen—a tiny gold arrow through a heart of diamonds. The stones sparkled brilliantly in the firelight; Ruth was sure they must be valuable.

"Oh, how lovely!" she exclaimed admiringly; "but, Archie, I wish you hadn't brought me anything so expensive."

"My dear Ruth," he said, smiling, "you shouldn't think of the intrinsic value of a gift, but of the feeling which prompted it. You will value it for the giver's sake, won't you? and wear it sometimes, and think of me?"

"Yes, I will," Ruth said; and she might have added that she needed no brooch to keep the latter part of the promise.

CHAPTER IX.

UNDER THE SPELL.

"Now, Ruth, what are you going to do for me? as this is my last day here."

"Anything you like," Ruth responded, with a smile. "Have you any particular desire? or do you wish me to suggest something?"

They were standing at the window in the afternoon. Ruth had made up her mind that to-day—Archie's last day—she would throw everything else to the winds and enjoy herself. For one day she would forget everything that could mar her enjoyment, and live only in the present moment. Who need grudge her this fleeting pleasure? To-morrow he would be gone, and there would be plenty of time to think seriously, and take a dark view of things; but to-day he was here, and she would give herself up to the charm of his society without any further struggle.

"Now, that is an answer I like," said Archie heartily; "no stipulations, but anything I like. I shall take you at your word."

"Anything in reason, I meant," said Ruth, in some alarm: "anything that I can."

He enjoyed her evident anxiety for a moment with a mischievous gleam in his eyes, then he said reassuringly—

"I won't ask impossibilities, or anything you don't wish. What do you say to a walk on the hills? it is such a fine day."

Ruth agreed, so they very soon set out; Katie, who had caught cold, being unwillingly obliged to remain at home. Her lovely French doll, however, which had been Archie's present to her, was a great consolation, and provided entertainment enough to occupy the afternoon.

It was a fine, clear, frosty day, as Ruth and her companion set out on their walk. The trees were covered with a delicate coating of hoar-frost, and the ground underneath was hard and firm. Even in summer the hills had seldom looked more beautiful. They did not talk much at first, as they scrambled over the uneven stumps of frozen heather; but when they reached a point where a fine view of the loch was to be had, they both paused to draw breath.

"There," said Archie, pointing to the largest island, "is the spot where we first met. Suppose Lance hadn't been forgotten, or you hadn't come to rescue him?—we might never have met."

"Or suppose your boat hadn't leaked, or you hadn't started at all?" Ruth suggested, laughing; but she became serious again almost immediately. "Don't you think it is rather strange," she said, somewhat suddenly, "that we never see anything of Rachel? You have never told me anything about her, either; and it seems so odd to know nothing at all of one's own sister."

"You never asked me anything," the young man returned, in what Ruth fancied a slightly constrained manner.

"You see," she went on quickly, "it is rather awkward to talk about family differences—not that there ever was any quarrel, so far as I have heard. When Miss Douglas first chose to adopt Rachel, I believe she made it a condition that there were to be no communications between our grandmother's (where we lived) and Rachel's new home. I suppose she thought a child would get reconciled sooner to her surroundings if she forgot all about her old home. That may have been true enough; but I know grannie found it very hard; and now, at least, there is no reason why we should remain strangers. I don't think," she added, in a lower tone, "that Rachel can wish to see any of us."

"Oh! I think she does," Archie said quickly. "I have often heard her talk about you, and wonder what you were like. She talked of writing, too; and I'm sure Aunt Douglas means to bring her to see you some day."

"Some day," Ruth thought, with a shade of sarcasm, was very long in coming; but she had no intention of attacking her absent sister—least of all to Archie. She waited to see if he would volunteer any information, but as he did not, she asked, "What is Miss Douglas like?"

"Like?" and Archie lifted his eyebrows, and then smiled. "Look here, Ruth: I couldn't possibly describe her," he said. "Just you wait till you see her, and then you can tell me what your opinion is. I should like to hear an unprejudiced verdict on the subject."

"I don't think my opinion would be quite unprejudiced," Ruth remarked a little grimly; but she did not press the question. If Archie did not care to talk about them, Ruth was too proud to persist in asking.

They began to move down the hill, and when Archie broke the silence again, it was to speak on quite a different subject.

"By the bye, Ruth," he said, in a casual tone, "did you say you had not seen that fellow Gordon since the autumn?"

"No," said Ruth; "I couldn't have said so, because I saw him since, in town."

"Oh! did you see him often?"

"Yes, indeed, nearly every day," Ruth said saucily, beginning to smile at Archie's dissatisfied tone. "Have you any objection?"

"What you can see in a fellow like that puzzles me," declared Archie, ignoring her question. "He is what I call a prig—a downright solemn prig. There, now; I shan't say any more, or you will be angry."

"Why should I?" she asked. "Why do you suppose I care in the least what your opinion of Mr. Gordon is?"

He looked at her as if in doubt how exactly to take her words; but before he could answer, the sound of a lively whistle reached them, and, glancing a little way further down, they caught sight of Mr. Lewis seated on a tree-stump. His back was turned towards them, and he was busily painting on a small block from a little water-colour box. He did not see them at first, as his own whistling drowned the sound of their steps, but as they got close behind, their heels crunched on the hard ground. He turned round and beheld them.

"Hulloa!" he exclaimed, "where have you dropped from?"

"From the clouds," Ruth said lightly; and then, when they had shaken hands: "What industry!" she remarked. "Aren't your hands very cold?"

"Yes, it is rather cold work," he admitted; "but I saw this lovely little bit, and thought I must make a note of it. I have finished now, and was just thinking of starting for home. Won't you come down too, and have tea? It is so much nearer, and my sisters would be so pleased."

Ruth was about to refuse. It was Archie's last evening, and she knew Lance would be disappointed if he had none of his cousin's society; but the young man was making vigorous signs to her.

"Say 'Yes,'" he whispered as the artist was bending over his box, "and then we can walk home by moonlight."

"Won't you come?" Mr. Matthew asked, looking up. "Jemima was remarking what a stranger you had been lately."

"Well, we might go down and make a call," Ruth said, prudently ignoring the mention of tea until Miss Lewis should invite them herself. The Misses Lewis were older than their brother, and although extremely kind, they were very old-fashioned and methodical, and Ruth very well knew that if it happened to be their mending day, or any other particularly busy day, it would never do to wait. Of course, man-like, the brother never thought of this; but as far as Ruth could remember, this was no especial day, and as Archie wished it, she thought they might risk it.

When they reached Lakeside, Mr. Matthew admitted them through the studio door. He had one or two things to do in his own domain, so he told his visitors to go down-stairs to the parlour, where they would be sure to find his sisters. Ruth, who was quite familiar with the house, went first. Archie opened the door for her, and followed her into the room; but there was no one to be seen. It was arranged in its usual prim order, a carefully arranged fire of very black coals smouldering in the grate, but the apartment was quite unoccupied.

"Hulloa!" exclaimed Archie at the door, taking a survey round. "Captain and Miss Douglas!" he announced, in a loud tone. "Well, there seems to be no one to receive them," he added in his natural voice. "Allow me, Miss Douglas," he went on, changing back again to the ceremonious tone, "to offer you a chair. I am sorry the fire is so poor, but we can soon remedy that;" and to Ruth's horror, he picked up the poker, and with a vigorous smash sent Miss Jemima's carefully prepared fire into a blaze.

"Oh, Archie!" exclaimed his cousin, "whatever will they say?"

"Say? why, 'Thank you.' to be sure. See how much better that looks already."

Mr. Matthew came running down at this moment.

"What! no one here?" he said, looking round the room. "They must have gone out. Pull your chairs close to the fire; they can't be long now, as it is getting dusk already."

"Very well," Archie assented cordially; "this is just the time to sit round the fire. You two must take the seats of honour;" and he began to wheel forward the heavy arm-chairs from their corners, pushing aside the table to leave more room. "I will humbly place myself at Ruth's feet, if she will give me the stool."

Mr. Matthew laughingly lent his assistance to push about the furniture, while Ruth looked on, rather aghast at this rash disarrangement of the apartment.

Archie, however, seemed troubled by no qualms about making himself at home.

"Where did you come from, sir?" he cried, addressing a kitten which had emerged from some cosy corner and begun to frisk about at his feet. He picked it up, and placing it on the table, responded to its invitations to a game by rolling along a ball of wool which he abstracted from a convenient work-basket. He seemed to enjoy this exciting pastime with as much zest as a schoolboy out for a frolic; but it came to an abrupt end. The kitten, making a rash clutch at the prize, dragged the table-cloth, which was already half off, on to the floor, entraining with it the work-basket and all its contents.

"Well, you may stay there, and be thankful you didn't do more damage," Archie apostrophised the astonished animal as it wriggled free from its entanglement. Then he came and threw himself down on his low seat, and looked up at his two companions.

"This is the very time for a ghost story," he observed. "If we only had the accompaniment of weird music, the ghost might emerge from these shadows."

"I could oblige you with the music," said Mr. Matthew, with a smile, jumping up, and going over to the piano.

He began to play very softly, a plaintive melody seeming to float gently through the room. Archie sat with his eyes fixed on the glowing coals, leaning his shoulder against the arm of Ruth's chair; but he did not proceed with his story. He seemed to have fallen into a reverie, while Ruth also sat in dreamy enjoyment of the twilight hour, and the artist seemed lost in his own music.

Suddenly the door opened, and the spell was broken. Miss Jemima's face, followed by that of her sister, appeared in the doorway; and instantly all poetical fancies seemed to take flight. Ruth rose hastily in some confusion, seeing all at once through Miss Jemima's eyes. That lady gazed in bewilderment at the unfamiliar aspect of her own room. To her astonished vision the place seemed turned upside down, and invaded with people. She did not even recognise her brother at the piano. The firelight was shining brilliantly, and dazzled the eyes of the newcomers, after the darkness of the hall. But Archie was not in the least embarrassed. He had risen instantly, and bowed politely to the two ladies who still stood rooted to the door-mat; then he advanced pleasantly, holding out his hand.

"How do you do, Miss Lewis?" he said. "You didn't expect to find your room taken possession of: but don't be alarmed: it is only cousin Ruth and myself."

Indeed, the two ladies were looking rather alarmed at this very unusual state of affairs; but the young man was going on easily—

"I really must apologise for the spill there has been. I'm afraid it was my fault—it wouldn't be fair to put it all down to the cat. Nothing is broken, however," he added reassuringly, taking the fact on trust, as he certainly had not troubled to ascertain. Miss Mary, the younger sister, murmured that it was of no consequence, and that she would soon straighten things again; and was about to proceed to do so at once, but Archie prevented her.

"Ah, but you mustn't think of doing anything, Miss Lewis," he said. "It was I who disarranged them, and I'll settle them in two minutes. Won't you have a chair?" and he pulled one forward. Anyone might have supposed he was host; but the two ladies appeared so taken aback and flustered that the young man had forgotten their relative positions, and was really actuated by the kindly desire of making them feel comfortable.

"I was just telling Miss Ruth that you would be disappointed if she did not wait for tea," said Mr. Matthew, leaving his piano-stool and coming forward; and his sister, who had recovered from her surprise by this time, was able to second the invitation, and said that Ruth had been a great stranger lately.

"Now, I think this is all as it should be," remarked Archie, in a tone of satisfaction, as he surveyed the tablecloth on its proper place, and the chairs pulled out into anything but their usual order. "Shouldn't I make a good, useful husband, Miss Lewis? When I'm at home I do no end of things for my mother. She says she misses me greatly when I go away."

As he spoke, he pulled forward a stool for the one lady, and picked up the handkerchief of the other with a pleasant smile, as if he enjoyed paying those little attentions. Who could resist Archie? The Misses Lewis both smiled, and were quite won over by the charm of the young man's manner, and on the spot forgave his unceremonious upsetting of their room. He was so sure that he was welcomed, so willing to please and be pleased, that it was almost impossible to help falling under the influence of his humour. Ruth, who had felt dreadfully apologetic on the entrance of the ladies of the house, found that she need have no more misgivings. She was pressed to wait for tea, and as she had only made a slight demur, fearing they had been thrust on Miss Lewis, she agreed willingly enough to stop. At table Archie was the life and soul of the party—the hero of the hour. Ruth felt it, and knew that she, too, was under the spell, but for one evening, what did it matter? After tea someone asked the young man to sing. He complied at once, and rose up. His host went to the piano with him, and they were some time turning over the music; then Mr. Matthew sat down and began to play the opening bars:—

Maid of Athens, ere we part,
Give, oh! give me back my heart.
Or, since that has left my breast,
Keep it now, and take the rest."

The voice which sang out those words was sweet and powerful, and something in the tone made Ruth involuntarily raise her eyes. What was it in the expression of those she encountered which made her start, and turn away to hide a blush? She was seated close to the piano, but she did not look at the singer again, although every note of his voice thrilled through her. It was a very common song—more hackneyed than she knew, indeed; yet Archie sang it as if the words were his own; and when he reached the last verse, how soft and pleading the tones were—

"Maid of Athens, I am gone;
Think of me, sweet, when alone.
Though I fly to Istambol,
Athens holds my heart and soul."

How much feeling he seemed to throw into the said nothing at all. She did not look at Archie, so she was unaware if he had noticed her silence. The others, however, all began to talk, and beg Captain Douglas to sing again. At first he demurred; then, apparently thinking better of it, he turned to Mr.

"She did not look at the singer again."—p. 696.

words! Ruth felt her heart beating so loudly, she was afraid it must be audible; and then in a minute or two the song was ended. The sweet sound of his voice seemed to linger in the air for a moment, and apparently affected even Miss Mary, for when she broke the silence, it was only to say a few words of thanks, instead of pouring forth a perfect flood of chatter, according to her usual voluble way. Ruth

Matthew, and asked him if he had any of the music from the Bohemian Girl. The artist produced a volume with the required songs, and Archie sang "Then you'll remember me."

What made him choose such songs? Was he likely to be forgotten? Ruth felt, with a pang, that even to-morrow all that would remain for her would be remembrance. She brushed aside the thought, however. It would never do to give way to sentimentality and have her eyes filling with tears before people. She pulled herself together mentally, and rose up.

"I am afraid we must go now, Miss Lewis," she said, in quite an ordinary tone. "My aunt does not know where we are, and she may be anxious."

Mr. Matthew rose too, and said he would walk home with them. Archie, from behind the artist, cast a dismayed glance at Ruth, and hastily telegraphed a sign with his eyes, which she interpreted as meaning that he wished her to refuse the escort.

"Thank you, Mr. Matthew; it isn't necessary for you to come out," she said, in obedience to the signal. "We can easily walk home on such a clear night, without bringing you out into the cold."

"Oh, I should have taken a walk, in any case," the artist said simply. "It is a lovely night, and both Wolf and I need some exercise, after sitting so long this afternoon."

Ruth glanced at the young man, whose expression still urged her to refuse, and slightly shook her head. She could say no more after that; so she went upstairs with Miss Mary to put on her hat and jacket.

When they came down again, and were standing in the hall, Archie came over to her, and under pretence of helping her with a shawl which one of the ladies had lent her, he whispered—

"Don't let the old boy come, Ruth; he'll spoil it all; and I wanted to talk to you alone."

Ruth had not time to answer, but she made one more effort to avoid Mr. Matthew's company.

"It does seem a shame," she said, "to have you climb up that long hill, and then go back alone. At least you must come no further than the school."

"Oh, the glen is my favourite walk," said the unconscious artist. "I often walk there, and to-night I shall probably walk further than your house. I feel in the mood to walk miles."

Archie, in the background, made a comical gesture of despair; but without plainly telling Mr. Matthew he was not wanted, no more could be said.

Accordingly the party of three set out together, Wolf barking with delight and careering round them. Once when Mr. Matthew was bending down to pat his dog's head, Archie whispered quickly—

"Ruth, did you like my song?"

"Yes," she returned, in a low tone, and without asking which song he meant. That was all, but apparently it was satisfactory, for soon after the young man began to whistle, and his cheerfulness, which had been rather damped by the addition of a third party, returned again.

If there were anything which he particularly wished to say to his cousin, fate seemed bent on frustrating him. All next morning the parlour was occupied by Mrs. Lennox and Katie, and Ruth was never to be caught for a minute by herself. At last Archie said he would walk down to the school with Lance, as he would be gone before the boy returned.

"Will you come too, Ruth?" he asked.

But Mrs. Lennox particularly required Ruth at home this forenoon, so she could not go.

"You'll come down to the boat to see me off, of course?" he asked, in some anxiety; and when Ruth replied in the affirmative, he went away quite cheerfully with Lance, with whom he was great friends. Katie was coughing so badly that it was clear she could not go out in the afternoon, so then would be his opportunity. It was not to be, however. Mrs. Lennox, to his consternation, announced her intention of going down to the boat also, as it was a fine day, and she had some messages in the village. Could she have seen the glance of despair which Archie cast at his cousin, she would have been extremely indignant.

Fortune was indeed unkind, for the second time thus to interfere with his plans. This time there was no possibility of even trying to get rid of the unwelcome person. Resignation was the only course open, and our young man was not used to practising that virtue or to being denied his wishes; consequently, he was silent and unlike himself on the journey down. To do him justice, however, he did not attempt to vent his disappointed feelings on the unconscious author of them, and Mrs. Lennox never so much as suspected that her society was not perfectly welcome to him.

They were too early for the boat; so when they reached the village, Mrs. Lennox went into the one shop of the place, leaving the two young people to walk down to the pier. Now was his opportunity. Archie was not slow to avail himself of it.

"Ruth," he began hurriedly, "I have been waiting to tell you something, and now I have only a few minutes left. Oh, hang it!"

This last exclamation was uttered with such vigour, and in a tone so different from that with which he had commenced, that it positively startled Ruth. She looked at him in amazement.

"Look!" he groaned, with a tragic gesture; "what does the old boy want? What can he possibly want again? Don't look at him or notice him, and perhaps he'll go away."

But this admonition was in vain. Mr. Matthew's greeting and outstretched hand could not be ignored. He never dreamt of waiting to be recognised, but with a pleased smile came and joined the pair, as a matter of course. He soon informed them that he had come to meet the steamer, as he expected a parcel by it; so it was evident he would be there till the last moment.

When Archie saw that it was useless fighting against fate, he gave it up, and, with a laugh, seemed to recover his good-humour. He raised his eyebrows and shrugged his shoulders slightly.

"I must wait for another occasion, Ruth," he murmured in a low tone.

What was it he wished to say? Ruth scarcely knew whether she was glad or sorry for its postponement. She glanced at him doubtfully, but he was smiling now, which was more perplexing than ever. In a few minutes he would be gone. Ruth could not smile. She gave him her hand half sadly as she looked once more into the smiling blue eyes. Yesterday she had given herself up entirely to the pleasure of his society; was she not already paying for it by being unable now to shake herself free from the glamour of his presence? And he was going! He had already shaken hands with Mrs. Lennox and Mr. Matthew, and now it was her turn.

"Oh, Ruth, what an unlucky beggar I have been this time!" and then he stopped, but still retained her hand. He seemed as if he were about to say something further, but no words came; and Mrs. Lennox, who was nearer the gangway, began to gesticulate frantically that the steamer was beginning to move. With a hurried "Good-bye, Ruth," and another hand-pressure, the young man tore himself away, and had only time to jump on board when the boat began to move off. Ruth had said nothing—not even good-bye—but long afterwards she still felt the clasp of Archie's fingers, and saw again his last smiling look.

CHAPTER X.

THINGS GO WRONG.

MARCH was "coming in like a lion." The east wind seemed to penetrate even into the house. Perhaps the wretched state of the weather had something to do with the general upset of tempers. Lance seemed the only one of the household whose good-humour remained perfectly unaffected by the prevalent depression, and, unfortunately, he had to take himself off to school at an early hour. Mrs. Lennox was querulous and fault-finding, and Katie peevish and troublesome. Whether Ruth began by being cross or not, she certainly ended by losing her temper, which perhaps accounted for some of her misfortunes. Be that as it may, it certainly was an unfortunate day for her—one long to be remembered, and serious in its consequences.

Katie kept fidgeting about with the things on the table, and after being repeatedly requested not to touch the ink-bottle, succeeded in upsetting it over her sister's desk, from whence it poured in a thick black stream over that unfortunate young lady's dress. This was too much for Ruth. She started up, out of all patience, and sharply reprimanded the culprit, who instantly burst into angry tears. Mrs. Lennox rushed into the fray by scolding both parties, and peevishly telling Ruth the catastrophe was her own fault. This unreasonableness completely exasperated Ruth's already ruffled temper, and she retorted somewhat sharply. She had just picked up a couple of letters, thoroughly saturated with ink, and discovered that they were the only two she had ever received from Archie. This did not tend to allay her irritation or soften her reply to her aunt's further interference, so a war of words seemed imminent, when Mrs. Lennox fired a telling shot and routed her adversary completely.

"Dear, dear, what a temper!" she ejaculated. "It is a great pity your grandmother didn't send you to your rich old aunt; she could have kept you in order, perhaps, and we might have had the blessing of the good-tempered one."

"How do you know she is the good-tempered one?" Ruth demanded contemptuously.

"Ah! by all accounts she's the best, and the bonniest, too."

"Who said so?"

"Just your Cousin Archie, that you think so much of," Mrs. Lennox declared triumphantly, completely quenching the fire of her opponent.

The girl said no more, but bent over her stained dress, and rubbed it in silence. Had Archie said that?—not in those words, of course, and Mrs. Lennox must have asked him. No doubt she had asked which was the better-looking of the two girls, and Archie had said Rachel. Well, likely enough it was true; but he need not have said so. The conversation at the "At Home" rushed back to her mind. It was true, then, about Rachel. Was it not all true? Now that he was no longer here, she saw things in a different light. She had had a dream, a pleasant dream; but now the awakening had come. Why should she have fancied that Archie admired her? Had he not a delightful manner with everyone? so why should she have taken it for more than he meant? Decidedly Mrs. Lennox had silenced her opponent.

It happened that Jack had been home over Sunday, and had not gone back to town this Monday morning. He walked into the room at this juncture, with rather a moody expression of countenance.

"Look here, Ruth," he said, "I'm going down to the post-office, and want you to come with me."

It was not a very gracious invitation, certainly, but it seemed preferable to staying in the house; and if Jack's temper did not look particularly promising, it was, at least, a change of evils; so she went off to get ready.

As they walked down the hill together, Jack, breaking a long silence, remarked—

"I had a letter from India last week."

"Is there any news?" his sister inquired.

"Things seem to be going very badly," the young man responded gloomily. "The governor says if his business doesn't take a turn for the better, he doesn't know what may happen, or what's to become of you all. I'm sure I don't know, either: I couldn't support the whole family."

Ruth looked dismayed, but said nothing. Jack had evidently not finished yet.

After another gloomy silence, he spoke again.

"The governor wonders if there is no prospect of you getting married now. He seems to think that I'm to blame, evidently. I suppose he forgets that we don't go to town for the winter now, but stick down in this hole. I can't always be bringing fellows down and introducing them to you. I'm sure I brought Gordon, and he's a good enough catch for any girl; but you chose to be so high-and-mighty with him. But"—as Ruth tried to break in—"he's going to run down at the end of the week, and I don't think it's too late yet, if you only play your cards well."

"Oh, Jack!" groaned his sister, "for Heaven's sake don't be so coarse. Play my cards well! What in the name of all that is dreadful do you expect me to do? Shall I go down to his hotel and propose to the man, or in what other way can I throw myself at his head?"

"Rubbish!" ejaculated Jack contemptuously. "Look here, Ruth: with all your cleverness, you're a great fool! Who else is there for you? Surely"—and he cast a look of sudden suspicion at her—"you can't be such a fool as to think of Archie Douglas?"

"I don't know what you mean," she responded proudly, but with the colour flashing into her face.

"You don't mean to say you ever imagined a fellow like that would dream of marrying you?" Jack demanded, in a tone of disgust. "Why, he couldn't! It will only be some great swell that would suit him: he could only afford to marry an heiress—he has nothing of his own; and I'll be bound he costs his father a good round sum every year."

"I don't know why you should think his prospects interest me," Ruth said coldly; "and unless you have any more advice to give me, I think I shall turn back and go home with Lance."

"Oh, very well, if you choose to take the huff; but I advise you to think over what I have been saying."

Ruth retraced her steps, but it was too soon for Lance, so she passed the school, and stepped into a little grove of trees a few yards from the road, where it was sheltered from the east wind.

She sat down on a tree-stump, her feelings in keeping with the dreariness of the day. She smiled rather bitterly to think how sorrowful she had felt that Archie was unworthy of her esteem. Evidently that was not at all the question. He was so much above her that it was absurd her ever having dreamt of his caring for her. And even if he had cared, as Jack said, he could not marry.

Oh, poverty, poverty! and all the other troubles came crowding into her mind—her father's difficulties and his wish to be disembarassed of her. Jack had pointed out the means whereby she might comply with this desire of her father's; but she would die before she followed his suggestion. Make herself agreeable to Gordon, and try to catch him, as her brother put it!—never! The idea was humiliating; her cheeks burned at the bare thought. Gordon, of all men! No, no—anybody, anything but that.

But both her father and Jack wished to be rid of her. Would anyone at home, except Lance, miss her? At this a great wave of self-pity swept over her, and the tears which had been threatening could no longer be kept back, and, bending her head down on her hands, she wept unrestrainedly.

How long she sat there she could not have told, but all at once a crackling among the branches startled her. She did not move; perhaps the intruder would pass on without noticing her. No; the steps came to a halt in front of her.

She dried her eyes hastily and looked up. It was Mr. Matthew.

"My dear Miss Ruth," he exclaimed, in great concern, "what is the matter? Has anything happened?"

Ruth made a negative sign, but she was painfully conscious of her red eyes and tear-stained face. He still kept looking down at her sympathetically, so she was obliged to speak.

"It is nothing at all," she said, trying to steady her voice, "only I was feeling unhappy, and——"

She broke off and turned away her face.

"But, my dear Miss Ruth, why should you be unhappy?" the artist persisted.

"Am I such a fortunate person?" she asked. "Everything is wrong; but my chief trouble was that no one wanted me at home."

"What!" he exclaimed, "no one wants you at home?"

"No—is that very surprising? It seems that my father is too poor to support us all, and I am, evidently, the one too many. It occurred to him, and to Jack also, that the best thing I could do would be to marry, and take myself out of the way."

"The steps came to a halt in front of her."

"To marry?" he repeated; "anyone in particular?"

"Oh dear no! anyone who would have me."

"Then there is no one you care for, yourself?" he asked slowly.

"No; isn't it a pity?" she said, with sarcastic bitterness: "then there might be a chance of complying with their wishes; but, unfortunately, no one wants me."

"I know someone who does," he said quickly. "Ruth, I know there is nothing about me to take a girl's fancy; but I love you. Will you marry me?"

Ruth started and cast a quick look of blank amazement at him. She had been speaking recklessly, and with as little reserve as if he had been really a favourite uncle, in which light the young Douglasses had always regarded him.

She was too completely taken aback at first to do anything but stare at him.

"Oh, Mr. Matthew," she uttered at last, finding her voice, "this is worse than all—I couldn't have believed it of you! Did you think I was asking you to take pity on me?"

"No, no, no!" he declared hastily. "I know very well it never even occurred to you that I could be in love with you. But, Ruth"—and he seated himself down on the tree beside her—"I have loved you for a long time, and was only afraid you might fancy someone else—some young fellow—your handsome cousin, perhaps" (so everybody had concluded she must fall in love with Archie!); "but since you tell me there is no one, that has given me courage to ask. I know I am no longer young; but we have always been good friends, and I think you like me. I feel sure I could make you happy, Ruth. I am rich enough, too, to enable you to help the others, if that is anything. Do you think you could say 'Yes'?"

The artist's voice trembled a little with emotion, and the colour deepened on his naturally ruddy cheeks; but the girl appeared quite calm and unmoved.

After the first shock of surprise at his avowal, she began to ask herself if it were quite impossible. It was true that she liked him; and then he wanted her, which no one else did. Still, the idea was too strange yet.

"No, Mr. Matthew," she said decidedly; "it wouldn't be a fair arrangement. Everything would be on your side—even the affection."

"I don't expect you to love me all at once," he said quickly; "but at least, you don't dislike me?"

"Dislike you? Oh, Mr. Matthew! how could I? You are far too good. I like you very much indeed, only——"

"Then," he interrupted her eagerly, "if you like me very much, that is enough to begin upon. Could you not say 'Yes'?" It would make me so happy."

"But," said Ruth dubiously, "it doesn't really seem quite fair to you."

"Fair!" he cried, drawing nearer. "Dear Ruth, if you accepted me, I should be the happiest man in the world."

"Ah! I'm afraid you would soon find out your mistake," she said, with half a smile.

The artist gave a laugh of happy assurance.

"I'm not afraid of that," he said, with conviction. "Only try me, only say 'Yes,' dear Ruth;" and he bent towards her, and took her hand.

It was a great temptation to Ruth. What a way out of all her difficulties this would be! All the advantages rushed into her mind as she hesitated.

"Well," she responded slowly, as his eyes devoured her face, "if you like to risk it, Mr. Matthew——"

"My dear Ruth!" and he joyfully pressed her hand between both of his, and leant forward and kissed her.

Ruth started. She was not at all prepared for this. She drew away her hand quickly, and rose up. This was reality, and at present her mind could only grasp something vague and indefinite.

"I must go now," she said, standing some distance off. "I think I have been here for hours;" and she held out the tips of her fingers at arm's length, and before he had time to prevent her, she was hurrying away.

"Ruth," he called after her, "may I come up to-night?"

She looked back in alarm.

"Oh, not to-night, please," she said hastily. "My head aches so dreadfully, I couldn't speak a word, and must lie down when I get home;" and with that she was gone.

It was true that her head ached; what with the violent weeping and other emotions she had gone through, added to the east wind, it was no wonder. When she reached home, she went up-stairs without seeing anybody, and taking off her hat and jacket, laid her throbbing head down on her pillow. It was a relief to keep perfectly still, to shut her eyes, and not even think.

After some time, Lance came to the door to tell her it was tea-time, and ask what she was doing.

"I have a dreadful headache," she replied. "You might send me up a cup of tea, for I can't come down."

"All right;" and Lance trotted off, without stopping to ask a dozen questions, as Katie would have done.

RELIGIOUS WEARINESS AND ITS CAUSES.

BY THE REV. THOMAS G. SELBY.

"And let us not be weary in well-doing: for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not."—GAL. vi. 9.

THE Epistle to the Galatians is directed against two closely related errors, the ferment of which was bringing languor and disease into the temper of a church once distinguished for its vitality and active enthusiasm. Under the influence of Judaizing teachers these fickle converts were fast losing the simplicity of their faith in Christ's death. It is sometimes argued that a modification of theory upon the subject of the Atonement is not at all likely to weaken the motives of the religious life or dry up the manifold streams of Christian beneficence. The history of the Galatian Church is a practical answer to the contention. The observance of circumcision was dictated by a self-righteous temper, and necessarily came to be thought of as supplementing the redeeming love of the Cross. In St. Paul's interpretation of the position, the exaggerated honour and efficacy attached to this fleshly rite took something away from the glory of Christ's sacrifice, and attenuated its incomparable motives and sanctions. The imposition of this yoke upon the Gentiles clearly involved an insidious doctrinal revolution, and the doctrinal revolution soon brought in its train a lamentable degeneracy of temper and of life. With the dying-down of that sentiment of gratitude inseparable from true faith in the self-devoting love of Jesus Christ, no wonder that the natural bias towards parsimony should begin to reassert itself, and that the call to maintain the ministry, as well as to be mindful of the interests of the poor, should need to be enforced afresh. This sordidness into which the Galatians had apostatised as the influence of the Cross began to wane, was carnal in its root and upspringing; and that grudging temper which asserted itself when the supreme efficacy of the Cross became obscured by an adventitious rite, was as much a sowing to the flesh as gross and repulsive animalism itself.

"Well-doing," as defined in the context, is "sowing to the Spirit," of which work ungrudging liberality is a most important feature. In other words, we must fill up the full measure of our lives by giving effect to those lofty desires and affections which are fostered within us by the Spirit of God, always setting ourselves without a moment's hesitancy to the pursuit of spiritual objects. Evil-doing, on the other hand, is "sowing to the flesh," taking up the things which occupy our time, thought, affection, because of those coarse incitements which spring up in the sphere of the fleshly life.

In some Eastern countries the fertile field may be seen running close up to the edge of the desert sand, so that the husbandman might almost walk on the line between the two, and with one hand cast his seed over the desert, and with the other let it fall upon a deposit of alluvial soil. There is something like that in human nature, and the line between the carnal and the spiritual is not so broad as we think. The realms of the earthy and of the divine lie in close proximity to each other in the same life, and man's will moves restlessly to and fro on the margin between the two. It is not difficult, alas! to find men who are always facing towards the flesh, and whatever they do is, directly or indirectly, because of motives which take their rise in the region of passion or appetite. On the other hand, there are elect souls whose faces are persistently turned away from the flesh, and they seek to do whatever engages their time, thought, and strength from purely spiritual motives. They are sowing to the Spirit, not, of course, without temptation and discouragement and infirmity. Perhaps most of us hover on the margin of these two domains, sowing for awhile to what is highest and best, and then, when things are contrary, abating our efforts; which, after all, is one and the same thing with sowing to the flesh. We lack strength, patience, consistency, steadfastness, that singleness of aim which is the mark of those who are pre-eminently spiritual. We all need to be warned against discouragement and practical apostasy. How often do we find ourselves flagging in the very best work, and perhaps tempted to turn our back upon it!

A few months ago, an eminent physiologist was setting himself to show in the course of a popular lecture that the sense of weariness is caused by the accumulation of poisons in the blood and tissues of the body. When we feel tired, not only has there been an expenditure of force out of all proportion to the intake of nourishment, but the vital mechanism has become clogged and unfit to do its work. The hunted hare will sometimes drop down dead in its flight, and this not because of the sudden failure of the heart's action under the influence of fear, but for the reason that the poor creature has been "poisoned by the products of its own activity." All weariness occurs in either the muscles or the brain, and the bundles of nerve which link together the thinking centre and the extremities are as incapable of fatigue as telegraph wires. Whenever weariness and painful exhaustion are felt, chemical débris has been heaped up to dangerous proportions in the interstices of the living framework. Almost all the organs of the body are intended to act as internal scavengers for the removal of this waste; the liver, for instance, converting the deposit of deleterious into harmless substances. Where weariness and oppression are experienced, not only has there been a reckless expenditure of capital, but the various organs of the body have been slow in getting to work, and have failed to keep pace with the activities of the muscle and the acting brain. To demonstrate the theory that activity is co-ordinated with these chemical changes, the lecturer used an experiment which, if distasteful to our humaner instincts, was at least scientifically conclusive. He projected upon the screen the shadow of the heart of a tortoise just dissected from the living body, which still continued to pulsate. When the heart was washed in a solution of salts, the movement ceased, but after a pinch of lime had been put into the solution, the organ recovered its rhythmic action and sustained it for many minutes.

Does not weariness in well-doing correspond in many particulars with this explanation of physical fatigue? Sometimes we weary in the highest and best work, because our secret thought and life are poisoned with elements that are the products of the flesh. Sometimes the intake is not proportionate to the outlay of energy, and our religious life is unequal in the vigour of its component parts. We lack that all-round moral robustness which can drive off evil and make our service a constant refreshment and delight.

This unrelenting struggle between the flesh and the spirit constitutes a standing temptation to weariness. The fact asserted in the preceding chapter explains the fatal paralysis which so often seems to loom over religious life and endeavour: "the spirit and the flesh are contrary the one to the other." In the enthusiasm of our first consecration, we are scarcely sensible of this lower side to our natures. It seems to have vanished; but by-and-bye the reaction comes. It is in this sphere that the secret poison distils itself which causes religious languor and lassitude, and which must needs be cast out if we are to live aright. Very ominous symptoms soon present themselves unless the impulses which engender themselves on the animal side of our nature are neutralised and destroyed. The vapourings of the Old Adam in us must be driven out, or well-doing will become a burden and a mental torture to us. The uprisings of these half-forgotten corruptions choke and load down our divinest capabilities, and make God's work a dragging weariness. They act like a strong brake upon the delicate movements of the spirit. Let us see to it that the desires of the flesh are consistently subdued and have no place in our true life. That life of humility, meekness, and dependence upon God must be jealously nurtured whose fulness will make our daily tasks as delightful as physical movement when conditions of perfect health exist. All weariness is incipient disease, of whose germs the carnal nature is the forcing-bed. Languor in spiritual things, service which is constrained rather than the eager, spontaneous outcome of love, the tasks to which you have to goad yourselves, all speak of unhealed disorder and infirmity, and insidious poison working in the deepest springs of the life.

One of the poisons precipitated by this interaction of the flesh and spirit, which needs to be daily cast out if we are to escape the sense of weariness, is the pride of an unruly imagination. We may sometimes adopt God's work without recognising His sovereignty over it, and allow our plan of its development to become a private idol. We are not altogether wanting in right motives, but oh, how prone to forget that the carnal nature is always seeking to assert itself again, and tempts us to exploit the Kingdom of God in the interest of our personal ambition! We suffer our fancy to play about God's work, and make it our own special scheme. How proud we are at its advances, and how mortified at its apparent checks! It is peculiarly so in the first stages of our religious career. We have been spurred by our natural romancefulness, and our deepest natures have not been fully quickened to calm and steadfast love of what is right and holy. The service of God and humanity, to the eye of youth are invested with adventitious charms which evaporate in the push, and prose, and exhausting jostle of daily life. What a sphere for splendid chivalries! How noble in itself, and how ennobling to all taking part in it! The world cannot fail to applaud an enterprise so glorious as that in which we resolve to play our part. How obediently it will respond to the fascination of our sacred and unselfish aims! The vineyard or the harvest-field into which we are drawn is for the moment a realm of enchantment. With a great show of zeal, with nimble footstep, with exuberant courage, we go forth to the enterprises in which we are to prove ourselves heroes and bring influential sections of society to more adequately Christian standpoints of thought and conduct. But after a time the balked imagination grows weary, all novelty wears off from our work, and the golden romance dissolves itself into something as unpoetical as stale manna. The routine and drudgery of our life-tasks becomes a haunting nightmare rather than a conceit of dreamland. Alas! alas! we had come, all but unconsciously to ourselves, to desire not so much God's harvests as the waving fruition of our own gay fancies. A reaction of the old nature had been insidiously set up, and we were all but overcome by heartache, languor, disappointment, scepticism. The machinery had become hopelessly clogged, for we had failed to cleanse ourselves from our vain wilfulness by daily contact with the humbling and soul-sanctifying presence of God.

The love of present praise and power is another poison which insinuates itself into the character, and produces lamentable languor and weariness. We start with the assumption that disinterested effort to serve God and our generation should be recognised and encouraged, and the recognition is so slow in coming, and the encouragement so faint and frigid when it does come, that they make no appreciable difference in our lives. So much is thought of the attitude of our fellow-labourers and of those who should be in sympathy with our activities, that the Lord of the harvest Himself is in danger of becoming a mere shadow or phantom in the background. We prize the plaudits of the Church and the suffrages of its members almost more than the commendation and support of its Divine Head. When our unconfessed lust of praise and power is not gratified, and we are compelled to fall back upon our residuary stock of motive, we see that many mixed and hurtful considerations have crept in and overcharged our hearts. Oh, how we thirst for present honour! We desire to do our tasks like the workers in Venetian glass, or artists in fligree, or diamond-cutters in some international exhibition, with crowds looking on. We aspire to move men in the mass, and think it beneath the vocation we have received to deal with them as individuals; but we find that with the growth of education men are not so easily hypnotised in the crowd as they once were. Men think and feel apart, and if we are to do good work it must be through more or less obscure forms of service. We are half angry to think we must toil unnoticed, and do much of our work without a syllable of sympathy or a cheer of commendation from anyone. Our struggle, our beneficence, our active ministries of teaching and of help, we assume should be enacted on a conspicuous and well-lighted stage, so that many eyes be turned upon us, not thinking that God would be our enemy if He were to arrange to gratify these carnal aspirations. Perhaps we meet with more criticism than support in our efforts, and criticism seems to tease and aggravate our latent pride. We at least should be sacred from such assaults. Our coadjutors see no wisdom in our plans, no heroic worth in our services, and possibly they may pour the cruel east wind of their animadversion upon our work. How many of us have been pained and cast down and perhaps turned aside in this way! We have not cast the poison from our hearts.

Another form assumed by this poison which begets weariness, is resentment at the discouragements we encounter in our course as Christian workers. How bitter we grow when those for whom we have laboured disappoint our hopes! It seems as though the precious forces of thought and love so freely lavished upon them had been entirely lost. Those who are the objects of our well-meant endeavour not only prove themselves void of gratitude, but bring scandal upon religion and make the disciples of Christ hang their heads with shame. Such depressing experiences, we are ready to think, will justify us in claiming exemption from active service for the rest of our days. Perhaps we are ready to impeach the principles of that providential government which now and again seems to lightly permit us to labour in vain and spend our strength for nought and in vain. We half assume that God ought to set aside the very principles of moral freedom as a compliment to our work, and keep our protégés out of the mire by a demonstration of mechanical force. Oh, how our hearts ache! As we look back upon the story of frustration and defeat, we turn sick and faint. The temper of cynicism towards man, and unconfessed disaffection towards God, has infiltrated itself into our tissues, and it is a pain to be compelled to struggle on in our service. It was so with the prophet Samueel, who could not tolerate the idea that the king whom he had anointed, counselled, befriended at every turn, should be finally set aside. He was so disheartened by the melancholy retrospect, that not only was he unmanly for the work of the hour, but his prophetic foresight was obscured, and he could not see the glory that was surely coming to Israel. "How long wilt thou mourn for Saul, seeing I have rejected him from reigning over Israel?" Sad and bitter thoughts of those who did run well, overpower us as we look back, and unfit us for what God is still requiring at our hands. Whilst we must bear the burdens of those who have gone astray, and seek, so long as there is still hope, to save them, idle regrets must be put away which waste the spiritual vitality, weigh upon the movements of the hour, and choke up the channels of the life. We are now and again tempted to give up human nature in despair, and to reflect upon the fidelity of God. This un pitying hardness, this unwillingness to be God's instruments through evil and good report, is a poison of the flesh which is apt to lodge itself in our nobler life and to produce weariness in well-doing.

The stupor and indolence inherent in the flesh transfer themselves by some obscure process to the spirit, and so choke and clog the finer energies that the best work becomes a burden grievous to be borne. The flesh always seems to gravitate towards inaction as though it were seeking that ignoble quiescence out of which it has been raised. There is a taint of congenital idleness in most of us which is physical in its basis. It would be easy to specify forms of Christian service which are almost entirely carried on by zealous recruits, and men and women rarely continue in them after they have passed mid-life, particularly if they have prospered in the world. Does not the history of some Christians tend to run parallel with that of the bird once found in the Mauritius, which has become extinct within comparatively recent years? The bird could fly once, but became inconveniently heavy in the course of time, possibly through luxurious and self-indulgent habits, and at last confined its movements to the ground. It must have been a sorry attempt it made at flight in the penultimate stages of its history. With every fresh generation, body increased in bulk and wings contracted in spread. At last the featherless stumps were unequal to the task of lifting the ill-fated creature from the ground, and then the extinction of the entire species was only a question of time. Some who still claim for themselves the Christian name suggest the history of this well-known bird. The broad, strong, sinewy wings which should bear them aloft into a realm where youth is ever renewed, come to resemble at last the mere paddle of the walrus or the seal. They are weighted by the grossness and luxury and leaden scepticism rife in that little world of pomp where they delight to move, and it becomes at last an unutterable weariness for them to soar in the higher realms of Christian duty and service. Their disappearance from the ranks of God's workers is only a question of time. They follow steadily in the wake of this extinct bird, which is not the path of the eagle. Activity is pre-eminently a spiritual rather than a fleshly attribute. The fatal heaviness of the flesh transfers itself to the spirit, unless there be a daily renewal of the inward man.

Another poison engendered within us by the flesh which helps to produce the sense of religious weariness is doubt. If we are permeated by tempers of unbelief, it is impossible to find comfort and satisfaction in the highest forms of religious work. The man who is a Hercules in natural gifts and endowments will drop out of the ranks like the weediest recruit if the inspirations of faith are wanting; and those alone who are spiritual and loyal to spiritual leadings can have genuine faith. The flesh is always at work in imposing its limitations upon our faith. It impedes that deep intake of Divine influence by which faith is maintained. It so keeps before our imagination the common things solicited by secret physical instincts, that our belief in the better things upon which holy and sacred work depends is checked and hampered. It is always seeking to make us into mere materialists. The pride of the flesh allures us to waste our souls upon the impossible and to undertake Divine work in human strength. If we are unspiritual, and full of the misgivings inseparable from such a condition, our duties will distress us in proportion to their sacredness. As travellers we are familiar with mountain atmospheres in which it seems all but impossible to tire. If we drink life, hope, love, invigoration at the very lips of the Most High, we shall never become sick at heart and weary in well-doing.

This lack of faith sums up all other causes of religious weariness in one. The faith which purifies the heart will relieve us from not a little of that internal and external friction which operates so disastrously upon our service, and robs it of much of its value. It is said that in the course of half a century our silver coinage loses fifty per cent. of its value by the inevitable wear and tear of trade. And not a little of the value of many Christian lives is lost through an analogous moral cause. We are proud of heart, and discontinue some of our activities because we will not accept temporary humiliations. Selfishness asserts itself, and we refuse to plod on unless we can have some kind of apparent success to recompense us in our tasks. We are envious, and chafe under our work because it does not bring us to the front and give us pre-eminence in church life. We are overbearing, and will not work if there is to be any degree of criticism and conflict. Our neighbours must be complaisant. If our hearts are purified by faith, there will be little or no sense of friction, no displeasure at reasonable criticism, no sourness and mortification when disappointment comes.

Just as the physiologist, by adding some new element to his solution, freed the fast-dying heart of the tortoise from the poison with which it was charged, and restored the rhythm of its pulsation, so let us see to it that pride, ambition, unbelief, cynicism, selfishness of aim, and grossness of taste, all the elements begotten of the lower life, are daily washed away and fresh streams of life are received from God to maintain the unfaltering rhythm of our holy service. "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent me," said Jesus, and "to finish His work;" and if work like His is our poison rather than our meat, and our best energies are clogged by the products of a fleshly environment, it is because we do not live in the same realm of soul-sweetening and soul-sanctifying influence. Work ought to be our best refreshment, and never fall into a sad and emaciating penance.

If we are to escape the sense of religious weariness, all the functions of the religious life must be kept in constant, harmonious, and well-timed play. Should self-examination, the discipline of the soul, systematic meditation upon Divine things, private and common prayer, be neglected, our lightest tasks will burden and nauseate us. Almost all the organs of the body, we are told, co-operate in removing the pernicious products with which muscles and tissues are charged after sustained exertion, and in changing fatal into innocuous elements. The sense of fatigue is sure to afflict and overpower us when the different organs fail to keep pace with the activity of the brain or the tension of the sinew. With all our religious service there must be linked earnest and persevering prayer, unsleeping watchfulness over the inner life, speedy contrition when we find the uprisings of evil within us, self-discipline and the daily study of the Word which strengthens and sanctifies. We sometimes hear men say they are so busy in doing good that they have no time for religious reading, and need to say their prayers at a gallop, if they say them at all. One wonders how the elements of the old nature can be cast out from such men when they reappear, and how these bustling Christians can keep themselves pure and healthy instruments for the Divine service. The case is parallel to that which occurs in the physical life when the sense of fatigue is felt because the blood and tissues are charged with a greater burden of deleterious waste than the lungs can promptly remove or the liver expeditiously convert. It is surely a healthier and more effectual thing to maintain the balance between the different parts of the religious life.

To check languor, impatience, and fretfulness, we must remember that this reaping is sure in its appointed time. The spiritual seed must needs go through its own proper cycles of growth. Whilst many things are made to depend upon us, there are fixed principles of Divine order and succession which determine the unfolding of the deathless seed. The blade, ear, and full corn in the ear, cannot be put into a varied or inverted relation to each other. God's great cycle which inspheres our little rounds of toil and struggle can no more be modified by our capricious wishes than the orbit of a sun can be changed by a pocket magnet. These bigger cycles mean more munificent harvests.

In some of the arid deserts of Australia, where not a sign of vegetable life is to be found, the natives dig up the kauri-gum of commerce. That gum is the fossilised product of a tree which flourished ages ago, and covered these desert districts with thick and far-spreading forests. The forests have vanished, but, thousands of years after, the soil is rich with the overflow of their copious sap. And if we are true to God and our vocation, after-epochs of history will be the better for our work. When we have passed away, and our names are forgotten, and our tomb-stones have crumbled to dust, the world will be the richer for what we have done, and the wealth of our imperishable harvests will be gathered out of the ashes of a burnt-up universe.

THE SCRAP-GATHERER'S STORY.

BY THE REV. FRED. HASTINGS.

NEAR Russell Square, London, I met once the most miserable man I had ever seen. At least, he was the most miserable in appearance. A trifle made him very communicative.

He had been a shoemaker, and had managed to earn a good living at one time.

Machine-made boots, cheapening the market, lessened his trade. Harder and harder became his struggles. Then he lost his wife, who had been a great help in selling his wares. To add to his misfortunes, shortly after that great loss, a prick with a nail, while at work, produced a sore that would not heal. It festered. He had at last even to give up business and go into a hospital. When he came out, his hand was so crippled that he could not go on with his old style of work at bootmaking. His little home and belongings had all vanished for rent, and he was not allowed to return to his room. The common lodging-house had to be his refuge, when he could raise money enough. At other times he had to remain in the streets, seeking the shelter of railway arches, porches, unnoticed corners in squares, or creeping into carts that stood in unguarded yards. Thus rheumatism fastened upon him and twisted him at length out of shape. He "seemed to himself to become smaller." His coat "began to flap around him, and appeared altogether too large." He took to picking up scraps of iron, paper, rags, and general waste. These he always sold at one place. The marine store-dealer became his friend and patron.

He said, "Ah, I only get a farthing a pound now; I used to be paid a halfpenny. It is hard work. You go up one street, down another, and find nothing. If I earn sixpence a day, I manage. Sevenpence I call a good day's pay. I am out early, and stay out as long as I can see. Trade is very bad just now. Don't know the reason."

Here a bone in the gutter left by some dog catches his eye. Into the many-patched bag it goes. The old man goes on, still talking and keeping his eyes on the gutters. I walked by his side, watching him with interest and listening to his story with sympathy.

"Sometimes I get a lift. Why, sir, some servants at some of the big houses know me and believe me honest. They give me a smile sometimes; they save up things for me; they leave sometimes a scrap of cold victuals on a ledge when they know I shall come by. I get it if some prowling dog or snivelling cat has not seized it first.

"I stay at Newton's Chambers, Holborn, when I can raise the pence to pay for my night's lodgings. Queer place. You would not care to put your head inside it."

"But I have. I have been in the 'doss-house.'"

The man looked at me with astonishment. He found he had some kinship with the stranger. I explained that I had been there to hunt up a wanderer, and had seen the common kitchen and sleeping places.

"Have you ever slept in a 'doss-house'?"

"No."

"Then I hope you never will."

* * * * *

I walked along thinking what good purposes this man might be serving all unconsciously.

In a little book which fell into my hands when I was a boy, was a story that deeply impressed me. It told of the proverb which a gentleman had painted over his kitchen mantel-piece, "Waste not, want not." It went on to describe the course of life of two individuals—one who despised the motto and came to great want, and the other who acted upon it and attained to wealth, and of how the latter was then able to help the one who had treated trifles as of no import.

Many things that appear useless have some hidden value. That which appears fit only for the dust-heap, may become fitted for a monarch's crown. We have to learn to avoid despising anything as complete waste and rubbish. Few things are fit only for "the void." Rags, pieces of paper, dust, refuse, bits of leather, of carpet, chippings, sweepings, are all of some value. I knew a man who made a competency by buying scraps of carpet from the great upholsterers, and working them up into hassocks and small rugs.

In jewellers' shops every particle of filing, scraping, or grinding, is preserved for the assayer. The wheels upon which gold and silver articles are polished, when worn out are burned, and the fire reveals particles of the precious metal, such as could not be seen by the naked eye. Sweepings—after great care has been used to pick up every particle of precious metal—are sold. They bring several shillings a barrel. It is said that when the floor of a jeweller's shop has to be renewed, the dirt accumulated in the crevices will often pay the cost of a new floor. Many particles of precious metal are held in it, or worked into the wood. The wood is burned and the gold saved.

I saw in an assayer's yard in Sheffield a number of barrels of broken gilded picture-frames and pieces of gilt paper, and was told that great amounts of gold, in the aggregate, were thus saved by being passed through the fire. The receipts from the sale of the refuse of starch mills constitutes a large part of the profits. If this refuse could not be sold, some mills would have to stop or run at a loss. The refuse is used to feed cattle.

Bookbinders calculate on the parings from books and magazines as part of their profit. The paper-trimmings of large establishments become of value to the extent of hundreds of pounds yearly.

In America, lumbermen—the fellers and cutters of timber—formerly wasted as much wood as they used. Small pieces that were formerly cast away are now cut up into laths or shingles. I saw in one lumber- or timber-mill sawdust utilised for fuel. By an ingenious arrangement—the invention of the proprietor of the lumber-mill—the sawdust was caught under the circular saws, and carried by a broad strap to a funnel. By that it was carried to be shot into the fire.

A large number of persons on the Continent live to-day by gathering refuse cigars and tips. In Copenhagen one hospital is supported by the money raised from the tips of cigars saved in boxes in the gardens and saloons. In Germany many children are fed, trained, educated, and sent forth into the world with a good start through savings from cigars. The rejected waste of a wasteful habit even becomes a means of good.

In the United States mint are double floors, the upper pierced with holes innumerable, so that it is like a sieve. Through the first the gold-dust passes, and during the year as much as six thousand pounds is said to be thereby saved to the Government.

It has been said that if the pieces of bread that are left on the tables of the well-to-do and wealthy of England to be swept away, and often thrown to the dust-heap, could be saved, the country would in a year be richer by a million pounds. This extra amount, distributed to every missionary society in England, would enable more than double the present amount of work to be done in the world towards the destruction of the power of evil and the establishment of Christ's Throne.

The crumbs from the table of Dives made the dinner of Lazarus. This had been noticed by Christ. He once fed Lazarus in a mass. When once Christ had fully provided for the wants of those likely to starve, He said, "Gather up the fragments, that nothing be lost." Christ was careful of fragments, and taught His disciples to be so.

In Nature there appears to be waste. Think of the great stretches of uncultivated land, salt marshes, frozen regions, wide prairies, rocky ridges, dreary deserts, vast oceans. On earth's surface there is much grass that is not used for pasture. There are many flowers that human eyes never see, and forests that man never penetrates. There are depths that he has never sounded, untold mines of earth he cannot reach. In the interior of the earth is ample heat, yet we have to labour for that we use. Sunshine we need, but how much goes by the world unused. A small portion only of that which spreads through the solar system is checked, and absorbed by our small world. In stellar regions there seems to be infinite waste of light and force. Why all this? It would not have been to the glory of God to have appeared limited in power. There could be no stint or niggardliness on the part of an Almighty Being. Nothing must be poverty-stricken; all must be lavish as royal wealth. In material things, however, although there is such lavishness, no waste is allowed, no atom is lost. All is used over and over again—as vapour, heat, particles chafed from rocks forming pebbly beach, sand, and soil. Soil grows grain, grain supports man and beast. Material things help to produce unmaterial; food stimulates thought and feeling. The apparently unused sun's heat goes towards the totality of force.

In the world of thought there is no waste. Good thoughts are gathered. From Copernicus, Tycho Brahe, Kepler, Newton, Galileo, and Herschell, men now gather knowledge that leads to further knowledge. Watts, Stephenson, Morse, Edison, are only founders of inventions on which others build. So is it in the world of mind. No thought is wasted. In the spiritual sphere, too, all devotion, faithfulness, endurance, and suffering are not waste. The prophets, the martyrs, the apostles, all worked and suffered, but no single pang was in vain.

All things tell; God gathers results. That which a man might think a fragment or a failure is leading to perfection. Perhaps it is already a success. There has been no waste in the realm of truth, of piety, or suffering faithfulness.

God could have put manna into the vessels of the Israelites in the desert if it had been good for them to be saved the trouble of collecting it. The Garden of Eden could have been kept right without man, but it was better for man in his innocent state to have to "keep" it.

Birds are provided with feathers, animals with furs, without effort. All animals except man are provided with food without cultivating it. Man is required to prepare his own coverings and produce his own food. It is because it is better for a being in a higher grade that he has to do this. Man not only gets exercise, but learns to think, to be self-reliant, to be careful, to gather fragments and learn the value his God put upon himself.

"Trade is very bad just now."—p. 706.

If minds were all alike, or if filled without effort, it would be an evil for the race.

Repeated small savings equal sudden great gains. How often men regret the waste of opportunities of gaining knowledge. Some rejoice in the fact that they used them. I know one, who fills the highest civic office in a borough, of whom it was said that "when a poor boy he was never seen without a book under his arm or by his side—that he was always filling up leisure moments." Even great thinkers must have been gatherers of fragments.

It is said that David Cox, the celebrated artist, used to sketch many things on paper and then cast them aside as not being up to his ideal. He did not think them worthy of preservation. They were consigned to the waste-paper basket or scattered on the floor.

His old housekeeper, either from motives of tidiness or reverence for her master, picked out these torn and crumpled pieces. She preserved them. When the gifted artist had paid the debt of Nature, his effects in due course were sold at auction at "Christie's," realising un hoped-for amounts. Then the old housekeeper brought out the contents of the waste-paper basket. They were carefully mounted, framed and sold. Enough money was realised by their sale to enable her to pass the rest of her days in comfort. There was unexpected value in fragments and scraps!

I am aroused from thinking by the scrap-gatherer at my side.

"Good-bye, sir. Hope I shall see you another day. Yes, I will look up and try and remember the One who told His disciples to pick up the scraps. I am doing good to others, I suppose, in some way. Perhaps the good Lord may not overlook me, a poor scrap-gatherer. You think He won't let a fragment of humanity be lost that He can prevent."

"Certainly not."

"I shall be quite content to be as a scrap in His bag. Good-bye."

JULY 15TH. VISIT OF THE WISE MEN.

To read—St. Matt. ii. 1—12. Golden Text—ver. 11.

INTRODUCTION. Last lesson told of Christ as a babe of forty days old being presented to God in the Temple of Jerusalem. After that Joseph and Mary returned for a time to Bethlehem. There we find them to-day—not in the stable of the inn, but in a house. The census having been taken, most visitors had left Bethlehem—more room for the Holy Family. Some friend probably had taken them in. Now were to receive visitors from a far land.

I. THE WISE MEN AT JERUSALEM. (1—8.)

Often called "the Magi." Who were they?

Probably nobles or princes of Persia.

As such their visit was foretold in Ps. lxxii. 10.

Worshipped the true God under emblem of fire.

Possibly had heard of prophecy of Balaam (Num. xxiv. 17).

What brought them long journey to Jerusalem?

Sight of a strange "star" or meteor of light.

Watched it move—followed for three months.

Lost it at Jerusalem. Then go to Herod's palace.

They are seeking a king. Where is he born?

Surely the ruling prince must know. Did he?

Herod, himself a usurper, was in great fear lest the kingdom should be taken from him.

What did he do? Called the religious leaders together—all the chief priests and scribes.

Asked what was foretold about birth of Messiah.

Scribes learned in the Scriptures knew the prophecies. Had made copies for synagogues.

Priests would often have heard them read.

There could be no possible mistake (Micah v. 2).

Bethlehem—City of David—was to be the place.

Herod then inquires time of the star's appearance.

Meaning to kill all infants born at that time.

Hoped thus to murder the infant Christ.

Sends wise men to Bethlehem, promising to follow.

LESSONS. From the wise men. 1. Their faith.

Believed "star" was God's guiding—followed it.

"Thy word is a lamp to my feet." "Teach me,

O Lord, the way of Thy statutes."

2. Their earnestness. Stopped by no difficulties.

They persevered till they found Him they sought.

"Seek ye My face." "They that seek Me early shall find Me."

II. THE WISE MEN AT BETHLEHEM. (9—12.)

The star reappeared—God was still guiding.

Their joy was great—their search nearly over.

Bethlehem reached—the child was soon found.

They entered—fell down—worshipped—gave gifts. Gold, as fit for the King of kings (Is. lx. 6).

Incense, emblem of prayer—always used in worship (Ps. cxli. 2).

Myrrh, emblem of suffering—Man of sorrows.

Then, warned by God's voice in dream, returned home another way and escaped Herod.

LESSONS. Offerings meet to be given to Christ.

Gold of devotion to His service.

Incense of prayer and praise.

Myrrh of broken and contrite heart.

JULY 22ND. FLIGHT INTO EGYPT.

To read—St. Matt. ii. 13—23. Golden Text—Ps. cxxi. 8.

INTRODUCTION. Come to-day to the last event told about Jesus Christ as an infant. Have seen Him worshipped by the Jewish shepherds and Gentile wise men. Have heard the songs of the angels and the blessings of Simeon and Anna. Remind how Simeon had foretold that a sword should pierce the soul of His mother Mary on His account (St. Luke ii. 35). Christ was to be a "Man of sorrows" (Is. liii. 3). His persecution began even while He was an infant.

I. FLIGHT TO EGYPT. (13—16.) The cause.

Wise men departed home—warned by an angel.

Same angel now warns Joseph in a dream.

Herod is plotting to kill Jesus Christ.

Joseph is to take Mary and the child to Egypt.

God had once brought Israel out of Egypt.

Afterwards forbade them to take refuge there.

Now expressly commands Joseph to go there.

Joseph obeys, not questioning the command.

Has implicit trust and confidence in God's wisdom.

Leaves country and home; takes the long journey.

How could a village carpenter meet the expense?

The wise men's present of gold would enable him.

Thus Christ fulfilled the prophet's words (Hos. xi. 1), and sojourned in Egypt till Herod's death.

LESSONS. 1. Ready obedience to God's will.

2. The ministry of angels to protect (Ps. xxxiv. 7).

II. MURDER OF INNOCENTS. (16—18.) The cause.

1. The wise men's not returning to Jerusalem.

2. Herod's jealousy of Christ increases to hatred.

The result. All babes under two are slain.

Bethlehem filled with tears and cries of woe.

As children of Israel wept when passing tomb of Rachel on their way to Babylon (Jer. xxxi. 15), so is there fresh weeping now.

LESSONS. These babies unconsciously suffered for Christ.

But obtained after death an eternal peace.

So by their deaths were really blessed by Him.

Christ still says, "Suffer little children to come to Me."

III. RETURN TO PALESTINE. (19—23.) Another call.

All Jesus's actions for Christ ordered by God.
Time come (by Herod's death) to leave Egypt.
Directed to return to the region of Galilee.
Chooses Nazareth as his new place of residence.
Fulfilled words not found in Old Testament.
Perhaps alluded to His being despised and rejected, Nazareth being held in scorn (St. John i. 46).

LESSONS. 1. Order my goings by Thy Word.

2. Hold Thou me up, and I shall be safe.

3. "Thy way, not mine, O Lord,
However rough it be."

JULY 29TH. THE YOUTH OF JESUS.

To read—St. Luke ii. 40—52. Golden Text—ver. 52.

INTRODUCTION. Christ probably two years in Egypt. Nothing more heard of Him for ten years. He was then twelve years old—an age at which specially intelligent and pious children were allowed to go to the Passover for the first time, fourteen being the usual age. This is the subject of to-day's lesson.

I. CHRIST IN THE TEMPLE. (40—50.) Remind of the three yearly feasts of the Jews.

Passover—in early spring—15th day of Abib.

Pentecost—beginning of summer.

Tabernacles—end of autumn.

All men had to attend all the three feasts.

Women and elder children went occasionally.

Thus Hannah went yearly, taking new clothes for Samuel (1 Sam. ii. 19).

Passover commemorated deliverance from Egypt (Ex. xii. 42).

Also was type of Lamb of God saving from sin.

Now He Himself as a Jewish boy joins the feast.

The solemn services over, all disperse home.

Large companies join together for protection.

Christ missed at end of the first days' journey.

Picture parents' grief—anxious search—the return.

He is found in the Temple among Jewish Rabbis.

What is He doing? Listening to their wisdom.

Asking questions to gain knowledge of God's law.

Surprising all by His intelligent questions and knowledge.

Mary questions Him—surprised at His conduct.

He reminds her that His Father is God—He must learn and do His will.

But Mary could not understand His meaning.

LESSONS. 1. Christ loved God's House (Ps. cxxii. 1).

Shall we not love it, too?

2. Christ loved God's Word. It was as meat and drink to Him.

Thus was filled with grace and wisdom (ver. 40).

Shall we not seek to know it more?

3. Christ loved instruction. Copy His example.

II. CHRIST IN NAZARETH. (51—52.) Picture the home.

Joseph, the village carpenter, working at his trade.

Jesus, the growing lad, learning to assist him.

Daily attending the village school with others.

On the Sabbath worshipping in the synagogue.

Going up to Jerusalem to the great festivals.

When Joseph died, supporting His mother (St. Mark vi. 3).

All the while obedient, gentle, and submissive.

Growing yearly taller, wiser, better (ver. 52).

Increasing in favour both with God and man.

LESSONS. 1. Diligence in earthly calling—not slothful in business.

2. Obedience to parents, teachers, and masters.

3. Contentment with our lot—preparing for higher work if called to it by God.

4. Growth in knowledge, purity, piety.

AUGUST 5TH. THE BAPTISM OF JESUS.

To read—St. Mark i. 1—11. Golden Text—ver. 11.

INTRODUCTION. Christ lived till thirty in retirement at Nazareth. The world knew Him not. Now, at the appointed age for those "who minister about holy things" (Num. iv. 3), He comes forward for baptism before beginning His public life. This Gospel begins with that because it especially records the ministry of Christ.

I. ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST. (1—8.) 1. His baptism.

He is announced as the messenger of Christ.

Foretold as coming to prepare for Him (Matt. iii. 1).

As a herald—to announce the King's coming.

As a pioneer—to prepare the road for Him.

This he did by preaching in the wilderness.

His subject—repentance towards God and faith in the coming Messiah as Saviour.

Men must feel their sin before they can be saved.

Must also be baptised as outward sign of cleansing.

Thus his preaching was baptism of repentance for forgiveness of sins.

Vast crowds gathered, professed repentance, confessed their sin, promised amendment, and were baptised.

2. His mode of life. His dress of the coarsest.

Such as worn by Elijah (2 Kings i. 8) and other prophets.

His girdle not embroidered, but of untanned leather.

His food. Locusts, or locust beans, and wild honey.

Simple and plain even to asceticism.

His message. All his hearers morally unclean.

All needed spiritual regeneration.

One mightier than he was coming soon.

He, the prophet, was only His unworthy servant.

Christ would baptise with the Holy Ghost.

LESSON. "He that believeth and is baptised shall be saved."

II. CHRIST BAPTISED TO FULFIL ALL RIGHTEOUSNESS (St. Matt. iii. 25).

He came direct from Nazareth to Bethabara (St. John i. 28).

St. John tried earnestly to prevent Him. Why?

Because he knew His stainless character.

But Christ prevailed upon him to baptise Him.

He saw Christ praying (St. Luke iii. 21).

Also the Holy Spirit descending upon Him.

He heard the voice of God declaring His sonship.

He bore record to Him as the Son of God.

Thus Christ passed through each kind of baptism.

Water—at the hands of His forerunner.

The Holy Ghost—direct from God the Father.

Fire—at His crucifixion (St. Luke xii. 50).

He set His people an example of obedience.

He was dedicated for His ministerial work.

He instituted the Christian rite of baptism.

LESSONS. 1. Submission to religious ordinances.

2. Faith in the Three Persons of the Godhead.

"Arise, and be baptised and wash away thy sins."

AUGUST 12TH. THE TEMPTATION OF JESUS.

To read—St. Matt. iv. 1—11. Golden Text—Heb. iv. 15.

INTRODUCTION. Christ's temptation came immediately after the baptism. As man He was filled with the Spirit—as man He must be tempted. He, the second Adam, must be tempted as was the first Adam. Adam fell at the first temptation—one to the body. Christ resisted three addressed to the three parts of man—body, mind, soul. Thus He was in all points tempted like us, but without sin.

I. FIRST TEMPTATION. (1—4.) To doubt.

These points may be noticed and questioned on.

Christ was led to be tempted—did not seek it.

Temptation came after forty days' fast. He was faint.

It came to Him when alone—as to Eve in Paradise.

What was it? To provide Himself with needful food.

Yes—but a doubt of God's love was suggested.

"God call you His Son—Father let Son starve!"

So incited Him to provide Himself with food.

ANSWER. God can keep alive without bread.

Israelites were fed forty years on manna (Deut. viii. 3).

Therefore no reason to doubt God's love.

LESSONS. 1. Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth.

2. "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him."

II. SECOND TEMPTATION. (5—7.) To presume.

Taken to Jerusalem—set on pinnacle of Temple.

Court below crowded with worshippers.

Prophecy (Mal. iii. 1), Christ should suddenly come.

Opportunity now of fulfilling that prophecy.

Promise in Psalms of angels' protection (xci. 11, 12).

Jews would believe in Him—hail as Messiah.

But Satan left out the words "in all thy ways."

No one must place himself in way of danger.

To do so is to presume on God's care and love.

ANSWER. Must not tempt, i.e. provoke, God.

Not take our own way to fulfil God's promises.

Remind of Jacob's deceit to get promised blessing.

Brought long banishment and trial to himself.

LESSONS. 1. Safety only in the path of duty.

2. Danger in going into temptation.

3. "In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths."

III. THIRD TEMPTATION. (9—11.) Denial.

The place—a high mountain on fine day.

The sight—this world's pomp and glory.

The offer—Christ to be prince of this world.

The condition—to own Satan as His lord.

The answer—at once short, prompt, decisive.

No possible excuse for complying.

Was temptation to rebel against and deny God.

Satan, boldly resisted, at once departed.

Angels brought food, help, and consolation.

LESSONS. 1. Resist the devil, and he will flee.

2. Thou shalt love the Lord, with all thy heart.

3. Thy word have I hid within my heart, that I might not sin against Thee.

LOOK UP

CHRIST is our risen Sun;

Look up to Him for light:

Sects, Churches every one,

Unveil your clouded sight;

Behold! His beams of grace divine

Alike on all believers shine.

Christ is our evening Star.

Sailor on life's wild sea,

In all its billowy war,

Look up! He shines for thee.

Heed not the flag thy ship may bear,

If only clear-eyed faith be there.

Christ is our sparkling Well,

Whence living waters spring;

Pilgrim, where'er you dwell,

Wherever wandering,

Let not your wearying spirits sink;

The fount is ready; draw and drink.

The Sun our light by day;

The Star our guide at eve;

The Well our living stay,

If only we believe.

Warmth, Light, and Purity in One,

Father and Spirit in the Son.

"MY LADY'S JESTER."

A STUDY.

"My lady is kind to the poor jester."—p. 713.

I.

"But nature sometimes makes one up
Of such sad odds and ends,
It really might be quite as well
Hushed up among one's friends."

O. W. HOLMES.

NATURE certainly had made him up of "odds and ends." The odds consisted of a strong handsome face set on shoulders of stalwart proportions, and the ends were two miserable crooked little legs, that were almost too pitiable to be grotesque. Not that he ever allowed anyone to pity him in words; it would have been impossible. When people looked into the clear, sympathetic eyes, and heard the firm, manly voice, they forgot that he was a cripple.

When I first made his acquaintance, Malin Ringskale was a fourth-year man at the great hospital where I had just entered as a junior student. Naturally, we had but little to do with each other at first, but as time went on, and Ringskale found that I was deeply and earnestly fond of my work, he became more friendly. I often went to spend an evening at his rooms, for he was a charming host, and I liked to hear him sing and accompany himself on the piano, or talk of people and incidents in his travels. I soon learned from the others that he was independent, and only studied medicine because he liked it; "got a place somewhere where he could go and enjoy himself, and never see a patient again," said Smith, who never did a day's real work in his life.

For some time I lost sight of Ringskale, because he took up an assistantship in the country after he had qualified; but we corresponded at intervals. He turned up again in London, however, at the end of my second summer session, when I had just been in for my examination. I was delighted to see him, for although I was tired out by months of hard work, I did not want to leave it and go away, as I knew I ought to.

"You are looking very fagged, old chap," said Ringskale, when we met; and I owned that I was.

He was thoughtful for a minute, and then he said: "What do you say to coming down with me for a few weeks to my place? We both need a rest, and we can have a nice quiet time amongst the hills and by the sea. It's at Llangwern, in Cardigan, you know. I call it my place because my father had a house there when he was alive, and I like it better than anywhere es. There's a little villa that I stay at now when I'm down there. It's very comfortable—plenty of room for us both. Will you come?"

"Thank you; I should like it immensely," I said; "but there are some cases here that I am greatly interested in."

"Ah! that's a pity," said my friend sententiously. "Here's a man whose eyes are all suffused and his chin sharp and angular, who can't sleep at night or remember what he reads in the daytime——"

"How do you know?" I interrupted defiantly.

"—And yet he says he is too busy to go away and get better. It's all right, Jack," said Ringskale kindly. "I see I must take you instead of asking you to come."

It was quite true; I had overworked myself more than I thought, and as my large-hearted little friend walked, or rather ambled, out of my study, I felt very flabby and ignoble, but very grateful withal.

Two mornings afterwards we were off, away from the Babel-clamour of London, speeding on in the train through the grimy Black Country, where the towns all merge into one another—they reminded me vaguely of my bad dreams in their interminable sameness. And then in the afternoon we came to a fairer land, where the farms and cottages were scattered picturesquely, and the train wound its way through woods and over mountain streams. At last we reached the little terminus of Aberafon, where a trap was waiting to drive us the few remaining miles to Llangwern.

In the soft August twilight we clattered by a row or two of whitewashed cottages, and over the Gwern foaming across its boulders; and then, half-way up the hill, we pulled up at a beautiful cottage, with a trim lawn and spruce firs in front.

"Here we are," said Ringskale, swinging himself down from the trap—for I knew him better than to offer to help him to alight. "What do you think of it?"

"It is beautiful!" I said. "Somehow, old man, I feel that if I had a home anywhere, I should like it to be here."

"That's a good beginning," said Ringskale cheerily. "I think it will freshen you up a lot."

As we sat chatting together after supper, my little friend grew quite eloquent about the attractions of Llangwern. How well I remember all his piquant descriptions to this day, and sometimes wish I could forget them!—How it was over a mile to the nearest part of the seashore, cliff-bound and full of reefs; how interesting it was to ride into Aberafon, the local metropolis, on market-day; how I should like his neighbours, the vicar and his daughter, when I saw them in the morning; how he sometimes visited outlying patients for Morris Owen, of Aberafon—"just to keep my hand in," he said comically. Ah! I remember our talk all too well.

II.

"The sun shone on her golden hair,
Her cheek was glowing fresh and fair
With the breath of morn and the soft sea-air."

LONGFELLOW.

In the morning we went down to the seashore for an early bathe; for it was wonderful how far Ringskale had conquered his physical disadvantages. He could ride well, and shoot, and pull an oar as very few able-bodied men can. Stranger still, he was a strong swimmer and loved the sea; but in walking, and especially on hilly roads, his poor little legs were a mockery to his spirit. He had a shaggy sure-footed pony that he rode over the hills and down the cliff-path to the beach, while I walked by his side.

It was a cruel-looking coast—a wilderness of boulders and reefs in the foreshore, backed by grim cliffs which the waves had honeycombed into caverns. In one of the caverns I was astonished to see a trim little boat.

"Come on, old fellow," said Ringskale, coolly fastening the pony up above high water-mark. "We'll pull out a bit and get a header, if you like."

He evidently enjoyed my surprise as he cautiously lowered the boat from a pair of davits in the rock to the tide-way at the bottom of the cavern.

"Haven't you got anything else to show me?" I asked, in mock disappointment, as we settled ourselves in the boat and shoved off.

"Not yet," he answered, laconically.

We had a refreshing swim; and after pulling back and slinging the boat up, Ringskale re-mounted his pony, and I strode after him up the cliff-path.

We were hungry as we made our way back to the village, but I could not help noticing that it looked still lovelier by morning light than evening. I walked on by my friend's pony, drinking-in the beauty of the scene—the white cottages shining in the morning sun, the blue smoke curling up against the dark pine-woods, the Gwern dashing white and impetuous down the valley. But suddenly I saw that the pony had stopped at a garden gateway, and Ringskale was bending in his saddle to shake hands with a young lady.

"Oh, Malin! I am glad you have come back to Llangwern once more; it seems such a long time since you were here last," she was saying.

"My lady is kind to the poor jester," he said, in a roguish undertone; and then—"Helen, allow me to introduce my friend Mr. Windhurst—Miss Rees, Jack."

"How do you do, Mr. Windhurst?" she said, frankly giving me her hand.

"Marry! he doth not well, lady, else would I have left him in London to do as he might," interrupted our little friend, with a grimace that made us both laugh.

Some girls there are (one meets two or three such in a lifetime) who can look straight into the eyes of a strange man without coldness or boldness, with only kindly interest and womanly sympathy. Then, if that man have a soul, it is elevated and purified until he scarcely knows it. This was exactly what happened when I first met Miss Rees.

As we went on up the road, after wishing her "Good-morning," I was very stupid and absent-minded. I heard Malin prosing on about "Old friends—like brother and sister—only child—but not the sort to be spoiled—good father, but no mother—splendid fellow, Rees—sure to like him;" and so on. But all the time I was following my own train of thought, collecting the stray remarks Miss Rees had made during our few minutes' conversation, and, above all, the looks that accompanied them. I thought of her lovely face, full of vivacity and "glowing fresh and fair with the breath of morn and the soft sea-air"; the ripples of sun-bright hair that one rarely sees, and the glorious eyes, at once clear and soft.

As we sat talking after breakfast, I blurted out—"Why do you call yourself My Lady's Jester, old man?"

"Oh, it is an old whim of mine, and it caught her fancy, you know; it helps one out from becoming a bore," said Malin, with one of his kindly smiles. He bustled off to his study directly after, saying he must write some letters.

Through the long golden summer days that I stayed on at Llangwern, I grew more and more attached to my little friend. He was always so patient and cheerful, though I was already physician enough to see that some subtle change was creeping over him. He was unaccountably tired at times, and then he would settle down with a pathetically bright smile in an easy-chair, and beg me to go out for a stroll and never mind him.

The vicarage was not very far, and we saw Mr. Rees and his daughter every day. Sometimes we went in to afternoon tea, and Miss Rees would play favourite bits from Chopin, or sing one of her native Welsh airs; sometimes the vicar came to have an evening chat with us. Often, when Malin said he was too tired to come out, I would go to the vicarage, and accompany Miss Rees on some charitable errand through the village or along the fern-plumed lanes. By her side, alone with her, I was happy—happier than any other man, I thought. She was always kind to me, and interested in whatever I talked of. Why not? I was Malin's friend, and I talked as a brother might to a sister.

At length there came a cool September day, when I felt that I must end it all one way or the other. My circumstances justified me in speaking out; for even if I never followed up my beloved studies, I had ample means to offer my darling such a home as she had been used to. Should I tell Malin first? "No," I thought, "better not. He is tired this morning, and it will be ungrateful to bother him if I am never to come to Llangwern again."

So I walked down to the vicarage, and found Miss Rees alone, for her father was out. Simply and earnestly I told her how I had grown to love her; and then I asked her whether she could care for me in return. For a second or two she remained silent, looking at me in a way that seemed reproachful and appealing.

"Oh! why have you said this? how can you?" she murmured. "It is not kind to Malin."

"Not kind to Malin?" I echoed in a dazed way.

"Has not he told you that he has loved me for two years?" she asked simply.

"Never," I answered, half indignantly. "Miss Rees, did you think I could have spoken so if I had known? Oh, forgive me!"

"I do—I must," she said brokenly. "Good-bye!" and she gave me her hand with a last warm clasp.

I went straight to Malin's study when I got back.

"Why didn't you tell me you loved her, old man? I will go back to London to-night; but you might have spared me."

"You'll do nothing of the sort," he said, flinging himself out of his chair and grasping my hand. "Do you think you're going to let the best girl in the world waste herself on a crooked little fragment of humanity like me, when there's a big straight fellow longing to make her happy?"

"She doesn't care for me," I jerked out doubtfully; "and if she did, I should still go away now I know."

"Heaven bless you both, old fellow!" said Malin reverently. And then he went on in his old bantering tone: "But it's too thin. 'These things be with Allah!' 'I am a jester and thou art the king!'"

III.

"The weary way-worn wanderer bore

To his own native shore."

E. A. POE.

I WENT up-stairs to pack up my things, and soon afterwards Malin went out. For a long time after I had packed up I sat there with my head in my hands, thinking, thinking. Yes, I must go away that night, even if I were too late to catch the last train from Aberafon. It would be just as well not to wish Malin "Good-bye;" I could write to him from London to wish them all happiness, as I did from my soul. What did it matter where I went, if I only left Llangwern at once? By the way, where could Malin be? It was evening now, and I heard his pony canter out two hours ago, but he had not returned. As I walked into the dining-room, the old Welsh housekeeper hovered about uneasily, and said, in the broken English of an excited foreigner—

"They ar sayink ther iss somethink the mattar down to the shore, sir; I do hope the Doctor iss all well. Indeed, I do not know wher he iss," said the old lady, anticipating my question.

I seized my hat and hurried across the fields towards the shore, and then a shapeless fear came over me, for there was a thin white mist hanging over the hillsides. It was about sunset, and there was still plenty of light; but when I came to the verge of the cliffs I could not see the sea; I could only hear the booming of the surges through the white fog that shrouded them like the vapour of a cauldron. I heard men's voices on the beach as I scrambled recklessly down the cliff-path. There was the shaggy pony tethered at the foot of the ascent, and as I hurried to the water's edge I descried a little group of men; but Malin was not among them.

"What is it?" I shouted, as I joined them, and noticed that they were men from the farms up the hill, and that they were holding a rope.

"It's a litt' bant from Aberafon; she's got caught in the fog, sir, and the Doctor's gon' to help her," said the spokesman of the party.

One end of the rope trailed through their hands and lay in coil on the beach; and then I saw with a sinking sensation that they were paying it out into the spectral white fog that hung over the rolling swell.

Briefly, and with significant gestures, the man explained that a little pleasure-boat had come too near that perilous shore. The Doctor had seen her from the cliffs before the fog came down, and knew that the only sandy patch where she could be beached would shortly be covered by the rising tide. After that, no human power could save her, as I well knew. Malin had ridden to the farms and taken the men down to the shore, and fastening the rope to his own tight little boat, had pulled cheerily out to the rescue. He would not hear of any of them going with him, but said that he could reach the other boat in a few minutes, and both could be hauled in safe and sound before the sand was covered.

I did not need the sturdy Welshmen to tell me that Malin had made the best of it, as he always did; we each understood and admired my friend's heroic attempt. As we stood there, straining our ears and eyes to pierce the fog, we heard a confused shout, almost like a cheer; and then Malin's voice rang out clear—

"All right!"

For a few minutes we hauled on the rope, and then a boat's nose shot forward out of the white wall of fog. It was the pleasure-boat, containing the four or five people whom Malin had saved; but instead of looking forward hopefully at the shore, their eyes were turned anxiously astern to something they were towing. It was Malin's boat!

As the first boat was hauled up high and dry, I and two of the Welshmen dashed into the water and seized the gunwale of Malin's boat. It was not empty, as we had thought at first. There was the familiar figure which had grown so dear to me lying motionless and prone across the thwart. I was wild with grief as I lifted Malin's helpless form out of the boat, and carried him like a child to a spot out of reach of the rising swell. "Why had it not happened to me, whom nobody would miss?" I thought bitterly.

"Merciful Heaven! I am afraid the exertion has been too much for him," said one of the gentlemen who had been rescued; while the two ladies of the party sobbed quietly.

"He iss dad!" exclaimed the youngest Welshman in a horror-stricken voice.

"No, he isn't," I said, with my hand over Malin's heart; "but he is very ill."

Improvising a litter out of the sail, we carried the little hero sadly to his home. Good old Dr. Owen, from Aberafon, hurried to his friend as fast as horse-flesh could carry him when he got my message. He examined Malin's unconscious form, and questioned the gentlemen who had been saved by him. They felt sure he had met with no accident in the boat. He had fastened the end of the shore-rope to their boat, and told them in a cheerful tone not to be alarmed; and then he had gone astern and tied his boat to theirs, and sung out, "All right!" to the men on shore. As they drew near the beach he was sitting up with his arms folded, when he suddenly fell forward without a sound.

"Poor fellow! poor Malin!" said the old doctor to me, when we were alone. "He is paralysed. I think he will recover consciousness, but he cannot live many days."

And so it was. I watched by his side, and did what I could for him while he lived. He was perfectly conscious on the following day, and the vicar sat with him in the afternoon, ministering spiritual comfort; but I noticed that Malin fixed his eyes on the door. I knew whom he was looking for, and I knew that Miss Rees had come with her father, and was waiting below. I had not seen her since we said "Good-bye" on the previous afternoon, but it was no time for ceremony, and I stole down-stairs to her.

"Miss Rees," I said, "I think Malin would like to see you, if you can come. He says nothing, but he is looking all the while, and I know it is for you."

"Thank you; it is so kind of you," she said, turning her beautiful eyes on me with unutterable sadness.

As she entered the room, Malin's face lighted up with one of his old bright smiles.

"This is good of my lady to come to the poor jester now he cannot come to her," he said, in a weak voice. "Where's Jack?" he added, as I was about to retire; for "my lady" was bending over him with streaming eyes.

"What is it, old chap?" I said, stepping back to the bedside.

"Give him your hand, Helen," he asked; and she silently offered me her one hand while she smoothed Malin's hair with the other, and kissed him on the forehead.

The vicar rose from his chair, and uttered a solemn benediction over us as we bent over Malin's bed, hand in hand.

"Amen," said the sufferer faintly. "Good-bye, Helen!"

"Don't, Malin," she sobbed, giving him a last kiss; "we all love you so!"

And then I led her away from the room, for Malin could not hear her voice.

It has been some years now since I first began to practise as a physician, with the best wife who ever encouraged a man to do his best. A little incident which occurred when I went back to London after Malin's death gave a new impulse to my studies. The professor of nervous diseases called me aside after his lecture one day, and asked me the particulars of my noble little friend's death. I told him all that I could, and the great man was very sympathetic.

"Poor Ringskale!" he said; "it was very sad. But he would not have had it otherwise."

"What do you mean, Sir George?" I asked.

"I examined him some months ago, and came to the conclusion that there was some obscure degeneration of the cord commencing. He concurred with me; and although I looked at the best side of the matter, he knew well that he would soon be a helpless paralytic, wheeled about in a bath-chair and carried to bed. You know what that would have been to him!"

"Yes," I said; "there was an angel stowed away in poor Malin's body."

SHORT ARROWS.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

THE BEAUTY OF HOLINESS.

IN an account of a summer Sunday which Coleridge the poet jotted down in his journal, we find the following entry:—"Called into the Sunday-school, found the two surrounded with good little men and women, bright with the beauty of benevolence. How sweet even a plain woman can look when engaged unaffectedly in doing good!" Of course, none of our readers are plain; but however lovely they are, they cannot but be improved by this kind of cosmetics.

"MARRIAGEABLE MEN."

Plutarch tells us of Themistocles that, when two citizens were suitors for the hand of his daughter—one being a rich man who was not worthy, the other a worthy man who was not rich—he preferred the latter, saying he would rather she had a man without money than money without a man. It would be well if all who profess and call themselves Christians took the same view when their daughters are asked in marriage. Too often the only question they ask is, What is he worth in pounds, shillings, and pence?

"ADAM'S LIBRARY."

God's green book of nature has been well called "Adam's library," and it is one which, if read with a seeing eye, will help us, next to that lamp of our feet or the Divine Word, in our journey through the wilderness of life. We have all read how a very short verse, so to speak, from that Bible cheered Mungo Park as he fainted with hunger and fatigue in an African desert. When nothing seemed to remain for him but to lie down and die, a little bit of moss of great beauty caught his eye. "Though the whole plant," said he, "was not larger than one of my fingers, I could not contemplate the delicate conformation of its roots, leaves, and capsules without admiration. Can that Being who planted, watered, and brought to perfection in this obscure part of the world a thing which appears of so small importance, look with unconcern upon the situation and sufferings of creatures formed after His own image? Surely not. Reflections like these would not allow me to despair. I started up, and, disregarding both hunger and fatigue, travelled forward, assured that relief was at hand; and I was not disappointed." Whatever our difficulties may be, let us remember the words, "If God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall He not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?"

WITH THE CHILDREN IN CHINA.

A missionary in China, who sends us the photograph from which our illustration was reproduced, says:—"This Chinese New Year season, beginning on February 6th, seems, apart from its universal idolatrous observances, to be specially the children's festival, like our home Christmas-time; family life is seen at its best among this somewhat loveless race. Even the poorest contrive some gaudy attire for their little ones; and every colour of the rainbow would be seen on the boys depicted in our engraving; buttermilk yellow, pea-green, scarlet, magenta, the brightest of blues. So thickly is their clothing wadded that their movements are impeded thereby. A few days ago I saw a row of our little schoolboys amusing themselves with vain efforts to fold their arms and cross their knees. As to the babies, they are often, during the winter, encased in a square of thickly padded cotton, one corner turned up over the feet; two corners folded across the body, while the fourth corner rises stiff behind the head: and thus accoutred, baby can, as I myself have seen, fall unhurt even from a high window into the street."

WORTH V. SHOW.

Two Books stood side by side on a library shelf. One was bound magnificently in Russia and shone resplendent with gilt lettering and decoration. The other was shabbily covered with paper and without adornment of any sort whatever. The contrast between the two was marked and striking. One was a joy to behold; the other offended the eye with its slatternly exterior. Day after day a student came into the library to read. Going up to the shelf he took down the paper-covered book, and spent hours in mastering its contents. At last the well-bound volume spoke to its neighbour: "I am not so foolish as not to know the end for which I exist. Of course I am intended to be read, and, indeed, am only too anxious to impart the truth that lies in print between my boards; but it is a shame, a grievous shame, that I have to stand here idle, and that even my cover holds out no attraction to the student. Were you less abominably shabby I should be quite envious of the attention you receive. Day after day you engross the student's mind, whilst I am neglected."—"Attraction," replied the shabby fellow, "depends upon intrinsic worth, and not on outward show. Were your contents as good as mine, then you too would receive attention. I have sound philosophy to impart: you contain only recipes for making puddings." Moral.—Fine character is better than fine clothing.

NEW BOOKS.

The first place among new books mentioned this month in THE QUIVER must be given to the Rev. W. Hardy Harwood's monograph on his predecessor at Islington, and a constant contributor to our own pages, the late Dr. Allon. "Henry Allon: Pastor and Teacher" is the title which Mr. Hardy gives to his work, which is published by Messrs. Cassell, and is prefaced by an admirable portrait. The biographical portion of the work is very brief, and the rest of the volume is occupied by a selection of the great preacher's sermons and addresses, including a touching "Ordination Charge."—Messrs. Isbister send us a beautiful volume of sermons by the Bishop of Winchester on "The Tenderness of Christ," one chapter of which will be familiar to readers of recent numbers of THE QUIVER. The work is one which is admirably suited for a gift-book.—From the same publishers comes the Rev. S. A. Alexander's "Christ and Scepticism," another volume of sermons dealing with problems of current thought, and so high and strong in tone that all who are labouring in the field of Christian evidences owe to their author a deep debt of gratitude.—"The Story of Samuel and Saul: Its Lessons for To-day," is the title and subject of an excellent volume in Messrs. Cassell's series of "Bible Biographies." The Rev. D. C. Tovey is the author of the work, and gives such help in his pages as will make the book valuable to all teachers of classes in which it is customary to take a series of lessons.—A book which all who love the service of praise should see is "Chapters on Church Music" (Elliot Stock) by the Rev. R. B. Daniel, a clergyman who is also an organist. He looks at his subject from all points of view, is always both suggestive and practical, and there would be greater harmony (in more ways than one) and reverence than is often exhibited in public worship if Mr. Daniel's hints were generally acted upon.—In this connection we may well give a passing word to an excellent little manual of "The Elements of Music," written by Mr. T. H. Bertenshaw, B.Mus., of which the first part has just been published by Messrs. Longmans.—At this season of the year when good stories in a handy and portable form are much in request, we would draw the attention of readers of THE QUIVER to "Cassell's Sunshine Series," in which are included several stories which were first published in our own pages, such as "Not all in Vain" and "For Erica's Sake." In their handy and compact volume-form these stories should make new friends and please old ones.—We have also to acknowledge the receipt of "Verba Verbi Dei" (Longmans), a harmony of the actual words of our Saviour, as recorded in the Gospels, from the pen of the author of "Charles Lowder;" and new editions of "Tools for Teachers" (Elliot Stock) and "Witnesses for Christ" (Simpkin, Marshall and Co.).

THE FERRY-HOUSE.

THE FERRY-HOUSE.

Scarcely less beautiful in winter than in summer was the brown river, slipping along in the silence. But now that all the river-banks, covered up in moss and ivy, give promise of a wild blue sea of hyacinths and a rosy scattering of campions; and, down in the river-marshes, "every Mary-bud begins to ope its golden eye," hope begins to throb anew in our hearts, as the willows quicken into leaf by the reed-thatched Ferry-house. And while human life goes on in all its care and sin and misery, weariness, fever and fret, the river-life continues day after day, season by season, even in God's appointed way, wherein only lies true rest and peace. The green blades of the young reeds appear above water, and "by the meadow-trenches blow the faint sweet cuckoo-flowers." The blackbird sings by his nest in the alders, where last year's reeds sway, soft pink-grey and golden in the evening light, and the cool green ripples go by. The white gulls rise in vast flocks from the sea-weedy banks winding down to the haven, where the sand-hills echo back the rushing roar of foam-topped waves running over the Bar. And there the cormorants chuckle and dive, and the black-and-white sea-pies flap side by side to the heathery headland, and the oxbirds whistle as they wheel in rapid silvery flight to and fro across the creek. So the old happy river-life goes on. And

"There are in this loud, stunning tide

Of human care and crime,
With whom the melodies abide
Of th' everlasting chime;
Who carry music in their heart
Through dusky lane and wrangling mart,
Plying their daily task with busier feet,
Because their secret souls a holy strain repeat."

THE ONLY SAFE INVESTMENT.

Two men were talking not long ago in the presence of the writer about money they had lost in different investments. At length one of them said with a sigh, "Is there no way on earth of making sure that money will not be lost?" There is such a way. Spend it for the good of others, and you will find that what you give you have.

THE SECRET OF TRUE POLITENESS.

Not long ago there was a controversy in a leading newspaper as to whether our manners are degenerating. If they are, our religion must be degenerating; for true politeness is more than "surface Christianity." If a man be a Christian gentleman, the fact will be known by his wife, his children, his servants, his horse, his dog, his cat, and by every living thing that comes in his way. To each and all he will display the gentler graces. A French lady, writing for girls on their behaviour in society, has summed up the matter in a terse and sensible sentence: "In order to be polite, be good." Viewed in this light, the highest kind of civility means carrying into detail the golden rule: "Do unto others as you would they should do unto you."

BOOKS THAT HELP.

On first thought it seems a pity that both Books of Chronicles should have had to be dealt with in a single volume of the "Expositor's Bible" (Hodder and Stoughton); but, as Professor W. H. Bennett exclusively to the preacher than does Professor Bennett's book. In this sense, the work comes specially under the heading which we have chosen for this paragraph. If it contained only the two chapters on "Living Epistles" and "New Testament Puritanism," its author would have a good claim upon the gratitude of the churches. But these chapters, far from standing alone, are but representative of others, which with them make up a greater and even more useful whole.—Leviticus and Numbers are books whose historical importance and,

THE GARDEN OF GETHSEMANE, AS IT IS AT THE PRESENT DAY.

(From a Photograph by Bonfils.)

says in the preface to his work: "To expound Chronicles in a series which has dealt with Samuel, Kings, Ezra, and Nehemiah is to glean scattered ears in a field already harvested." The four important introductory chapters give the key to Professor Bennett's treatment of his subject, which is both scholarly and interesting. To the general reader the explanation of apparent discrepancies between the narrative of the Chronicles and other parts of Scripture should prove most instructive, and for preachers the later chapters, especially those on David, Rehoboam, and Hezekiah, are invaluable. The Rev. James Denney's volume, in the same series, on "The Second Epistle to the Corinthians," is a work which will be appreciated much more in the manse than the private house, for it appeals more more particularly in the case of Leviticus, typical character can scarcely be over-estimated; but they are difficult books for an expositor to take in hand. The Rev. J. S. Exell has just added to "The Biblical Illustrator" (Nisbet) a single volume dealing with these two books, and collating all the illustrative, anecdotal, and expository extracts he can find bearing on them. Our admiration for the care and thoroughness with which "The Biblical Illustrator" is compiled grows as each new volume of the work appears. It is at once an armoury of illustration and a library of reference.—There is a wealth of meaning in the "Eastern Customs in Bible Lands" which Canon H. B. Tristram describes in the pleasant little volume just published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton. Dr. Tristram brings his great experience as a traveller to bear upon the elucidation which these customs offer of various more or less figurative passages of Scripture. The result is a work at once full of interest and suggestive of much fruitful thought and teaching.—Mr. Spurgeon's lecture on "What the Stones Say; or, Sermons in Stones," is published by the Christian Herald Publishing Co., with a preface from the pen of Pastor Thomas Spurgeon, and careful notes by the late Mr. Spurgeon's secretary, Mr. J. L. Keys. It is a thoroughly characteristic lecture, usefully expanded by Mr. Keys's notes and appendices, and helped by numerous illustrations. It would serve as a helpful present to any young preacher or speaker.

A WISE PROVERB.

"O my son," says an Arabic proverb, "take care that your mouth break not your neck." How many of us, by not controlling the words of our mouths, bring ourselves into difficulties that may be compared to break-neck precipices! Or is the proverb a caution against eating and drinking in a way that is dangerous to life?

THE COUNTESS OF ABERDEEN.

AN UNFASHIONABLE SLUM IN MANCHESTER.

ANGEL MEADOW, CHARTER STREET, AND "THE REST."

BY ARTHUR G. SYMONDS, M.A.

THE CENTRE OF THE SLUM DISTRICT.

(St. Michael's Church, Charter Street, and Ashby Lane.)

THE FLAGS, ANGEL MEADOW.

ANGEL MEADOW and Angel Street don't sound "slummy," do they? Yet they are names of places in one of the most unfashionable slums in Manchester — unfashionable for those who don't live there; very fashionable for those who do.

The district of which these euphonious places form part covers about a square mile of ground, on which the houses are crowded together in close narrow streets, and alleys, and courts, which look as if they had been squeezed into the smallest possible compass by the great factories, mills, and gasworks which surround them.

This is the district which my artist friend, Mr. Hedley Fitton, and I visited on one of the bright spring days of last March, and which he with his pencil, and I with my pen, have tried to depict for the readers of THE QUIVER.

Turning off Corporation Street into Long Millgate, we walked along till we were attracted by the picturesque appearance of a little court, called Epsom Court. Passing through a dark alley under one of the houses fronting the street, we found ourselves in a narrow cul-de-sac, with some half-dozen dilapidated houses on either side, and a wall topped with a low railing at the further end. Only half the houses seemed to be tenanted, and, judging by the appearance of the lower windows, only the upper parts of them were occupied. The court was deserted, save by two old women, one of whom rose from the steps on which she was seated sunning herself, and beat a hasty retreat indoors as soon as she saw us approach. The other, a fat, jolly-looking old body, to whose face the loss of one eye had given a very quizzical look, did the honours of the court with great affability, pointing out certain features which she begged my friend to "put in t' book," especially some pieces of bread placed on the low wall for the birds, and dilating on the superiority of that court, socially and morally, over its neighbours. "We're very select, we are," said she; "it baint everyone as can come and live here. Why, I had a carakter from my last landlord of twelve years, I had. Oh! he's very pertickler, is our landlord." This fact perhaps accounted for the empty houses.

Quitting Epsom Court, we continued our way through Long Millgate, crossed the Irk at Red Bank, and found ourselves in the Jewish quarter. On every side in this district there are abundant signs that the inhabitants are for the most part foreign Jews. The Biblical names over the shops, the notices in the windows written or printed in Hebrew characters, the strongly marked features of the men and women, the black-eyed, black-haired, dark-skinned children—of whom, by-the-bye, a group was playing the very Christian and English game of football with an old hat; a prevailing odour of garlic; and, not least, the bright patches of colour—scarlet and yellow especially—made by the garments hanging on clothes-lines across the narrow streets, or spread over walls and railings by the river; all bewrayed the Jews' quarter. It is an unfashionable slum, certainly; but it is pervaded by an air of strenuous industry and purposefulness which relieves even the poorest streets from that sense of degradation and crime which so generally characterises the abodes of poverty in our great cities.

Re-crossing the Irk, we made our way up the hill which crowns the northern side of Manchester. On this the streets are built in terraces rising one above the other, but in such close proximity that the cellar windows of the upper row are often on a level with the ground-floor windows of the lower one, and the occupants can converse freely from one to the other.

At the lower end of this district lies a wide sloping open space, railed in on all sides, and flagged with paving-stones. This is Angel Meadow, better known in the district as "The Flags."

The site is that where the bodies of the thousands who died in the Great Plague were buried in huge pits; and within the memory of many now living, barrow-fulls of human bones used to be dug up and taken away, and sold for a few coppers, to be ground up and used for bone-dust manure, and, according to popular tradition, for flour. In 1868 the "Meadow" was railed in and flagged, and soon afterwards some swings were erected on it, a wooden porter's lodge built at one side, and a man appointed and paid by the Corporation to look after it. Great open-air meetings are sometimes held here, especially in election times; and the Irish—who form a very large proportion of the inhabitants in the adjacent streets—consider no election properly conducted which does not include in its programme one or more evening or Saturday afternoon meetings on "The Flags."

It was about half-past four when we reached the place, and the swings were crowded with little bare-legged urchins just let loose from school. Scattered all over were groups of children, running, playing, shouting, full of life and vigour, while idle men with pipes in their mouths, and women with babies in their arms, stood and watched them over the railings.

It was impossible not to think of the strange contrast between the scene before us and that which was hidden from our eyes in the earth beneath our feet. Up here, bright warm sunshine, lighting up the happy faces of children, whose every movement and sound was instinct with the joyance of life; down there, the mouldering bones of corpses piled up and jammed together in ghastly confusion, just as they had been thrown in pell-mell from the dead-carts, with rude jests, by heedless and often drunken hands, "unblest, unshriven, unassailed."

round the lamp-post. With no small trouble Barney is got into his proper place, and then all seat themselves in the slings of their ropes, push off from the base of the lamp-post with their naked little feet, and swing round once or twice, their loose hair streaming out, their bare legs gleaming from under scant petticoat or short trousers—sadly too wide for such "shrunk shanks"—and their shrill voices ringing with happy

IN "THE REST"—A SLUM LODGING-HOUSE.

It may be that it is their "Angels" who have given the name to the spot. But there are few, if any, of those who dwell around it, who even know that their careless feet are treading ground hallowed by such a holocaust of death.

The upper side of the Flags is bounded by a street called Style Street, or Stile Street—the latter, perhaps, a reminiscence of the days when the grass was green on "the Meadow," and hedges surrounded it, and wild flowers bloomed, and trees waved, and birds sang there, and the rustic lover kept tryst with his lass by the stile at the top of the meadow which sloped down to the purling stream. Now there is never a flower or shrub to be seen, nor bird's sweet song to be heard, save that of some caged thrush piping its shrill plaint of captivity. But there are still lads and lasses here, as there always will be "while youth is young and love is strong;" and, thank God! there are children to make the grim world bright with their happy little faces and merry laughter.

Look at this group of half-clad dirty urchins, who have made an impromptu "roundabout" with some pieces of rope slung over the bar of a lamp-post. "Come this road, Barney!" cries one of the girls to a clumsy, weakly, half-naked boy, who has got his rope and himself hopelessly entangled laughter, as the ropes twine round the post and bring them to a dead halt, with knees and faces close up together. Then, as soon as Barney can be unravelled and got into his place, off they go again; and so they will swing round and round, over and over again, till their supperless bed-time comes, and they will forget their hunger in sleep as now they do in play.

At the corner of Style Street and Ashley Lane stands St. Michael's Church: square-towered, solid, stern, yet withal imbued with that sense of calm and repose which instinctively associates itself with all emblems of religion. Around it lie the busy, bustling hives of industry, the dark haunts of crime, the grim abodes of misery. By day is heard the never-ceasing roar of commerce, as it hurls men, women, and children backwards and forwards like shuttles in the great loom of labour. By night from the crowded human lairs around ascend the shouts of drunken revelry, the agonised cries of sudden anguish, the groans of secret pain. By night and day alike the church stands there, a solemn witness against man's greed, and cruelty, and crime, speaking with silent eloquence of Divine mercy and pity, and pointing, as with the finger of God, away from the turmoil and pain of earth to the peace and rest of heaven.

This point, where Style Street, Ashley Lane, and Charter Street meet, is about the centre of the slum, and as we walked up Ashley Lane we had a good opportunity of studying the various types of humanity that congregate in the district and are depicted in Mr. Fitton's sketch.

Standing at this corner, we saw one of those every-day sights which are so eloquent of the extreme poverty of the district, and of the struggle for life that is so ceaselessly waged within its borders. Down the street came two carts from the gas-works, piled up with coke, still warm and smoking from the furnace. Behind each of them ran, or walked, or toddled a dozen little children, all carrying bags, baskets, tin pails—anything that would serve as a receptacle—picking up the coke that fell from the carts as they jolted along.

On emerging into Rochdale Road, we met a police-constable, whose emphatically expressed opinion was that we had selected the very best—or worst—slum in the whole of Manchester. "Why," said he, with a touch of professional pride, "over there" (pointing across the road) "is the largest police-station in the city, and the strongest division of the force is always kept there. We never know when there may be an outbreak among the folk hereabouts. Talk about Ancoats, and Greengate, and other slums! why, they all come here or go from here. No; this is the district for you, gentlemen, if you want to make a book about Manchester slums." He advised us, however, by all means to see Charter Street, and to pay a visit to the largest lodging-house in the district, called "The Rest."

From end to end, on both sides, Charter Street is composed of lodging-houses. Beds are advertised in every window and on every wall, in print and manuscript, in colour, in black and white, at varying prices and with divers subsidiary attractions. In this wretched little hovel they are offered at 2d. and 4d. a night; in that there are beds for single men at 4d., for single women at 3½d. In one house you can get beds—"flocks for 6d., feathers for 7d."; in another, beneath the printed notice of "Single beds at 2d., 4d., and 6d.," appears the attractive offer, written in schoolboy round-hand, of "One plate of beefsteak pudg for tuppence!"

Through the open doors and windows we can see the beds—deal frames, thin mattresses, the very look of which makes your bones ache, one blanket, and a dirty coverlet of many hues—placed in such close juxtaposition that the occupant of the one nearest the wall cannot possibly get into or out of it without passing over the slumbering forms of the occupants of two or three other beds. Many of the upper windows are barred—a necessary precaution, probably, against the accidents which might attend the visits of drunken or quarrelsome lodgers.

At the door of one of the houses sat a man mending his socks before starting out for his nightly prow. From the upper window of another a slatternly drab looked out, with towzled hair and unfastened dress. The old paralytic landlord of one of the larger houses sat propped up in an arm-chair placed in the doorway, holding a levée of the passers-by. From the cellar of another there appeared a human creature, clad in female garments, but whether woman or child, it was impossible to tell. From her face misery and crime had blotted out every trace of the lineaments of divine womanhood; in stature and figure she was but a child. Alas! she was only a type. Through the open door of the last house in the row we could see a room containing an old wooden-armed settle on one side, and two or three benches drawn up round the fireplace. On these were seated five or six lodgers, mostly women—one with a ghastly bandage right across her face—who gazed at us with such obvious resentment of our curiosity, that we deemed it wise to abstain from further and closer investigation of their "sanctum."

Retracing our steps through Charter Street and Miller Street, we turned down a wide yard opening into the latter, called "Factory Yard," at the further end of which stands a large old disused mill, which, we learnt, was "The Rest."

"Eying us over with a look of good-natured contempt."—p. 723.

THE SLUM DISTRICT FROM LONG MILLGATE.

On entering, we found ourselves immediately in a long, low, dark room, some fifty yards in length and thirty in breadth, the roof of which was supported by iron pillars and its floor paved with flag-stones. Across the room and along the walls were ranged long deal tables, with forms on either side, at which some fifty or sixty men were seated, eating and drinking; while a score or so more were grouped around a fire which blazed brightly in a capacious grate on the further side. Close to the door was an enclosed serving-bar, at which incomers purchased bed-checks for twopence, fourpence, or sixpence, and provisions at commensurately low prices. The food supplied here consisted of loaves or half-loaves of bread, "hunks" of cheese, and bowls of tea or coffee; but from a kitchen at the opposite end of the room those who could afford it purchased savoury messes of tripe, stewed hashes, or meat puddings. The barman informed us that no intoxicating drinks of any kind were supplied in the place. "We have," he said, "trouble enough with them without that; and when they get too much of it outside, and come here, we have a job to put them out. The gaffer is laid up now with injuries he got in a chucking-out job the other day."

Opening out of the first room were two smaller rooms, which we learnt were called the "fourpenny and sixpenny kitchens," while that in which we stood was the "twopenny kitchen"—the prices being those paid for the beds to be occupied at night, not for the provisions supplied in the respective "sitting-rooms." Learning that, "if we kept our eyes open," it would be safe for us to walk through all the rooms, we passed through the large one, exchanging short, but not unfriendly, remarks with some of its occupants. An old man, who had before him an enormous plateful of stewed tripe, which he was rapidly and dexterously shovelling into his mouth with the blade of a very long clasp-knife, vouchsafed us the information that the food supplied there was "not bad; but it might be better." A sturdy young labourer, with tight crisp curls on his bullet head, and whose whole wardrobe consisted of shirt, trousers, and boots, told us he had lodged at "The Rest" on and off for a year, and that, as he had no wife or children, he found it cheaper and liked it better than living in a house—an opinion which was endorsed by several of the bystanders. At the corner of a table sat a tall man, whose buttoned-up frock coat, white linen collar, and generally superior appearance, attracted our attention; but he so obviously shrank from our notice—whether from crime or shame, God only knows!—that we felt bound to respect his feelings, and refrained from speaking to him.

The inner rooms were much more sparsely occupied, and their tenants evidently belonged to a higher social grade than most of those in the large room. One or two were reading newspapers; a few were having a meal; but the majority were either stretched on the forms fast asleep, or were grouped round the fire, smoking, sleeping, lounging, just as my friend has depicted them in his illustration. How strangely varied were the types we saw! That grey-haired old man close to the fire seems to have drifted here only for rest and sleep; but the bearded Jew near him, peering at us suspiciously from eyes half-closed beneath his shaggy brows, irresistibly suggests a less innocent motive. The long light-coloured coat—ragged though it be—in which that queer-looking man sitting next to the Jew has wrapped himself so closely, recalls the book-maker and welsher on many a racecourse. Stretched on the form opposite lies one whose dress is that of a clerk; but his dusty trousers, worn-out boots, and the heavy sleep in which he is buried, tell the tale of a dreary and futile search for work. On the form facing the fire lies a man smoking, his head propped on his arm, watching his "pal," who has gone to the fire to light his pipe. In dress and general appearance both of them look superior to their companions; but their thin white hands show no trace of honest work, and on their faces is written only too legibly a sad story of debauchery and ruin.

No one in this furthest room spoke to or even seemed to notice us; but as we turned to leave it, a villainous-looking ruffian confronted us in the doorway and barred our egress, calling out, in a loud voice: "Them's two detectives!" At once we became the object of by no means agreeable attention, and I feared that our exit would not be as easy or as pleasant as our entrance had been. Feeling, however, that our safety depended on keeping our presence of mind—for we were too far away from the barman to be able to call him to our aid—we gripped our sticks more tightly, boldly walked up to the biggest and roughest-looking of the gang, and asked him whether he thought we looked like detectives. After eying us over with a look of good-natured contempt, as though conscious that he could single-handed dispose of half a dozen like us, he said—"Detectives? Not you! You ain't built that way!" Then, pointing to our aggressor—"Yon chap," said he, "has bolted from his missus and three kids, and he's afeared she's sent you to fetch him back." Whereat there was a roar of laughter at the expense of that worthy, under cover of which we made our way out of the room.

This episode, and the feeling that we had had quite enough for one day of the not over-fragrant atmosphere which pervaded the place, made us decide not to prolong our investigations into the upper floors, where, we were informed by the barman, as many as 486 beds are made up and occupied nearly every night. But the general impression made on us by our visit was that, in spite of its obvious drawbacks, we would far rather spend a whole night there than a single hour in one of the Charter Street lodging-houses; and that the waves of misfortune, and crime, and want bear the human "flotsam and jetsam" of a great city like Manchester into many a worse haven than "The Rest" in Factory Yard.

A GOOD-FOR-NOTHING COUSIN.

CHAPTER XI.

RUTH'S KNIGHT.

NEXT morning Ruth awoke with the feeling that something had happened. What was it? she wondered drowsily; then, as consciousness fully returned, she remembered. Had she really promised to marry Mr. Matthew?

Well, what if she had? she said to herself, half-defiantly. She could not now be advised to lay siege to Gordon or be accused of hankering after Archie. Should such remarks be made again, she could easily stop them by saying that she was engaged. However, she resolved to keep that piece of news until it was needed. Jack was leaving to-day, and, as it happened, did not have any private conversation with his sister. Just as he was going, he said, "Now, you had better think over what I was saying;" but there was no occasion to make any reply to this.

Ruth only smiled, feeling that, as the advice was now useless, it conveyed no sting.

However, as the day advanced, things began to assume a more sombre aspect in her mind. Now that Jack was gone, there seemed no particular use for her news, and yet the fact remained. She tried to avoid thinking of it; but somehow she was irresistibly attracted towards the window, for she felt sure Mr. Matthew would come to pay her a visit to-day. Even as the thought crossed her mind, she saw him. There he was, walking briskly up the road. A sudden panic seized Ruth, and without giving herself time for reflection, she fled from the room, and seizing her hat and jacket from a peg in the hall, she made her escape by the back door. The hill rose up almost immediately behind the house, and a thick cluster of trees rendered her flight invisible from the road. She did not go far, but chose a sheltered nook, where, herself unseen, she could sit and command a view of the house. Mr. Matthew disappeared through the door; and shortly afterwards Katie's voice was heard calling, "Ruth, Ruth!" all over the place. Evidently Katie knew that she had been at home only a few minutes ago; and a sudden fear struck Ruth that her little sister might think of coming to look for her. But she soon reassured herself. Who would dream of her sitting on a hillside on a cold March day? She drew closer to her shelter, resolved to wait there till the visitor departed. It would never do, she thought, to go away, as she might return to the house and still find Mr. Matthew there: thus falling into the very danger she was trying to avoid. Katie soon ran in again; but Ruth sat still, and she certainly found it a cold seat. The dreadful idea flashed into her mind: What if Mrs. Lennox should invite the artist to wait for tea? Suppose he was imparting his news to that lady at this very moment? Perhaps she had better run down again, and interview him herself. However, she could not make up her mind to do this, so she sat down once more.

She had almost begun to despair of his ever going away, and thought she must have sat for hours in the cold, when at last she heard the front door shut, and a few minutes afterwards Mr. Matthew's figure appeared on the road. He was walking more slowly this time; but Ruth rose up with a sigh of relief. She did not go home at once, as that might look suspicious; so she climbed up the hill, glad of the exercise, which brought some warmth into her chilled frame. When she returned, some time later, with a fine colour on her cheeks, her aunt greeted her at the door.

"Dear me, Ruth!" she said, "where have you been all the afternoon? Mr. Lewis has been here, wishing to see you about something—your picture, I suppose. I thought he would never go away."

At the mention of the artist's name, Ruth gave a quick half-guilty glance at her aunt, but one look was sufficient to show that the lady knew nothing yet, so she answered quite naturally—

"Oh, I went for a long scramble up the hill; it warms one more than anything."

For the rest of the day she could breathe freely; Mr. Matthew could hardly return to-night.

During the next few days Ruth evinced a wonderful partiality for long country expeditions — expeditions which were generally in disfavour, and forgotten or put off as long as possible. For example, there was a farm some miles across the hills, where good butter and eggs were to be had. This fact was usually ignored; but all at once Ruth was seized with a desire for those dainties; and as it happened to be one of Lance's early days, set off on the errand, accompanied by her brother and sister.

Next day she bethought her of another farm-house, where she and Lance had a long-standing invitation to tea. This was a great treat to the boy, but quite the reverse to Ruth. Nevertheless, she suggested that it was too bad to have neglected the McPhersons for so long, and the delighted Lance got an unexpected afternoon's holiday to enable him to go. It was curious that on returning from both visits they should learn that Mr. Matthew had been to call. On the latter occasion he had come in the evening, about seven, and sat with Mrs. Lennox until nine, when he had reluctantly been forced to depart. Ruth and her brother had been driven home in the farmer's gig, but did not arrive until ten o'clock—which was a very late hour for these parts.

On the former occasion, however, Ruth might have explained why they missed their visitor, had she chosen. They were returning gaily through the bleak fields, after making their purchases, when Ruth's ear was caught by the sound of whistling. She recognised the familiar tone at once. He must have been to the house, and, as Mrs. Lennox was out, the servant had, no doubt, informed him where they were; so he had come to meet them. Instantly the trick which Archie had resorted to on a former occasion flashed into her mind, and without giving herself time to reflect, she exclaimed suddenly—lay about two dozen yards to their right, and by slipping through the gap in the hedge which bordered their path, they might easily escape observation. They darted off at once, Ruth taking care to keep in the rear. They gained the shelter of the trees without either Lance or Katie suspecting anything, while poor Mr. Matthew, all unconscious, pursued his way, and wondered why he never met them. But this state of things could not go on for ever. Ruth was quite aware that she was acting foolishly. She could not live out-of-doors in cold March weather, nor was it possible always to elude Mr. Matthew. It was on the Friday after she had accepted him that at last they met. They were almost opposite the school-house. Ruth and Katie had come to meet Lance, and as Mr. Matthew met them face to face, an encounter was inevitable. He came forward with a glow of pleasure on his face, and hand outstretched.

"Lance, a penny to whoever reaches that wood first!"

The wood indicated

"The young man turned back to his unexpected visitor."—p. 732.

"At last!" he exclaimed. "I began to think there was some fatality about our meeting. At whatever hour I called, I always missed you."

He stood holding her hand, and looking into the half-averted face as if he could not look enough, and as if afraid she might vanish from his sight. Ruth, after the first sudden blush which had risen to her cheek at his appearance, recovered herself, and withdrew her hand.

"How do you do?" she said, in an ordinary tone, and with a quick glance at Katie, who was standing all eyes and ears. "I am afraid you must think I am never at home; but lately there were so many messages. Have you been sketching?" she hastened to ask, lest Katie should think it necessary to make any explanations.

He opened his book, and she bent her head to look at the little sketches; but she seemed to have nothing to say. This interview, which he had longed for, appeared likely to be a disappointment. Ruth stood as silent and grave as if she had forgotten how to smile; but at last she looked up.

"This is a pretty little thing," she said. "Why don't you finish it?"

"Do you like it?" he said, in a pleased tone. "Then I shall finish it and give it to you, if you care to have it."

"Thank you; but isn't it too cold for sketching landscapes at present?"

"Not at all," he declared cheerfully; but just then Lance's voice was heard at the school door. "Ruth," he went on hurriedly, "when may I come to see you? To-morrow I am going to run up to town, to buy something," and he smiled significantly. "May I come this evening, or Sunday?"

"Oh!" and Ruth hesitated for a moment. "Aunt Lennox doesn't care for visitors on Sundays," she said, "and I promised to help Lance with his French to-night, so perhaps Monday would be the best day. Come and have tea with us," she added, with something of an effort, "if you can spare the time."

"Spare the time!" he was beginning warmly, but Ruth made a slight gesture in the direction of Katie, whose quick ears had already noted the omission of the prefix "Miss," and who was listening with great interest to what was being said. "I did not say anything to your aunt yet," he said in a low tone, as the little girl moved half reluctantly away, in answer to a shout from her brother.

"Oh, of course not!" said Ruth hastily; "there is no hurry," she added, afraid that her tone might sound rather short. Then, as Lance came up, she held out her hand. "Good-bye, Mr. Matthew," she said, without waiting to see if he were going or not—"Good-bye until Monday. We shall expect you early."

And to-day was Friday, so for three days more he was to do without seeing her. This short meeting, so much desired, was over, leaving behind it an unsatisfied feeling. Mr. Matthew was left standing alone on the road, looking after the three retreating figures, but not one of them looked back. Lance had plunged into an interesting anecdote, and apparently his two sisters were lending him all their attention. The artist watched till a turn in the road hid them from view, and then, with a sigh, he began to retrace his own steps. To-morrow he was going up to town, and as the errand on which he was bent crossed his mind, he smiled again. In imagination he was choosing a diamond ring, and then on Monday, or perhaps even on Sunday, coming out of church, he was giving it to Ruth. Already he saw it sparkling on her finger.

On Saturday afternoon Ruth, knowing that Mr. Matthew was safe in town, went down to the post-office with Lance. She had been thinking deeply since the preceding day, and her secret began to weigh heavily on her mind. Poor girl! she had no one to advise her, and she felt terribly in need of advice. Mrs. Lennox was the last person she would have chosen for a confidante, and yet she must tell someone. Mr. Matthew would be at the house on Monday, without fail, and then it would all come out. They had paused to take breath on a steep little hill on the road, when Ruth abruptly broke the silence.

"Lance," she said, "what should you say if I told you I was engaged to be married?"

"Hulloa!" exclaimed the boy, his roving glance immediately arrested, and turning to stare at his sister. "I say, are you joking, or in earnest?"

"In earnest," she replied, without looking at him.

Lance whistled as a means of expressing his surprise.

"Why didn't you tell me before?" he asked. "Old Wilson asked me more than a month ago, and I said it was all nonsense. But he's a jolly fellow! I like him."

"Whom?" asked Ruth quickly—certainly Lance's speech seemed rather involved; "of whom are you speaking?"

"Archie, of course," returned the boy, with a stare.

"Whatever put him into your head?" she demanded, her cheeks scarlet. "No," she went on hurriedly, with her face again averted; "it is Mr. Matthew."

"What!" roared Lance, in a voice that was perfectly terrible to his sister, so plainly did it express his feelings. "Old Lewis! Gracious! what made you do that?"

"I don't know," she responded, in a sudden burst of desperation, and burying her face in her hands. "I've been asking myself ever since."

"Ruth went first red, and then pale, as she heard the three people file into their seats."—p. 735.

"I thought you liked Archie?" Lance persisted, still in the same tone of unmitigated wonder; but to this his sister made no response, and for a while there was absolute silence.

At her brother's exclamation of horror, it flashed clearly into Ruth's mind what she was doing. She had accepted Mr. Matthew, but had she ever really contemplated marrying him? She knew now that she had not. She had only grasped at the idea as a momentary relief; the very next morning she had repented. It was only a cowardly feeling which prevented her from owning her mistake, and made her resort to every pretext to avoid the artist. She blushed with shame at herself, as she realised what her conduct had been.

"Look here, Ruth," Lance's voice broke in on her unpleasant meditations: "you'd better tell old Lewis that you've made a mistake."

Ruth quickly raised her head.

"Oh Lance! it's all very well for you to say so," she cried despairingly; "but you don't suppose it's so easy to do!"

To this the boy made no rejoinder at first. With wonderful generosity he refrained from pointing out that she ought to have thought of that before getting into the dilemma.

"I tell you what," he said at length: "if you like, I'll tell him."

"Oh, Lance!" and the tears brimmed into Ruth's eyes.

In spite of its impossibility, this bold offer to fight her battles touched her greatly. Never since the days of her childhood had she been used to being relieved of her responsibilities. She had been accustomed to stand alone; no one considered her a person to be guarded and petted. It was new to have anyone offer to come between her and the disagreeables of life—and this, too, was a trouble of her own making. She looked at her young champion, who was perfectly unconscious that his sister was regarding him as a hero; and her lips smiled, although a tear shone in her eye.

"You dear boy!" she murmured; "but I must tell him myself, or he would think it an insult."

As she spoke, her eye fell on the road below, and she gave a sudden start. Surely those were the best bonnets of the Misses Lewis appearing at the foot of the hill? This attire was an ominous sign, and meant an occasion of the greatest ceremony. With instinctive dread Ruth realised what the ceremony was—they were coming to pay a visit of congratulation.

"Lance," she exclaimed hurriedly, "look! They are coming up to call on us, to speak about— For Heaven's sake, go and stop them! Don't let them come any farther."

"What shall I say?" the bewildered Lance demanded, rather taken aback at the suddenness of the call made upon him.

"Anything—anything you like," Ruth cried distractedly; "only send them back. I will hide in the school."

The school was only a few yards distant, and the door stood open. She darted in, knowing that, as this was a holiday, there would be no children about, and thinking the coast was clear. The room was not empty, however. Someone looked up as she flew in. It was Mr. Wilson. She stopped short suddenly, arrested by his surprised glance, and stared at the unexpected occupant of the place as if he had been an intruder.

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Wilson," she said, remembering herself as he rose up. "I thought the school was empty, and came in to rest."

It seemed rather a curious way of coming in to rest, to fly in by an open door as if she were pursued; and Mr. Wilson might be pardoned if his eyes did wander to the window, in evident search of further explanation. None appeared forthcoming, however. Nothing was to be seen on the road; so the young man turned back to his unexpected visitor, with a countenance whose every line betokened interrogation, and said—

"Certainly, Miss Douglas; won't you take a seat?"

Miss Douglas complied, and sat down on one of the forms, while he stood in front of her, the picture of mingled surprise and curiosity. It was certainly a little awkward. For the moment no plausible excuse would occur to Ruth; and as for Mr. Wilson, it evidently never dawned upon him that it was his duty to disguise his feelings, and attempt to make a remark upon some indifferent subject. At last Ruth looked up and laughed.

"I am sure you must think me a most extraordinary person, Mr. Wilson," she said. "I may as well tell you that it was not to rest, but to hide, that I came in here."

"I thought so," Mr. Wilson declared, with blundering directness.

Ruth stared at him as he gave this somewhat embarrassing, although obviously truthful, reply, and then she burst into an uncontrollable fit of laughter.

"I might have known you would think so," she said, when she had recovered; "but, you see, I was taken by surprise, and hadn't enough presence of mind to tell a proper fib."

The young schoolmaster possessed no great sense of humour. He looked rather horrified at the idea of a young lady talking so easily of telling a fib, and waited until she should explain herself more fully. But Miss Douglas had not the slightest intention of doing so.

"Don't let me interrupt you," she said easily, as if the subject of her entrance were at an end. "Pray go on with your writing; I shall not stop long."

This advice Mr. Wilson found impossible to follow. He could hardly refrain from going to the door to look out; and as for writing while his visitor remained, the idea was not to be entertained.

Ruth, now that she had got over the somewhat ludicrous contretemps of her entrance, sat and listened, in some anxiety, for Lance's return. Surely he had had time enough to do his errand—but here he was now.

"It's all right, Ruth," his voice shouted out cheerfully, before he himself appeared. "It was jolly hard work, but—" He was in the room now, and broke off suddenly at the sight of Mr. Wilson.

The boy made as little attempt as his master had done to cover the awkwardness of the situation. He made no pretence of finishing his sentence, but plainly betrayed by his look that there was a mystery which must not be divulged to the willingly open ears of his senior.

"We seem to be making ourselves very free of your school-room," Ruth said, with a laugh and a keen appreciation of the ludicrousness of the attitude of her companions. "Another day, Mr. Wilson, you will be tempted to look the door." Then she rose up. "What a funny little room it is!" and so she stood for fully five minutes, affably making conversation. At any other time he would have been charmed with her condescension; but now his curiosity was aroused, and he was longing to get to the door to look out. When they had gone at last, after more unnecessary delay, he went to the gate, and looked first up the hill and then down; but nothing could be seen. Ruth glanced over her shoulder, and laughed softly.

"Poor man!" she said, "he is dying to know what is the matter. I am sure he will put on his hat and hurry away down to the village to find out; but he'll never guess." Then, as the cause of it all returned to her mind, she asked anxiously, "What did you say to them?"

"Oh, I sat on the wall until they came up," Lance began, with great enjoyment; "and they said they were going up to the house, and asked if you were at home. I said 'No': that you had gone to McPherson's farm, and wouldn't be home till night."

"Oh, Lance! and they knew I was there the day before yesterday."

"I forgot; I hadn't time to think of everything," declared the boy, rather thrown out of his narrative by this unadmiring interruption. "Then they asked for Aunt Lennox," he went on, evidently abbreviating the scene; "and I said it was no use going to see her, for she was busy making jam, and couldn't stir out of the kitchen."

"Jam!" his unfortunate sister cried tragically, "jam at this time of year!" and she turned a despairing look on the owner of this awkwardly inventive genius. "Did you call it strawberry jam?" she inquired, grimly, when she had gazed at the culprit speechlessly for a few moments.

"No, I didn't," Lance replied, somewhat indignant at the reception of his news.

"How could you make up such stories?" groaned Ruth, "and give such details? They couldn't have believed you."

"Well, I like that!" cried Lance, justly incensed. "Didn't you ask me to tell crams? If I had told the truth, and said Aunt Lennox was sitting knitting at home, and that you were hiding in the school, where would you have been?"

"But you might have said something more probable," Ruth objected.

"You should have told me what to say, then."

"Well, I suppose I ought to be thankful you didn't say we all had small-pox," she said resignedly; "but after all," she added more gratefully, "you did your best, and sent them away. They'll think as badly as possible of me after Monday, so this won't make much difference," she finished, with a sigh.

—which Ruth considered providential, as it prevented any encounter with the Lewises, which would otherwise certainly have taken place.

It was early in the afternoon when Ruth made her way down the hill; and never had the road seemed

CHAPTER XII.

UN MAUVAIS QUART D'HEURE.

THE dreaded Monday arrived all too soon, and Ruth knew she must brace herself for a disagreeable interview. Mr. Matthew must not be allowed to come up in the evening; she herself should go down and prevent him. On Sunday it had rained torrents, so none of the family from the g'en had been able to go to church so short. She dreaded to come to the end of her journey. How would Mr. Matthew take it? she wondered. Why had she allowed a whole week to elapse before making up her mind to confess her change of intention? He would have a right to be angry, especially as he had already told his sisters. She had never seen the artist really angry; but with instinctive fear she felt sure he was capable of being roused, and it was no pleasant prospect to picture what he would be like then. Yet, however difficult the task might be, she must tell him at once that she could never think of marrying him. The longer she delayed, the harder it would be.

She had reached the gate of Lakeside, and now the moment had come. Her feelings were very much like those of a person standing at the door of a dentist. She wished she had not come, and almost hoped some interruption would occur to prevent her carrying out her plans. She paused guiltily to reconnoitre. What if the Misses Lewis should be about, and see her? She could not possibly face them; but after waiting for nearly five minutes, she made sure that the garden was empty; and gently pushing open the gate, she ventured in. She made a long circuit round in the shelter of the trees, to avoid the parlour windows; and reaching the studio stair, she ran up and tapped at the door. Inside, the artist was seated in front of his easel, enjoying a delightful day-dream. The picture before him was Ruth's, and he was willing away the time in contemplation of it until the hour arrived for his promised visit. The tap at the door roused him out of his charming reverie.

"Come in," he called indifferently, looking over his shoulder to see who the intruder might be. "Ruth!" and he started up in joyful surprise, and coming over, seized both her hands.

But she drew back hastily, in dread of another salute.

"I daresay you are surprised to see me, Mr. Matthew," she began hurriedly; "but I had something to say to you."

"But won't you sit down, dear?" he asked, trying to lead her to a seat.

Ruth shook her head.

"No, thank you," she said. "I won't take long."

She paused for a moment, the colour coming and going in her face, and then, summoning up all her courage, she plunged into her subject.

"You remember what passed between us last Monday?" she asked, somewhat falteringly.

"When you promised to marry me? Of course I do!" he declared.

"I have been thinking over it since then," she said, averting her face; "and I am afraid it was all a mistake."

"What do you mean?"

"I don't think I should have promised," she said, in a low tone. "I am afraid I can't keep my word."

"Ruth!" he exclaimed, in a pained tone, "do you mean this?"

She looked at him deprecatingly, but did not speak.

"What has occurred to make you change your mind?" he asked slowly.

"Nothing has occurred; but when I had time to think about it, I saw that it was impossible."

"And it took you a whole week to find it out?"

His tone sounded hard, and Ruth, casting a swift glance at him, saw that his face looked as unpromising as his voice. The interview was going to be worse even than she had feared.

"I don't think it took me so long," she said, looking down; "I think I knew the next day; but I couldn't make up my mind to tell you."

"So it did not occur to you that it would be kinder to inform me of your decision at once?" he demanded, in the same hard tone, "instead of making a fool of me all this time?"

"I did not mean to make a fool of you," she protested, with an imploring look at the stern face. "I was trying to decide what was the right thing to do."

"So you let me tell my sisters and everybody, and yet you never intended to keep your promise!"

"How was I to know you would be in such a hurry to tell people," she flashed out, in some heat. "You didn't"—as a sudden alarm seized her—"you didn't tell Jack?"

"No," he returned, with great dryness: "if that is all you care for, you may set your mind at rest. Perhaps your anxiety on that point may enable you to realise my position a little."

Ruth felt that this was true. It would have been very much worse for her if Jack and Mrs. Lennox had known. She admitted that the artist had cause for anger.

"Mr. Matthew," she said impulsively, "I am very, very sorry. I know you must think I have behaved badly; but indeed it is better to tell the truth now."

"Perhaps it would have been better if you could have told it sooner," he remarked, in the same sarcastic tone. "I suppose the truth is you have found out you were in love with someone else, and you only accepted me temporarily, in a fit of pique."

He tried to retain an air of dignified contempt, but he was too angry to succeed, and his last words sounded anything but calm. Ruth flushed to the roots of her hair, but for a moment she could find no words to speak. She gazed at him, as if half-fascinated by his angry eyes; and then her quick blush subsided, leaving her quite pale.

"I know you are very angry, or you would not say such things," she said, her voice trembling a little. "I did not wish to accept you, but you over-persuaded me. I ought to have told you my mistake next morning—that was all."

"All!" he cried angrily. "You consider it, then, nothing to place a man in a humiliating position? to pick him up and cast him aside as the fancy takes you? The next time, Miss Douglas, that a man offers you his love and all that he has, you would do well to treat it seriously, and not answer 'Yes' or 'No' according to the mood in which you happen to be."

But Ruth could stand no more of this.

"I am very sorry for what I have done," she said; but her tone had less contrition in it this time. "I regret having given you any pain; but I can say no more;" and with that, she turned and fairly made her escape out of the studio.

She sped along quickly, thankful to be out of the place where she had spent so many happy hours; but at first her brain was in too great a whirl to enable her to think clearly. The interview had been a thousand times worse than she had feared. Every bit of her was tingling at the recollection of Mr. Matthew's words. She almost flew, as if trying to run away from her own thoughts. On the hill she overtook Lance returning from school. He looked back, saw her, and waited until she came up.

"Have you been down there?" he asked, nodding in the direction of Lakeside. "What did he say?"

"Oh, don't ask me," she said quickly: "I wish to forget all about it."

"Did he cut up rough, then?" the boy asked curiously. "What a pity you didn't write to him!"

"Well, it's over now," and Ruth gave a sigh of relief; "but I'm sure he'll never speak to me again."

"Who cares?" Lance said coolly. "But, I say," he added, with animation, "how can you keep Jack from knowing?"

His sister groaned. This problem had already suggested itself to her. If all communication suddenly ceased between the two houses, how could the cause be kept from the others? The consequences of that unfortunate episode seemed endless.

In the days which followed, Lance was Ruth's only comfort. He knew her secret, and helped her by going to the post for the letters; so one danger of encountering the artist was avoided. Ruth almost hoped that Mr. Matthew had gone away from home; but on Sunday she was undeceived. She had found it impossible to avoid going to church without awakening her aunt's suspicions. The only thing she could do was to hurry her family off early; so they were about the first to enter and take their seats. Just before the minister appeared, Lance whispered, "Here they are!" and a rustling and sound of steps behind made her quite aware of his meaning.

The pew of the Lewises was only the second behind their own, and it happened that the intervening one was empty. Ruth went first red, and then pale, as she heard the three people file into their seats. She felt sure that the sight of herself, sitting plainly visible, would sadly interfere with Mr. Matthew's devotions, as, most assuredly, the knowledge that he was behind did with hers. The whole long service might have been spoken in an unknown tongue, as far as Ruth was concerned. It seemed interminable; and yet she dreaded the moment of departure. Usually the two families met in the churchyard, and walked part of the way home together. Ruth grew nearly sick with apprehension as she thought of the almost inevitable meeting. Fortunately, Lance was at the end of the seat, and the idea occurred to him to sit as if glued to his place (which he was usually in the utmost haste to leave) until his aunt rose up, with impatience, from the corner where she was imprisoned. Even then, as he rose, he had the clumsiness to sweep half of the books from their places with his elbow, and by the time he had managed to grope for them on the floor and replace them, the church was empty.

That was one danger averted; but it was impossible that Lance could always be present to come to the rescue. Ruth was obliged to go alone sometimes to the village, although she avoided the road as much as possible. One day, after first glancing apprehensively up and down the street, she entered the shop. She was right in, when she suddenly discovered Mr. Matthew within a yard of her. His back was turned towards her, but something in his attitude made her sure that he had seen her. If he was in any doubt as to her presence at first, he was not long left in ignorance, for Mrs. Black, from behind the counter, greeted the young lady by name in a tone which was distinctly audible. Mr. Matthew never turned his head. He bent down over the fishing-tackle he was examining, and appeared to be equally deaf and blind. Ruth went a shade paler, but she managed to go forward and speak in a firm enough tone.

Fortunately, the shop was rather busy with people coming and going, so the lack of greeting between the lady and gentleman might have passed unnoticed. When Ruth's business was finished, and she turned to go out again, the artist was still there, and she was obliged to pass him. She gave a quick glance as she almost brushed against him in the narrow passage; but his eye never rested on her. So this was how he would have it. Ruth felt sadly that she had lost a friend. She was grieved, and would willingly have undone that unfortunate day's work had it been possible; but she felt disappointed in Mr. Matthew. She had not suspected him of being capable of harbouring such resentment.

Another day, as she was walking up the village street to the post-office, she raised her eyes, which had been somewhat thoughtfully fixed on the ground, and caught sight of the grey skirts of the Misses Lewis whisking out of sight, with a rapidity which suggested flight.

"What do they think I could do to them?" she said to herself, with scornful bitterness. "They are flying as if from the plague."

When she came out again with her letters, there was the artist standing in colloquy with a boatman, halfway down the street. She walked slowly, hoping he might go before she reached them. But no; Mr. Matthew's tactics were evidently not those of his sisters. He was not going to move a step out of his way or go a moment sooner on her account. She heard his voice conversing distinctly as she passed; but again he appeared totally oblivious of her presence. She raised her head proudly and walked on, after throwing one glance in his direction, to see what he meant to do. But when she had gone a little way her lip quivered slightly, and her eyes filled with tears. She had not many friends, and the loss of this old one touched her deeply. She could never have behaved with such hardness, after the first anger had passed away; and it grieved her to see that Mr. Matthew should consider her so guilty as to merit such treatment.

Life just now did not appear rose-coloured to poor Ruth. The present was by no means agreeable, and the future looked still less inviting. One thing she felt thankful for was that Gordon had not made his appearance on the scene to add to her complications. Yet, should he arrive, she was quite determined not to be influenced by Jack's words. She would have no more of lovers; her last experience was sufficient. Still, Ruth's spirits were elastic, and a fortnight after Mr. Matthew's unnecessary errand to town she felt like her old self again, and ready for anything to break the present monotony.

This was a Saturday, and she had thought that they might go for a long expedition with Lance; but at breakfast the boy announced his intention of sailing across the loch with one of the boatmen. His sister was a little disappointed; but Lance had been very useful to her lately, so she made no objection to his plan, but at once set about preparing a substantial lunch for him to carry with him.

"When do you think you'll be back, Lance?" she

"Oh, doctor, do something for him!"—p. 737.

asked, as she accompanied him to the door.

"Some time in the afternoon," the boy responded. "You and Katie might come down to the pier to meet me, about three;" and then he set off whistling, turning back at the gate to wave his cap.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE ACCIDENT.

THAT same Saturday, Gordon and another man stood on the deck of the afternoon steamer, which was tossing about unpleasantly on the loch.

"My word!" exclaimed the latter man, clutching his hat, "what a squall! Does it always blow a gale in these regions?"

It certainly was blowing very hard, and what with the pitching and tossing, and the waves breaking now and then over the deck, the two men found it hard to keep their feet, and saw the steamer approach their destination with unmixed feelings of satisfaction. As they drew into the pier, it struck Gordon that there was an unusual crowd of people about. It was evident something exciting had happened.

"What is the matter?" he asked of the man who held the gangway.

"An accident," returned the man laconically; and then he pointed in the direction of the moving crowd. "Yon's the last one out of the water now," he said.

"Oh!" said Gordon's companion, looking in the direction indicated; "perhaps I can be of use. I am a doctor."

The two young men hurried down the pier, but stood aside for a moment when they reached the foot, to allow the melancholy procession to pass in front of them. Several weather-beaten men moved slowly along under their dripping burden, followed by the rest of the crowd. Instinctively Gordon's eye travelled to the motionless figure as it was being borne past him. He gave a sudden start.

"Good Heavens!" he ejaculated, in a horrified tone, "it's young Douglas!"

"Somebody you know?" asked his friend; but without pausing for an answer, he hurried into the cottage after the men.

Gordon stood outside and passed his hand across his eyes, as if he would fain rub out the vision he had seen; but those rigid features which had thus suddenly startled him seemed stamped upon his brain. As he stood there in bewildered inactivity, his friend came out quickly, and said a few words to him in a low tone.

"No; oh no," Gordon answered hurriedly; "I couldn't take them the news for worlds!"

"As you please," said the doctor, shrugging his shoulders; "but as you know them, I thought you might. You had better send one of these men, then—after all, I don't suppose it matters how they get the news; you know what it is," he added significantly, as he turned and re-entered the cottage.

Gordon stood still for a few minutes, in great perturbation of mind. He shrank from being the bearer of bad tidings; but whom could he send? At first he declared to himself, with energy, that go he would not; but as the necessity of doing something, and that quickly, impressed itself upon him, his resolution wavered. Would it not be kinder to go himself, and try, at least, to break the news gently? Anything was better than standing idly doing nothing here. He moved off at last, and turned his steps in the direction of the glen. He had a long walk before him, and on the way he would consider what he should say. He walked slowly. Why should he hasten? they would hear soon enough. He had not gone very far up the hill when all at once the sound of a laugh, borne on the wind, caught his ear, and the next moment Ruth and her little sister appeared, almost blown round the corner. Ruth was laughing, and the wind had lent a fine colour to her cheeks, while Katie's long hair was flying about in all directions as she grasped her hat with both hands. The sound of the gay laugh gave Gordon something of a shock—it was so different from the picture which he had in his mind. Now that the moment had come so unexpectedly, it found him quite unprepared, and he shrank from his task. Ruth held out her hand pleasantly.

"How do you do, Mr. Gordon?" she said smilingly; but Gordon's countenance did not relax from its gravity. "Isn't it windy?" Ruth went on. "I don't wonder you look serious, struggling against it."

Instead of rousing up at this sally, which she expected he would do, Gordon looked at her with an expression so solemn, that instantly the smile faded from her lips, and her mind filled with vague alarm.

"I have just heard bad news, Miss Douglas," he said, with an effort, wishing himself miles away, but feeling he must not let her go on any longer in ignorance.

"What sort of news?" she asked quickly.

"There has been an accident on the loch," he began, and then stopped short.

"Then it is Lance!" she exclaimed, the colour fading from her cheeks. "Quick, quick, Mr. Gordon! don't keep me in suspense. Have you seen him? Where is he? Are you sure it is Lance?"

"Yes," said Gordon; "that is—" and he hesitated confusedly under her agonised look. "The doctor is afraid he has been very long in the water;" and again he stammered and paused.

Ruth's eyes were fixed on his face, and what she read there enabled her to fill up the pause. For a moment she stood staring at him with distended eyes, every vestige of colour gone from her face, as if she had been turned into stone; then all at once, with a half-articulate cry, and before Gordon could speak, she had started out of her rigid immovability, and was speeding down the hill as if she had wings to her feet.

Katie, meanwhile, had stood by, drinking-in what was said; but it had all passed too quickly, and the words were too vague for her to do more than half comprehend the meaning. Her sister's strange expression filled her mind with an indefinable fear, which, when Ruth's dress had disappeared out of sight, found vent in a flood of tears. Gordon looked down at the little girl, completely at a loss. Nothing of a consoling nature occurred to him, so he was silent. Should he take the child home, and see Mrs. Lennox? or should he return to the cottage, where so much still remained to be done? Jack was in town, and someone must take him the news. Gordon looked helplessly around, and then down at poor Katie, who was sobbing loudly, and apparently unheeded; but for his life he could not find a single word to say. He would have been thankful if she had followed her sister's example and rushed off down the hill; but evidently the little girl was as incapable of taking the initiative as himself, so they might have stood thus for a considerable time, had not Mr. Wilson opportunely appeared on the scene. The sight of the schoolmaster instantly suggested a solution of his dilemma to Gordon. He moved over to meet the new-comer, who was sauntering slowly down the hill. In a few minutes the bad news was imparted, and before the astonished Wilson could recover from his shock or make any objections to the task assigned him, he found himself committed to be the bearer of the news to Mrs. Lennox, with the weeping Katie on his hands, while the other man strode off towards the village.

Ruth reached the cottage, which was easily recognisable by the crowd gathered round the door. The people drew back to make way for her, and regarded her with pitying glances; but she saw nothing. She pushed in hurriedly, but for a moment her eyes could discover nothing in the gloom of the interior. Someone turned round on her entrance, and after giving her a rapid survey, came forward. It was the young doctor.

"It's all right," he said briefly, and at once addressing her; "your sister has recovered."

Ruth looked at him for a moment vaguely, as if she scarcely heard; then, as her eye, becoming accustomed to the dimness, fell on a prostrate form stretched out near the fireplace, she gave a sharp cry, and threw herself down on her knees beside it.

"Lance! Lance!" she cried wildly, bending over him. "Oh, doctor, do something for him! Quick! quick! it can't be too late."

"My dear young lady," said the doctor's voice, "he has been under the water for more than an hour. You had better come away."

Ruth rose up with a stony feeling of despair. She could shed no tears. She felt this was some dreadful nightmare, from which she must soon awake. Was that really Lance, lying so fixed and white, with that unchanging expression on his usually merry face? The grey eyes were closed, and the dark rings of hair lay damp and curled on his forehead. He seemed asleep. As Ruth gazed down at the beloved face, a sort of awe fell upon her; a cold numbness possessed her, paralysing her brain, and only enabling her to move mechanically.

"Don't look like that, child; I am quite well," said a voice near her.

At the sound of the strange voice Ruth turned round. An old lady was looking at her from amidst a heap of shawls and blankets. Was she speaking to her? What did she mean? but Ruth paid no more attention. Nothing mattered to her now.

"Rachel," said the old lady again.

Ruth heard, but as one hears in a dream.

"The other young lady is all right, in the next room," said the doctor, going over to the speaker: "so is the boatman; but the boy—" and he lowered his voice and moved his head in the direction of the motionless figure; "and this young lady is his sister?"

"Then this must be Ruth Douglas," said the old lady in a firm voice, sitting up. "Do you know that we were coming to see you? and your sister is in the next room."

Ruth received this announcement without emotion of any sort whatever. She looked blankly before her, as if this were something which concerned another person. What could touch or move her now? It seemed as if the end of the world had come. Somebody came to the door and looked in.

"Miss Douglas," said a voice, which sounded like Gordon's, "I am going back to town by the steamer, and shall see Jack. He could be down this evening; and," he added, in a lower tone, "I have made arrangements here."

DEPENDENCE WITH LIBERTY.

BY DR. CHARLES A. BERRY.

"If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this or that."—JAMES iv. 15.

THESE words follow a very vigorous protest against the practical atheism in which many people live—the atheism of God-forgetting assurance, of arrogant self-confidence and audacious boastful-ness. "Go to, now, ye that say, To-day or to-morrow we will go into such a city, and continue there a year, and buy and sell, and get gain : whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow. For what is your life ? It is even a vapour, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away." Over against this violation of the counsel, "Boast not thyself of to-morrow," our text indicates how we ought to bear ourselves towards a future of which we know nothing, and towards those schemes and purposes which "reach a hand through time." "For that ye ought to say, If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this or that." Our text is thus a call to humility, to a well-ordered sense of that dependence which underlies our liberty, and to a disciplinary and sanctifying remembrance of God as the source of our strength and the ruler of our affairs. The reminder is not less gracious than wise, vigorously corrective of some evident tendencies in our modern life, yet full of elevation and promise to the dutiful and trustful soul. I know no better thought to enshrine within daily remembrance than this, which recalls man's ignorance and helplessness in himself, and man's power and resource in God.

Now, in commending this word to you as a daily counsel, I am aware how necessary it has become to redeem the sound sense of it from foolishness and formality. Like most scriptural injunctions of its kind, this text has suffered from over-emphasis and literalism. One-eyed readers have seen only so much of the writer's meaning as to make him responsible for an impracticable, and therefore incredible, crusade against all forecasting of time and purpose. The man of words, on the other hand, has laid his finger and fixed his spectacles upon the word SAY—"for that ye ought to say"—and he will have it that to think or feel or acknowledge is not sufficient—that a man must always say "If the Lord will" whenever he forms or announces any plan of future operation. Now, I am far from thinking that this literal expression of our dependence may always and everywhere be dispensed with. There are plans so vast, so serious, so far-stretching, involving such enormous faith and grit, carrying with them such evident risks and dangers, that their inauguration offers a natural occasion for the reverent utterance in men's presence of the Divine proviso. And there are occasions, not infrequent, when, co-operating with godless and worldly men, it would be to them a wise reminder were we to express our dependence upon the consent of God. But to suppose that our daily correspondence is to be well interspersed with D.V.'s, and that our common speech must be interlarded with "Please God," "If the Lord will," "God willing," would be to reduce a solemn truth to an absurd mockery. Piety never fails of its best when it obeys the instincts of sanctified common-sense. Good taste is the natural blossom of a good heart. And the general sentiment of modern Christendom is healthy which looks with disfavour on a practice which so easily sinks into artificiality, which lends such obvious occasion to fraudulent pretence, and which awakens unnecessary criticism and ridicule on the part of worldly men. Our text does not exact such a dangerous obedience. What is required of us is an habitual sense of dependence upon Him in whom "we live, and move, and have our being," a ceaseless recognition of the fact that what we have, and are, and do, all rest upon the permission of God, and a frank remembrance that all our plans are decrees nisi until made absolute by the consent of Heaven. Where such a spirit rules the life, there is no need, save for special reasons, to repeat the expression of it. And where the spirit is absent, it is nothing less than criminal blasphemy to use the formula which implies submission. Our one anxiety must be, however, while dropping the use of a phrase, not to quench the spirit which it expresses, but to live in modest and reverent humility as those who momentarily receive "life and breath and all things" from God. "Be not wise in your own conceits." "In all thy ways acknowledge Him." "If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this or that."

But while our text has been threatened with ridicule through the folly of the literalist, it has been much more seriously endangered by those who have tried to turn it into a sneer at the dignity of life, at the enterprise and forethought of wise men, and at the most reverent and dutiful spirit of self-reliance in the shaping of plans and ideals. Some men read our text as if it were intended to heap contempt upon life, to reduce it to a vapoury worthlessness, and to ridicule every vigorous endeavour to turn it to high account. It is true that in the earlier part of our textual passage there is a strain of contemptuous sarcasm. The writer is there addressing the godless men around him—the men to whom this present is the be-all and end-all of existence. He notes their eager calculation, their arduous toil, their skilful and painful planning, and he turns upon them the torrent of his brilliant badinage. "What fools you are!" he seems to say. "What good is there in all your laborious struggle? What is your life—your life, such life as you yourselves take account of? Is it not a mere vapour? Do not you say and believe it is something which is and is not, which to-day basks in the sun and to-morrow vanishes away? Why don't you complete your philosophy of atheism with a philosophy of pleasure? Why don't you eat and drink in view of to-morrow's death?" Such was the strain of the writer's attack. He had in mind the philosophy of the Epicureans, and was evidently of opinion that for an atheist it was the most rational of all philosophies. The Epicureans emphasised the uncertainty of the future, and man's inability to control it, but they turned this self-evident truth into a reason for enjoying the present moment, without strain of forethought or effort, without purpose for a morrow which might never dawn, without hope or fear in respect of a future which at longest would be brief. The men whom James attacked accepted the Epicurean account of life, but were too eager and greedy to enjoy the Epicurean content, such as it was. Hence the writer pours upon them his vials of ridicule and derision, pitying them all the time as men self-robbed of God and yet unable to get pleasure out of the world. Shall we say James took too low a view of such life when he called it, in the approved terms of its philosophy, a vapour that vanishes away? Shall we charge him with levity or with lack of dignified wisdom when he scorned such purposes as such men could form? But to ridicule such a mode of life was not to heap contempt on life: to unravel the folly of such scheming and planning was not to declare against all thought and plan and purpose. The moment James drops those men and breathes again the unpolluted atmosphere of his own faith, another tone is discernible in his utterance. The man who believes in God is the only man with an adequate faith in to-morrow. Only the man who believes that to-morrow as well as to-day is in the safe keeping of God can wisely project his mind in plans which reach through years of effort. It is the conscious child of eternity who makes the most capable workman in time. Hence, so far from ridiculing life and purpose, James insists that to the man of God life is a glorious heritage, a grand arena for working out, under God, the most comprehensive and far-reaching purposes. His scorn is reserved for atheistic self-confidence. For pious and reverent purposing, with all that it means of modest self-reliance and utilisation of resource, he has encouragement and promise. This is in complete harmony with all we know of the practical-minded Apostle, and it finds evidence in the very words of the text. "If the Lord will," is a phrase which reminds us of the limits and sanctions within which our liberty has play. "We shall live, and do this or that," is an expression of our self-determination, of our right to frame plans, of our duty to look ahead and move forward. Our text is thus the true mean between atheistic self-confidence and fatalistic acquiescence, between arrogant egotism and immoral repudiation of life's powers and obligations. Therein lie the strength, peace, liberty, and elevation of our life. To banish God is not to find freedom, but servitude. To find and acknowledge Him as the Sovereign Lord of life is to enlarge our arena and to discover the real sources of brave confidence and quenchless energy.

And yet, alas! interpret our text as broadly as we may, very few of us can escape the charge of neglecting its counsel—nay even of despising and rejecting its spirit. I am not now concerned with what atheists do, nor with the habits of men who pride themselves upon being godless and worldly. Shall I be speaking what is untrue if I say that many of us who bear Christ's name, who have rejoiced in the salvation which He wrought by His sacrifice, do practically live in another spirit than that of daily and devout dependence? There is an unhealthy tone about much of our conversation, an unreligious, if not irreligious, pretence and assumption about the daily life we lead. We speak of our business, our possessions, our plans, as if we were absolute masters of ourselves and our destiny; as if, by cunning calculation and prudent scheming, we could dodge all disaster, control all forces, regulate every possible exigency, and reach our goal with colours flying. Now and again, indeed, we suffer a rude and momentary awakening from our self-deceit. Death stalks into our circle of schemes, and carries off a life on which we had depended. God's energy breathes out in a hurricane which sweeps across sea and land, and our ship goes down in tragic loneliness, with only the sea-birds to chant a requiem; or our strong house of cards falls ignominiously to the ground. The intensity of life eats away our vital energy, and the hand begins to tremble, the eyes grow dim, the head swims, and to save some salvage from our self-wreck we have to hurry away and leave our schemes to fate. For the moment we are impressed with our dependence upon a higher Will; but so deep-rooted is the practical banishment of God from most of our affairs, that we soon slip back into old habits of feeling. How many of us retain a daily sense of dependence upon God, and how many of us seek guidance for our daily business? How many, or how few, before entering upon a business enterprise, or a social connection, or a personal obligation, or a public task, do fervently recognise the need of Divine consent, and seek it in devout and earnest prayer? Must it not in truth be said that, in addition to dropping the phrase "God willing," many of us have lost the tone and quality of mind which that phrase indicates? And must it not be further confessed that we have sunk to this forgetfulness of God in daily life because we stand committed to many things which we know God would not be willing to sanction, and because we have set our hearts on winning them instead of on pleasing Him? The wrong-doer cannot ask the sanction of God, does not want God to notice him, wants only, and can want only, to forget God and to be by God forgot. And the reason why we find it so difficult to remember God in business and in social life, and to live in quiet submission to His sanction, is because the world is just as much as ever at enmity with God, sets up its own standard, ruthlessly overturns the injunctions of Heaven, and threatens with swift ruin those who can be frightened by threats, should they dare to "trust in the Lord and do good," and to wait with confident expectation their promised inheritance in the earth. Yea, verily, it is as true to-day as ever it was, that the world and the flesh stand in opposition to God and the spirit. There never was, there never can be, any compromise or any truce. It is war to the knife, and the knife to the hilt. "Ye cannot serve God and mammon."

Here we have penetrated to the very heart of our text. It is not a plea for the repetition of a phrase, it is not a call to periodic recognition of our dependence: it is an exhortation to make God absolute Master of all we have and are, to submit ourselves wholly to His authority and direction, to be self-crucified to worldliness and alive to the higher spiritual functions of life. You may tell me that this is a large order. Precisely. The Gospel is a large order; and it is just because so many people have failed to appreciate that fact, preferring to regard it in aspects more gratifying to selfishness, that we see so little of Christ in the men who profess His name. Let us beware of self-deceit. The Gospel brings to us large gifts and larger promises; it overflows with free favours and undeserved bounties; but it would be no Gospel of redemption at all, would be nothing better than a pauperising and debilitating extravagance of grace, did it not turn its gifts into obligations and interpret its promises as occasions of obedience. The Gospel is a claim as well as a gift, an instruction and motive as well as—nay, because—a benediction and a promise. It lays upon us a large order because it creates for us a great occasion. And its order is that we must lose ourselves in God, that we may find ourselves in new relations and with new ideals. The primal mischief of life is that all our activities and interests are organised around the wrong centre. Self instead of God, gain instead of goodness, comfort instead of character, property instead of piety, indicate our mistaken attitude. Out of these eccentricities arise all the grind, the friction, the waste, the fruitlessness of life. It is a pitiable spectacle we see around us in this mad battle of selfishness, and one hardly knows whether more to pity the man who wins and finds emptiness, or the man who loses and is left to poverty and obscure suffering. It is all wrong, miserably wrong, and the fruit of it is seen in the unrest and misery of life. The Gospel comes to put us right, and by putting us right to set us in the way of finding rest and happiness. It re-erects God as the true centre of life, and by making His will supreme bids us to find security and peace in obedience and trust. It is God's will that life should be bright and blessed for all His children, that the earth should be a paradise of joy and song, and not a charnel-house of blighted careers nor a cruel arena of selfish strife. What we see around us of unhallowed wealth and unsanctified poverty is the result of a dominant and shameless materialism, of a selfishness not less visible in the envy of the poor than in the greed of the rich. All classes among us are tainted with the worldliness which sets a practically supreme value upon gold, and what gold can purchase, and have become insensible to the profound truth of the Master's utterance that "a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things he possesseth." Hence the dethronement of God's ideal of life, which makes truth, love, service, the elements of well-being; hence the substitution of our godless greed to possess what the world craves and prizes; and hence the banishment of God and of our sense of dependence upon Him from common daily affairs.

How much simpler and sweeter, how much more calm and strong and satisfying, is the life to which God calls us! While it rests upon the confident assurance that "the Lord will provide," it finds motive and scope for exercise in the healthy vitality of its unburdened and unanxious powers. Breathing the atmosphere of dependence in the attitude of trust, and commending all our plans to the Lord of our talents and our time, we are able to work without worry, to forecast without anxiety, to achieve or to fail without foolish pride or still more foolish grief. To the man who recognises that the Lord reigns, and that He is the Father and Friend of all who trust and are not afraid, life is a certain triumph, a quiet and satisfying inheritance. The curse of our modern civilisation is strain, and the origin of strain is a godless, trustless selfishness. Only at distant intervals do we meet with a man who believes and does not make haste. For the most part, men are strung to a self-destroying tension, working too eagerly to be effective, and reaping weariness instead of joy and vigour out of their work. And the only way out of this wild fiery chaos is for Christian men boldly to relinquish all part and lot in the unholy strife, to recall the world to the supremacy and goodness of God, to set the example of a fearless faith in the sufficiency of a gracious Providence, and to point men to that nobler philosophy of life which is rooted in dependence and animated by trust. Remember the Master's sermon on the lilies and the sparrows. Recall His simple yet Divine account of life's sources and reward. Put away from you the unholy passion for mere wealth, power, fame. Learn to live the full and harmonised life which combines trust with toil, dependence with self-help, Divine sovereignty with individual initiative. And upon you and yours will fall henceforth the warmth and brightness of God's sunshine; you shall know the joy of work, the rest of faith, the blessedness and satisfaction of a God-governed and God-insured life!

AFTER LONG ABSENCE.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A.

SKETCH IN THE LARGE ROOM.

IT is rather a perilous experience, after the lapse of years, to visit an old love. One feels rather awkward, to say the least of it. Then there are the speculations—how shall I be received? what shall I feel? what shall I see? and—what shall I say?

But I will not speculate—experience is better than speculation—and I will tell the reader how I felt, and what I did, when I went to see an old flame of mine.

It was an "it," and not a "she;" if it had been a "she," I should probably have been quagmired amid what I have mentioned above, and been glad to keep my experiences to myself.

Many years ago I was instrumental in raising an endowment for a "Seaside Home for the London City Missionaries"—a place whither these hard-worked men could be sent for change of air when recovering from illness—for rest, when exhausted with their heavy and incessant work, and for a short holiday every year; so that by a little change of air and scene, they might be kept from breaking down at all.

This "Seaside Home" consists of twelve rather collegiate-looking buildings on the highest ground in Ventnor, each house having, besides the basement, accommodation for one single missionary, and a sitting-room and bed-room for a married couple. There is also a large common hall, with a good selection of books and games, and with the portraits of some of the benefactors hanging on the walls.

I say this was my old love, for which I worked for many years—which I had visited when it was trim and bright in its early youth, and which I revisited the other day. But alas! alas! how Time turns dimples to wrinkles, and blushes to blotches, and curves to angles, and does many naughty things, on which I do not love to dwell.

One thing, however, was a comfort; though my old flame needed painting and papering, and, between ourselves, a little putty, too; and though it was decidedly shabby, and had gone down in the world as to appearances, it was still the same as to the old lines—it was “itself,” and that, I confess, was everything to me. And so I said to myself, “I’ll take some of my friends into my confidence, and though I can’t do all I would for you myself, perhaps they’ll help me to paint, and paper, and putty you; and though I can’t undertake to make you ‘beautiful for ever,’ yet I most certainly shall never see you wanting renovation again.”

I own, good reader, to having flirted, in the years which have passed between my first visit to the Seaside Home and that of the other day, with some other institutions, and to have written in connection with them what has passed beyond the limits of conventional penmanship; if I had lived in the days of Serjeant Buzfuz, who pleaded Mrs. Bardell’s case against poor Pickwick, he could have made a great deal out of those documents, especially one bulky one, in which I showed my appreciation of the Royal Hospital for Incurables. But that is neither here nor there; the London City Mission Seaside Home had the chief part in my affections always, and has it still.

The “Seaside Home” is twenty-five years old—rather young for me, but so steady, so good, that forsaking all other, except in a secondary kind of way with a little scratch of the pen, I intend to keep to it—until death do us part.

It has a sister at Folkestone, but when that wants painting and papering and puttying, I shall probably not be here to have pity on its woes.

Now, just think, good reader, if this noble place is not worthy of a little sympathy and help.

During the past year 208 missionaries and 146 missionaries’ wives have had a fortnight’s holiday within its walls, while thirty missionaries have been received and nursed, and returned to their work again, in many instances entirely restored to health. The same on an average might be said of each of the twenty-five years of its life, so that the missionaries have had 5,100 fortnights of refreshment here, and their wives 3,650. Think of what a boon that must be to men hard worked fifty out of the fifty-two weeks in the year!

I am only mentioning now what this building has done, which I am so anxious to paint, paper and putty, and generally repair; its funds have provided last year alone for a similar holiday to 112 missionaries, 105 wives, and 20 invalids, and 144 missionaries have received grants to spend their holiday elsewhere.

When I went to the Home in the month of February, I found ten invalids there, one or two of whom arrived during my short stay. Seven of these were men recovering from influenza—in some cases complicated with pneumonia—and bronchitis. They appeared to have suffered much; but the sea-air had done wonders for them. The entire change in their surroundings—the plain but wholesome food—the companionship of each other —the spirit of cheerfulness which pervaded the sunlit place—the kindness of the matron who thought of everybody, and was a kind of bottled sunshine in herself, were all restorative, and all did their work, as I could see with my own eyes. Sometimes, when a man comes down, he is moody and broody, and seedy beyond description. He has nothing to say, and I have heard of one who was so down that it seemed almost like a personal injury if anybody else had anything to say either; but lo, and behold! first a sickly smile, then a toleration of noise, then a little remark himself, then a good laugh, then a partaking in the noise himself, then a general shaking up, then a feeling that he's getting well, then the tender solicitude of the matron that he should "take a little more" freely responded to; then long walks and tremendous ventilation, then high spirits, and would be a melancholy prospect for fowls, if only they could think. I remember one day in Leadenhall Market looking at a number of fowls feeding home; and what do you think, good reader, "home" means to him? Why, "work:" it means the slums—it means a long day's toil—it means that, one day of which would probably be enough for you for a year.

Yes; it is inexpressibly touching to see the anxiety of these recovering men to get back to their hard toil; they seem to live for it. They don't want to hang on at the Home, they want to get away from it; sometimes they would leave before they are fit to go, if they were not kept back. Personally, my experience is that the hearts of the London City Missionaries are in their work. They seem to love it; and one of the objects of the "Seaside Home" is to divert, if possible, their minds from it, for a short time, so that a change of thought, as well as of air, may help to restore them.

Some of my readers probably know what "influenza" is. It is bad enough in itself, but its after-effects are often worse; the Seaside Home enables the Missionary to combat these, and restores him, quite cured to work, for which, without this help, he might not have been equal for months, or perhaps even for ever.

Certainly some of the recovering men I met at the Home had dreadful experiences; those of one man in particular I remember. He was delirious for some time, and imagined himself to be a fowl—not a fowl crowing or clucking, as the case may be, but a defunct bird, and one undergoing the general fate of defunct fowls—being trussed. That carelessly in a wicker cage, while some of their fellows were being plucked close by; no doubt with ourselves many a meal would be spoiled if we knew what was perhaps even immediately before us.

But to return to my friend the City Missionary. The great difficulty seemed to be with his legs. His body had been manipulated with great agony, to him, until it had been got into proper shape; but his legs could not be got into their proper place at all, and his earnest cry was for someone to "pull them up, and be done with it." He did not tell me whether he was furnished with a "gizzard" or not, so as to be turned out complete; but if he was, I should think that it must have added considerably to his woes.

Now, however, all this had passed away. He had returned to humanity again; and with the good food and air of the "Home," and its amenities and rest, he was a new man; and thus it was with many more. Indeed, it might be said that all the Missionaries are returned from the Home to their work almost new men; and, as they themselves say, "They would not know what would become of them without it," both as a means of keeping them from failing by a timely and refreshing holiday, and by giving them change of air, and so restoring them when they are knocked over either by active illness or by that nervous prostration which in many cases from time to time the nature of their work brings on.

I tried my hand at "interviewing" while I was there; and amongst those with whom I spoke was one man who came down during my stay, and what he had to tell would fill a volume. He joined the Mission in 1858; at first his mission was chiefly to infidels, and his description of his work on Islington Green was that "nine months of it was equal to nine years." At his last meeting an infidel, Bible in hand, made his way through the crowd, and said to him, "Give us your hand;" then he added, in the presence of the vast assembly, "You're the most straightforward preacher ever I met; if they were all like you, we'd have little to do."

Cholera cases came next, and the Missionary got the cholera himself, but had no Seaside Home then to go to for recovery; then in 1870 he became a Missionary to the public-houses. Imagine what a life that must be; out every night in gin-palaces and beer-houses, from five p.m. to eleven—all weathers—over a large area—hustled about—often abused—in controversy with all sorts and conditions of men—forcing, as it were, religion, conviction of sin, and thought about the soul, into the very strongholds of irreligion and carelessness, and often of vice—where the very atmosphere is against every serious thought! Is it any wonder that a life of this kind breaks a man down?

This Missionary had had serious internal injury inflicted on him. As he himself said, he was "pulled," "strained," and "punched" by drunken fellows—fellows with fists like legs of mutton, and that in spite often of the landlords, who in many cases, he said, were most kind. Such was the atmosphere he had to work in, that he said at times he actually staggered home himself, almost intoxicated by the fumes of liquor and tobacco after some five hours of talking and arguing in a public-house.

From these unlikely fields wonderful sheaves have been garnered; sometimes from amongst drinkers who have been brought to God, sometimes amongst landlords, who at more or less sacrifice have given up the business altogether.

The City Mission has many marvels to show, but I really think its operations amongst public-houses are the greatest. As this Missionary said, "Tis a marvel to me; I've been twenty years at it, and don't know how 't is done."

Amongst many curious things which this good man told me in connection with drink was one which would puzzle many of our readers, i.e., how two men could get dead-drunk on one halfpenny. "As I was out one morning early I saw two loafers standing at the top of Bermondsey; they were waiting for someone. In conversation I found out that they had only one halfpenny between them. They tried hard to get another halfpenny from me, but I would not give it to them; they said they were 'dying for a drink.' One of them presently says, 'Here comes So-and-so'; and when he came up, one of the men begged the halfpenny from him. When they got it, they went into the public-house hard by, and called for half a pint of beer, which they put into a quart pot; and then, though dying for drink, neither of them would touch it. It was left on the bar, and one of the two men remained inside, while the other went outside. When the outside man saw someone coming along that he knew, he hailed him and asked him to 'have a drink,' pulled him in, and handed him the quart pot. Having drained it, it was only fair that he should fill it again; and thus the original penny was worked through the day, until the pair were thoroughly drunk at night."

But time, or rather space, is up; or I could tell you much more, not forgetting the man who ordered a quart of liquor, just put his head back, and lifting the pot on high, simply poured its contents down his throat without any swallowing, and, no doubt, without any tasting either! The public-house is not without its curiosities in their way.

From a host of grateful letters received from the Missionaries the following short extracts speak volumes :—"I believe it is largely due to the comfort of the Seaside Home that I am able now, after forty-one years' service (twenty years of which were spent in visiting the courts and alleys of Shoreditch) still to continue my work, in the enjoyment of a fair measure of health and strength, for which I am grateful."

We have no space for the letter of the man who came back "over five pounds heavier in weight"; but there is one touching letter which really deserves to be given in full :—

October 12th, 1893.

DEAR SIR,—In the month of March last my dear wife and myself were stricken down with influenza. When able to leave my bed in April, I did not feel I had sufficient courage to do battle with ungodliness in the taverns about Trafalgar Square, Piccadilly Circus, etc., or even to mix with the promiscuous multitude of every caste and clime who throng the Westminster public-houses.

As the fever abated, the thought of dear old Ventnor, where we had spent several delightful holidays, broke in upon the gloom of our sick-chamber, and, like a delightful vision, helped to lure us back to health.

When, after nearly three weeks' stay under soft skies, and amongst spring flowers, we seemed to laugh and sing again, to climb the hills and view the sea, we compared notes, and ascertained that each had been struck with alarm at the weakness and dejection of the other as we had stood revealed to each other in the clear light that fell upon the boat as we were crossing the Solent.

We both came back very much improved, and I am thankful to say I now feel more than an average of physical capacity for the work of the Lord.

Only once previously had I been to a home as an invalid, and that also was to Ventnor, twenty-three years ago, which was the first year I was in the Mission. It occurred in this wise. Our children took scarlet fever immediately after measles, and four dear little ones died in a few weeks. My wife was rendered helpless, and myself but little better. As we looked forth from our solitude, there seemed scarce anything left to live for.

The Ventnor Home was just opened. I arrived there in a dazed condition, supporting my feeble wife. As we looked forth upon sea and sky and hills, with their grandeur and beauty, it was soon borne in upon us that the world was too lovely to turn our backs upon in despair.

After a few weeks' stay, we came back to our district, and took up the work with recuperated energies; and the good hand of God has been upon us all these years.

I am sure you will not be surprised that we reckon our Seaside Homes—supported by a generous public—amongst the chief mercies for which we have to thank God; for, next to the grace of God, there is nothing more needful than a good average state of health to enable us to prosecute our work successfully.—Yours truly, J. W. M.

And now all I would say to my readers who have had the influenza and have recovered—and to all who have not had it, and are thankful that they have not—if you would like to give a little thank-offering in connection herewith, I live at "The Cliff" Eastbourne, and shall be glad of any little help to paint, paper, and putty my dilapidated, but still to me beautiful first love.

AN INTERRUPTED PROPOSAL

CHAPTER I.

T WAS one of those brilliant May days which in England are so delightful, but in Malta are anything but agreeable.

A slight sirocco was blowing, as was evident by the limp flapping of the flag on the palace in Valetta, and the sirocco was harder to bear than even the burning sun. It was about four o'clock in the afternoon, and two young people were sitting up in the verandah outside the central guard-room: the subaltern on duty and a girl of about nineteen years of age with a face like a blush-rose, and eyes of speedwell blue veiled under black lashes, and hair full of glittering gold threads, like wandering sunbeams, that were lurking among the brown tresses.

She was looking away across the glaring white square with eyes full of wondering pathos.

But though she seemed to be deeply interested in the dark-faced women flitting across the street in their faldettas—in the brilliant mule-cloths, and the country carts—yet she was, in reality, thinking of nothing and no one but the man at her side.

He was a handsome young fellow, in the becoming uniform of the Welsh Rifles, with the silver chain and whistle setting off the dark blue of his tunic, and his close-cropped head just showing under his white helmet. They had been partners together through the season, and he had driven her about the country in his tandem. And though he had never spoken to her of love, yet, she felt sure, with the freemasonry of a girl's first romance, that he loved her and was only waiting a convenient opportunity to tell her so.

He had certainly put it off till the last moment, for she and her mother were to sail in one short hour by the P. & O., and they were having tea in the guard-room as a farewell entertainment.

Down the short stair, in the room below, Mrs. Clarke was being taken round the picture-gallery by the young subaltern who was Dick Seddon's supernumerary—a kind-hearted boy, ready to do a good turn for his friend, and to amuse this exceedingly disagreeable woman of the world while Seddon told his love-story to the girl of his heart.

Everyone in Malta had hated Mrs. Clarke for the whole of that season.

She had come out to Malta for the sole purpose of getting Norah married, and had been absolutely unscrupulous in her hunting of eligible young men.

Dick Seddon was an absolute detrimental, and she had congratulated herself every day through the season that Norah had profited by her advice, and had not allowed her feelings to be worked upon by that impressionable young man.

Oddly enough, she was off her guard for a moment, thinking perhaps that at this eleventh hour there was little danger to be feared from a daughter who had been so well schooled in the ways of the world.

There was a great deal of rustling black silk about Mrs. Clarke's person, and a general air of wealth, which was, however, not borne out by investigation. For she had broken in upon the small amount of capital that had been left her by her husband; and in providing her daughter with gowns, and paying the enormous house-rent exacted by Valetta landlords in the season, she had gone far towards qualifying herself for the workhouse.

It was all over now, and, worse than all, it had been a failure; and Norah—lovely little Norah—was returning home without having made that splendid match that had seemed so probable when viewed from the opposite side of the Mediterranean.

"Oh, really! dear me, Mr. Kynaston," she said, putting up her long glasses to get a good look at the painted walls; "often though I have been to tea up here, no one has ever explained the pictures to me in such an interesting fashion."

She was very gracious to the boy, who had a title within measurable distance of himself, and she had a half feeling of regret that he was so very much too young for Norah.

Mr. Kynaston blushed.

The real authors of those guard-room pictures would have been truly astonished could they have heard the romance that the latest-joined subaltern wove about their contributions to the walls.

He had just described the skeleton in the bedroom as a real vision seen by a former occupant in a fit of insanity, and at once transferred to the wall as a warning to the man who should come after him.

He had romanced so much about the whole collection that he paused now with a blush of shame, absolutely unable to proceed.

"Well, perhaps we ought to be going now," said Mrs. Clarke cheerfully, as she pulled out her watch.

"Oh dear no, not yet," cried Kynaston hurriedly, anxious to give a few more moments to that blissful pair. "You have not seen the gem of the whole collection yet;" and he almost pulled her to the other end of the room.

It is rather difficult to propose to the girl of your choice, in helmet and gloves when you are wearing a sword that is apt to be unmanageable. But this was what Dick Seddon was trying to do, with one eye on the palace square, and the other on that lovely blushing face.

"Norah," he said earnestly, "you must have thought it strange, knowing, as you did, that I loved you, that I have never spoken to you of my feelings. But, Norah my dear, I am such a poor beggar, that I had not the face to ask anyone to share my fortune with me—the hard fortune of a soldier's life. And, besides, I knew that your mother would never allow it for a moment."

He had taken her little ungloved hand in his big pipe-clayed one, and was looking into her dewy eyes with a true honest passion, full of trouble.

"Norah darling, will you be—"

At that instant the sergeant of the guard gave a peal at the bell over the door, there was a trampling of feet in the square, a hoarse "Guard turn out!" and the governor's carriage trotted into view.

With an exclamation of despair, poor Dick dropped her hand, and rushed headlong down the steep stairs, arriving just in time to turn the guard in again, his sword banging and clattering on the stairs behind him—his face red with mingled heat and vexation.

When he returned, Norah had risen to her feet, and her mother was standing at her side, surveying the empty relics of tea and iced lemonade through her scornful glasses.

"Very good of you to have had us to tea, Mr. Seddon," she said in her shrill voice; "but we must really be going now, as the P. and O. sails at five. Good-bye, good-bye. If you are ever in our part of the world, pray look us up.—Now, Norah!"

Dick pressed that little tremulous hand, his eyes full of honest grief which could not vent its agony in words.

"I will write," he whispered hoarsely.

And then Mrs. Clarke swept her away, still talking volubly, and the guard-room became once again a howling wilderness.

He watched her soft blue gown till it was out of sight, and when she turned to wave her handkerchief, he gave a sigh that was half a sob, and began to revile the fate that had put him on guard this day of all others, and had broken so ruthlessly into his romance.

It was only when the shrill whistle of the Peninsular announced that she was leaving her moorings that he remembered that Norah had never given him her address.

He knew that they lived in London, but that was all—and the metropolis is a large place.

"Kynaston, I've gone and done it this time," he groaned to his sympathetic supernumerary. "I can't write to her, because I don't know her address, and I can't afford to take any leave this summer; and besides, I don't believe I could get any if I wanted to."

And the guard-room had never echoed so profound a sigh as came from that most miserable subaltern in the Welsh Rifles.

CHAPTER II

FAR in the depths of Bloomsbury there is a street which is dignified by the name of "Queen Anne's Road."

It is a very narrow and a very grey street, full of houses that look as if they were so respectable that their respectability had landed them in a slough of sordid commonplaceness.

They are principally lodging-houses, with window-blinds that have once been white, and window-boxes that have once boasted of a few stunted geraniums.

No one comes into this street of his own free will, save the fruit and vegetable hawker and the cat's-meat man; and everyone leaves it with a sense of relief.

It was in Queen Anne's Road that Mrs. Clarke and her daughter came to lodge soon after their return from Malta.

The small fortune that the elder lady possessed had been so invaded, that she discovered an absolute necessity for immediate and thorough retrenchment, which entailed giving up the snug little house in South Kensington and retiring into lodgings and obscurity.

Mrs. Clarke in lodgings and obscurity was not the same woman that Malta had known.

She developed an abusive temper, and a great love for a dressing-gown and curl-papers, and a plate of shrimps for tea.

Instead of rising and battling with circumstances, she drifted with the tide of their fortunes deeper into the Slough of Despond. As no one came to see them now, dress did not matter; and as no one, of course, was ever asked to share their humble meals, dinner drifted into "high tea," and the elegancies of life were merged in a dirty cloth and a Rockingham tea-pot, because it was not worth while using the silver one when they were in such a wretched house.

Six months had come and gone since the Peninsular sailed out of the quarantine harbour that brilliant May day, and during the whole of that time Mrs. Clarke had never ceased to abuse her daughter for the chances she had thrown away in Malta.

And Norah's eyes were often dim with tears, and her cheeks had lost much of their lovely bloom. For her mother's tongue was cuttingly bitter, and Dick Seddon had neither written nor come to find her.

"You always were a fool, Norah," said Mrs. Clarke cheerfully one day, when her daughter entered the room in her shabby gown. "You might have caught someone last winter. Why, Mr. Matteson was immensely attentive to you; and Dick Seddon would have been better than no one, for his regiment was not a bad one. But you don't seem to be able to attract men permanently to you, in spite of your looks; you are not clever, not witty enough. Men like to be caressed with one hand and patted with the other."

Norah waited patiently till her mother had finished speaking. Her figure had something pathetic in its young lines, and her eyes, as she glanced round the shabby room, with its crochet antimacassars and wax flowers, were full of unspoken trouble.

All this was unutterably painful to her: her mother, in her crumpled tea-gown, reading yesterday's Morning Post, the tea-pot on the hob, and a general litter of old flowers and feathers and lace about the room which suggested the fact that Mrs. Clarke was contemplating a new bonnet.

There was a scrap of lace among the tangled heap that brought a sudden flush of pain to her face; for it was a piece of Maltese lace that Dick had given her, and which her mother had calmly appropriated. It reminded her of those golden days with Dick, and she put her hand to her lips to choke down the sob that would scarcely be repressed.

"Mother," she said quietly, "please let us forget that there are any men at all in the world. They are only an annoying set, who bring trouble in their train. I wanted to tell you that I have got a situation at last: with an old lady in the next street, who wants a companion to look after her; and I am off to-morrow."

"H'm!" said Mrs. Clarke; then she added eagerly, "What is the salary?"

"Fifty pounds a year, paid quarterly," answered Norah quietly. "I have to be there all day, so that it is not a very large sum, after all."

"I shall get a new gown at once, and a new mantle," said Mrs. Clarke, starting into life suddenly with a jerk and becoming absorbed in the merits of black over grey. "Really, I do need one! I have never been so utterly deprived of every necessary in my life before; and all to provide you, Norah, with a season in Malta. It is your bounden duty to give me back a little of what I spent on you. Of course you bargained for a quarter in advance?"

Norah set her lips in a firm, hard line.

Her mother had been a trial to her all her life long, but she was only at this time discovering what a trial she could be in adversity.

"You shall have the money directly I get it, mother," she answered quietly; "but I think that you must wait for your new gown until we have paid the landlady. You know that we owe her a quarter's rent."

It was then that Mrs. Clarke displayed her latent powers of abuse. She was an hysterical woman, and had never been accustomed, since she had worried her husband into an early grave, to restrain her feelings. So she now gave rein to them.

When Norah left the room to go up-stairs to the sloping attic which was her own special abode, she sank down into a chair by the window, and covered her face with her hands.

"Dick, Dick!" she sobbed wildly. "God help me to bear it; help me to bear my life and the long years that are to come." Above her head, the small window, propped open with a broken vase, let in a shaft of pale sunlight.

It was November, but strange to say there was but little fog, only a haze, which in the blessed country would have been laden with crispness and gossamer threads of sparkling dew.

A pert London sparrow hopped on to the ledge with an inquisitive shake of its head; and the deep roar of the great city, heard dully so far up in the roof, made the air tremble. A train far beneath rumbled under the house, and set the jug and basin rattling, and Norah rose from her chair and went over to the cracked looking-glass to smooth her hair. Dick might have loved her, might love her still, but her duty lay clear before her in a hard-going road; and down that road Norah would have to walk as cheerfully as she could.

For Norah was one of the brave ones of this earth, and her heart was set in the right place.

CHAPTER III.

MRS. BLESSINGTON was not an attractive old lady. There was a severity about her hard eye and the line of grizzled hair which lay straight under her hard black net cap, which did not tend to cheer Norah's heart, as she surveyed her, sitting in her hard arm-chair, with one eye on the maid-of-all-work and the other on the leg of mutton.

Her black bombazine gown was pinned at the throat with a cameo brooch, and there was a hard line of black frilling at her wrists.

At her side was seated a little girl of about eight years old, prematurely aged and unattractive. She was hemming a coarse handkerchief, and looked up with lack-lustre eyes as Norah entered.

"Mary Jane, you can have two slices of mutton for your breakfast, but if you attempt to give any to that policeman who haunts the area steps, I'll cut off your meat to-morrow. Now, mind, I have measured the mutton, and know exactly the size of it.—Well, Miss Clarke, ready for your duties?"

Mary Jane departed with a founce and a toss, and Norah came forward with a sinking heart.

"This is Theodora—a child I have adopted: the daughter of a man I hate," went on Mrs. Blessington calmly. "I am a complete invalid, so I shall be much obliged if you will take her out for a walk once a day, and see that she knows her grammar, ready to begin school to-morrow. Let me look at you again."

Then, as Norah turned obediently to the light, and endured the scrutiny of the sharp, bead-like eyes, she added—

"Yes, you'll do. Not at all an unpleasant face."

And the girl, with a strange wonder, felt almost certain that she caught a gleam of something like softness in her expression. But if so, it was only a momentary touch, for her voice was as hard as before, as she turned to Theodora.

"Go into the next room," she said; "I have something to say to Miss Clarke."

And when she had disappeared, that strange old woman laid her withered hand on the girl's arm.

"Look here," she said brusquely: "I can trust you. If ever a man wants to speak to Theodora when she is out walking with you, bring her straight home. I hate her father—he tried to marry me for my money years ago, only I found it out in time. And now he is desperately poor, with a sickly wife and a dozen children. I've taken Theodora, on the understanding that she is brought up without knowing any other belongings, or else back she goes to poverty. There's my story. Now, what's yours?"

"I have no story," faltered Norah, flushing painfully.

"Oh yes, you have. Nonsense! It's a love story gone wrong; I know that by the look in your eyes. There, there, don't cry. You've got to do the housekeeping here, and if you spend a penny more than you need, or let that rascalion of a girl feed her policeman out of the joint, I'll be down on you like a ton of coals! Now go and make Theodora's acquaintance, and ask her where you are to find my draught—the rhubarb one—and bring it to me here."

And then began Norah's new life, which was only a shade less dreary than the days spent in the lodgings in Queen Anne's Road with her mother.

"She was true to herself, to Dick, and to this man."—p. 751.

There were occasional gleams of brightness in the household in Rutherford Place.

Occasionally Mrs. Blessington forgot that she was bound never to spend a penny where a halfpenny would do, and relaxed into the extravagance of a bottle of gooseberry wine for luncheon or a couple of chickens and whipped cream for supper. But as this period of extravagance was always followed by one of extreme depression, Norah grew to dread the days when Mrs. Blessington relaxed her purse-strings, and to be grateful for the cold mutton and sago pudding of every-day life.

She used to arrive at No. 1, Rutherford Place, soon after eight o'clock in the morning, and leave at the same time at night; and though she certainly got through plenty of hard work in that time, and developed into the dressmaker as well as the house-keeper of the family, yet she was far from being uncomfortable in her situation.

Mrs. Blessington was invariably kind to her, whatever she might be to Mary Jane and to Theodora; and Norah often wondered at the strange preference evinced by the invalid for her society.

Theodora was by no means an agreeable child. There were fathomless depths of curiosity in her nature which never seemed to be satisfied. And Norah felt that these sharp eyes were probing and plumbing the depths of her experiences, and that, if there had been anything to discover, Theodora would have discovered it already.

"Miss Clarke," said the child one day, as she sat on her low stool, stitching at one of an army of linen handkerchiefs, "what makes you look as if you were always going to cry. Pink round the eyes, like my rabbit! Mary Jane says that perhaps your policeman has took up with another cook!"

Norah felt a wild, uncontrollable desire to laugh hysterically. But she turned it off into a cough, and rebuked Theodora for her want of grammar, as well as her lack of manners.

If her policeman had not "took up with another cook," still he was strangely silent: a matter which was, she said to herself, nothing new for the male sex, famed as they are for inconstancy.

Her mother, meanwhile, was pursuing a little path of her own in life; and, aided by the stimulus of Norah's quarterly salary, had once more blossomed into a decent member of society, and was pursuing the vicar of the parish with more zeal than thought.

Utterly unsuited as she was to be a clergyman's wife, she flung herself heart and soul into mothers' meetings and Scripture readings, and at the end of three months was the plighted bride of Mr. Smyth, the spectacled vicar of St. Bartholomew's, whose nervous timidity had been overcome by the masterly mind of "that splendid woman," as he called her.

When Norah realised that her mother had chosen a second husband, and that one such an estimable man, she felt thankful for Mrs. Clarke's sake, and truly sorry for the Rev. Tobias Smyth, who had all unwittingly won a Tartar for his helpmeet.

But being a discreet young woman, she said nothing, gratefully declining Mr. Smyth's offer of a home, and preferring to live entirely with Mrs. Blessington after the wedding came off.

One day, about a week before the interesting event, as Norah was returning home from Rutherford Place, she was greeted by a familiar voice, which made her jump as she turned hastily round.

"I cannot be mistaken. Surely you are Miss Norah Clarke?" said the voice.

And Norah blushed hotly as she saw, standing under the gas-lamp in front of her, the Mr. Matteson who had been the subject of her mother's recrimination so often during the past nine months.

He was standing, hat in hand, with an eager look on his pleasant middle-aged face. And the girl greeted his grizzled whiskers and bald head almost enthusiastically as she remembered the happy days of which he reminded her so forcibly.

"How surprising, how wonderful, to meet you here!" she said, gasping a little with the effect of the shock; and then remembered that as Mr. Matteson was "something in the City," it was not at all surprising that she should come across him in the London streets.

"No more surprising than to meet you here, Miss Clarke," he said, smiling quietly, well pleased at her evident embarrassment. "I have often wondered what had become of you since those pleasant days in Malta which seem so long ago."

She turned and began to walk homeward, he accompanying her, and on the doorstep she begged him to enter, and he assented willingly enough, and was presently ushered into the presence of Mrs. Clarke in a becoming grey gown, with a pleasant litter of millinery about her.

"Dear, dear me, Mr. Matteson!" she simpered. "Really, how delightful! and at such a time, too. No doubt Norah has told you the news—the interesting news of the approaching wedding."

Mr. Matteson turned ghastly white to the very lips.

He never noticed the becoming confusion that Mrs. Clarke was summoning to her aid. He never imagined it possible that she should pose as a blushing bride!

"What!" he said hoarsely, "Miss Clarke going to be married? I was not aware—I was not prepared for such an announcement."

He looked from one to the other, blindly groping with his hands like a man in a dream.

Mrs. Clarke had her eyes coyly fixed on the opposite wall, but she made haste to answer him in a petulant manner—

"Goodness, no! Why should Norah be the only person to be married? No, indeed; I am intending to take, as a second husband, the Rev.—"

But Mr. Matteson cared nothing for Mrs. Clarke's matrimonial expectations. He sat heavily down in the nearest chair and wiped his face. "Thank goodness!" he said, gasping. "No, of course I did—I didn't mean that—I mean—I mean I am delighted to hear it!" he concluded lamely, as he caught the flash in Mrs. Clarke's eye. "I—I think I must be going now. I hope you will permit me to offer you some small token of my regard for your welfare. I—I shall perhaps meet Miss Clarke again before long. Good-night."

And he dashed away in a condition of mind which was nothing short of insanity for a middle-aged gentleman with a short neck to indulge in.

When he had gone Mrs. Clarke looked at her daughter keenly.

"I know you are a fool, Norah. But you'll be worse than a fool if you don't marry that man. Why, think of the diamonds he can give you—the house—the position—the——"

Norah drew her breath sharply, and broke in upon her mother's words with an accent of impatience.

"Dear mother, surely one wedding at a time is enough for this family! For goodness' sake let us finish your trousseau and your wedding gown before you begin to fashion mine!" And she succeeded in diverting Mrs. Clarke's attention to her own affair with complete success.

Mr. Matteson's small wedding present proved to be a diamond ring of much value, and round it Mrs. Clarke wove a romance of her own imagining, which Mr. Smyth believed implicitly, and hinted darkly at with pride: which was to the effect that Mr. Matteson had been a rejected admirer of her own, and was eating out his heart with grief and despair. This was believed by the world in general with implicit confidence, which shows that, among society in general, if you can only tell a lie and stick to it your reputation (such as it is) is made! When Mrs. Clarke had been safely and tearfully married, and Norah, with earnest prayers for the welfare of the husband and wife, had departed for good to Rutherford Place, the world seemed to combine in loading her with presents.

Every day came some parcel to the modest area door, addressed to Miss Norah Clarke, always in a different handwriting, with a modest inscription inside: "From A. B. C.," or "From a Friend," or "With Earnest Good Wishes."

And the odd thing was that these parcels were so varied in their contents that they comprised every branch of dry goods, from a smoke-cured Yorkshire ham to a bouquet of roses from Covent Garden.

It was Mrs. Blessington's great amusement to calculate on the next arrival, and whenever she heard the area bell, it was: "Run, Theodora! run, Miss Clarke! or that fiend in human shape will be cutting a hole in the paper and peeping."

Norah had a pretty good guess as to where the presents came from. But although she met Mr. Matteson nearly every day, hovering in the precincts of Rutherford Place, yet she instinctively avoided the subject, from motives of delicacy.

Their acquaintance did not seem to be ripening very fast into a warmer feeling, and she felt the comfort of having a sensible middle-aged man in whom to confide her grievances.

Mrs. Blessington had taken to her bed, the doctor said, never to leave it more, and Norah felt the timidity of youth where sickness and death are concerned.

"When Mrs. Blessington dies, what are you going to do?" said the man of few words one day in bleak March, when they were standing under a gas-lamp talking, with the wild, wet, storm-tossed sky above them, and the north wind tearing through the dirty little street.

Norah shook her head sadly. "I can always have a home with my mother if I want one."

Mr. Matteson looked up swiftly at the lovely face that had lost somewhat of its fresh bloom and gained so much beauty in the school of adversity. Norah "Talked to her of the waiting angels."—p. 752.

was balancing herself against the lamp-post, the wind playing wild tricks with her curly hair and waking the colour in her cheeks.

"Have a home with me," he said suddenly. "I love you, and want to marry you."

None of the passers-by guessed that there was anything pathetic in this odd little scene.

They only saw a staid City man holding on his top-hat with one hand, and grasping his umbrella with the other, and a girl, with all the light of laughter quenched in her eyes, looking away at the bar of sunset glow across the sky, struggling with the biggest temptation her simple life had known.

"I love you. I can give you every comfort that wealth can buy: a house in Park Lane, diamonds, horses, what you will," he was saying.

How beautiful it would be to drift into such a haven of rest, out of the sordid every-day world in which she dwelt, where she had to look at both sides of a halfpenny before spending it. But she was true to herself, to Dick, and to this man. She would not marry him without loving him.

"I am only a plain, stupid sort of fellow, but I love you."

"Mr. Matteson," said Norah, bringing her eyes to earth again with an effort, "I am so sorry, but I do not love you; and it would not be fair to you to marry you under those circumstances."

He accepted his dismissal as calmly as he had made his offer.

"I thought as much. Well, I will say good-evening. I think I shall go away for a bit. I suppose it is that Mr. Seddon. Well, I would not put too much faith in him. You know, subalterns have a love in every port," he said awkwardly.

"I thought that was sailors," said Norah, with a piteous smile.

"Perhaps it is, perhaps it is. I will say good-evening."

And he walked away with a bent look about his figure that added ten years to his age.

And Norah ran home, and up to her room, and cried till she could cry no more.

CHAPTER IV.

"HOLD me up a bit, so that I may see the light. It is growing so dark, Norah; and yet it seems so odd to me that the birds are singing so loudly," said Mrs. Blessington feebly.

She was dying: there could be no doubt about that; and Norah was alone with her, and the nurse and Theodora in the next room.

Norah slipped a strong young arm under her feeble head. The sharp features were blurred into something like softness, and the eyes had lost their keen hard look of suspicion. Death was softening the outline of that embittered life, and shaping the features to something like their old beauty, when Theodora Blessington had been wooed and won so falsely, and had lost her trust in human nature.

"I am dying, Norah, I know," she said calmly. "I don't think that I shall last the night out. We Blessingtons always die at the sunrise; and it is such a short while till daybreak. I made my will weeks ago, Norah Clarke. I wish I could make my peace with God as easily. But I want to tell you about it. Bend over me, for I am weak. I am a rich woman, Norah, and all the money I have in the world I have left to you, on condition that you bring up Theodora. If she marries, she must be wooed and won as a penniless girl. And on her wedding-day you must make over to her the half of my fortune; it is all written down plain in the will. I am doing this because I trust you, and I know that you will fulfil my dying wish. Live where you like, how you like. Only bring up Theodora to be a true good woman, and God will bless you, even as I do. Hush! do not speak about it; I have so little time left. Send for Theodora's father. I want to forgive him—before I die."

Norah, dumb with astonishment, went out, and despatched a messenger to Camden Hill; then went in again to the sick-room and sat by the bed, watching those restless hands pulling at the sheets; bending down every now and then to catch a wandering word.

"You have been very good to an old woman, Norah. God bless you!" said Mrs. Blessington at last, in a strong voice, as with almost miraculous strength she lifted her head from the pillow. "I can hear him in the street—his footstep—Edwin!" A light flashed over her face, transfiguring her, so that even in the pale candle-light Norah saw the dying flicker of the love that had never left her.

The door opened at that moment, and a tall bearded man entered the room with a hesitating step.

He must have been good-looking in his youth, but his face was weak and his eyes inclined to be shifty in their restlessness. But such as he was, he was the love of Mrs. Blessington's life, and Norah slipped out of the room.

As she closed the door behind her, she caught a fitful glimpse of the man on his knees at the dying woman's side, and her hand straying weakly across his bowed head.

Theodora did not know her father by sight, and her mother had died some months ago. So that Norah, going in to her, found her devoured with restless curiosity, which only softened into childlike gentleness when Norah took her on her knees and talked to her of the solemn mystery of death and of the waiting angels. The child had much improved under Norah's influence, and now, when the girl took her in her arms and put her to bed, Theodora begged her to sit by her with her hand in hers till she was asleep.

It was late in the evening when Norah was roused from her sad thoughts by the child's bed. The house was very silent; even the roar of London seemed to be muffled within those walls, when suddenly upon the still air rose a wild cry: "Theodora!" It rang through the house, startling Mary Jane in the kitchen, and making the child stir in her sleep. And when Norah rushed out upon the landing, she found the tall stranger there, shivering in every limb.

"She is dead! she is dead! and she knows now that I loved her!" he cried wildly.

Norah took him by the hand and led him into the sitting-room, where he gradually grew calmer. And still with that same composed look on his face, he rose and went away, muttering under his breath.

When Norah went into the quiet chamber of death, she saw Mrs. Blessington lying in her last sleep, her hands folded on her breast, an ineffable smile on her worn features. Perhaps she knew the truth now: that Edwin had loved her always, and that misunderstanding and pride alone had parted them. Human life holds many mysteries which shall be cleared up hereafter; but among them there will be no sadder record than this of two blighted lives.

When Mrs. Blessington's will was read, it was found that, save for a legacy of five thousand pounds left to her old lover, Norah had complete control of her fortune, subject to the conditions set down in the will. And as there were no kind relations to dispute it, Norah woke, a month later, in a Devonshire village, mistress of a pretty home and five thousand a year.

She had had few partings to go through before leaving London. Her mother had wept over her, and had implored her to take a house in Park Lane, which would enable her to see a little life; and her step-father had hinted that there were several deserving charities which would be the better for a little valuable support. But she had escaped from everyone now, and was settled in Prior's Haven Lodge, on the South Devon coast; a house which had come to her with the rest of Mrs. Blessington's fortune.

When she opened her eyes on the morning after her arrival, she found Theodora already dressed, dancing round her bed.

"Norah, darling Norah!" she cried; "come out! It is all green, and there are flowers growing beside the paths of the garden. And Wynter says that you will buy me a little pony, just like that one we used to see in the Park."

When the child knew that she might walk on the lawn and pick any flowers she liked, her delight knew no bounds. She had never seen the country before, and the mere sight of it had carried her out of herself, so that she clung to Norah in a burst of affection.

"All this lovely place for you and me to live in? Norah, I will never be naughty any more."

There were tears in her eyes which she dashed away, and Norah lay still, thinking, after all, there were depths in the child which she had never dreamed of before. And she prophesied to herself a happy future, in spite of all the sorrow that had come and gone. When she rose and drew aside the blind, the sun shot in with a stream of gold filtering through the green creepers round the old-fashioned window.

The lawn, smooth-shaven and green, lay below her, and beyond that a belt of trees, and the glitter-

When the gong summoned them down to breakfast, she found Theodora waiting for her in the long dining-room, examining with frantic astonishment the big Crown Derby bowl full of clotted cream, the pretty breakfast-service, and the dainty napery.

"Is it all true? will it last?" she said, looking back with a little shiver to the dull London house and to the pensioned Mary Jane, who had, on the strength of her £100, married her policeman, and set up a coffee-tavern.

"Yes, darling," said Norah, smiling through her tears. "It will last if we remember to thank God every day for all His goodness."

Prior's Haven was a quaint little village built on the side of a hill, and bowered with green.

It possessed a little society of its own, as Norah guessed by the look of the trim houses which lay on the slope below the Lodge. No doubt, later on, she would get to know everyone; at present she wanted nothing save to enjoy the exquisite peace of her new home.

That evening, when Theodora was in bed and the light was growing dim in the golden western sky, ing river rolling down to the sea. And up again, a long green slope of hill-land, undulating and swelling away into the dim hazy distance.

Behind the house rose the heather-clad hills, steep and precipitous, and over all the exquisite blue of the Devonshire sky and the crisp morning air, laden with perfumes from a myriad flowers.

It was like the Land of Promise. And Norah, with a low gasp, sank down on to her knees, and thanked God for His unutterable mercies to her.

"Norah, how do you come to be here?"—p. 754.

Norah slipped a white shawl over her black evening gown, and went out, down the shrubbery to the gate, where she stood looking out up the road, into the tree-shadows.

There was the quick footstep of some passer-by beating rhythmically up the white dusty way, and as it grew nearer, Norah lifted her head to see who was approaching her. In her strangely happy state, it did not seem strange to her that she recognised Dick Seddon. Only she fell back a little against the gate, and cried out, with a sob in her voice, "Mr. Seddon!"

The voice came to him across the sombre musing of his thoughts. He had not glanced in the direction of the black figure by the Lodge gate. But the voice filled him with a wild tremor of delight.

It was Norah: this slim figure with the exquisite whiteness of the rounded arms and neck, set off by the dead-black of her gown.

For one instant he was silent. The white glaring palace square, the hateful tragedy of that day, all the bitter disappointments of that past year, surged back upon him in a flood.

"Norah," he said breathlessly, "how do you come to be here?"

"This is my own house. I am rich now," she said, in a sobbing, tremulous voice, wondering, with growing dismay, why he did not snatch her in his arms.

Could he have forgotten her? Had some other girl in the last Malta season taken her place in his heart?

"And I! I am only the same poor subaltern that I was last May when we parted," he said bitterly. "Truly Fortune holds wonderful changes in its turning wheel. And so you are the rich Miss Clarke, of whom the whole village is talking? Well, if I may be allowed to offer my congratulations, please let me do so. But I think I must wish you good-night, for they will be expecting me at the rectory."

He was talking at random, scarcely knowing what he was saying.

How bitter it was to come home and find the girl he loved rich beyond all expectations!

He could not pour out the flowing words of his love now; for she was a wealthy woman, and he only the rector's son, with scarcely a penny besides his pay.

But Norah, with a woman's true discernment, guessed the agony that was shaking his heart.

She knew the honest loyalty of his love, and she loved him all the better for it.

She stole out from under the shadow of the great elm-trees, a slim figure in the dusky light, and laid her hand upon his arm.

"Dick," she said, between laughter and tears, "why do you not finish what you began to tell me in the guard-room, one long year ago? I love you, Dick, just the same. Have you lost your love for me?"

With a cry, that was torn from his very heart, Dick turned and caught her to him.

What need was there of protestation, when she was crying on his shoulder, and his lips were raining passionate kisses on the curls of her sunny hair?

They loved one another—they had never changed. That was the burden of their words as they paced up and down in the moonlight, learning over again the sweet lesson of love.

Everyone was delighted to hear of their engagement; and even Mr. Matteson expressed his sympathy in the dumb shape of a diamond bracelet.

Had he known the whole history of the interrupted proposal, he might have marvelled as much as Mrs. Smyth did at Norah's folly in throwing herself away upon a penniless subaltern in a marching regiment.

But as Norah, Dick, and Theodora were as happy as the day was long, it did not much matter what the world thought.

SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY; OR, THE SCIENCE OF THE SOUL.

BY THE REV. ARTHUR FINLAYSON, AUTHOR OF "EVANESCENT PHILOSOPHIES," "ETHICS OF ATHLETICS," ETC.

I.—ROMANCE OF SCIENCE.

YOUNG fellow had been very successful at an important grammar-school. He had won several scholarships, and this fact altered his prospects in life; for instead of entering his father's business, as was intended at a certain age, the youth was allowed to continue the studies in which he showed such diligence and proficiency. The course of his education took him from the shelter of his father's roof and the incentive of his father's Christian example. But the effect of parental piety remained upon the youth. He had now relinquished the classical side of his studies, and was devoting himself to natural science. And in the lecture-room and the laboratory he found that the study of physical science was gradually undermining the precious spiritual truths which he knew well his parents held so dear. Contact with certain teachers and college lecturers led him to view matters in a different light. The general tone adopted by some of the lecturers on physical science was not favourable to the truths of Christianity. The men who were so scientific when lecturing on their special field of investigation adopted an obliqueness of vision when referring incidentally to the truths of revelation, and thus by a species of mental hemiopia, or one-sidedness, they unconsciously became unscientific in their arbitrary assumptions, and in their dogmatic rejection of truths which belong to a different domain. Where older men err, it is not surprising that younger men follow, and fall into the same mistake. Thus it came about that this young man, when home for the vacation, and conversing with his father in a confidential manner, startled and pained his parents by the frank confession: "I am drifting hopelessly and helplessly into a position of practical atheism."

His good father, trained in a classical school, was not able to combat the theories of his son's scientific teachers; and as he did not claim to be a man of science, he naturally felt indisposed to venture an opinion on any of the theories of scientific men. But he was able to show that the facts of science are one thing and the theories suggested for their explanation quite another. The distinction is too often forgotten by men of science who glory in their scientific accuracy in their own domain, and yet discuss religious matters in a loose, inaccurate, and unscientific manner. It is precisely because so many who glory in their scientific accuracy are yet unscientific in their habit of confounding fact and theory, or in their calm assumption that their pet theory is a well-ascertained fact, that other thinking men are led to undervalue scientific investigations or think lightly of scientific facts. But that is also a mistake. In seeking to avoid Scylla, we must not make shipwreck on Charybdis. True science is the handmaid of revelation, rightly interpreted. He is wisest who uses both the world-book and the Word-book as companion volumes of the same work, and is able to say concerning them, "My Father wrote them both."

Now, there are many young men and young women in the present day who are liable to be carried away by the romance of science, or who are unconsciously drifting from the old moorings of their religious faith. In their enthusiasm for the new study, with its enchanted fields, they are apt to be carried away by the abracadabra of scientific conjuration, the mystic spell or charm, and magic key which is to open all locks and solve all difficulties. To such it is well to point a friendly warning against a treacherous undercurrent, which will carry them into waters beyond their depth, and leave them hapless wrecks on a barren and rugged shore. I want to stretch out a friendly hand to such young students, and to help them, if I can, to sail on smooth seas, or to mark out for them a safe anchorage when sailing in dangerous waters.

To attempt to answer special scientific difficulties in this paper would obviously be an impossible task. Such an effort, to be successful for general readers, would require volumes. The difficulties of one are not those of another; and we should by such a course only be raising difficulties in one direction, while attempting to set them aside in another. There is, happily, a more rapid and easy way: special difficulties, of course, require special treatment; but it is possible to lay down general principles which may be successfully applied in a large number of particular cases, and while the outcomings of certain principles may vary in different cases, yet the principles themselves remain the same and indisputable. The principles which I propose to lay down apply to all. The distinction between the general law or principle and the mode of applying that law to a particular case must not be forgotten by the general reader. Attention to these general principles, and care in the application of them, will, I believe, be helpful to very many in the battle of life, and in conflict with the sophistries of science falsely so called.

II.—LIMITATIONS OF SCIENCE.

1. Scientific investigation is conditioned by scientific limitations.—This is a principle too often forgotten by students of physical science. The laws of vital force or power are essentially different from those by which ordinary matter and its forces are governed. In the same way, the laws of spiritual force or Christian life (which is, at least, as undeniable as physical life) belong to a distinct sphere. The province of physics is one thing; the province of revelation is another. The latter deals with problems absolutely beyond the jurisdiction of physics or philosophy. The domain of physical or chemical forces is one thing; the domain of moral and spiritual forces is another. Physical science is one thing; psychical science is another.

2. Scientific men should beware of travelling beyond their own special domain.—Scientific experts are to be listened to with all possible respect in investigations of science; but beyond these limits every man of ordinary intelligence may form his own opinion as to the conclusions derived from the known facts, without presuming to call in question the ascertained results of scientific investigation. The tendency to recognise as facts only material or sensuous processes, and yet to frame really metaphysical theories outside the sphere of merely physical and material elements, and to dogmatise over the region of philosophical thought, is a fruitful source of error. It is a species of mental hemipia, or bias, to which students of science are much addicted. Put on blue spectacles, and all things assume a blue aspect; but the original condition of such things or their relation to other minds is in no wise affected thereby. "Let the man of science," said an eminent divine, "reign supreme within his own sphere, and let none but those trained in the same school and learned in the same craft venture to dispute with him as he gathers his facts and generalises his rules. But when all this is done and he proceeds to reason, then it is different. He steps out of his special department into a sphere open to all men alike. Tell me what your facts are, and if I sufficiently master them I am as competent to judge of the validity of the conclusions drawn from them as the man of science himself."

This is an intelligible principle. All argument rests on common principles, and when once the facts of the case are clearly ascertained, any man who is trained to reason correctly is competent to judge of them. For scientific men to ignore or forget this is not a pardonable error. "The first and greatest wrong," says Pere Didon, "committed by men of science is to mix up metaphysical doctrines with science, and cleverly invest the one with the authority of the other. Another fault of scientific men is, on the one hand, an almost total ignorance of the faith they attack; on the other, the misconception of the elements which constitute science." There is nothing unreasonable in the position taken up that scientific men, as such, are only to be considered as experts in their own special field.

Special knowledge in one direction does not imply special knowledge in another. It often precludes it. The scientist is conditioned by his limitations.

"It is admitted," says Dr. Hodge, "that it is the province of scientific men to discuss scientific questions, and that much injury to the cause of truth has followed the attempts of men not devoted to such pursuits undertaking to adjudicate in such cases. Physicists are wont to take high ground on this subject. Metaphysicians and theologians are not allowed to be heard on questions of science. The rule must work both ways: scientific men, devoted to the study of the sensuous, are not entitled to be dictatorial in what regards the super-sensuous. A man may be so devoted to the examination of what his senses reveal as to come to believe that the sensible alone is true and real." When, therefore, students find so-called scientists dictatorial and dogmatic on questions beyond their sphere, the principle here laid down should be carefully remembered, and applied with judgment.

Material science has no measure of moral truth. "The plummet of physical science is not the fitting instrument for discovering the Infinite Spirit; a higher organon is needed for this investigation. The universe they have sounded, broad and deep though it be, is, after all, but one sphere, and that the lowest, of the true universe as it may be known to man. Physical and physiological research can go far; it has gone so far of recent years that some Christians have felt half-afraid lest it should succeed at last in reducing the whole world of being under the empire of mechanical necessity. prove men to be magnetic mockeries—cunning casts in clay—and leave no room for religion. But all such fears are quite groundless. Science can go far, and the farther she can go the better; but she has found, and she has recognised, her limit. Beyond the molecular changes in the substance of the brain, further than the furthest point to which scientific processes, the scientific reason, even the scientific imagination, can go, is the hyperphysical fact of consciousness. And with regard to this, science admits that she knows nothing. Her far-reaching, deep-searching analysis fails here. Her most delicate instruments are too coarse to dissect a motive, or weigh a desire, or measure the force of a moral effort. She can only stand powerless before the inexplicable undeniable facts, and say: 'This knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high, I cannot attain unto it.' The limitations of science are clear and distinct. They are unmistakable. Yet this is the very rock on which so many scientists split. They venture out to sea with purely local charts; and it is small wonder, therefore, if the shore is strewn with wreckage of scientists' criticism—stranded because, from its very nature and in its method of operation, it was unscientific.

If you are a student of science, remember your limitations. You must not expect to see the whole range of truth by following scientific truth only in its physical relations. You have not a key which will open every lock, and to act as though you had will simply be to court disaster and prove yourself unscientific. "The learned sceptic," it has been said, "often deserves special consideration. He has explored, like Huxley, among natural laws till he loses sight of the Law-giver; he has dealt with sensuous things till he has lost sight of the super-sensuous, and has been unfortunate, perhaps, in the class of Christian teachers whom he has encountered. Or, like Buckle, he has plodded among the forces and uniformities of history till the chaos or coincidence of facts has hidden from him the guiding hand Divine. Or he has spent his life in elaborating the difficulties of religion and the objections to Christianity till his sight is confused. We respect his learning and acuteness; we pity his perplexity, and the more because the whole surrounding atmosphere of his life has been that of doubt and cavil." The lesson for you and me is to beware of imprisoning our minds in the fetters of purely material science. And in the world of spirit outside material science we must cultivate the spirit which will enable us to enter on its study with some prospect of success. A deaf man cannot be considered a judge of music. A blind man is no fit judge of scenery. To understand poetry, painting, the drama, you must possess and cultivate the poetic, the artistic, the dramatic instinct. In like manner, spiritual things are spiritually discerned. Science and philosophy have wrought wonderful changes in the world of thought; but they do not deal with the domain of the heart. Hence, while man exists religion is indestructible. When the soul, in face of the realities of life and the mystery of death, asks, "Wherewith shall I come before the Lord, and how shall I appear in His presence?" the Christian revelation alone is found to adapt itself to all the deeper needs of human nature. To recognise this is the soul's truest science. Brother, suffer the question, "Are you scientific?"

There is a weighty inspiration for you and me in the beautiful lines of Mr. I. Campbell Shairp, when he says—

"I have a life in Christ to live,
I have a death in Christ to die;
And must I wait till science give
All doubts a full reply?"

"Nay, rather while the sea of doubt
Is raging wildly round about,
Questioning of life, and death, and sin,
Let me but creep within Thy fold. O Christ! and at Thy feet
Take but the lowest seat,
And hear Thine awful voice repeat,
In gentlest accent, heavenly sweet—
'Come unto Me, and rest, Believe Me, and be blest!'"

Let us take the lesson to heart. In this truth there is inspiration, food for reflection throughout life, and strength for all time.

CHAPTER I.

PEGGY'S EXCURSION.

PEGGY sat in her little carriage like a princess, surveying the trees, the flowers, and the passers-by with a serenely ruminating gaze which many found very fascinating.

In all the achievements of her life, she carried with her that arresting charm in which beauty is only an accident. Peggy had both. But her beauty was not the first or chief attraction; you discovered it almost with surprise when you were already attracted.

It was cool and shady under the trees, and the few chairs here and there were occupied chiefly by elderly couples or maiden ladies, resting from the heat on their way home from marketing. All these Peggy had surveyed with that apparently cynical interest which so exercised her mother's speculation, charming them by her condescending smile, as, one by one, they got up and sauntered away to the suburban homes where early dinners were being prepared for them.

But there were still many habitués of that little park left, for whom no dinners were preparing, and in whom, whenever they approached near enough, Peggy's interest waxed keen. She had leant over the side of her carriage, and conversed affably in infant language with more than one ragged child of the surrounding slums, happy in its freedom amongst the trees and grass. She had received sticky sweets from one, a portion of bread-and-jam from another, in return for which she had bestowed her doll, and a woolly white lamb she much loved. She was just beginning to find her confinement in the carriage irksome, and to consider how she could climb out of it, when her attention was claimed by a boy. He came sidling towards her along the bottom line of railing which protected the grass, and his appearance immediately arrested her interest.

He had many charms. He was ragged, he was hatless, he was barefooted. And the gleam of his white teeth and sunshiny smile would have attracted any baby—therefore certainly Peggy, whose intelligence was uncommon and whose friendliness was great. Approaching her, he got down from the railing and beamed, his eyes and whole face sparkling.

After a moment's pause of solemn consideration, first of his white teeth, then of his bright eyes—unusually bright in their somewhat grubby setting—Peggy smiled back; and lifting her hand, shook it in the air, with a pretty little gesture of greeting.

Thereupon two grimy hands approached, the handle of the carriage and gave a tentative push; and Peggy, to her delight, felt herself moving. Things were no longer irksome, and she sat content.

"Go on," she commanded, as, alarmed at his own audacity, he paused to see how Peggy was regarding it, and to glance back at her presumed guardian, sitting preoccupied, still, and intent, on a chair hard by. But Belinda was in another world, too much engrossed to notice him, and Peggy apparently approved of his proceedings. So he went on.

The carriage moved very smoothly; it was delightfully easy to guide. In a quarter of an hour or so, Peggy had been the round of the park, had seen all the flowers and the children, and was being guided down a little retired street by her charioteer, whom she had already begun familiarly to address as "Boy."

They were a quaint pair. Probably if they had met a policeman, he would have stopped them, and so spoilt Peggy's adventure and saved much suffering; but "Boy" knew better than to draw attention to his doings by putting himself into the way of the police. He was quite aware that he was doing wrong—but he was acting in the kindness of his heart; as he believed, in the interest of Peggy. So he dodged, and twisted, and trundled Peggy's chariot along in high glee, his aim being a certain pond on a common where he was wont to play, and which he thought Peggy would like to see.

For the drawback of the park they had left behind was, that it contained no pond and too many palings. There were several ponds and no palings where "Boy" was going. Crab-fashion, down side streets and retired ways, they travelled, attracting some little attention from working-men going home to dinner, who were perhaps too hurried and too hungry to put any obstacles in the way of their progress. "Boy's" little bare feet pattered along the hot pavement, whilst Peggy's noiseless wheels carried her smoothly onwards.

The charm she exercised on everybody was working now on the boy who had carried her off. His bright face was crimson, and every nerve in his little body was strained to the uttermost, in his hurry to give Peggy the pleasure he himself delighted in.

At last they emerged from a little side street on to the common, and it did not take many minutes to convey Peggy to the side of the alluring pond.

It was a quiet time of day, and there were few people about. All the nursemaids and children had gone home to dinner; only the dinnerless ones without nursemaids, and with apparently no intention of attending to the surrounding school-bells, camped out or played about on the breezy common, and saw nothing unusual in the companionship of the boy and Peggy.

For a little time Peggy was satisfied to watch from her carriage the games of the children on the common and at the pond-side; but when some little boats were added to the attraction of mud-pies and stone-throwing, she could contain herself no longer.

"Git me down," she commanded. "Boy! git me down, please."

The boy hurried to her side, and Peggy's extended arms added emphasis to her entreaties. He recognised a master-spirit, and accepting his responsibilities, did his best. Peggy was landed on to the grass with no other casualty than a scraped nose and a crumpled frock.

She stood for a moment, a quaint little figure, her sun-bonnet tilted back, her little fat legs planted widely apart to steady herself, her unusually immaculate frock requiring a nurse's righting touches after its long imprisonment in the carriage and the boy's embracing arms. Her beautiful eyes delightedly contemplated the advancing fleet of boats which some daring spirits on the other side were propelling across the pond. Then she walked deliberately a few steps forward to meet it, planted her two feet into the water, and hugged up one of the little boats into her bosom.

"Me wants it," she announced, as a scream from the owner warned her of transgression. Turning hastily, Peggy trotted off. Carriage and boy were alike forgotten in the delight of this new possession; and apparently so was the boat by its owner, for after a few steps in pursuit of Peggy, he turned to guard the rest of his fleet from other more dangerous thieves.

Peggy trotted on with the aimless zigzag of a little child, hugging her prize and talking to it in a comforting manner.

"Peggy git to some water, little boat," she announced presently, stopping to hold it straight out before her, and to pat it promisingly with chubby palms. "Peggy tell Lin; Muvver let Peggy put you in bath."

Then she swerved aside on to the grass, and as she sat down, lifted up a cherubic face of innocence and beauty to a passer-by. She was such a picture, with her soft halo of bright hair, and beautiful eyes, that he paused and glanced down at this white-frocked baby—Peggy was little more—who held up to his admiration the clumsy little boat she was affectionately clasping.

"What is it, little one?" he asked, perplexed, adjusting his spectacles. "How come you to be alone, I wonder?"

He was a learned man, crossing the common on his way home to a late lunch, and his head was as full as it could be of great and wise thoughts. But to Peggy, all men were alike friends and playfellows; she was nothing daunted at a stranger, for in her short experience of life strangers soon became friends.

"Boat!" she remarked, with a perfectly fascinating smile, slipping her fingers into his as he bent down towards her, and signifying that she would accompany him on his way. So a great philosopher was the second person who assisted Peggy's unwitting elopement.

They sauntered on together, the philosopher adapting his long strides to the pitter-patter of the little feet. Presently these grew tired, and Peggy commanded "Carry Peggy!" and in this way the master presented himself to his wondering household, with a baby-girl in his arms, whose words and ways seemed to be tolerably familiar to him.

When the welcome sight of luncheon on the table presented itself to Peggy's eyes, she announced—

"I 'ae hungry!" and hastily divested herself of her bonnet.

The waiting housemaid lifted her on to a chair, and Peggy fixed solemn eyes on the philosopher.

"How will she eat it, Mary?" he asked perplexedly, regarding the fish before him.

Under Mary's directions, and with her help, a plate of fish was prepared, Peggy meanwhile watching the preparations and the philosopher with largely observant eyes.

"You ain't said your g'ace," she presently observed reproachfully.

"Eh! What does she say, Mary?" he asked, peering through his spectacles.

"She says you have forgotten grace, sir," amended Mary, as politely as possible.

The philosopher laid down his fork.

Memories of long-gone-by years, of a gentle mother whose tender face beamed above his, of a grave father watching a little child with earnest eyes, rushed through his brain, as he encountered the questioning orbs of the baby at his side.

With a curious look upon his face, he glanced up at Mary, as he racked his brain in vain for another memory, that of the "grace" he had been used to lisp when he had been a babe like this one.

Meanwhile, Peggy sat expectantly, patiently, with that strange expression on her face which caused her mother so much thought and speculation. She came to his help presently.

"Has you forgot?" she asked sympathetically, remembering her own occasional shortcomings.

He bowed his head in silent acquiescence, and Peggy's fat little fingers clasped themselves together above the table.

"S'all Peggy do it?" she inquired earnestly, in the manner of one bracing herself to a difficult task.

"Yes, Peggy, you do it," answered the relieved philosopher, and he clasped his hands also, as he had been wont to do sixty odd years before. And then, to his utter amazement, was sung out in the lisping baby accents—

"Benedictus benedicat."

The old man gazed at the child, and for a moment the thought crossed his mind: "Was this a young angel dropped from heaven, or only a human baby come to sojourn with him?"

The child returned his gaze as she lisped the sonorous syllables with a note of triumph; and then she sighed. She had done her duty, and her hands parted.

"Faver's g'ace," she remarked, with satisfaction; "Peggy don't like 'Thank God' any more now she's big, and Paul's borned."

Her host was regarding her with eyes whose dimness was not alone caused by age; and he resumed his fork with a sigh—was it of regret, was it of reverence, for this unapproachable innocence and sweetness? He ate his fish silently.

As for Peggy, she was a dainty little maiden, whose training had evidently been most careful. Mary's offers of help were dispensed with.

"No, thank you. Peggy knows how. Ain't you got a littler fork?" she asked dubiously, surveying the rather heavily chased one which was handed to her.

The philosopher observed silently the brave efforts of the little waxen fingers to close round their tool, and a bright idea struck him.

"Bring one of the little pickle-forks, Mary," he suggested.

Peggy's eyes shone with delight as she grasped it, and she daintily ate her dinner in a manner befitting the little princess she looked. After it was over, Peggy solemnly repeated the grace, getting rather mixed in her inflections, and then presented herself at the philosopher's side.

"Up!" she demanded. "Now tell Peggy a story."

Some memories of his own childhood led the old man to divine what Peggy's "up" meant, and as he took her on his knee she nestled into the sheltering arms, threw her head back, and fixed her eyes expectantly on his face.

"Tell Peggy a story," she reiterated.

The philosopher that evening was to deliver a learned address to a very learned society, and his head was full of his subject. Nevertheless, at this point, glimmerings came into his mind that someone must be wondering as to Peggy's whereabouts and safety. So he asked—

"Where do you live, little woman?"

Peggy pondered. Then she shook her head.

"Dunno," she announced slowly.

"With father and mother?" he asked.

Peggy solemnly nodded.

"And nurse, and Paul, and Lin," she added, summing up her belongings in a satisfied tone. "And Paul: he's ill, and muvver sits by him. Can't 'tend to Peggy," she added self-pityingly.

"And has Peggy run away, then? Where is mother?" the philosopher asked, faint regrets that he must give up this child who had come to him, passing through his mind.

"Out there," responded Peggy, waving her hand magnificently towards the outer world. "At home," she added explanatorily.

Mary, silently removing the luncheon, listened to this conversation, and here ventured to put in a word.

"Don't you think, sir, Thomas had better tell the common-keepers that the young lady's here, in case they should be asked about her?"

"By all means; certainly. Send him at once," said her master emphatically. "And, Mary," as she was hastening off, "you will take care of her whilst I am away, and don't give her up to anyone—you understand? Mind they are the right people. Is my portmanteau packed?"

"Yes, sir."

Peggy's hand was straying over the philosopher's beard, and she now drew back his attention to herself by a gentle pull, saying plaintively—

"Ain't you got a story nowheres in your head? It's got no hair on—like faver's—where the stories be. Ain't you?"

What the philosopher's answer was I have not space to tell. The story he unfolded to the listening child was a grand and universal one: couched in beautiful words, yet adapted to the peculiarly sympathetic intelligence of his listener. Peggy, enthralled, rehearsed it afterwards with much dramatic effect to her parents and other audiences, applying it in many ways which its author never dreamed of. At its close—

"I yikes you," Peggy remarked considerably. "Sould Peggy kiss you?"

The old man looked at the flower-face lifted to his: the beautiful grey eyes, where lingered the wondering expression his story had called there: the rosebud mouth, quivering with sensitiveness and sympathy, and with the gratitude of the baby heart: the tumbled soft hair—the fairness, the softness, the perfectness of a perfect child.

His eyes shone behind his spectacles. He bent his face, and Peggy, with parted lips, solemnly planted in the middle of his grey moustache a soft little caress. It was her notion of payment for his story. She was accustomed to being importuned for kisses she did not care to give; but for her father and the philosopher her kisses were volunteered.

"You feel like faver," she remarked, with a satisfied content, as she nestled closer; "Peggy's tired."

The old man sat still in perplexed thought as to what his duty was in respect to this "faver," whilst Peggy's eyelids softly drooped; and soon she lay, a beautiful picture of sleeping babyhood, within the philosopher's arms.

CHAPTER II.

BELINDA.

BELINDA's eyes travelled rapidly down the column of closely printed novelette she was reading, till "The End" was reached, amid a climax of horrors. Then, with a gasp, she recollected herself, and lifted her eyes.

All the chairs around were empty; the little park was quiet in its mid-day rest; even the slum children were lying on the grass under the trees, still and tired.

Belinda sprang up.

"Peggy!" she exclaimed, with a thrill of horror and dismay such as no fictional episodes had induced. "Oh, Peggy!"

Belinda clasped her hands and looked round. There was sunshiny blankness where Peggy's carriage had stood. Belinda started off, and ran swiftly up and down, and round and across all the park, treading—had she but known it—in the very marks of Peggy's carriage-wheels, which had been propelled along much the same course. Gasping, frightened, breathless, she stopped at last before a stern park-keeper, and blurted out her story.

"A baby in a pram! And you've lost her!" he repeated incredulously. "Ridiculous! she couldn't have wheeled herself away!"

"She 'ave, she 'ave indeed!" asseverated Belinda,

"What is it, little one?"—p. 750.

the tears coming in a passion-flood. "Peggy ain't like other little gels—she's so clever! Oh! missus, missus! whatever shall I do? And the baby ill, too—else I shouldn't a-been trusted. Nurse will kill me!" she finished agonisedly to the keeper, with the air of one whose doom, from which was no rescue, was pronounced.

"Sarve you right too," said the pitiless man. "What have you been doing? Not attending to your work!"

Belinda gave a despairing gesture.

"Blame my mother!" she exclaimed dramatically. "It's this name of mine. But never again! I'll never buy another ha'porth, if only Peggy will come back."

"Ha'porth!" repeated the man. "Do you mean to say, you bad girl, you've been drinking?"

"Drinking? me!" said Belinda angrily. "Me!" she reiterated more fiercely. "You're a bad man to say such a thing of a 'spectable gel."

"Then what have you been doing? Any way, you've lost your baby."

"Oh, Peggy!" wailed Belinda, breaking into fresh tears: "the darlingest, lovingest little ducky you ever saw. Oh! what shall I do?"

"You'd better come along to the police," said the man, moved to pity by Belinda's streaming eyes. "If anyone can tell you, they can."

And in a minute Belinda was anew relating her grief to the big policeman on the beat near.

"A little girl—about three—in a white frock and bonnet, in a pram," sobbed out Belinda, in answer to the man's queries. "Answers to the name of Peggy. I did just what nurse told me, and came down the pavement straight, nor turned to the right nor to the left," she related, in a manner insensibly induced by the literature she had been reading: "except once. I will tell the truth—the whole truth. I saw some story-books with big names stuck up on a board hanging outside a shop door, and I thought how nice to sit under the trees and read 'The Loves of the Lady Ermine,' and I bought a ha'porth. And we sat under the trees, and Peggy—bless her little heart!—was as happy as a queen, with her doll and her lamb, a-prattling away to herself. And she's gone! She ain't nowhere! Oh! what shall I do?"

Belinda again subsided into tears and sobs.

"Where do you live?" asked the policeman sternly.

"I live in Black Street, with the Reverend Mr. Cardyne, and Peggy's his little girl. Everyone knows him," she added proudly. "And I shouldn't have been trusted with Peggy, only the little baby's ill, and nurse and missus too busy to 'tend to her. And I promised nurse solemn to go straight along the pavement into the park under the trees, and back again, and not let Peggy out of her pram. For nurse says: 'There's no knowin' what she'll do if she gets loose.' And now I daren't go back, and break missus' heart. It's nigh broken already, with baby ill. And Peggy! They think such a lot of Peggy. She's like a princess, only prettier, and cleverer, and knowinger. You never saw such a knowing little gel!"

Belinda stopped at last.

"Now you listen to me," said the policeman bluntly. "You just go straight back as quick as you can, and slip into the house and find your master—not your mistress, mind—and tell him what you've told me. And listen! don't you hide a word of your own carelessness, but tell the truth. And if you're sent out of the house without a character, it'll serve you right, in my opinion."

Belinda listened, and sped away along the pavement like an arrow from a bow, looking neither to the right nor to the left, until she reached the street where Mr. Cardyne lived.

There was no need to slip into the house, for both Mr. Cardyne and nurse were watching for her. The sight of her master's face, more than the nurse's agitation and horror when she gasped out, "Peggy's lost!"—the only words she had breath for—were too much for Belinda, and she sank on to her knees with uplifted hands on the doorstep.

"Tell Mrs. Cardyne when she asks, nurse, that I have gone to Peggy," Mr. Cardyne only stopped to say quietly; and he walked hastily away, whilst nurse relieved her feelings by drawing Belinda into the dining-room, and giving her an uncompromising scolding. Then she went up to the top of the house, where, in a quiet darkened room, sat Esther Cardyne by the side of her sick little son. For some hours the news of Peggy's loss was kept from her.

Then when, after the doctor's reassuring visit, and the long quiet restorative sleep of the ailing infant, Esther rose at last and went, tired but hopeful, to her room, she found her husband there awaiting her.

"Much better," she said, smiling into his anxious eyes. "He will be well in a day or two. It has been so still all the afternoon, and he has slept beautifully. What has made our Peggy so quiet? Has she been with you?"

And then he told her.

Poor Esther! Poor mother! After her first despairing cry, she sat quite still, listening to what her husband had to tell her: how all their search in the park and its neighbourhood had been unavailing: how warnings had been given at the police-station, and how already there were big notices out, headed "Missing!"

"The police theory is, that whilst Belinda was reading, Peggy was stolen, as the carriage was found deserted in a little street, at least two miles away."

"Oh, my Peggy! my Peggy!" wailed the mother. "What else have you done?" she asked presently, watching the hurried unsteady steps travelling up and down, up and down.

"Offered a large reward. The notices are already up all over the place for any information."

And so, whilst Peggy, after careful tendance by loving hands, was peacefully sleeping in the philosopher's secluded home, and whilst the philosopher himself was lecturing in a big town many miles away, little dreaming of the misery Peggy's loss was causing, her father and mother spoke hopeful words to each other, whilst their hearts ached with pain and fear. They took many an unavailing journey together, as the night wore on, and little shreds of information reached them.

As the dawn drew near, the husband and wife went up on to the flat roof of their house. It seemed easier to hope, and to bear the terrible suspense, out-of-doors.

"We must hear in a few hours now, Esther," Mr. Cardyne said, as they watched the cold pale grey in the eastern sky, suffuse and change into glorious rosy hues.

And soon came a message which took them to Hampstead, to find a bonny little girl who declared expression now over the baby on her lap, and then ran from the room, shaking with sobs.

"I've killed her!" she repeated over and over again. "Oh, Peggy ducky, come back!" she implored, glancing wildly round at the familiar chairs and tables, which were full of reminiscences to Belinda of Peggy's pervading presence.

"'Wot are yer cryin' for?'"—p. 764.

her name to be Peggy, but who was not in the least like their Peggy.

Mr. Cardyne bought some papers and showed Esther his notices in them, and drew her attention to the big rewards posted up here and there as they again drew near home. They found quite a roomful of lost children awaiting them, at whom and at whose guardians, Belinda indignantly glared; but still no news of Peggy.

There was good news, however, of little Paul, who was able to smile and crow with delight, and clutch at his father's beard, as Esther took him into her longing arms.

Belinda's grief was painful. She just glanced at her mistress's white face, bent with an ineffable

Esther had not trusted herself to speak to the girl, fearing her grief might make her unjust; but her silence and averted looks were a far worse punishment than any words, however hard, would have been.

As the morning wore on, Belinda shrank aside, and stole away out of Esther's presence, and finally begged nurse so hard to be allowed to go to the park and look about, that nurse consented.

There she sought out the chair on which, the morning before, she had been sitting reading, with such unlucky intentness, the vicissitudes and woes of the Lady Ermine. She sat down again and glanced around, with a vague hope in her mind that as Peggy had disappeared, so she would return. Anything more miserable and haggard than poor Belinda's appearance could not well be conceived. Her hat was awry, her hair dishevelled, her eyes and nose swollen with crying, her face smeared. For, as she had walked along, recollections of Peggy's sayings the previous morning on the same route, returned freshly to her memory. She burst anew into sobs, and tears—that began by being clean, but which, when mixed with the stain of her cheap kid gloves, left anything but a clean mark on her countenance—streamed from her eyes.

Whilst thus engaged, she suddenly felt a touch upon her knee, and, looking hastily from behind her wet pocket-handkerchief, she beheld—not Peggy—but a bright-eyed ragged boy, whose black fingers rested on her clean print gown.

Belinda was a kind girl, but grief and disappointment made her cross. She gave her knee an angry jerk to dislodge the fingers, and turning a sulky shoulder to the boy, again buried her face.

There was a moment's silence. Then the fingers made themselves more insistently felt, and Belinda heard—

"Ain't you got your baby to-day?"

"Oh! oh!" sobbed Belinda at the cruel reminder.

Then, a sudden thought darting across her mind, she seized hold of the grimy hand, and, fixing the boy with severe eyes, she demanded—

"What do you know about my baby? Have you took her? Where is she?"

Belinda spoke imperiously, remembering the numerous stories of lost heirs she had read about.

"Dunno," he answered stolidly, contemplating with pity Belinda's swollen face—"Wot are yer cryin' for?"

"You're a bad boy!" Belinda returned ungratefully, suspiciously returning his glance. "I believe you've got my baby hidden away somewhere. What 'ave you done with her?" she insisted.

"Ain't doned nothin'," he returned sturdily. "She doned it herself."

A cry of joy broke from Belinda.

"Tell me," she said, giving him a shake, "what she done!"

Then hastily fumbling in her pocket, she drew out a little leather purse, and after withdrawing a shilling for a purpose which flashed across her brain, and putting it for safety between her teeth, she signified to the amazed boy that the remainder of the contents should be his, if he would restore her baby.

Absolutely bewildered by the story which he thenceforth poured into her ears, Belinda's one thought was to keep the boy with her. She found a post-office near by, and sent off a telegram to Mr. Cardyne, which ran thus:—

"Sir, a clu from a ragged boy name of Sparks on Clapham; keeping him in toe, BELINDA."

It had originally been longer, but as Belinda found that her money would not run to so much, she had curtailed it. She was quite satisfied in her belief that Mr. Cardyne's cleverness would enable him to guess all she omitted. She had wrangled a little over the spelling of "clu" and "toe"; and had finally demanded, with a superior air, of the young lady telegraphist who was obliging her—

"Does you or me, Miss, know best what I want to say? The gentleman won't be stumped by no spelling; you may make yourself quite easy! An' it ain't as if he don't know my writin'."

She finished triumphantly and marched away with Sparks in "toe"—a smile of scorn, which fortunately she did not see, illumining the features of the young lady she had left.

She travelled with her guide along the devious route he had taken the preceding day, arguing thus with herself:—

"I lost her. I must find her. If I try to make this imp go to Black Street, he'll run away. I knows 'em. The sight of master would just frighten him out of his wits."

And in course of time Belinda arrived on the common whence Peggy had disappeared twenty-four hours before.

MY LITTLE PARADISE.

HAVE a garden that I call Paradeisos—my paradise—which, in the original, signifies a garden. Its shape is peculiar in the ornamental portion, where the flowers flourish and the buds blossom, bursting the winter clothes that God had given to protect them from frost, and snow, and the north-east wind, and preserve their lives for the resurrection of the spring.

This garden is long and narrow, varying in width from about five yards near the house, then gradually narrowing to about four feet, and again widening out to about ten yards at the extreme end, where the Jerusalem artichokes grow and the boys pull down the palings, notwithstanding the awful notice in large letters—"BEWARE THE MASTODON!"

A footpath winds gracefully from one end to the other, having on its left a murmuring brook, with here and there a diminutive cascade. Sloping down to the brook is a steep bank, adorned with many wild plants. Where the bank ceases and the path narrows it is shaded by luxuriant trees—maple, hawthorn, willow, etc.—which, being on the south side, form a pleasant shady walk on a hot summer's day. At one spot, overhanging the brook, is a leafy old bush that has been trained so as to form a bower, sufficient to seat two persons if cushions be placed on the old stump. Here occasionally I sit of an afternoon, "puffing off my cares" or reading, or meditating, seeing everywhere, myself unseen. On the farther side of the brook stands a lofty hawthorn-tree, that in May hangs out its snowy banner of sweet-scented flowers (turning red when withering), regaling both sight and smell, and the ear also, when the sparrows, robins, and tomtits are singing and twittering among its leafy boughs. At the narrowest part of the path the bank sinks perpendicularly—a sheer precipice—down to the water, where sticklebacks, shrimps, whirligig beetles, boatmen, and other creatures disport themselves.

Let me remark here that the site of this garden was originally a road-side bank, covered with briars and brambles, and has been transformed into its present condition by my own hands and some help from others during the few years I have been here, affording me the greatest pleasure in watching its gradual growth and improvement. On entering this garden from the house, you will see on your left a luxuriant vine that sixteen years ago was a little slip on a tree in the garden of Lord Mansfield, near Highgate, one of the most beautiful and historic villages on the northern heights of London. This vine has never grown a single grape. On your right, against a wall with a southern aspect, are two pear-trees, from among the leaves of which peep out the lovely flowers of the major convolvulus, and tropæolum in the autumn. On either hand as you advance are flower-borders, on which may be seen fresh floral beauties through all the changing seasons of the year, beginning with snowdrops, yellow aconite and crocus, and ending with chrysanthemums of various colours, until the cruel hand of winter lays the ground completely bare, except where the hellebore or the Russian violet hails the Christmas morn with its incense of perfume.

Here is a little path down to the brook, with a bridge over a cascade. In the water grow the forget-me-not from my native place in Gloucestershire, the bog-bean, "that lily which a sunbeam or a rosebud leans upon," besides watercress—good for food—the osmunda, royal fern from Breconshire, and the rare marsh-fern from Sussex, etc. The bank here is covered with lilies-of-the-valley from Holly Hill, and a fine sweetbriar from Paddlesworth perfumes the air, especially after a shower, and its fruit gives food to the birds in winter. Ferns cluster around the trunk of a willow, whose friendly arms support the "twisted eglantine" and the evergreen ivy, whose flowers are the hunting-grounds—the one of the gaudy butterfly, the other of the sober-clad night-moth.

Now we arrive at another cascade that all day long and throughout the night sends up its murmur of praise, or seems to be chattering to the water-nymphs, while over it wave the pliant branches and graceful foliage of the willows that were little slips two years ago, and are now good-sized trees, hiding the ugly reservoir that is used to flush the town drains. Wild flowers cover the ground—hellebore in the winter, violets, primroses, etc., in the spring, followed by alyssum and rock cistus later on—just as you may see them on the banks of a rustic lane. Further on, currant, gooseberry, and raspberry bushes give promise of jams and jellies in the winter, and luscious tarts in the summer, while strawberries make the mouth water with the thoughts of strawberries and cream at our afternoon tea.

We now retrace our steps and cross the bridge over the cascade, which, though not so grand as the Miners' Bridge or Swallow Falls at Bettws-y-coed, is certainly much safer. Immediately a wider prospect stretches out before our vision, a larger garden well supplied with fruit-trees, strawberries, and vegetables, the gift of two kind friends. But we will turn aside to the little greenhouse—another present—which is filled with ferns from various parts of the country. Kent and Sussex, Hereford and Gloucestershire, North and South Wales have given up their treasures to the exertions of myself and friends. A few ornamental plants are here, but ferns are my chief hobby.

We will now take a peep at the rockery in yon far corner, all overgrown with native plants. This beautiful blue sage came from Cobham Park—one of the few localities in which it is found. Here is the maiden pink, another rare plant, and hard by is an erodium (stork's bill) from Hastings Castle. It is nearly allied to the geranium (crane's bill). The little horseshoe vetch is creeping over the stones, and derives its name from the shape of its head of flowers. Stonecrops of several sorts, saxifrage from the mountains of Breconshire, a little snapdragon ("mother of thousands"), creeping-jenny, beloved of cockneys, with oak and other ferns, besides other rock plants that adorn this little corner. The borage, beloved of bees and useful as a flavouring, grows here plentifully.

The privet hedge by the public road was planted by me thirteen years ago in little slips. It is now grown a thick fence, five feet high, and bears plenty of white spire-like flowers, and its black berries afford fruit to the birds, of which many visit my garden. Two robins, doubtless married, and certainly most respectable, claim it as their dominion, and allow no intruders. They fly about the bushes or come to the back door for crumbs, etc., that my benevolent housekeeper throws out for them. In return for her kindness, they sing their little songs nearly all the year round, and pick up slugs. No unfeeling boys are allowed to disturb their domestic bliss, though I fear my tom-cat sometimes frightens them; but they are quickly high up the trees, out of her reach. (A tom-cat is the only she in Norfolk.) The water-vole used to frequent the brook, and I have often watched him sit and nibble the weeds of an evening. I fear his ugly cousin, the grey rat, has exterminated him. However, Nemesis, in the shape of my cat, pursues the murderer day and night, sitting and watching patiently on the bridge, till she sees the grey rascal come out of his hole, then down she pounces on him—one shrill squeak, and all is over.

Of frogs and toads there are plenty in the garden and brook. The latter are useful in destroying malicious insects that creep into the buds of flowers by night, like ghouls. The former are allowed to disport themselves on land and water for their beauty! Some say that toads and frogs, and all destructive or noisome animals and vegetables, rose out of hell. On this point I am unable to come to a positive conclusion, having no data to go upon, but I do know that many of them existed on this earth long before man made his appearance. The worst enemies of this sort that thrive in my garden are the snails and slugs, which are sure to devour the choicest of my flowers, especially the more delicate ferns. They will eat the leaves of many poisonous plants, such as the foxglove, henbane, and belladonna, which I cultivate as botanical curiosities, and these do them no injury. Many of the snails have prettily marked shells. I have noticed four varieties: viz., the large helix and two smaller ones with coloured stripes or unmarked pink shells, and a very small white with black stripes, which come out in such numbers after a shower of rain that the rustics have thought it had rained snails: which is not true—though, according to popular language, it does “rain cats and dogs” sometimes.

I am often delighted to see the busy bee from my neighbours' hives come to regale herself on the flowers of my garden, and I observe that she is not so fond of variety as some giddy girls of my acquaintance, but sticks to one and the same species until she has visited all the individuals, and then flies away to her hive, or, perhaps, to flowers of the same species in another garden: I know not, for her flight is too swift and straight for me to keep up with her, and often too far—much too far—for my slow limbs to follow. Bee-keepers have powdered their bees at the hive and afterwards found them miles away hard at work, and yet they return home before sunset. Wonderful instinct! or, perhaps, some special sense that can thus direct their flight across miles of the country back to their home and their companions. If there are several hives close together, each bee will go to her own hive, where they will not allow a stranger to enter. But, if you want to know more about bees and ants, read Sir John Lubbock's book on the subject.

Writing of ants reminds me that I have had several nests of the small red ants, and have often observed their interesting proceedings; but they are a pest in a flower-garden. They do not generally come out till the middle of summer, when they begin to be very busy at home in the morning, like respectable domestic people, and go abroad foraging in the afternoon. Some flowers, as the goat's-beard, close about mid-day to keep out these intruders, as their smooth bodies gather no pollen, and they would eat the petals. Various plants have various methods of defending themselves against these mischievous busybodies. The common spurge secretes a milky juice, and when the ant walks on the leaf her sharp claws penetrate the epidermis, and the juice exudes, becoming thick and gluey on exposure, and so clogs the poor ant, who stumbles on, getting more and more clogged till she falls down exhausted, or tumbles off the leaf and dies miserably. Others, as the vetch, exude a sweet juice at the joints of their leaves, where the ants stop to enjoy the sweets and forget all about the flowers.

There is a tree in Central America—a sort of acacia—which has thorns, and at the roots of these are little dens or caves exuding a sweet juice, affording a nice domicile to the ants in their ascent of this, their Mont Blanc. Here they congregate in numbers, enjoying themselves, and warding off all creeping things that would injure the flowers. So this tree keeps a standing army to protect itself, and rewards them with board and lodging. Wonderful provision of Nature!

Of spiders I have several species, which I encourage, as they destroy those grub-bearing flies whose progeny would devour my choice plants. The most glorious of these creatures (which are not insects, and have no heads, only a thorax) is the geometric spider, who spins a beautiful circular web, with many concentric circles and radii innumerable. This lovely fly-trap, glorious in the autumn when covered with dew-drops, he hangs out between two or more plants by means of strong ropes. He sits in the very centre of his net, where he can feel the slightest tremor and distinguish the direction and distance of the unwary intruder, whom he poisons with his deadly bite, and wraps around him a shroud of web till his dinner- or supper-time.

In the autumn the gossamer visits me and lays his lines across my path, so that my nose or mouth is caught in them as I walk along. He is a very little fellow, and is borne up in the air by his ropes and blown about by the wind till he comes to an object on which he fixes his web, and starts off for another aerial sail. I have also occasionally seen the wall-spider, who builds no domicile, but lives in holes and crevices of the wall, and suddenly jumps on his victim, whom he speedily devours. There are several indoor spiders, the plagues of the tidy housewife. One of them is very large and very disgusting. The harvest spider has a very small round body and very long legs, and if he loses one or more of them he takes no notice of the loss. Whether they grow again I know not. The spider that has his hole in the ground with a filmy trap-door I have not seen here. As soon as he hears a fly he peeps out of his hole, quickly snatches him up, and shuts the trap-door on him.

should be older and wiser, he watches from a distance, and if he sees the angry scowl, away he goes for his life. So he travels along till he finds a young lady spider who smiles upon him.

There are blights of various kinds, called Aphides.

THE ONLY "SHE" IN NORFOLK.

THE LOVES OF THE SPIDERS !

Yes, fair readers, spiders, like froggy, do go a-wooing at the proper season. The gentleman, having dressed himself in his gaudiest attire, goes forth like Cœlebs in search of a wife. He peeps into the nests as he passes, and if he sees a handsome lady sitting at her door, he cautiously, at a respectful distance, watches her countenance; then, if young and inexperienced, he goes a little nearer, to see if her look is favourable—one step more, and he sees an angry countenance: he turns to flee, but is too late. She dashes out like a flash of lightning, seizes and devours him. If he

These go through several generations of quite different forms, till they return to the original one. The worst of these intruders on my premises is the Dolphin, that covers my broad-beans with black masses of them, and destroys the fruit.

Last, but not least, of the dwellers in my Paradise is my little black dog, who answers to the euphonious name of Jack. He loves to lie on the path enjoying the sunshine, or "rapt in cynic meditation fancy free." At night he will hunt the cats that dare to prowl about in the darkness, seeking rest and finding none. At other times he will range about half the night with some canine male friend—of whom he has a number—occasionally deserting the old for a new one. These dogs become greatly attached to him, and one from a considerable distance remained all night outside the door waiting for him.

There are in my garden many other objects of interest, and I find in them an endless enjoyment, never tiring in the study of God's works within the narrow confines of my Paradise. Everywhere and in everything I see evidence that, notwithstanding some doubts and difficulties, all this beautiful arrangement of vegetable and animal life has been brought into existence by Infinite Wisdom and Infinite Love. ## "ALL SOULS ARE MINE."

BY THE REV. DANIEL MOORE, M.A., PREBENDARY OF ST. PAUL'S, CHAPLAIN TO THE QUEEN, AND VICAR OF HOLY TRINITY, PADDINGTON.

"Behold, all souls are Mine."—EZEKIEL xviii. 4.

MINE, as the Infinite Proprietor : Mine, as the Infinite Creator : Mine, as the Infinite Benefactor and Preserver of them all : Mine, as the Maker of all things and the Judge of all men. This is the standing lesson of all revelation. A sense of dependence is the first conscious idea of all created intelligences. We feel we are not our own to live, not our own to choose, not our own to act, not our own to die. We are the property and belonging of "ONE," of whom, and through whom, and to whom are all things. And the universal Lord is the universal Parent also. All revelation and all reason, all consolation and all hope, are comprehended in those first words of the Lord's Prayer, "Our Father, which art in heaven."

But the text forces upon our notice one special glory of this Divine proprietorship. To be told that "in Him we live, and move, and have our being" is not enough. This might not of necessity include more than a promise of things which pertain to the present life—the air we breathe, the food we eat, or the raiment we put on. But man has higher interests than these to think of—interests, too, which are constantly endangered, and which, therefore, stand in need of watchful protection and continual help. Who will take charge of these—the living soul, the kindled spark of immortality, the inbreathing of the Divine Spirit which came upon us as soon as we were born? In whose Almighty care and keeping should this Divine thing be? Perish, it never can; and yet live, by any power or might of its own, it never will. God alone can take care of it while it lives, or when on earth it can live no more. "Behold, all souls are Mine."

I. The first thought suggested by these words, as emphasising the Divine proprietorship in all humanity, is that if there be one part in our human organisation in which, more than in any other, the Author of our being claims to have a special and peculiar ownership, it is man's Soul. "All souls are Mine." We know the words might have run—"All things that pertain to the human creature are Mine: the body, with its capabilities of active service; the mind, with its varied powers of intelligence; the judgment and the will, with all their faculties of moral choice and determination. All these are Mine"; and for the right employment and use of them each one must give account. But these parts of a man, though properly belonging to God, as much as souls belong to Him, are derived to their possessors through human and physical channels, which are natural, and physical, and strictly human. Earth of earth, ashes of ashes, very dust of very dust, brains the powerfulest, and hands the skilfullest: all these are made for naught. They must soon return to the condition from which they sprang. "The dust shall return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it."

Yes, says the high and mighty One, All souls are Mine—Mine as nothing else, of or belonging to man, is Mine. In regard of their source of being, we must always be careful to distinguish the Divine and immortal part of this human workmanship of ours, from our physical and intellectual faculties. To suppose that "souls" can be transmitted from parents to children, in the same way as bodies are transmitted, were a libel upon the Divine creation. When the infusion of a Divine element into our spiritual nature takes place, or how it takes place, we know not. All that Scripture leads us to conclude is that the formation of the human soul is a separate and distinct act of God, in the case of every one who is born into the world. The father of our flesh is not the Father of our spirit. That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and nothing else. The supplemented or superadded life that is breathed into it, the Divine resemblance which is imparted to it, the seed of immortality that is formed in it, comes of a distinct and repeated putting forth of creative power, whereby each child of Adam becomes a living soul. And, being fashioned in this Divine mint, the soul thenceforth becomes, for all the purposes of moral existence, indestructible. Do any, looking upon one of the children of men, ask, "Whose is this image and superscription?" A voice from the excellent glory makes answer, "Behold, all souls are Mine."

II. "All souls are Mine"—Mine, that they may be for My glory: Mine, that I may get honour out of them: Mine, that man, whether created in innocency or redeemed from death, may be a praise for Me in the earth. "This people have I formed for myself," says the prophet; "they shall show forth my praise." Man was a praise to God at his creation. The very angels in heaven were proud of him, inasmuch that "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy." Man, as he was first made, would be a praise among the angels for his innocence, his purity, his faultless perfectness. The transcript of the Divine likeness was complete. Not a breath of taint or evil was permitted to mingle with the inspirations of the Almighty. Man himself might fall—to all human seeming, fall irretrievably. But God had a property in the ruin. Every atom into which the Divine image was shivered, contained life in it, had divinity in it, had the germ of eternal redemption in it. Hence, in Scripture, creation and redemption are set forth as the one simultaneous act of the one Infinite mind. The one did not follow upon the other; the one was implied and included in the other. "But now, thus saith the Lord, that created thee, O Jacob, and He that formed thee, O Israel, fear not: for I have redeemed thee. I have called thee by thy name. Thou art Mine. This people have I formed for Myself." It manifestly adds to the glory of God to have made man so that he could be redeemed—aye, to have made such provision in the economy of grace that Adam, in his estate of innocence, should not be worthy to be compared with the lowest of the redeemed saints in glory—being formed into a new creation, renewed as the sons of God. It is of redeemed souls especially, therefore, that God declares, "All souls are Mine." God loves the work of His own hands. This is the great security for our salvation. We are His property. His name is written upon our foreheads; and our name is written in His Book of Life. We are accounted of, among the glorified spirits of the world above, as creatures formed for His praise. Hence the mission of His dear Son. Hence all His exceeding great and precious promises. Hence the coming of the Holy Ghost, accompanying with His quickening power the instrumentality of the word and sacraments, that the world might be convinced of sin, and all men be drawn to the cross. Yes, brethren, glad as we are, when looking above us and around us, to acknowledge that "the heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth His handy-work," we should remember that the work of redemption shows forth that glory even more.

"'T was great to make a world; 't was greater to redeem."

In the triumphs of His dear Son, in the victories of grace over our fallen nature, in the recovery of the rebellious to their lost allegiance and to their lost home, new lustre is shed on the all-glorious Name. Oh yes! it is in the history of man created, man fallen, man redeemed, man glorified, we get to see something of the priceless worth of man's soul: see at what infinite pains and cost God has ever taken care of it: see in what sense it is true, and why it is true, that God has caused the proclamation to be made throughout all worlds: "Behold, all souls are Mine."

III. "All souls are Mine." Yes, and all that belongs to souls: their well-being, their well-doing, their well-keeping, whether for life or for death. "My times are in Thy hands," said the Psalmist; all my times: my sorrowing times, my joyous times, my times of labour and struggle, and my times of rewardful rest, when I shall have accomplished as a hireling my day. And we are no judges of the fitnesses of these times. To labour or to rest, to live or to die, there is a time to every purpose of God under heaven. And everything is beautiful in that time, because it is His time. We find it hard to think so sometimes. We see the pious father or mother taken away just as their children had need of them to train their souls for heaven; or men of great gifts of statesmanship removed, just when their country had most need of their wise and judicious counsels; or faithful ministers of the Gospel called to their rest when the Church stood most in need of them. But when thus thinking about family needs, and the nation's needs, and the Church's needs, what thought are we giving to a more imperative need than any of these? when this servant of God or that is removed just because "the Lord hath need of him:" need of him for a higher service and a better world. Oh yes! brethren, God's time for taking to Himself the souls of the righteous is always the right time; He never makes any mistakes. Anyhow, as applied to ourselves, that of which the text assures us is that our souls are in safe keeping, by reason of the Divine property in us. "All things are yours," says the Apostle: life if you live, death if you die, things present if they fluctuate, things to come if they make you afraid—they are all yours, because gathered up and included in that charter of covenant right, and ownership, wherein God has set His seal on you and on all that belongs to you. If we are the redeemed of the Lord, Jesus claims us, makes mention of us to the Father as their joint property: "All Mine are Thine, and Thine are Mine, and I am glorified in them." He mentions us, as if by name, in His parting intercessions, like the flocks that pass under the hands of him that telleth them. Still, everything is based upon a foregone right and proprietorship. It is because we are Christ's, and because Christ is God's, and because your souls are the purchase and travail of the Redeemer's soul, that they can never perish. None can pluck them out of the Father's hand. Behold, saith the Lord of hosts, "All redeemed souls are Mine."

IV. Are Mine, and shall be Mine everlastingly. For so are we assured by another prophet, who, speaking of the souls of the redeemed, says: "And they shall be Mine, saith the Lord of hosts, on that day when I make up My jewels": on that day when my Beloved puts on His "many crowns": on that day when souls shall be "a crown of glory in the hands of the Lord, and a royal diadem in the hands of our God." Again are we glad to be brought back to that aspect of our text which makes the infinite preciousness of souls to consist in this: that they are at once the personal property of the Divine Redeemer, and that their salvation is His glory. Such a view seems to take the assurance of salvation out of our own hands entirely: to raise up a new order of securities for us, above the promise, above the oath, above the covenant: even the glory of the Divine Name, which would suffer reproach and hurt, if Christ were not able to challenge all the powers of eternity to controvert that saying, "Of Them which Thou hast given Me I have lost none." Oh yes! that which we should all try to say, and to feel when we say, is, "I am my Beloved's, and my Beloved is mine." It is only proprietary love which is unchanging love. "Jesus having loved His own which were in the world, loved them unto the end." Through all their weakness, all their waywardness, all their unfaithfulness, He loved them; and that for no other reason than because they were His own. Satan desired to have them again and again, that he might sift them as wheat; but he was driven back. A voice from the thick cloud was heard, "Touch not Mine anointed. Do My blood-bought saints no harm. These souls are Mine."

Such, brethren, are a few practical applications of this precious text. Only the light of eternity can disclose to us what it is for the Eternal Lover of the souls of men to declare that He has a direct property in us. That light will show to us how the hidden things, and the obscure things, and the mysterious things, in the Divine dealings with us, were the affixing of the seal to a covenant right, enabling us to see how, through sorrow, through temptation, through the darkness, through the light, God was hiding souls in the secret of His pavilion, graving them on the palm of His hands, that none of them should perish and none of them should be lost. Lost! for how could any one of them be lost? Could the glorified Redeemer lose one of His many crowns? Could reproach or stain be allowed to rest on the throne of the everlasting glory? Could a single precious stone be missing on that day when the Great Proprietor is making up His jewels? No; this may not be. God will assuredly take care of His own. Behold, saith the Lord of hosts, "All souls are Mine."

A PRINCE'S PART.

BY ELIZA TURPIN.

"It is a prince's part to pardon."—BACON.

PART II.—THE GATE IS OPENED.

CHAPTER IV.

HE days dragged slowly by, as all days must depart. They left their monotony behind to form a dense past. I did not tell Mona what I heard that day on the cliff. She was so perfectly happy that I could not bear to mar her peace.

Perhaps I should not have left her in a fool's paradise. It might have been wiser to have broken the golden spell she was weaving for herself out of her heart's first love. But wiser heads than mine fail in judgment, and few act always for the best.

St. Alvers did not come to the Abbey for a week. We saw him at church, and after the service he told us he was very busy.

Mona thought nothing of his absence. In fact, she was rather pleased than otherwise. She admired his endeavour to interest himself in the village and people.

My mind was greatly perplexed. I was reaching a state bordering on desperation.

"Nora, you are not well," Mona declared one day when I was grumbling at everything.

"I am quite well," I contradicted confusedly.

"Nora has not your evenness of disposition, my dear," aunty said. "Your moods vary, but your disposition is always sweet."

"That means that mine is not," I said crossly. "All the Talbots are not 'sweet.'"

Mona laughed. Aunty looked very dignified and prim.

"The hot weather is trying," Mona remarked, soothingly.

"People are trying," I asserted. "Those who have nothing to make them cross would be senseless if they were put out." With this parting shot I left them and went down to the village to see Polwyn's cottage and Dicky.

Artistic effect had given way to renovation and health. Bricks and mortar destroyed all quaint old beauty. The sweetly scented woodbine over the porch looked dusty and parched.

"Will it be cut down?" I asked Mrs. Polwyn.

"Sure to," she replied. "And Miss Mona were thet vond of 'en. My lord, 'en telled t' men to spare et, but they can't."

Considering her again! I stood thinking of the puzzling facts when I heard the sound of men's voices.

"Good-morning, Miss Nora," Mr. Callan called from the road. They came into the garden. St. Alvers' eyes wandered to the cottage door as if in search of someone else.

"Mona is not here," I blurted out foolishly. Mr. Callan gave me a swift glance. I felt he had read my thoughts.

St. Alvers tried to look unconcerned—a pitiable failure. He reminded me of a child who has taken a second bon-bon before the first is eaten and is discovered in the act.

He went inside to Dicky, and Mr. Callan favoured me with a prolonged stare. I tried the method of "staring back," but it took no effect. I began to fear he would be left with some severe optical disorder if he taxed his powers further, so I went into the cottage, in wasted disgust.

St. Alvers was looking at a book Mona had lent Dicky. As he was returning it, a tiny piece of paper fluttered from it to the ground. He caught it under his foot and took it up.

Months afterwards she showed it to me. It was only a small scrap on which she had made a memorandum concerning some studies, but he kept it treasured through long, dark days.

I walked back with them until our paths diverged.

"I will walk on with Miss Nora if you are going to see Standish," Mr. Callan said. Standish was the steward.

St. Alvers hesitated. Then he shook hands with me, and strode off without a word.

"You are thoughtful," Mr. Callan remarked, as we walked on in silence.

"You suppose the parrot need never think," I retorted, with a smile. He laughed.

"I have not studied the capabilities of a parrot's mind. No doubt they are not to be scoffed at," he said. "But may I commence my study by asking what you were pondering?"

He said it so pleasantly and laughed so lightly that I forgot to be offended.

"I was thinking men are a failure," I said. "It doesn't need great penetration to discover that."

"What reason have you for making such an assertion?" he inquired, still smiling.

I hesitated. To tell him would be to reveal my knowledge, and my perplexing fears.

"Oh! things in general," I returned vaguely.

"Is your cousin of your opinion?" he asked, in a would-be careless tone.

"Why should she not be?" I said, answering his question by asking another.

"Nora," he said, "I should like to tell you something."

"I know," I cried. I was glad of the opportunity to rid my mind of its burden. He looked surprised.

"I have not added thought-reading to my rôle," I said, "but I know what you are going to say. It's about St. Alvers. You think he is in love with Mona and you do not wish him to be. Now, am I right?"

"Partly. But you have guessed that long ago. I want you to know my reason."

"Your reason," I said quietly, "is—Lucine."

He was completely taken aback. "I am not a prophet Isaiah," I quickly assured him. And I told him what I heard that day on the cliffs.

"Now I am ready for your explanation," I declared,

"Sit down here," he said, pointing to a fallen tree by the pathway. "I will tell you."

After he had studied botany in the form of some nettles which grew by the trunk of the tree and flicked off their harmless heads with his stick, he spoke. I give the story as he told it to me.

"It was at Florence where he first saw her. He had known old Darrel for years—old Lord St. Alvers, Guy's father, was intimate with him. People scarcely understood this friendship, but the St. Alvers do not care what 'people' think.

"Lucine was away in some convent or other, for the life her father led was not exactly the life to bring up a daughter to. He was a gambler.

"Well, he (I mean St. Alvers) dangled after the girl when she came home, and, somehow or other, the old man Darrel conceived the notion of his marrying her. I have an idea that the originator of the scheme was Lucine herself. They went to Rome, to Venice, and eventually I met them all one evening in Paris, near the Arc de Triomphe. The Darrels had taken an étage in a tenement in the Rue St. Honoré, and Guy was at the Hôtel Continental. I asked him what it all meant. I put the case before him—he a young, wealthy man; intelligent, even clever; widely read and with a deep knowledge of the world, for his years. Was he going to throw himself into the arms of two bold adventurers and marry a girl without an idea beyond men's admiration and fine clothes? I became almost angry with him, though it was none of my business, in a way. He sat smoking and smiling, lazily listening to my tirade. Then he said I was troubling myself needlessly: he had no intention of marrying 'la belle Lucine.' And so matters remained for a time.

"I suspected the Darrels were carrying on the old game. Lucine had cast off all her nun-like innocence (if she ever had any) with her convent garb. She was no hindrance to her father; she was a help. In a few weeks she became popular among the species of mankind they wished to decoy. Ah! many a young man has played away fortune and honour in that gaudy saloon of theirs! Men have risen from the tables to go out and die by their own hand rather than meet the reproaches of an old father or mother.

"But there," he said quickly, "you do not need to hear such tales. I will go on with the story. Guy did not gamble deeply. He had too much respect for himself, perhaps. I stayed on in Paris. I was as well there as anywhere else, and I was not overburdened with work appertaining to my profession—in other words, I was a briefless barrister with a small private income.

"I tried to get him home, but he would not come. He's self-willed in some things; he was in this. No doubt it was partly pride. Anyhow, he said he would not be coerced into leaving that Babylon for 'a lonely old castle overrun with rats and mice, haunted by a thousand ghosts; a very ruin!' That is how he described Castle St. Alvers.

"One day St. Alvers and I sat chatting in his private room. We were just going out to look at some pictures a poverty-stricken artist in the Quartier Latin was striving to sell for bread. St. Alvers is Quixotic in a case like that, so I thought I had better go with him to restrain his sometimes mistaken generosity. I had not had so much money to throw about as he had. We sat talking, as I said, when the servant announced that a lady, Mademoiselle Darrel, wished to see Lord St. Alvers.

"Show her up," he said coolly. She came. Her father was very ill, dying, she said. He wished to see Lord St. Alvers.

"We went back with her to the flat in the Rue St. Honoré. Darrel was dying. He had been shot. He would give no particulars, nor would Lucine. Guy was too much shocked to press them. I scarcely felt justified in doing it: I had always been very cool with them. He intimated that he had a secret to impart to St. Alvers, and requested me to leave the apartment. I waited for him in the salon, where the tawdry gilding, if it could have spoken, might have revealed so much vice and sadness. When Guy joined me, he was an altered man. Before, he had been an ardent, earnest, yet somewhat lazy and always good-natured lad; after that hour with the dying scoundrel—yes, he was a scoundrel, Nora—he became different. He was older, quieter, and wanted occupation. The same night he told me he had promised, by the dying man's bedside, to marry Lucine when her father was dead. I reasoned, expostulated, tried to laugh him out of it; but all to no purpose. He said he was compelled to keep his word.

"We heard no more of the Darrels for a few days. Guy showed no inclination to visit his betrothed. Then we went to St. Petersburg and to several Russian cities. Lucine wrote and told us of her father's death, and that she was going to live with her uncle, in London, until her marriage.

"And so the thing stands. The Darrels have some hold on Guy, I am sure. He has never seen Lucine since the day he was bound to her by his promise; he does not care to see her. It's not a very promising outlook for wedded life. And now, to crown all, he has fallen in love."

He waited for me to speak, but words seemed inadequate to express my surprise at the strange tale he had told me.

"What do you think now?" he asked, when he had waited long enough for my comment.

"Two things are clear," I said. "One, that they have some hold on him. The other, that he does not care for Lucine Darrel."

He agreed.

"And now," he went on, "there remains one course. Guy must tell Lucine Darrel the whole state of affairs concerning Mona, and trust to her pity. That's not a part of her nature either. Only she might pity herself married to a man who loved another girl."

"Would not Lord St. Alvers tell you what it is that forced him to so obnoxious an arrangement?"

"I have asked him," he responded. "He says that it would do no good to tell me. That his words are true I cannot doubt. Poor old fellow!"

"Mr. Callan," I said hesitatingly, "do not tell him that Mona cares. She has never said so."

"I will not," he readily promised. "It would only make things more hopeless."

"I am afraid I have often misjudged you," I began

"What do you think now?" he asked.

again; "I used to think you had some sort of an objection to seeing Mona so happy and so often in Lord St. Alvers' society."

"I had a great objection," he admitted miserably.

"Yes, but I thought it was a selfish reason," I went on, with the instinct that "confession is good for the soul."

He turned and looked at me with a smile.

"Did you think I was jealous?"

"Something like that," I confessed.

"No," he said; "your cousin is just the girl for Guy. I should be glad to see him happily married. Surely," he exclaimed, on the sudden thought, "you did not think I was in love with her myself?"

"Why not?"

He smiled again at my question.

"Well," he said with a peculiar look, "there is a good reason 'why not'—the best of reasons."

I looked up at him, into his smiling eyes, with an inquiring glance.

"You see," he said, "I am afraid I am in love with someone else."

"Dear me!" I commented.

"You think that a strange fact?" he questioned.

"If 'someone else' is agreeable, it's all right," I returned, and he laughed.

"Come here to-morrow," he suggested, as I rose to go, "and we can have another talk over matters."

"Very well," I said. "Won't you come to the Abbey for a cup of tea?"

"I think I will," he said.

CHAPTER V.

MR. CALLAN stayed until dinner-time. He would not remain longer, because he said St. Alvers always waited for him.

"I shall soon be there—running," he said, as he bade us adieu.

Later on, Mona and I stood together under the beech.

"What are you thinking of?" I asked her.

"Of many things," with a slight flush.

"All at once?" I questioned.

"I was thinking of the birds just then, how free and unrestrained they are. How happy they sound!"

"She held out her hand calmly to Lord St. Alvers with an ordinary greeting."—p. 777.

The eventide warblings trilled through the silent air.

"It's like angel melody," Mona said.

"Mona, don't wax poetical," I advised. "It sounds as if you were going to die. Old Jan's granddaughter used to talk about angels before—"

"Nora, you really are ridiculous!" she laughed, interrupting me.

"Mona is like her father," aunty said: she had joined us a minute before. "He was like the Duke in—let me see—As You Like It. Found 'tongues in trees,' and all that sort of thing."

"And good in everything!" Mona quoted softly.

"He fancied that often in places where it did not exist and in people who were wholly bad."

"No one is wholly bad," Mona interposed. "There is no situation or person but has a redeeming point. I am glad my dear father knew that."

I began to wonder where Mona would perceive the "precious jewel" in the ugly adversity which was in store for her. But St. Alvers had played with fire and had certainly burnt his own fingers. Only for his undoubted honour and truth I could almost find a savage sort of comfort in this reflection.

Aunty went in with one of her headaches. The moon rose in full, calm glory, changing the foulest objects into fair scenes. Prosaic day was transformed and dispelled. Fairyland had stepped in. The scent from the falling rose-petals was wafted abroad on gentle, mourning, sighing winds.

"I was just thinking, Mona——"

"Don't, dear. Think of the exertion!"

"It's about the moon," I exclaimed, in self-defence. "All the thoughts about the moon are stale by now. Perhaps it's something you have read—poetry."

"Now you are wandering. Have you ever found me guilty of reading poetry?"

"I cannot say you add that crime to your numerous shortcomings," she returned, laughing merrily.

"People who read poetry are either disappointed lovers or—lunatics," I remarked. "But all the same, this evening is making even me feel that peculiar—er——"

"Inward yearning—aching void—which?" my cousin questioned. "If you develop any such symptoms, I will banish you."

"There is someone coming," I said, as the sound of a footstep fell on my ear. "It's Lord St. Alvers."

"Are you star-gazing?" he inquired, as he drew near.

"There are no stars," I said. "I was going into raptures over the moon."

"Have you consulted a doctor?" he asked, with great gravity. "Have you been long like this?"

"Wretch!" I cried.

Then we all laughed, and I thought how inappropriate it was that we three should be gay and happy, even outwardly.

"Nora, go and play something," St. Alvers asked me later on.

"Do you think it will 'soothe the savage breast'?" I laughed, as I went in through the open window and remembered that Mona could play ten times better than I. How humiliating to be de trop!

I ran over a few soft old melodies—simple tunes—and watched the two outside as I sat. I knew the task he had to perform. I divined why he had come once more.

All through his long pleading and recital she turned her head away. With a miserable attempt at unconcern, she tried to hide her agony and love.

"Mona, look at me, speak to me!" he cried, when he had finished.

"Why should I?" she asked, in low tones which resounded with pride and pain.

"Why?" he exclaimed. "Because I love you—because you are my very life, my all. Because I have loved you from the minute I saw you."

That was exaggeration, I am sure. But it is usual in such cases.

At last he took her hands and turned her face to his. Then I shut the piano and went silently from the room.

I waited for her until I heard a slow, lagging footstep which was strange in our house. Mona always walked gracefully along; I generally ran—un-gracefully.

This girl who entered was the old Mona never again. "The same, the same, yet not the same."

"Mona!"

"Nora—you here!" in surprise. "Is aunty——"

"In bed," I supplied promptly.

She sat down by the window, and I knelt beside her chair.

"Nothing can destroy your love for me, Nora, can it?" she began. "We shall always have each other."

"Always," I ejaculated fervently, regardless of the future. "We can live together and be happy; we needn't be cross and ugly old maids."

She gave a low, dull laugh.

"And men will be strictly prohibited," I added, as a grain of comfort. "But do tell me. It will ease you."

"I think you know. A man who is engaged has asked me—at least, told me he—loves me," she said, with even a haughty accent through her pain.

"Lots of men do that," I assured her comfortingly, with an element of imagination in my assertion. "They don't intend any insult. They fall in love with everyone."

At another time she would have asked me where I had gained my experience. It was fortunate she did not then.

"He told me about that girl," she went on, divining that I knew too, "and I was surprised he should tell me. Then he said he loved me. If he had not said that, I think I could have borne all."

I knew better, but did not say so.

"I said some nasty cold things. I believe I insulted him——"

"Serve him right," I commented.

"I told him the sooner he announced his engagement the better, then people would understand his methods."

"He did not like that!" I cried, with relish in the thought. But she paid no heed.

"Of course, I don't love him. How should I? Nora, you believe I do not?" in pleading anxiety.

I did not mind telling—well, prevaricating just a little to gain a great end; but really, this was too much.

"I know you do." Then there was a dead silence. I went away.

The days passed on. The world was going backwards just then.

Mona said nothing. She buried herself in books, and if at times I found her studying a bare cover, she always said she was thinking out a problem, or something of the sort. Her problem was not solvable.

I was coming from the rectory one day, and met Mr. Callan.

"How is——" I began.

"Guy is in a most peculiar state," he returned, supplying the word. "He'll say nothing. When I question him we go 'one step forward and two steps back.' And you look weary."

"I am. I should like to help them."

"Guy says that he will not annoy a girl who does not care a straw for him."

"Ah!" I wished it were so. "We were so happy before. It's all men. They are the patent misery-producers of the world."

"I think it is the women in this case," he retorted, in man's defence of man.

"That's your view," I said, in a tone which implied that his view was not of the most reliable character. "But what sort of a girl, to look at, is Miss Darrel?"

"Oh! yellow hair and limpid blue eyes. Fascinating, 'to look at.' Repulsive to look into. She's like a snake at the edge of a chasm—draws them there; and then the greedy vulture (otherwise old Darrel) preys on them, or, rather, did prey. He's dead now."

"I don't suppose she loves St. Alvers?" I asked, cautiously, feeling rather ashamed of imagining the unfortunate young peer as being loved by a "snake."

Mr. Callan laughed.

"She loves his wealth, position, and all that. I believe she rather dislikes him personally."

"She'll have a fine opportunity to vent her dislike on him if she marries him," I said quietly.

"I wish Guy would tell me what hold she has on him," Mr. Callan soliloquised. "He won't. And he's not exactly a sociable companion just now."

"It gives you a chance to indulge in your own love-thoughts," I said, with a smile.

"Yes," he agreed, with a slight hesitation.

"I wish you would tell me about her. What is she like?" I questioned curiously.

"Oh! she's very nice," he replied vaguely.

The next day aunty and Mona sat in the drawing-room when I went in for tea. Aunty was looking anxiously at her darling.

"I fear you are not well, dear," she said. "I notice a change in you. You are not wilful as you were. And now you say you do not care if you never have another dress. In time you would be limited to your own room and consigned to solitude."

Mona smiled.

"I suppose I meant for the present," she said.

"How did you know I was here?"—p. 778.

"I hope so, my love. In the country a little interest in dress is so useful. It gives one something to think about."

"I have no lack of thought," Mona returned wearily.

"I think you need a tonic," aunty declared. "You are growing desponding—so unlike you."

I laughed. The tonic she required was a formidable preparation—to be taken en masse, and not in teaspoons or tablespoons.

I was so disgusted with myself for laughing, that I began to cry. Aunty immediately concluded that I was in hysterics, until, between laughing and crying, I made a rare exhibition of myself. Perhaps Mona understood.

The same evening I met St. Alvers. He looked so altered and miserable that I felt constrained to sympathise with him, even though he had wrought such unfortunate circumstances in regard to Mona. I told him he looked unwell.

"It doesn't matter much," he said defiantly.

"Lord St. Alvers!" I exclaimed, "what do you mean?" It was just a little deceitful on my part. I knew quite well, too well, what his meaning was.

"You're a good little thing," Nora, he said quietly.

"Can you tell me you do not know what I mean?"

"I cannot," I admitted. "At least, I believe I know. And I am very, very sorry for you and—"

I recollected that we had decided not to let him know of Mona's love for him. So I stopped.

"And whom?" he inquired sharply. But I did not answer.

"If you mean Mona," he added, "you are wasting your pity. If you mean—the other, why—don't throw it away, that's all."

"Wasting my pity!" I echoed. "What do you mean?"

"She cares nothing for me," he replied moodily.

Then his face changed.

"I am a fool. Why should she love me—my darling—my love? Better far that she should not. And yet—"

I longed to tell him the truth.

"Would it make you less or more miserable to know she did?"

"God knows—I cannot tell."

We had reached the entrance to the Abbey grounds as we talked, when I looked up and saw Mona coming along. She came straight to us and held out her hand calmly to Lord St. Alvers with an ordinary greeting. She controlled herself well indeed.

I saw his dark eyes lighten with a look which the absent Lucine might have regarded very unfavourably.

"I am going to the rectory, Nora," she announced. "No doubt aunty will be glad to see you, Lord St. Alvers, if you are going on with Nora."

"I am not. May I not walk back with you?"

She hesitated, and it angered him. Wrongly though it was, he had given her his whole love, and it seemed that she valued it so lightly.

"I cannot intrude my presence upon you," he said curtly, "since it is so obnoxious. But you need not avoid me so pointedly. I love you and honour you far too deeply to annoy you wilfully."

She did not reply, and he was going. He held out his hand to say good-bye.

I can imagine those overwrought nerves of hers; I can fancy how they gave way, how her resolutions weakened and fled. She turned her face to his, and their eyes met. In one long, yearning glance he had wrested her secret from her keeping for ever. He had drawn from her eyes the mute confession she was striving to withhold. Both their weaknesses had united in an awful strength.

"Mona!"

And I saw that mine would be the intruder's part if I remained, so I took my leave.

I even conquered the curiosity usually attributed to our sex, but which is occasionally perceptible in the other one, and did not turn to look if they were gone when I was at the top of the avenue of beech-trees. Things were becoming so complicated, and yet so fearfully clear, that it was becoming fast a difficult problem, and one whose end and solving were nothing but the brink of further confusion. What the result of to-day's work would be was not easy to guess. Ah! how many will intrigue, plot, plan; will sell their honour for the one end—marriage. And yet anyone, even the most devout pilgrim to Hymen's altar, will never question that the way thither is through thorns and over sharp rocks; that, rough as is the approach, the end is rougher still, in far too many cases; that the bud is often cankered. But yet there are plenty to try the rocky road; there is no scarcity of applications for the thorny throne. The maid who avows that she will never wed is like my Highland namesake, and does not wait for the swan to "barter the lake's clear breast," for the "eagle's nest," ere she is married.

I waited again for Mona, anxiously and impatiently, and with many a fear. When she came, we went under the old beech-tree, and she told me that her life was lived.

"He is going to her, he says. If she does not give him his freedom he must marry her. There is no alternative—none. It is to save a dead man's name from dishonour. He has told me all, for he said he would not take me, if he could, until I knew. And I could not let him sacrifice what he has given so much to keep—the secret which the Darrels knew. She will not give him up—is it likely? He says she is hard and cold, but perhaps she loves him. Oh Nora, shall I ever get rid of this pain?"

CHAPTER VI.

MR. CALLAN was very good to us in a silent, unobtrusive fashion which admitted of scarcely an excuse to thank him. He had a way of performing little kindnesses in a natural manner which was delicate in the extreme. He came to see us; brought books and papers, and offered to teach Mona and me Italian. But I was too much afraid he would be disgusted with my incapability in learning if he attempted to teach me anything, and considered that the better way to conceal my ignorance would be by not seeking to lessen it, so I declined with thanks. But I sat and listened to him as he conned the soft sounds to Mona, who was glad of any excuse to keep her mind occupied and drown the haunting memories which crowded in. I am sure this was one reason, and the principal, why she progressed so rapidly.

Miss Darrel had gone to Rome and Switzerland for a holiday. St. Alvers had gone to find her. There was some difficulty about this, according to his letters, which Mr. Callan told me all about. I never alluded to him in talking to Mona. She had asked me not to mention his name if I could help it, and I knew it was better so. Of course aunty often spoke of him, and remarked on his unsettled disposition.

"I think he should have stayed at home for a time," she remarked. "He has been away for so long."

But neither Mona nor I made any response.

I often wondered if aunty had not noticed his preference for Mona. She did not say anything, however, so I did not know. And Mona guarded her secret so well.

One day, a hot July day, when scarcely a breath of air relieved the sultriness, and the myrtle boughs hung mournfully, their ivory-like flowers drooping with a pitiful supplication for rain, Mr. Callan received a letter from St. Alvers. He had reached Paris and overtaken Miss Darrel and her uncle there. He had found their address, and was just going to see Lucine.

Mr. Callan brought the letter to me, and I sent up from my heart a silent prayer that she might be merciful to him.

"If she grants me my request," St. Alvers wrote, "I shall write to Mona."

"He will write to her whichever way it turns out," Mr. Callan said. "I hope it may not be 'farewell.'"

"Oh! don't look for the worst," I begged earnestly.

The next day aunty received an invitation from an old friend in Yorkshire to go and visit her for a short time. She seldom went from home, and we pressed her to accept. So she began to collect all her pretty dresses and laces for the creation of envy in the breast of someone, and started off three days after she received the letter. Mona and I were left alone.

I watched every morning for the news from Paris. Every footstep that fell on my ear set my heart beating ten times faster than its wont, with eager expectancy. The days seemed lengthened into lifetimes of hope deferred.

It was the morning after aunty had left us. Mona and I sat at breakfast by the open window, with the hum of the industrious bee and the thrush's full melody to remind us that the beautiful world was without, waiting to teach us its Heaven-sent lesson. The weather was so hot, that morning and evening were the only times when existence was anything but a trial.

It is strange that when we await a crisis it invariably is reached unexpectedly. I believe on that bright morning Mona had found solace in reading the magnificent lesson on Nature's scroll, and I had lost the memory of St. Alvers and his Circe-like betrothed.

Ah! the letter-bag, and with it the returning recollection of outer things. Among the few missives I espied one bearing the stamp of a foreign land.

"Mona, will you have some ham?" I asked, trying to look unconcerned. But she disregarded me entirely.

She was too sincere to affect indifference. She opened it, and I knew by her tightening, paling lips that the white dove had fled from Pandora's box.

"It's all over," she announced. "He says she will not release him, and he declares he will never marry her—but he must. Oh! I——"

And she left the room to bear her pain alone. I walked to the window and then turned away in disgust. Why was the earth so tauntingly bright, so aggravatingly beautiful?

But the fact remained. Moreover, besides being bright and beautiful, it was very tempting, and I strolled to the beech-tree and sat looking at the lattice of leaves and branches which framed the azure sky above my head.

"Miss Nora," said a voice I knew.

"How did you know I was here?" I asked lazily.

"Drake told me," was Mr. Callan's reply: for it was he.

"Detective-staffs should be formed of our domestics," I declared. "It is useless to try to conceal one's self from them."

"If you wish to be alone——" he began.

"Now, that's just like men," I said, highly aggrieved. A girl can't indulge in a little philosophy but they always flatter themselves she is actually wasting her thoughts on them."

He ignored my flippant veil.

"I have had a letter from St. Alvers."

"Mona has. She has gone away to her room. I shall have to be going to her soon." But this broad hint took no effect. He threw a letter into my lap.

"Read it," was his command. It ran thus—

"MY DEAR CLIFFORD,—I have seen Lucine. She refuses to cancel my vow. But the tale I told you before I came here she may publish to the world. I will never suffer her to share my name—dishonoured though it may be. And, of course, to ask the truest, noblest woman in the world to be linked with the disgraceful scandal Lucine will make is out of the question. I shall come back to St. Alvers once again."

"Is the tale very dreadful?" I asked.

"Guy thinks so. But I cannot see myself how a man is to be held responsible for the deeds of a parent. Everyone's good name is in himself. And no one has led a more honourable life than St. Alvers."

"It's a shame!" I cried, oblivious of the fact that what was a "shame" was rather vaguely defined. "But I am sure Mona would not care for what his father had done, or mother, or any other relation."

"Guy would," was Mr. Callan's rejoinder. "He has a strong sense of honour—peculiarly so. He honours the woman he loves, and will never ask her to share a stained name."

It was too hot to argue. On a day like this it was enough to sit and enjoy the shade.

"Enough it seemeth unto me
Not to be doing, but to be."

That is one bit of a poem I always appreciated and understood.

"I will come down this evening," Mr. Callan said, as he went away.

I went in to Mona. She was seated by her window, with the letter which had crushed her hopes open in her hand. I sat by her side, and drew her head to my shoulder.

"He says he is coming back; but, Nora, I must not see him. He must not suffer scandal for me. In a little while he will forget me and marry her."

burial to occupy our minds and thoughts and lessen grief. There was nothing to distract Mona's mind from the one great death she was grieving for to-day—the crushing of her young love.

"I had a letter from Miss Stayne to-day, Nora," she said to me as we sat at dinner—the most miserable pretence of a meal that we two had ever made.

"Poor old Miss Stayne," I said, thinking of the time when she had so earnestly endeavoured to cultivate "A letter addressed to myself."—p. 780.

"He won't," I declared.

"If I were dead to him, he would cease to care," she said slowly; and often, in days to follow, those words echoed in my heart in miserable memory.

"Let us talk of something else," she urged at length.

"Everything else seems so flat," I said.

"We'll go to the sea," she said. "Anything's better than nothing."

"I suppose we shall live to remember all this without feeling very keenly about it," I remarked. It was like a death without the details of mourning and in us what we respectively lacked—in me, cleverness and accomplishments; in Mona, method and system.

"She is not particularly old or pitifully poor," Mona remarked, with her faint smile. "She says her 'Uncle Sam' has died and left her a small fortune. It will relieve her of the necessity to take another situation, and she wonders where to settle."

"Why not at St. Alvers?" I asked, on the impulse of the moment. "There's the 'White House' unoccupied."

The "White House" lay near the rectory, and was a small cottage prettily situated and covered with creepers. It had usually been the habitation of some person on the St. Alvers estate, but the present steward, Mr. Standish, had too large a family to live there, and so it stood empty.

"Write to her and tell her of it," I urged. "I am sure it is just the very thing for her. Fancy that 'Uncle Sam' dying! I believe I sometimes doubted his existence; but he could not very well have died unless he had lived, so I suppose he was no myth."

I tried my best to keep up a little conversation, but I am afraid it was a somewhat unsuccessful attempt. At last I gave it up, and sat silently thinking of many things.

True to his promise, Mr. Callan came again in the evening, but he evidently did not like to mention the theme uppermost in our minds. We talked on perfectly indifferent topics. But, however much Mr. Callan might discuss science and art with Mona, he never reverted to such depths in conversing with me. The sculpture of departed worthies of the house of St. Alvers in the church was quite near enough to the fine arts for me. (How far off that is I shudder to recall.) For Mona was reserved the privilege of hearing of all the associations of sunny Italy—of that perfect little statue by the unknown Greek found in the ruins of the most elegant of villas at Tempé—of beauty's home and glory's grave. And so in all things. Mona first—me behind.

After this Mona appeared to be unusually interested in the village people, and together we lingered lovingly near all the old familiar spots linked with our happy girlhood. In the blindness of my heart I rejoiced.

"Will you come with me to Metherton?" I asked her one day. "I want some things."

"No, dear, not to-day. Will you take a message to Mr. Howard? And if they press you to stay to luncheon, do."

She stood in the old porch to see me off. I remember her now, even after the lapse of many years, as she looked then.

"Nora," she said lovingly, "if I ask you to do something for my sake, will you do it?"

"Certainly," in surprise.

"Some time I shall. And you believe that I should act for the best, or I should try, though I fall short?"

"Yes, dear, I do," in increased wonder.

"Good-bye," she said quickly, and as I rode away (not without a groom) she waved farewell. Farewell!

Mrs. Howard did press me to stay, and I could not refuse. She was a very kind little woman, and joined in the universal love accorded to my cousin with the utmost heartiness. Mr. Howard was a keen, quiet man, about fifty years of age, with a clean-shaven, clearly cut face and grey hair. He was considered the most acute lawyer in that district.

The old-fashioned red-brick house in which they lived adjoined his offices. Before I went home, he came to me from them to say good-bye. Mrs. Howard had gone in.

"Miss Talbot is well, I hope?" he said quietly, looking at me.

"Pretty well, thank you," I replied.

"She has had a little trouble lately, has she not?"

"How do you know?" I exclaimed, astonished. I knew no idle curiosity prompted his inquiry. He was too true a gentleman for that.

"From something she said the other day. Your friend Lord St. Alvers has flown off again, I hear."

"He has gone to Paris," I stammered, with a fine flush; and if Mr. Howard did not conclude that I was madly in love with St. Alvers it was through no fault of mine. But he said nothing.

It was nearly six o'clock when I reached the Abbey. I ran up-stairs to find Mona, when I saw she was not down. I could not see her in her room, and went to my own.

"Mona," I called; but there was no response.

"She must have gone for a walk or to the rectory,"

I thought, going back to see if her out-door garments were in their place. They were not.

I thought nothing of it, and went down-stairs to wait for her. At last I asked Drake if she had left any message.

"No, Miss Nora," he answered. "I see'd en go afore lunch. She took'd a portmanteau."

"A portmanteau!" I exclaimed. "Perhaps she had a telegram from aunty."

I flew to Mona's desk, and the first thing I saw was a letter addressed to myself in her handwriting. I tore it open with a faint cry. This is what I read:—

"MY DEAREST COUSIN,—I have gone away: you know why. I believe it to be for the best that I do this. Do not try to find me. For my sake do not. I have arranged everything, and shall receive an ample supply of money through Mr. Howard. Tell aunty what you think best, but do not seek me. When he is married, I shall come back to you. Oh, Nora! give him my love, my undying love, and tell him to be true to her, and kind. Tell him he must save his name and reward her love, for she must love him. It is no wrong to her that I send him my love. It is adieu, like a last farewell beside a dying-bed, only that my love is stronger than death.

"I shall be with Miss Stayne. Good-bye, Nora, and dear aunty. It will not be for long. Tell him to forget me; we shall never more be justified in remembering each other in this world. Perhaps in a land where honour is uncorruptible and undefiled we may meet again—where there is no pain, but unfading joy and light for all eternity.

"Good-bye once more. Yours with unchanging love.

(To be continued.)

MONA."

HOW GOD DELIVERS IN TIMES OF NEED.—II.

BY THE REV. PROFESSOR W. GARDEN BLAICKIE, LL.D., D.D., F.R.S.E.

"Messenger after messenger went to summon her."—p. 182.

It is very remarkable that the sentence which we find repeated most frequently in Scripture is this short but very delightful one—"For His mercy endureth for ever." In the Psalms we find it thirty-four times (twenty-six times in the 136th), and six times in other places—not to mention numberless occasions where the same truth is expressed in other words. Surely it was meant that it should be very deeply engraven on our hearts, and have a powerful effect on our lives. To realise it gives a bright and cheerful tone to any life. It keeps the spectre of despair clean out of sight; and even care ceases to look so dark—ceases to be the atra cura of the pagan poet; for the rays of Divine mercy transform and brighten it, as the rays of the sun lighten and brighten the column of smoke that ascends from the cottage on the mountain-side.

It is the keynote of several Psalms, the succeeding verses or strophes of which consist of illustrations of its truth. Among these is the 107th. It begins with a call to "Praise the Lord, for He is good; for His mercy endureth for ever."

Following this is a series of pictures, showing manifold situations of distress in which God's people have found themselves. In these situations their cry has risen in trustful accents to their Father, and uniformly with a happy result. "Then they cried unto Him in their trouble, and He saved them out of their distresses."

As in the case of the 91st Psalm, there is an allegorical element here; the assurance really given is the assurance of constant protection, but not always of deliverance from temporal evil. The issue is in the hands of Him who doeth all things well, and to whom it has often seemed right to leave the agencies of pain to do their worst for a time, but always under the assurance to His people that "ALL things work together FOR GOOD to them that love God—to them who are the called according to His purpose."

Yet all Christian history is full of instances in which God has interposed to snatch His servants from physical destruction, or to avert from them other evils, when their situation had become well-nigh desperate. The Divine arm has been visibly stretched out, like that of Jesus to Peter when he was sinking in the waters; and it may be that this has been done just because we, too, are of little faith, and because that feeble faith sometimes needs to be buttressed by the evidence of sight. In a former paper (QUIVER, March, 1894) we have described some of these deliverances in the case of communities; in this we will do the same in the case of individuals. The instances we are to bring forward will fall under two divisions: remarkable cases of God supplying pressing wants, and of His averting pressing dangers. And it will be shown how closely these instances have been connected with a habit of filial, trustful, believing prayer.

I.

MANY are the instances of God's servants, reduced through persecution or poverty to the most extreme state of destitution, finding supplies sent to them in a way utterly unexpected. And it is remarkable that not only human beings, but even animals, have sometimes been the medium through which the supply has come. The first colleague of John Knox in the High Church of Edinburgh was a man with a remarkable history, of much decision of character and remarkable gifts—JOHN CRAIG. He had been a Dominican friar, had been suspected of heresy in Scotland, had gone abroad and entered a Dominican monastery at Bologna, where, chancing to find in the library a copy of Calvin's "Institutes," he was so impressed by it that he became a Protestant. Escaping from the monastery, he became tutor in the family of a Protestant nobleman in Italy; but being arrested and tried for heresy, he was condemned to be burnt, and escaped only through the connivance of a soldier to whom he had once done a kindness. It is said that in his flight he entered a wood, and sat down to think of his forlorn condition, in a foreign country, without money or friends, when a dog came running towards him and deposited a purse at his feet containing a considerable sum. There is a well-known story of a poor widow in a lonely part of the Highlands whose last handful of oatmeal had been consumed, and who had not one morsel of food for her children on the following day. Sitting down to ponder some of the texts that might serve to keep up her flickering faith, she was arrested by these words in the 50th Psalm: "All the beasts of the forest are Mine, and the cattle on a thousand hills." It was bread, not beasts, the poor woman was thinking of, and, though the words haunted her, she could not see what they had to do with her case. Early in the morning, a drover, who was driving a herd of cattle past her hut, found that a young ox had fallen over a bank, and so injured itself that it had to be killed; and not being able either to carry it on or to send back for it, he made a present of it to the widow, whose wants were thus most unexpectedly supplied. Thus a dog in the one case and a young ox in the other was a medium of deliverance. Birds, too, like Elijah's ravens, have done their part. Once, in a large city, a pet canary that had escaped from a handsome mansion in the neighbourhood flew through the open window into a starving man's house, and having been watched, a servant came in search of it. The story of poverty was carried back by the servant with the bird, and an ample supply came from the rich man's mansion. When God made miraculous use of Balaam's ass, Jonah's whale, and Peter's fish, He showed how He could requisition "all sheep and oxen, yea, and the fish of the sea," to fulfil His purposes; in these latter days, without any miracle, He does the same.

Probably some of our readers are familiar with the name of Beaté Paulus. She was the daughter of a pastor in the south of Germany named Halm, a man of piety and force of character, and the wife of another pastor, a relation of Professor Paulus of Heidelberg, the well-known rationalist; but the pastor was not a partaker of the professor's rationalism. Pastorin Beaté Paulus exemplified in a marvellous way the power of prayer. She seemed to know by a kind of spiritual intuition when God would interpose to answer her. Being desirous to obtain a superior education for her sons, she had sent five of the six to different schools, believing that God would provide the means of educating them, although she did not possess them. One morning three letters came by the same post to the pastor from the different towns where the boys were boarded, saying that if the dues were not settled at once the lads would be dismissed. The pastor was angry; he reproached his wife with her folly, and asked how she was to pay the bills with her faith. The wife read the letters with an untroubled look; she said calmly, "It will be all right," left the room, and went up to a garret where she often went to pray. There she spread the letters before God, and declared that she could not believe that He would forsake her in her trouble; she was willing to be the second whom He might forsake, but not the first. Night came on; supper was ready, messenger after messenger went to summon her; breakfast came in the morning; but her invariable answer was to leave her alone, for she was not ready. At last she appeared in the family with a wonderful light in her face. In a little time a message came from the innkeeper of the place, asking her respectfully to go to see him on particular business. It turned out that he had been thinking of her all night, and having three bags of gold in a box, for which he said he had no particular use, he wished her to accept of them, for he thought she must be in need!

II.

THE cases of sudden and unlooked-for deliverance from pressing and fearful danger, sometimes apprehended and sometimes hidden, are not less remarkable or instructive. The case of Luther will occur to everyone. After the Diet of Worms, at which Luther took up such an attitude of bold defiance toward the papacy, the Emperor, Charles V., signed the edict by which Luther was placed under the ban of the Empire, and all his people were forbidden, under the most serious penalties, "to give shelter to the said Luther, to conceal him, to give him food or drink, or furnish him, by word or deed, openly or secretly, with any kind of succour;" further, they were enjoined "to seize him, wherever he might be found, and bring him to us in sure custody." His books were to be burned, or utterly destroyed in some other way; and his adherents were to be seized and suppressed, and their property confiscated. It was a moment of extreme peril to Luther—a peril which it seemed hardly possible for him to escape. On his way home he spent one night with his loving old grandmother at Mora; next day, while skirting the woods of Thuringia, five horsemen in masks burst on him and his companions, and, before they could recover from their astonishment, carried Luther off into the depths of the forest. And for a full year no one knew what had become of him; the Reformation seemed to be lost. It turned out, after all, to be a friendly intervention. The Elector of Saxony had braved the Emperor, and secretly arranged to kidnap Luther, and send him to some hiding-place. This was the castle of Wartburg, where the Reformer remained for a year disguised as a knight, and occupied himself chiefly in translating the Bible. It was a bold and highly hazardous exploit, but it saved Luther and it saved the Reformation.

It is said of George Wishart, the Scotch martyr, that when he was preaching at Dundee, a priest was employed to assassinate him. One day, when the service was over, the priest stood waiting at the foot of the stair with a dagger concealed under his gown. Wishart must have had a sharper eye than the King of Moab when he was visited by Ehud, for he saw and seized the dagger, and quietly asked the priest what he was going to do with it. The poor wretch fell at his feet, confessed his intention, and craved mercy. The people outside would have lynched him but for Wishart's calm remonstrance: "Whoever hurts him shall hurt me, for he hath done me no mischief, but much good, by teaching me more heedfulness for the time to come."

The annals of missionary enterprise present many memorable instances of deliverance from frightful danger. When Dr. Adoniram Judson had been but a short time in Burmah, he was seized as a spy of the British Government and flung into prison under circumstances that made it plain that he was doomed to death. His first prison was a perfect hell; each prisoner was confined by three pairs of iron fetters, and all were fastened to a long pole, to prevent their moving. Lying on the bare damp floor, the fetters crushing them and making wounds in their flesh, every turn or twist of their bodies, made in hope of relief, only aggravated their miseries. Poor Mrs. Judson, frail at best, and expecting her confinement, struggled to visit the prison daily, and brought food to her husband and his fellow-missionaries, to receive which he could only crawl to the door. Six months after, a poor puny little girl was born that seemed to be always wailing. One day, coming to the prison door with his breakfast, Mrs. Judson found that he and his fellow-prisoners had been carried off, no one knew where. At last she found him, and learned that after a most cruel march he had been committed to another wretched gaol, where he was under the charge of a horrid gaoler—a man with "Murderer" branded on his breast, bearing the nickname of "The Tiger-cat," a wretch who positively gloated over the sufferings of his prisoners. Meanwhile, the British army, under Sir Archibald Campbell, was advancing nearer and nearer, driving back the native troops, which so enraged the king that his prisoners could not doubt but in a little while he would revenge himself by putting them to death. Mrs. Judson, after eighteen months of mental torture, was now on the very brink of despair. But it proved to be the dark hour that precedes the dawn. God's deliverance had come. The authorities of Burmah believed that Judson might be of use in pleading for them with the British Government and obtaining easier terms of surrender. In a moment Judson and his wife were free, and under the protection of the British Government.

Our readers must be familiar with some of the dangers of Livingstone. His deliverance from the lion that had its paw on his head was next to a miracle, and, but for the chivalry of a native helper, Mebalwe, who drew the attack of the lion on himself, and thus saved his master, he must inevitably have been killed. Many of his hair-breadth escapes will be found recorded in his biography; but we cannot forbear extracting a description of one of the most remarkable. On his return journey from Loanda, in 1856, at the confluence of the rivers Loangwa and Zambesi, he encountered a hostile tribe who had formerly been provoked by some Bazimka, or half-caste Portuguese, so that at first Livingstone could only avoid their fate by showing his bosom, arms, and hair, and asking if the Bazimka were like that. But still he was in most imminent peril. He felt that in a few hours he might be called to stand before the Judge of all, and prayed for resignation to His will. He pled, as one only can plead who gets near to God and feels very strongly that it is God's work he is doing—pled that for the sake of Africa he might be spared. "What an impulse this great region and teeming population knocked on the head by savages to-morrow. But I read that Jesus came and said, 'All power is given unto Me in heaven and in earth. Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations—and lo! I am with you alway, even to the end of the world!' It is the

"The people outside would have lynched him."—p. 783.

will be given to the idea that Africa is not open if I perish now! See, O Lord, how the heathen rise up against me as they did to Thy Son. I commit my way unto Thee. . . . Thou givest wisdom liberally to all who ask Thee—give it to me, my Father. . . . I cast myself and all my cares down at Thy feet. Thou knowest all I need for time and for eternity."

This was his morning meditation. In the evening he writes: "Felt much turmoil of spirit in view of having all my plans for the welfare of word of a gentleman of the most sacred and strictest honour, and there is an end on 't. I will not cross furtively by night, as I intended. It would appear as flight; and should such a man as I flee? Nay, verily, I shall take observations for latitude and longitude to-night, though they may be the last. I feel quite calm now, thank God."

In the morning the natives collected round him and his handful of followers, all armed. They had sent the women and children out of the way, as was usual before a fight. A canoe was lent, but the river was a mile broad, and first the goods, then the men, had to be conveyed across. But by some marvellous influence the natives were restrained from making any attack. While waiting for the return of the canoe, Livingstone showed them his watch, burning-glass, etc., and kept them amused as best he could. It needed both nerve and faith to be so calm while a horde of savages were standing armed at his back. It was indeed a wonderful deliverance, and it seemed as if He who shut the mouths of the lions in Daniel's prison had touched the hearts of these savages, and restrained them from hurting a hair of his head.

But no missionary of modern times has so wonderfully experienced the protecting care of God at moments when all seemed lost as the Rev. John G. Paton, D.D., late of the New Hebrides Mission. At the risk of repeating what we have said on a previous occasion, we must refer to his case, because it shows so emphatically that even in this age, when so many suppose that "natural law" is the only ruler, and that spiritual force is but an imagination, "the Lord's hand is not shortened that it cannot save, nor His ear heavy that it cannot hear." Dr. Paton relates that on one occasion, when residing in the island of Tauna, he found his house surrounded at daybreak by armed men, and a chief intimated that they had assembled to take his life. "Seeing that I was entirely in their hands, I knelt down and gave myself away, body and soul, to the Lord Jesus, for what seemed the last time on earth. Rising, I went out to them, and began calmly talking about their unkind treatment of me, and contrasting it with all my conduct towards them. I also plainly showed them what would be the sad consequences if they carried out their cruel purpose. At last, some of the chiefs who had attended the worship rose, and said: 'Our conduct has been bad, but now we will fight for you, and kill all those who hate you.'"

On this occasion Dr. Paton's safety was due to the influence of his own mild words. But there were other times when it came from an extrinsic cause, with which he had nothing to do. Once a party were assembled bent on burning down his house, and the fence was already on fire, when a furious tornado of rain compelled them to abandon their project. Another time it was a ship seen in the offing that caused his murderous assailants to desist.

We remarked in our former paper that the 91st Psalm must be regarded as, in the main, allegorical, using material images to denote the inward spiritual preservation of God's servants. But in the case of Dr. Paton it really seemed that the allegorical was superseded; he seemed to be literally preserved from the influence of every hurtful thing.

Thus, while they cannot absolutely rely on being preserved from all earthly ill, the servants of the Lord have the firmest assurance that they will be protected from all that would hurt or destroy the immortal part of their nature. Within the veil, it will be their universal and enthusiastic testimony that no good thing has failed of all that God promised, and that the very things that seemed most against them have turned out most signally for their good.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

AUGUST 19TH. FIRST DISCIPLES OF JESUS.

To read—St. John i. 35—49. Golden Text—ver. 41.

INTRODUCTION. After the Temptation, Christ returned for a short time to Jordan, where John was baptising, before going into Galilee. He mingled with the crowd; and when John saw Him, was at once pointed out by him as the Lamb of God. He had been announced by John, who now bare record how he had heard the Father's voice declare that this was He who should baptise with the Holy Ghost.

I. THE FIRST PAIR OF DISCIPLES. (35—40.)

Their names. Andrew was Christ's first disciple. John the Evangelist was evidently the other.

He always, from modesty, avoids his own name.

Their knowledge. Had been for some time disciples of John the Baptist.

Carefully instructed by him about Jesus Christ.

He now points out to them the true Lamb of God.

In His character meek and gentle as a lamb.

In His death the all-sufficient sacrifice for sin.

Their following. They heard, saw, and followed.

Christ notices them, encourages them, invites them.

They come and spend a night under His roof.

They learn more. Their hearts are drawn to Him.

II. SECOND PAIR OF DISCIPLES. (41, 42.) Who?

One known—Simon Peter found by Andrew.

Proof of having found Christ seen by bringing his own brother to Him.

"He first findeth." Who, then, was the second? Surely John sought and brought his brother James. Christ beheld Simon, by a look read his character. He gives him a new name for his new life. "Cephas," or "Peter," meaning "rock," or "stone."

His character was bold and determined, and he was to become one of the foundation-stones of Christ's Church.

III. THE THIRD PAIR OF DISCIPLES. (43-49.)

Jesus returns to neighbourhood of His old home. Finds Philip, probably long known to Him.

Calls him to be a disciple or learner.

Philip finds his friend Nathanael (or Bartholomew).

Tells him of Christ fulfilling the Law and the Prophets.

Notice these points about Nathanael's character.

His honest doubt—"Can any good come from Nazareth?"

His willingness to learn—he came and saw Christ.

His guileless disposition—testified to by Christ.

His open statement of faith when once convinced.

LESSONS. Christ's disciples must—

1. Learn of Him, the great Teacher.
2. Come to Him, the only Saviour.
3. Acknowledge Him as Lord and God.
4. Bring others to Him to be His disciples.

AUGUST 26TH. FIRST MIRACLE OF JESUS.

To read—St. John ii. 1-11. Golden Text—ver. 11.

INTRODUCTION. Christ had just been gathering together and teaching a few disciples. Either five or six accompanied Him to Galilee. A wedding was being celebrated in Cana, a few miles from Nazareth, where He had been brought up. To this He was invited, and asked to bring His new disciples.

I. WINE WANTED. (1-5.) Tell the story.

A wedding in a country village in Galilee.

The bride has been taken to the bridegroom's house.

Merry-making and feasting go on for several days.

Six extra guests cause supplies to run short.

The mother of Jesus tells Him what is needed.

Evidently she expects Him to work a miracle.

He replies that He must work in His own way.

He is no longer subject to her leading.

The moment to display His power not yet come.

She tells the servants to obey His bidding.

Was evidently a relation or family friend.

II. WINE PROVIDED. (6-11.) Notice—

Six stone water-pots, holding ten or twelve gallons each, for washing hands and arms "up to the elbow" (St. Mark vii. 3, margin).

These, at Christ's order, filled quite full of water.

Showing that no wine could have been added.

Then the liquid drawn out and tasted by the governor, or presider over the feast.

Was found to be wine of the best quality (ver. 10).

His astonishment was great, not knowing whence it came, though the servants knew.

Notice His words to the bridegroom about it—

Most men give the best first, keeping inferior till the taste is blunted. This just the opposite.

So Christ began His miracles. What did they show?

His sympathy with the bridegroom's distress.

His power—able to do all things for His people.

His glory—as of the only-begotten of the Father.

Result. His new disciples believed on Him.

LESSONS. 1. The blessedness of Christ's friendship.

He came to share man's whole life on earth.

Therefore rejoiced with those who rejoiced.

Just as He mourned with those who wept.

Should be welcomed as Friend in all life.

Nothing be done He cannot be asked to bless.

2. Christ's best blessings come last.

The world offers its best gifts first: viz.,

Youth, mirth, festivity, pleasures of the body.

These soon turn to bitterness and disappointment.

But joys of true religion increase.

Its ways are pleasantness, its paths peace. (Prov. iii. 17.)

Increase more and more as time goes on.

Their end—an inheritance that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for ever.

SEPTEMBER 2ND. JESUS CLEANSING THE TEMPLE.

To read—St. John ii. 13-25. Golden Text—ver. 16.

INTRODUCTION. Soon after His first miracle Jesus went up to Jerusalem for the Passover feast—thus beginning and ending His public ministry with one of these Festivals. His time for manifesting Himself as the Messiah had now come. Jerusalem would be crowded with Jews from many lands. No better time could there be for showing Himself. So with His new disciples, and probably joining a company of pilgrims, Christ went up to Jerusalem.

I. THE TEMPLE CLEANSED. (13-17.) Describe the scene.

The Court of the Gentiles—outside the Temple.

Huts of shop-keepers, booths of money-changers.

Pens of flocks of sheep, goats, and oxen all about.

Wicker cages filled with turtle-doves and pigeons.

Tables of small coins at which money-changers sat.

Heat, and noise, and crowds filling the place.

This the entrance-court of Temple of Most High!

What a contrast to what was going on hard by!

The Court of the Jews—adjoining that of Gentiles.

Sacrifices incessantly offered at the brazen altar.

Priests clad in their beautiful robes of office.

Levites assisting and singing the Psalms of David.

Crowds of worshippers joining in chants and prayers and Psalms of David.

Inside the Temple. Incense always burning on altar.

Now picture Christ and His party of disciples.

He goes into Court of Gentiles—the cattle-market!

He makes a small cord of rushes, and uses it.
 He drives out the cattle and the buyers and sellers.
 He overturns the tables of the money-changers.
 He overthrows the wicker cages of the birds.
 He speaks thrilling words of indignation.
 God's House must not be a place of merchandise.
 Why was it built by Solomon and dedicated to God? (1 Kings viii. 30.)

For offering of sacrifices for sins of all kinds.

For prayers and vows. (2 Chron. vi. 19.)

For teaching God's Word. (St. Mark xiv. 49.)

For dedication to God's service. (St. Luke ii. 22.)

For singing God's praises. (Ps. cxxxiii., etc.)

But not for traffic, merchandise, and such-like.

II. THE JEWS ANSWERED. (17—25.)

Notice effect of Christ's action on those who saw it.

Disciples saw in it honour for God's House.

Buyers and sellers were silent, being overawed.

Jews indignant at interference with their customs.

Asked for a sign of Christ's authority.

He answered by a mysterious prophecy.

They would reject Him, but He would rise again.

Its fulfilment confirmed the disciples' faith (ver. 22).

Had He not already given them many signs?

His miracles did convince many people.

They saw and believed in His Divine power.

But Christ could not trust Himself to them.

He knew their fickleness, foresaw their hatred.

Therefore stayed only short time in Jerusalem.

LESSONS. 1. My House is a House of prayer.
 Use it, honour it.

2. Your bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost.

SEPTEMBER 9TH. JESUS AND NICODEMUS.

To read—St. John iii. 1—16. Golden Text—ver. 16.

INTRODUCTION. Last lesson told how many in Jerusalem believed in Jesus after seeing His miracles. Some only believed in Him as a teacher sent from God. Among these was Nicodemus, a member of the Jewish Sanhedrim, or Council of Seventy Elders. But he desired to know more of this new Teacher.

I. THE NEW BIRTH. (1—8.) What it is.

Nicodemus was seeking more knowledge of God.

What had this young and new Teacher to tell him?

He must be born again: i.e., undergo a change.

So only can anyone enter God's spiritual Kingdom.

How is this change brought about?

By the action of the Holy Spirit cleansing heart.

Of which baptism by water is the outward sign.

How does the Spirit work? Like the wind.

It is invisible—its movements cannot be seen.

It is powerful—3,000 converted at once. (Acts ii. 41.)

It is seen in its effects. Saul the persecutor becomes the apostle Paul, the great missionary preacher.

What are the results of being born again?

Such walk in the light of the truth. (1 John i. 7.)

They crucify the flesh, with its lusts. (Gal. v. 24.)

They live in love one with another. (1 John iii. 14.)

LESSON. Ye must be born again.

II. THE NEW TEACHER. (9—16.) Who is He?

A Teacher from above, come down from heaven.

Sent to reveal heavenly things to men.

But His words not believed by the Jews.

Even "masters" (ver. 10) learned in the Law did not understand the Scriptures about Him.

The Son of Man must be lifted up on the cross.

Brazen Serpent was a type of this. (Numb. xxi. 9.)

It was made like the serpents which bit people.

When looked at with faith, was effectual to heal.

So Christ was made sin, who knew no sin. (2 Cor. v. 21.)

Through faith in His death man is saved.

LESSONS. 1. The greatness of God's love—it reaches to the whole world.

2. The value of the sacrifice—His only Son.

3. The freedom of salvation—whosoever believeth.

4. The danger of rejecting—perish everlastingly.

"Lord, I believe; help Thou mine unbelief."

THE LITTLE 'UN.

A STORY OF LONDON ARABS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "COLONEL KIT," ETC. ETC.

"I! master, let's have a look."

The words were enforced by a prod that sent the basket of carpenter's tools all awry, and Jim Davis turned angrily.

His anger was, however, quite disarmed by the comical little face that looked into his with a certain appeal.

"There ain't much to see," he said, good-naturedly making room in front of him: "only a hoss as can't get up."

"It's the little 'un wants to see," said the boy; and then Jim Davis saw that he had a tiny child pressed close to his side, a girl-child, with a pinched, suffering face, who gave a plaintive cry as the crowd surged about her.

"Here, let me have her," Jim Davis said, lifting her up.

The boy looked up jealously for a moment, but was soon watching the horse with great interest. It was presently helped up, and the crowd melted away.

"'They can't do nuffin for her,' the boy said gloomily."—p. 789.

Jim Davis put down the little girl, who took the boy's hand, and limped along painfully.

"Thank ye, master," said the boy. "Dot could see lovely, couldn't she?"

The child rubbed her cheek against his grimy hand, but gave no other answer.

"What's wrong with her?" asked Davis.

"Her leg hurts her," the boy answered briefly; "but she's going to get quite well soon, 'cause me and her is all alone."

"Well, I daresay she don't dislike sweets," said the man, holding out a penny ere he went on his way.

It happened that Jim Davis had just got some new work, which took him in that direction every day for a time, and he often afterwards fell in with the children. The boy sold matches, flowers, or anything for which he would be likely to get a ready sale, while the little girl limped at his side. The boy, generally called Coppers, by reason of the colour of his hair and eyes, did not have very much in common with the other street boys. Dot took all his time and care, and if he ever longed to take part in the rough play he watched with such interest, Dot never suffered from his longings. Under happier circumstances, she might have been a pretty little child; as it was, she had a certain attractiveness, and good-natured Jim Davis soon found pleasure in so often seeing her.

One afternoon Coppers was standing alone, with his matches in front of him, and he looked so lonely and unhappy that Davis crossed the road to ask after Dot.

"Her leg's that bad, I got old Mother Mitchell to have her down by her fire," Coppers answered. "I say, guv'nor, can't nothing be done for the little 'un?"

"I should take her to the hospital," Davis said slowly; "and I believe I know how to get you a letter."

"Oh, do, master!" Coppers said eagerly.

It took Davis two days to get the hospital letter, and Coppers took it with great joy, firmly convinced that Dot would soon be cured; and Davis was infected by the boy's hopes. He even bought a cheap and tidy little hat and cloak, that the child might make a respectable appearance, and Coppers put his own head under the tap by way of preparation.

Davis thought a good deal about the children while he was at work. His job was finished earlier than he expected, but he lingered about, hoping to see them. At last he saw Coppers carrying Dot uncomfortably on his back.

"Well?" he asked; but there was no answering brightness in Coppers' face.

"Look here," he said, after a pause: "I'm going to sit in the park a bit instead of going home to tea. Come and keep me company."

He took Dot in his arms, stayed to buy some sweet cakes, and then they went into the park. For a wonder, they found a quiet corner, and there Davis fed the two with his cakes, till a little colour came into Dot's white cheeks, and she fell asleep, nestled comfortably in his arms; then he repeated his questions to Coppers.

"They can't do nuffin for her," the boy said gloomily. "Oh, come, mate, that ain't what they said," protested Davis.

"Pretty near," Coppers said dismally. "They ain't got room to take her in; lots of little 'uns like her is waiting to be cured."

"But what did they say about her legs?"

"They give me a bottle of physic, and she's to have plenty of good things to eat and drink, and a change to the country would do her good," said Coppers, with unconscious irony.

Davis gave a little dismayed whistle. He looked down at the small sleeping face, but had no words of consolation to offer; only after a time he put one hand on the boy's shoulder and patted it gently. The sun, near its setting, made long cool shadows; a gentle breeze sprang up and fanned their faces; and a sense of help and comfort came over poor Coppers. He looked a little consoled when he turned into the miserable street which he knew as home.

"How's the little 'un?" asked Davis a few days after, when he came upon Coppers.

"She ain't no better, but"—Coppers made the announcement very importantly—"she soon will be. She's going into the country."

"How's that?"

"Mother Mitchell, she's going hopping, and I've 'ranged for us to go with her."

Coppers was so proud of his arrangement, and so certain it would cure Dot, that Jim Davis had not the heart to discourage him, though he thought the little one would have small chance of getting better among all the hardships which hop-pickers have to endure.

"S'pose I've seen the last of them," Davis muttered next day, after bidding them good-bye. He was surprised to find how sorry he was; when they returned, his work would be in another part of London, and he might never see them again.

Two months later, one cold drizzling autumn day, Davis tripped against Coppers, who was looking in the window of a newspaper-shop. They were both very pleased at the meeting, but the inquiry after Dot died on the man's lips as he saw a shabby piece of crape tied round the boy's arm.

"Come home with me and have some tea," Davis said presently; "they're all out at my place."

Coppers went, but without the burst of pleasure he would have had formerly; and it was not till he had fed his guest, and the two were sitting over the fire, that Davis asked after Dot.

"She's dead," Coppers said, with a gulp; "and I'm right down glad!" He spoke quickly, as if afraid of breaking down. "T wasn't like dying here; and she just was bad."

"Tell me about it," said Davis sympathetically.

"She just did like the country, and I thought she'd get well, but she didn't; her leg hurt awful all the time. Mother Mitchell was all right to her, but me and she had to be hop-picking all day, and the little 'un was dull like, and kept getting worse. One night Mother Mitchell said she must have a doctor, and we didn't know what to do; and the parson came, and was so kind."

"Well?" for Coppers made a very long pause.

"The parson fetched a doctor, but the little 'un was laying in my arms, and didn't want no one else; and the doctor didn't disturb her. He just said, 'Poor little 'un!' and then parson said some beautiful prayers, and the little 'un held on to me till they took her away."

"Was she dead?"

"Of course. If she wasn't, they couldn't have took her."

"Poor old chap!" said Davis pityingly.

"I'm glad," said Coppers almost fiercely. "There wasn't room for her in the hospital, and she'd always have had to be in pain. The parson had her put in one of his little girl's bed-gowns, and they brought lots of white flowers, and they're going to make some grow on her grave; and she'll always be in the country, and won't have no more pain to bear; so I'm glad."

"But you'll miss her terrible," said Davis.

"Don't!" cried Coppers sharply; then he said, as if in apology, "I'd rather miss her than let her be hurt. It don't matter about me."

"Look here, old chap," said Davis, patting his shoulder: "I'm going to keep my eye on you; if you're a good boy now, and get on, I'll help you all I can; and some day, if you like, learn you to be a carpenter like me. We'll go somewheres on Sundays sometimes, and me and you'll be real friends!"

Coppers brightened up.

"And when you get to be an old man," he said, with much vigour, "I'll take care of you, and work for you."

"That's a bargain!" said Davis heartily.

THE MUSIC OF THE PSALMS.

BY J. F. ROWBOTHAM, AUTHOR OF "THE HISTORY OF MUSIC."

It is a curious question to set oneself to answer—What sort of music accompanied the Psalms in the Temple services of the Hebrews? The time was long ago, the indications in the Bible itself are few, and the collateral information on the point in the way of comparison and analogy strikingly meagre. Yet, by making use of the slender materials at our hand to the very uttermost, some light of an interesting nature may be shed upon an obscure subject; and our own appreciation of the Psalms, whether as objects for musical delivery in our churches or as themes for meditation and exposition, may thereby be considerably extended and illuminated.

What sort of music accompanied the Psalms? What sort of tunes were those divine hymns of praise sung to, in ancient days? What was the original and earliest form of delivery to which they were subjected? These three questions bear upon one another, and may very well be considered together.

In the first place, we may be very sure that there were regular and recognised tunes to the Psalms, for the inscriptions of several of the Psalms themselves are an evidence to this. When we find, for instance, the title of a Psalm quite at variance with the subject of the Psalm itself—of this there are many examples, e.g. the title of the 34th Psalm relates to David's behaviour before Abimelech, while there is not a word on that subject in the whole hymn that follows—in such cases as these we have no option but to imagine that the title indicates the tune to which the psalm was to be sung. If so, its variance from the subject of the psalm becomes very reasonable and natural indeed. The same phenomenon may thus be studied in the Psalms of David which meets us in the poetry of Burns, where we find, for instance, the title of the tune "Lady Macdonald's Lament," and immediately following it a sonnet of passionate attachment from the poet to some dear friend, a song of happiness and rejoicing.

The Psalms, then, had regular tunes, some of which became so thoroughly identified with certain canticles that there was no way of alluding to them except by quoting the subject of the tune with which they were generally associated.

In addition to being sung to regular tunes, the singing was accompanied by the sound of various musical instruments. The instrumentalists were some priests, some Levites, both of whom had their peculiar instruments. By allusion to the twenty-fifth chapter of the First Book of Chronicles, to the twelfth chapter of Nehemiah, and elsewhere, we shall find that the priests played the trumpet exclusively, while the Levites performed on cymbals, psalteries, and harps. The use of the trumpet by the priests seems to have been their peculiar privilege, of which they were perhaps somewhat jealous. The trumpet in its oldest form was made of ram's horn, but later in Israelitish history it was constructed of brass and even of gold. There were many traditions connected with the instrument. It was the trumpet which had caused the walls of Jericho to fall, and had struck the Midianites with panic. Doubtless a peculiarly sacred character attached to the trumpet, which marked it out as par excellence the priests' instrument.

We are not to think of any elaborate harmony in the Hebrew Temple services such as probably characterised the performances of the Egyptians. To the Hebrews, music was not an art, but a voice in which they poured forth their soul to Him that "inhabited the praises of Israel." To dally with the musical relations of notes, to seek to enhance the effect of the composition by graceful combinations of instruments or sounds, were thoughts very far from the earnest minds of the genuine Hebrews.

"The singers and the trumpeters were as one, to make one sound to be heard in praising and thanking the Lord," runs the passage in the Second Book of Chronicles; and earlier in the same chapter we read of "One hundred and twenty priests blowing with trumpets"—a scream of sound! Harshness is forgiven to that enthusiasm which wrestles for expression and sees heaven open before its eyes. "For when they lifted up their voice," continues the sacred narrative, "with the trumpets and the cymbals and the instruments of music, and praised the Lord saying, For He is good; for His mercy endureth for ever, behold then, the house was filled with a cloud, even the house of the Lord; so that the priests could not stand to minister by reason of the cloud. For the glory of the Lord had filled the house of God."

In this swallowing up of all into enthusiasm, this contempt of mere beauty and the fair outside of music, we may see the contrast between the sacred music of the Hebrews and that of the Egyptians. In the Egyptian temples there were the priestesses singing and rattling their sistrums, flutes playing, lyres and lutes swept by the hands of women—all beautiful and melodious in sound. The Hebrews, on the contrary, would not tolerate women within the Temple's precincts; their choruses were composed entirely of men-singers; even boys' voices they were careless to take advantage of; and the national instrument of the land, the harp, was made to give way in the enthusiasm of devotion to the trumpet.

Any attempt to revive the actual melodies of the Hebrew music to which the Psalms were sung, seems predisposed to end in failure. One method of approaching such a result is to be particularly guarded against, and that is by reference to the music of modern Jews, who sing the Psalms at the present day in their synagogues with the same earnestness of tradition as ever, so far as concerns the words, but with respect to the music with complete alienation from primitive forms. So far from being of a primitive cast, the music of the psalmody in modern Jewish synagogues is of the most florid and often the most meretricious order. Full of turns, trills, and unexpected runs, it possesses, so to speak, a trivial character, instead of that pomp and sublimity which we should naturally look for in so exalted a musical sphere. In addition to this defect, there is very little common ground for comparison, even were an inquirer to adopt this means of reconstructing the past. The chants used by the German Jews are entirely different in complexion, style, and tune from those employed by the Italian Jews, and these latter in their turn are in striking contrast to the music which the Spanish Jews employ. Thus the attempt to make a rifacimento of the old Hebrew Psalms by allusion to the chants of the modern Jews can hardly be proceeded with, owing to the want of a fixed standpoint, if no other reasons were against it.

We have, however, the testimony of one witness in the past to the ancient Hebrew chants—a witness who heard them in their antique form, and was a cultivated man to boot, whose opinion is therefore a most valuable one. This was Clemens Alexandrinus, who has recorded his opinion that the chants were very much like the Dorian mode of the ancient Greek music. Now the Dorian mode was the gravest and most simple of all the modes of music in ancient Greece, and we have authentic specimens of it surviving whereby we can test its character. It has survived also in the First Tone, as it is called, of the Gregorian Song, which is traditionally called the Dorian mode, and was almost certainly composed, or at least arranged, in Constantinople, while Greek art and Greek music still possessed vitality in that capital of the East. In comparing the old Hebrew chants to the Dorian mode, however, Clemens Alexandrinus probably intended to convey no allusion to the actual notes of the chants, and meant presumably little more than to characterise thereby the chants' simplicity and earnestness. One of the celebrated Alexandrian's commentators says, "We must take this statement of Clement to refer to the earnestness and solemnity of the chants."

Very earnest, very solemn, very sonorous, and, we may add, probably very low in pitch, were the ancient Hebrew psalms as they were sung in the services of the Temple. This last assertion about them, as to their low pitch, must be accepted merely as an hypothesis, however, though doubtless a true one. All ancient music was very low in pitch as compared with our own. Whether it were that the voices of mankind have become higher as centuries have advanced, or that the absence of women's and boys' voices from many systems of ancient music may have affected the pitch to profundity, or finally that the accompaniment of the voices in those days, instead of being underneath the voice as at present, was above it, and therefore depressed the voice instead of raising it—whatever were the cause, the fact remains as certain that, speaking generally, ancient music was very low as compared to ours. If we would restore to our minds in a popular way a conception of ancient music in general, we have but to refer to the bass of our own modern music. In its simple progressions, in its grave and sober outlines, and finally in its depth of pitch, we have a very fair, if superficial, reproduction of much of the music of antiquity, and, as it seems to us, of the Hebrew chants among the number.

But if we cannot actually lay down in so many words the very notes which the Psalms were sung to, we can at least furnish a very tangible piece of information relative to the manner in which they were sung. From the earliest times the Hebrews were marvellously attached to that form of singing which the Greek poets used to call "Amœbean," and which consists in dividing the song or the verse between two singers or two sets of singers, and causing each to declaim half in turn. The very earliest song which occurs in the Bible is arranged in this peculiar form—the Song of Lamech:—

"Adah and Zillah, hear my voice:
Ye wives of Lamech, hearken unto my speech.
For I have slain a man to my wounding:
And a young man to my hurt.
If Cain shall be avenged sevenfold:
Truly Lamech seventy and sevenfold."

Lamech the poet was the father of Jubal the minstrel, and there is a certain suggestiveness even in this fact, so far as the poem we have just quoted is concerned.

When the minstrel of the old patriarchal times gave place to the choruses of city life, the division of the verse into two parts, each reflecting the other, occasioned the division of the chorus into two groups, each responding to the other. When Miriam the prophetess took a timbrel in her hand and all the women went out after her with timbrels and dancing, Miriam answered them:

"Sing ye to the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously:
The horse and his rider hath He thrown into the sea."

This last phrase probably represents the response of the women.

In the same way, when two choruses came out to meet David after his victory over Goliath, one chorus sang, "Saul has slain his thousands:" and the other chorus answered, "And David his ten thousands."

This method of singing probably—we say probably, for we are unwilling to commit ourselves to a complete assertion of the fact—insinuated itself into the services of the Temple, and most likely not only were there two choruses of singers who answered one another, each declaiming one half of each verse of the Psalms, but two bands of instrumentalists likewise flanking the singers and supporting them at the proper places with their music. Sometimes even three divisions of singers and instrumentalists may have been employed, as is suggested by the psalm, "Praise the Lord, ye house of Israel: praise the Lord, ye house of Aaron: praise the Lord, ye house of Levi." There is a tradition, or a strong supposition, that the first sentence was sung by the High Priest addressing the people; the second by the people back to the High Priest; and the third by the Levites.

Now if this was an occasional method of performance, it did not interfere with or change in any radical way the usual and recognised system of having the Psalms sung by two choruses, aided by their respective bands, who each delivered half of the verse alternately. So common was this method, that Isaiah transfers it to the Seraphim, "And they cried alternately and said," etc. (Isaiah vi. 3).

The structure of the verses in the Psalms themselves is a very obvious suggestion of this practice; but we can go a step further than suggestion, and argue from an actual ceremony which is described to us in Scripture, and upon which we may fairly speculate as to its general identity with the arrangements of the psalmody in vogue in Solomon's Temple.

The ceremony we allude to was the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem in Nehemiah's time, when we read, "The chief of the Levites, Hashabiah, Sherebiah, and Jeshua the son of Kadmiel," were appointed, "with their brethren over against them, to praise and give thanks, according to the commandment of David the man of God" (so that this was obviously a revival of the old practice), "ward over against ward."

"Two great companies of them that gave thanks," says Nehemiah, "were appointed, whereof one went to the right hand upon the wall, and after them went Hoshaiiah and half the princes of Judah." From this it would even appear that the whole disposal of the ceremony was affected by the choral requirements. "A band of trumpeters also went with them," continues Nehemiah, "and the other company of them that gave thanks went over against them. So stood the two companies of them that gave thanks in the house of God."

CHRISTIAN CONTENTMENT.

BY THE REV. J. R. MACDUFF, D.D.

"I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content."—PHILIP. IV. 11.

THESE words are not uttered by St. Paul in the midst of prosperity. No thanks to him if they had been so; if he had been seated at the time in one of life's pleasant arbours with flowers blooming and scattering their fragrance all around. No thanks to him, if he had made the avowal when pillowed and cushioned in fortune's chariot, with the palm-branches strewn on his way, and the air filled with hosannas.

They were the utterance of one whose track was rugged and steep; whose life was a gigantic scene of conflict, a retrospect of toil; Hill Difficulties ever and anon confronting; who could tell of hair-breadth escapes, bodily and mental tortures: perils of waters, perils of the wilderness, perils of false brethren. At one time fleeing a fugitive from Damascus; at another, a solitary stranger, stoned well-nigh to death by the semi-barbarians of Lycaonia; at another, toiling at menial labour to earn his daily subsistence; at another, one of a shipwrecked crew on a heathen coast; at another, immured in a Philippian dungeon; and now, a prisoner in the world's great capital, with certain death before him.

And yet, here he is, with all that war of elements, sitting quietly and calmly under the heavenly palm of Contentment, as if no cloud were on the horizon, and nothing but sunshine were brightening his path.

And we must remember, too, that in the case of the Apostle this tranquillity of soul was all the more remarkable, as his not only might have been, but doubtless would have been, a very different condition had he not made a noble life-surrender to the Lord who died for him. As the scholar of Gamaliel, with his learning, his Hebrew pedigree, his rare intellectual energy, he might have won for himself a place of eminence and renown, and never required his hands to minister to his necessities. But with the full consciousness of that self-sacrifice and humiliation, occupying a cell instead of a pedestal of fame, he says: "I am therewith satisfied;" "I have all and abound."

Let us seat ourselves too in thought under the shadow of this palm-tree. It would be a happier world if each man and woman could habitually take their place there and say with Paul, "I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content."

Like all Christian graces, contentment is not indigenous to the soil of the heart. It is a plant of heavenly growth, requiring careful nurturing and fostering. Hence, you observe, the Apostle here uses the word with reference to it, "I have learned." It was a thing acquired, the result of moral and spiritual discipline. He speaks as if he had only mastered and completed the lesson at the close of life, when the wrinkle was on his brow and heaven in view. Old age, with many, is associated with peevishness and discontent. But it was then this great and good man had really come to enjoy the boon. The sun was brightest and calmest at its setting in his evening sky.

What is the source and secret of contentment?

I answer that question, first, negatively. It comes from nothing outward. This is best evidenced in the case of those who are rich and opulent, what the world calls successful, but who are not rich towards God. They have every temporal blessing that can be obtained; the fabled horn of plenty is filled to overflowing; and yet see how discontent often sits like a bird of ill omen over whatever they have. Life has no sparkle. It is a constant fret. Nothing seems to go smooth or easy with them. Judging from their wealth and possibilities of enjoyment, one would expect that, like the singing birds, they would warble all day long throughout this bright summer of their being. But not so. They rather crouch with ruffled wing and wailing note within the bars of some imaginary cage, when none are freer to soar than they. Solomon was an illustrious example of one who had his full of these outer things. If such could have ensured content, if the golden key of riches, honour, power could have given access to that enchanted ground, the priceless blessing would pre-eminently have been his. No better proof could be given that contentment comes from nothing external than to see these wings, which the grandest of human destinies had covered with silver, and these feathers with yellow gold, lying "among the pots," blackened and tarnished:—this King in Jerusalem—if we still cling, as we do, despite modern criticism, to the old theory of the authorship of Ecclesiastes—telling us he "hated life!"

On the other hand, go to some Christian of lowly mediocrity, or even to a child of penury like the well-known cottager, and such as she, whom the poet of Christianity has so graphically pictured, with the Bible her only patrimony in possession, and a nobler reversion to "a treasure in the skies." See how, despite adverse outward things, contentment inspires her humble life-story and brightens her lowly lot: following her even to her half-filled barrel of meal and half-used cruse of oil, imparting a calm and tranquil joy unknown often in the ceiled dwelling and lordly demeane. She might most truly be called the caged bird. But she sings her song within the wire-grating, while the bird of gilded plumage and unfettered pinion is often tuneless and mute.

This leads me to observe, further, that as contentment comes from nothing outward, it must depend on something inward. It springs from within. It is a thing of the mind. And though with some it has the aspect of natural grace—a flower surviving the ruins of the fall—yet, like all natural virtues, it is transformed by religion into a heavenly one, a transplantation from the King's garden, a growth of the new, regenerated nature. As such, let us for a moment seek to analyse two among others of its component elements. What, in the case of the believer, constitutes a contented frame?

(1) Contentment is derived from the conviction that all that concerns us, and happens to us, is the appointment of God. Every niche in the temple of life is God-built: every turn in the wheel of life is regulated by Him. There is no room left for vain hankerings after other and imagined better portions. The Christian clings to the firm assurance—"This and no other lot was planned for me. My Heavenly Father, the all-wise Disposer, has apportioned me my cup. I dare not wish it otherwise. I would not have it otherwise. It is wisest, it is best, just as it is. The manna comes down from Heaven in appointed measure. Let others covet the double supply, not I. I am content with such things as I have, for He hath said, 'I will never leave thee nor forsake thee.'

"Father, I know that all my life
Is portioned out for me:
The changes that will surely come
I do not fear to see:
I ask Thee for a present mind,
Intent on pleasing Thee."

Wordsworth in two brief lines describes the Christian pilgrim pursuing his path:

"So didst thou travel on life's common way
In cheerful godliness."

(2) Another element in Christian contentment is the hope of heavenly glory and felicity. The ills of life would often be hard to bear with unruffled composure but for this. It would often be difficult to sing the song of contentment with no thought of a Better Land. It would be easy enough, as I have previously said, to sail in the charmed barque on pacific oceans, with no environing storms: to exercise calmness and resignation when in an atmosphere of smiles and sunshine. Not so easy to hold on the even tenour of our way when outward troubles come crowding upon us: loss of health or loss of wealth; to suffer in silence under unmerited wrongs; to hear unmoved the tongue of calumny; to brook the coldness and vacillation and unkindness of mutable friends; to see breaks and blanks in the loved circle; the sea of life scattered with wrecks.

But Contentment borrows lights from the future. The half-starved voyagers can bear up manfully with the harbour in view. The belated Alpine traveller can cheerfully buffet the rain and tempest with the mountain refuge at hand or the radiance gleaming in the châlet. The heavenly voyager or wayfarer can sing his "song in the night" with the joyous prospect of morning and of home.

This same great Apostle gives elsewhere a comparative estimate of present suffering and future glory. He holds the balances in his hand. Into the one scale he puts afflictions. How does he speak of these? He calls them by comparison "light afflictions," and still farther "light afflictions which are but for a moment." How does he speak of the glory with which they are contrasted? He calls it "a weight of glory," "an exceeding weight of glory." As if this were not enough, "a far more exceeding" aye, more, "an eternal weight of glory."

Or shall we go to a Greater than Paul? See, amid the other characteristics of the perfect humanity of Paul's heavenly Master and Lord, how no murmur of discontent ever escaped His lips. If any were entitled, in human language, to aspire after great things, surely it was He. Considering His peerless and supreme Divinity, He might well have felt abased even had He been proclaimed an arch-King among men, a Monarch among monarchs, the sovereigns of earth doing obeisance at His throne! But how meekly and resignedly He accepts the manger, the workshop, the youth of toil, the homeless and houseless manhood! See how this patient "Lamb of God" stands dumb before His shearers. "He was oppressed and He was afflicted, yet He opened not His mouth." He took the cup of anguish with Contentment's noblest utterance, and walked unresisting and calm to the cross. What was it which supported Him in this hour of fierce conflict? True, in the first instance it was the might of indwelling deity, combined with the elevating consciousness of doing His Father's will. But His holy human soul was also sustained by the thought of the reversion of glory: seeing of the fruit of the travail of His soul: the revenue of joy reaped in the future for Himself and His Church when the conflict of the present was over: "who, for the joy that was set before Him, endured the cross, despising the shame."

It is the same animating anticipation which imparts strength and endurance and equanimity to His tried and tempted and suffering people. They have learned in whatsoever state they are therewith to be content; for they reckon that "the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which is to be revealed."

Thus, then, you observe, this divine Grace springs partly from within—from the possession of a heart at peace with God as our heavenly Father and Friend; and partly from the hopes and consolations of another and brighter world. It is, as we have seen, independent of all things outward. It is like a calm well in the depths of our being. And just as when the storm is raging around, rending and uprooting the giants of a forest, or rousing the waters of lake or sea into madness, such a well as I have spoken of in field or garden retains its unruffled surface—a glassy mirror; so, when others are chafed into dissatisfaction and disquietude: while the wicked are like the troubled sea which cannot rest: this well of good-content in the Christian's soul retains its placidity amid all moral hurricanes. Hear the tranquil Christian we have again and again alluded to as he confronts King Agrippa. Conscious of the inner secret and source of peace denied to him at whose tribunal he stood, he could make the truthful and noble avowal, "Would to God that not only thou, but also all that hear me this day, were both almost and altogether such as I am."

O Apostle, prisoner, pilgrim on the heavenly way, we can now understand and reconcile thy paradox, "Having nothing, yet possessing all things." Truly "Godliness with Contentment is great gain."

Let our closing thought and lesson be the duty, the obligation, and (where this is heartily given) the delight, of calm acquiescence in the midst of adverse providences. This is undoubtedly a hard lesson: one that has to be "learned." There can be small sympathy with such morbid and imaginary sources of discontent as those of which I have spoken. But there is every need for tenderness here. We have little sympathy with the peevish prophet of Nineveh when, in sullen mood, he brooded over a faded gourd, and with regard to a comparative trifle made the childish and petted averment, "I do well to be angry, even unto death." Or with the prophet of Carmel, when he rushed away from duty, and sat moping under his juniper-tree, oblivious of all the past, and wished to die. Still less sympathy have we with the surly King of Israel, who buried himself in his mantle on his royal couch at Jezreel, turning his face to the wall, and refusing to eat or drink, because Naboth declined to give him an acre of land to add to his vast demesnes. But we have sympathy for the burst of anguished feeling from the Rachels who are weeping for their children, and refusing to be comforted because they are not; for those, like Job, who are staggered under the mystery of successive bereavements; for those, like Jacob, who can no see silver lining in the cloud, and in heart-bitterness are led to exclaim, "All these things are against me." While, on the other hand, we honour, we wonder at that serene assent to the will of Providence which enables not a few, like Aaron under the sorest of domestic afflictions, to "hold his peace;" or, like Eli, to say, "It is the Lord;" or, like Job, to "bow down and worship;" or, like David, "I was dumb, I opened not my mouth, because Thou didst it;" or, like the Shunammite, in reply to the question regarding her withered flower, "Is it well with the child?" to answer, "It is well!"

Here is surely the highest development of the "meek and quiet spirit:" recognising God's sovereign right to do with us and ours as seems good to Him: content with St. Paul to have the thorn still left to buffet if the God he besought thrice to take it away considers it better that it should remain: accepting with submissive heart the nobler compensating boon, "My grace is sufficient for thee, for My strength is made perfect in weakness."

Reader, seek, at all hazards, to exorcise the evil spirit of discontent, in all its Protean shapes. It is one of the demon throng walking up and down in the earth to get admission to the soul: and once admitted, once bolt and bar have been removed to let this importunate wayfarer in, who can set the bounds to the riot it may run? Discontent is a habit of mind rapidly fostered. It is a false medium. It misrepresents everything. It fills the windows of the heart-chamber with discoloured glass. The sweet sunshine and verdant sward and gorgeous flowers of life are every one of them distorted, turned into paleness and ashes. Discontent, though you may yoke it in golden harness, will never pull smoothly; though there be never so much of level way, it will keep wheels and vehicle jolting persistently in the ruts, bespattering with mud, or raising its columns of blinding dust. It is strange, indeed, with what self-complacency many seem purposely to subject themselves to this voluntary penance, to lash themselves with these imaginary scourges, these ghostly evils, pouring so lavishly all the gladness out of the cup, and filling it with gall and wormwood! They have their days of outer sunshine, but these are the very days on which their shutters are closed. They are only opened in the time of cloud. Like the Israelites, they have three-score and ten palm-trees, and twelve wells in Elim, and only one Marah-well whose waters are bitter; but they nurse the Marah-well remembrance, and are oblivious to the Elim memories. They could not live without their fret, and they carry it with them to the grave.

Let us all be discontented with nothing but one thing—the meagreness of our Christian attainments. "Not as though I had already attained," is the only murmur which has the authority and sanction of the man who penned this notable eulogy on a Christian virtue: a brief entry from the diary of his own experience. If it be merely higher and higher on the ladder of human ambition, "satisfied," "contented," you never will, you never can be. But if it be from bough to bough on the tree of Christian attainment, aspiration after the true and only satisfying good, you will reach it at last, when from the topmost perch in the Kingdom of Grace you take upward wing to full and everlasting contentment in the Kingdom of Glory.

HEALTH BEFORE CUSTOM.

URELY it is time that the foolish and unhealthy custom of drinking healths should cease! It has been recognised by thoughtful people long ago as provocative of drunkenness and detrimental to health. From this point of view, that was an excellent answer which a great man made when asked to drink a king's health: "By your leave, I will pray for the king's health and drink my own."

RULE-OF-THUMB V. RULE-OF-SCIENCE.

"I do wish they would teach you something practical at your school," exclaimed an over-burdened mother one day—"something that would enable you to assist me in the house. Why, you cannot even make me a cup of tea properly if I am ill!"—"Oh, mother!" protested the daughter, "you are too hard. Why, it is easy enough to do that—just pour boiling water!"—"Oh no, you are quite wrong," interrupted her brother; "mother does not make nice tea like that; I have watched her."—"And what is the proper way, Mr. Consequential?"

asked the sister.—"Mother pours the water on the tea in a hot tea-pot, just after the water boils, and serves out the tea in the cup after it has stood a very few minutes."—"Five I think I give," said the mother; "but George is right. Tea properly made is most refreshing and exhilarating; just what I like when I have a bad headache; but tea carelessly made of water that has been boiling a long time, and that has been stewing the leaves also, is flat and indigestible, and makes me ill." And she made a pretty grimace, at which mother and daughter laughed. "Ah," she continued, "you may smile, but how many bad tempers have been increased by bad cooking? How many terrible family jars? Alas! their number must be legion. How many people, too, I fear, have been driven to take too much stimulant to overcome the depression caused by dyspepsia!"—"Why, mother dear, you seem to regard cooking as one of the most important things in the world."—"It is far more important than you think. Haphazard, careless, rule-of-thumb cookery is horrid, whereas cookery pursued on sound principles—rule-of-science cookery, I may call it—is delightful and healthful in its results."—"I should think that cake you compounded the other day was rule-of-thumb," remarked George slyly.—"Well, I suppose I had better go in for this teaching," remarked his sister; "they are about to begin it at our school."—"And a very good thing too!" exclaimed her mother. "It is quite time they did something of the sort. The idea that rule-of-science cookery is an inferior subject is perfectly ridiculous, and if you take my advice you will study so as to become a teacher yourself—you would be likely to get a good salary."—"Ah! that reminds me," exclaimed the young damsel, drawing a paper from her pocket: "the National Society have commenced a training-school of cookery at Lambeth, to ensure more efficient teaching of this important art of yours, mother, in their schools. The house is in Lambeth Palace grounds, leased at a nominal rent by the Archbishop, and the object is to train well-educated women to teach cookery. The course seems most complete."—"Well, that is the best news I have heard for many a day," cried her mother. "Give me the prospectus, dear. Oh, yes. I see the school is inspected by the Education Department, which also recognises the diplomas granted by the school, and of course they hold examinations. The full training course is forty-two weeks, but there is a shorter course. Well, well, this is a step in the right direction: I think you must go in for this, my dear. I hope to see the day when cookery will be properly taught in every elementary school."—"And no more rule-of-thumb cake," added George. "Ugh! it did make me ill."

RELIGION FOR BUSY PEOPLE.

Lord Astley, before he charged, at the battle of Edgehill, made this short prayer: "O Lord, Thou knowest how busy I must be this day. If I forget Thee, do not Thou forget me." About this Hume remarked, "There were certainly much longer prayers said in the Parliamentary army, but I doubt if there was so good an one." The battle that many persons in this age have to fight in life admits of little leisure. Let them think for their comfort that their Heavenly Father knows exactly how they are situated, and that His presence is always near them, whether they are conscious of that presence or not. It is not the length of our prayers that is of importance, but their earnestness. Prayer means thinking to God as well as speaking to Him, and this can be done in the very crisis of business and in the midst of the largest crowd.

SAVED BY HOPE.

St. Paul tells us that we are saved by hope, and it is quite certain that sanguine nations and men are the most progressive. If a man never thinks that he will become better, he never will become better; while, on the other hand, all things are possible to him who believes. It has been said, "God will forgive us all but our despair." This fine line contains a truth that should never be forgotten by those who are trying to reform either themselves or others.

THE NEWEST BOOKS.

No doubt, the most popular class of books among general readers at this season of the year is that which includes good stories. Messrs. Isbister send us two excellent volumes, each containing reprints of collections of short stories. The first is "The Phantom Brother," and other tales, by Evelyn Everett Green, Sarah Doudney, L. T. Meade, and other writers almost as well known. The leading story in the other volume is "Greater Love," by Alexander Gordon. These varied and well-illustrated volumes are deserving of a warm welcome.—A strong single-volume story is "The Thing That Hath Been," by Mr. A. H. Gilkes, of Dulwich. The story has a good manly tone that should secure attention for it. Messrs. Longmans are the publishers of the book.—Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton send us a new edition, with numerous additions to the former one, of the veteran hymn-writer, T. H. Gill's, "The Golden Chain of Praise."—Messrs. Sampson Low's "Preachers of the Age" series has reached the point at which it begins to include men who are coming to the front as well as those whose fame and services to the churches are known all over the land. So we are glad to welcome the Rev. E. J. Gough's "The Religion of the Son of Man."—We have also to acknowledge the receipt from Mr. Elliot Stock of "Little Rests by the Way," a series of addresses to children for every day in the month; and "For His Name's Sake," which is published by Messrs. J. Nisbet and Co.

CHINA'S "HONOURABLE WOMEN."

Great merit and lasting fame are ascribed in China to widows, and maidens deprived by death of affianced husbands, who have devoted their sorrow-stricken lives to the service of their parents-in-law. Sad to say, such mourners are yet more highly esteemed where they signalise their bereavement by suicide. This Chinese sutteeism is never, as in India, by fire: but by opium, starvation, poison, or drowning. In honour of these women and girls, memorial arches, such as is here shown, are sometimes erected, and may be seen, usually near the highways, all over the country. They are of stone, about twenty feet high, more or less elaborately carved, with inscriptions graven on the upright and cross pieces in praise of filial piety and chastity, which virtues are expressed by the two large characters "hian" and "tsieh." The inscription also gives the widow's name and place of sepulture. Near the top are always found two characters denoting that the monument is raised by the Emperor's permission. The cost of such structures varies from tens to hundreds of dollars, towards which a small contribution accompanies the Imperial sanction. When the edifice is completed, some mandarin of inferior rank goes to worship before it.

THE MATCH AND THE CANDLE.—A PARABLE.

"So far as I can see, brother candle, although you are stuck up, you needn't be so proud," said a wax vesta from its position in a candlestick. "There is no essential difference between us twain. We are made of the same stuff, and we both possess a wick which enables us to afford illumination to the world. Advantage, indeed, if any, lies with me, for I have a head and you are dependent upon me for the light you yield. Unless I first am lighted, for anything that you can do, the universe would lie hid in gloom."—"It's all very fine to talk so big," said the candle; "when you are struck and thrown aside, you become useless for further work. You live but a minute, whereas I endure for hours; and if it comes to that, there are a hundred ways in which my light can be made to shine. You are not so absolutely necessary as you seem to think."—"Oh! it was a hasty word I spake," replied the vesta. "I see that each has his own appointed work. I start the flame, you sustain it. You must, however, at least admit that without assistance you can shed no ray of light upon the field of darkness." Moral.—Energies of different kinds are required to initiate a movement and afterwards to carry it on. The man who starts a work is not always the best fitted to keep it going.

"THY WILL BE DONE."

Some people have an almost blasphemous way of talking about the will of God. They say, "It is the will of God," when things go wrong, but seldom when they go right. If sickness break out through inattention to sanitary laws, or money is lost owing to a foolish investment, or a complete want of common sense in the arrangements causes some enterprise to fail, they say, "Oh, it is the will of God, and we must submit." Still, though we need not submit to our own ignorance, negligence, and indolence, we must submit to the Divine Will, and to do so cheerfully is almost the whole of religion. And surely the Kingdom of Heaven has come into the heart of anyone who can say on all occasions as says the old motto which is carved on the chimney-piece in one of the rooms of a famous castle:—

"Let come what will come,
God's will is well come."

MAKING THE MOST OF EACH OTHER.

A friend of the writer's lately remarked to an old man, "You seem to begrudge every moment that you are absent from your wife."—"Indeed I do," replied the old man; "we have now been married forty-six years, and I feel that we shall before long be separated, so I try to make the most of the time that remains." This thought of inevitable separation, at least on earth, should make us appreciate, before it is too late, not merely our life-partners, but all our friends. They are not without faults, and they may sometimes torment us; but, with all their drawbacks, it is better to have them than not to have them. "For though," says the Homily on the state of matrimony, "thou shouldst be grieved with never so many things, yet shalt thou find nothing more grievous than to want the benevolence of thy wife at home."

A MINISTERING FAMILY.

A friend wrote lately to a correspondent to tell him that for the last five years he had been a medical missionary. "I like my work much," he said, "preaching the blessed Gospel and healing the sick. It is a grand means of getting the truth at the careless and ungodly." He then went on to speak of other departments of Christian work in which the members of his family were engaged. One of his daughters was going abroad to the mission-field, his wife conducted a Bible-class for poor women in St. Giles. Each was doing something for the glory of God and the good of man; for, as he triumphantly ends his letter, "we are all on the Lord's side." What can be happier than for a family to be united in good works upon earth, and afterwards to meet in the Communion of Saints—the whole family being translated to Heaven without a single failure?

CAUSE AND EFFECT.

The Book of the Acts of the Apostles comes after the four Gospels as if to teach us that that only is true faith which is followed, though not preceded, by works. "If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them." The facts of our religion related by the four Evangelists, when apprehended by living faith, produce Christian Acts.

ELOQUENT RAGS.

Talking about the way boys were admitted to his Home, Dr. Barnardo said to an interviewer, "I was standing at my front door one bitter day in winter, when a little ragged chap came up to me and asked me for an order of admission. To test him, I pretended to be rather rough with him. 'How do I know,' I said, 'if what you tell me is true? Have you any friends to speak for you?'—'Friends!' he shouted. 'No; I ain't got no friends; but if these 'ere rags,' and he waved his arm about as he spoke, 'won't speak for me, nothing else will.' When we seek admission to the Heavenly Home above, we shall not be as badly off as this poor boy, for we shall have a Friend to speak for us, the One Mediator between God and men—the man Christ Jesus. As for our own righteousnesses, they are 'as filthy rags,' which need not, and should not, be mentioned. Our hope is not in these, but in the spotless robe of Christ's righteousness, which covers us and pleads for us.

THE SPURGEON MEMORIAL, STOCKWELL ORPHANAGE.

Although the great preacher disclaimed being its actual founder—according that distinction to the late Mrs. Hillyard, the clergyman's widow who handed him £20,000 for the purpose—it is held, with good reason, that the best and most lasting memorial to Spurgeon is the Stockwell Orphanage. At one time the preacher indulged the hope that, when his work was done, his remains might rest in the centre of the Orphanage grounds; but as that was not to be, it was still meet that some worthy memorial to the father of the Orphanage should be set up in the institution itself. The Memorial Hall, opened on June 20th, 1894, seems, on the whole, to be an appropriate monument, and one in which visitors for generations to come are likely to be interested. This hall will accommodate an assembly of over a thousand persons, one end being taken up with a platform for speakers, the opposite end being the place chosen for the memorial itself, which is 16 feet 8 inches in width, and 12 feet in height at the centre. The designer and modeller is Mr. George Tinworth, and the whole has been produced in terra-cotta by Messrs. Doulton and Co. at their art pottery works. The aim of the artist has been to represent the different phases of Spurgeon's pastoral and philanthropic work. The figure of the preacher is of life size, and he is supposed to be in the act of addressing an audience. The groups lower down on either side are orphans. The panel in high relief on the left of these represents the late President of the Pastors' College addressing his students, as he was wont to do on Friday afternoons. The corresponding panel on the right portrays him seated in the Orphanage grounds conversing with the children as he loved to do. On the pilasters are emblematical representations of the Sword as well as the Trowel, and Wheat, the latter signifying the fruitfulness of the preacher's work. In ornamenting Artist who has arranged that our light affliction (the chipping of the marble), which is but for a moment, should work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. The marble wastes, our outward man perishes; the statue grows, the inward man is renewed day by day.

WHY HE CAME TO CHURCH.

Nothing is more contagious and inspiring than the example of energy in good works. "Do you know why I came to your church?" an artisan said the capitals the artist has modelled a story from the bird world. In the four smaller panels near the top he has depicted Christ's Parable of the Sower. On the top of all will be noticed the victor's laurel and crown. The Hall also contains the large and fine collection of Reformation Pictures which the late preacher purchased from time to time with admirable judgment. A bookcase containing a complete set of his published works is also to become a part of the furniture of the Hall.

WASTE AND GROWTH.

If a block of marble could speak, it would no doubt express pain rather than thankfulness to the artist for cutting and chipping it; and yet, as Michael Angelo said, "The more the marble wastes the more the statue grows." Unless we are as dumb and senseless as marble, we ought to thank the to a clergyman. "Because I saw you going about your business early and late. I don't believe in blinds down at nine o'clock in the morning, and six bank holidays a week."

SAVED BY HELPING.

There is nothing which helps our own spiritual life so much as working for others. A traveller was crossing alone a high mountain which was covered with snow. He struggled against the sleep which weighed down his eyelids. If he had fallen asleep death would have been inevitable; but sleep was fast stealing over him. At this crisis his foot struck against a heap lying across his path. Stooping down, he found it to be a human body, half buried in the snow. The next moment the traveller had taken a brother in his arms, and was chafing his chest and hands. The effort to restore another brought back to himself life and energy, and was the means of saving both.

EIGHTY-FOUR YEARS YOUNG.

"I never met a man more full of sunshine," is the verdict of Mr. Walter Besant in reference to Oliver Wendell Holmes, whom he went to see after attending the literary congress at Chicago. Dr. Holmes is as lively and as busy as ever, and tells his visitors that he is eighty-four years young. If we have no hope of another world in which we shall renew our youth, it may be absurd to speak of being eighty-four years young; but if we have a hope full of immortality, we will never speak of being on the dark or shady side of eighty, seventy, sixty, but will think that each year beyond these ages is brighter than the last, because it is nearer to that blessed world where "they need no candle, neither light of the sun; for the Lord God giveth them light."

A TRUSTY MAIDEN.

PARADE SERVICES.

BY THE REV. E. J. HARDY, M.A., CHAPLAIN TO H.M. FORCES; AUTHOR OF "HOW TO BE HAPPY THOUGH MARRIED."

FALLING-IN AFTER SERVICE.

IN the Queen's regulations and orders for the Army all officers in command are ordered "to take care that Divine Service is regularly performed for the troops under their orders," and they are "to induce the wives and families of the men, by every means in their power, to attend public worship." It is the same in the Royal Navy. On board every ship of war in every large dockyard, and at each depôt of Royal Marines, there are compulsory Church Parades.

Much may be said for as well as against the regulation. If it be urged by its opponents that it is treating soldiers and their families like children "to drum them to church," as it has been expressed, it may be replied that when they live in barracks they must obey rules, and that they soon become as accustomed to go to church as they do to get up early in the mornings, attend the military school or gymnasium, or do anything else that befits them. If all were not ordered to go to church by the authorities, the men who would wish to attend might be almost prevented by the scoffs of those who did not. In some regiments the wives "on the strength" are not compelled to attend a place of worship as strictly as in others; and it is not long ago that a sergeant's wife said to me that she wished the colonel were more strict in this respect; for as it was, the women who did go to church were said by the others to be proud, and only to go because they wanted to show their clothes. If some in a community will not give others the liberty to do right, then it is better to force all to do it; and if Tommy Atkins and Jack Tar think or say that to make them attend Parade Services is a survival of the grandmotherly legislation which prevailed in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when everyone was legally bound to attend church, they may comfort themselves with the reflection that even now civilians are not altogether free in this respect. Mrs. Grundy is more powerful than ever Queen Elizabeth was, and many go to a place of worship to propitiate her who would never think of doing so to please the Almighty. Is not this why the fashionable people who assemble in the London parks after Divine Service are said to attend Church Parade? A better argument against compulsory church is that it is impossible to force worship, and that a man who is obliged to go to church against the grain seldom benefits by doing so. In my experience, it is not the most, but often the least, religious commanding officer who is strictest in this matter. One such I have in my mind's eye. He never attended church himself, but was most particular that everyone else should do so. On one occasion, when a soldier's wife was a few minutes late, he threatened that if this occurred again he would have the women of the regiment paraded and marched to church before the band. Talking to this officer one day about Parade Services, I remarked that many people were of opinion that soldiers should not be forced to attend them. "Not go to church!" he said, with horror; "why, that would be subversive of all discipline. Where would we find our men?—one-half of them would spend Sunday in the public-house, and the other half lolling on their cots."

It is the parade, and not the church, that such commanding officers think of when advocating Church Parades. And this leads me to what is, to my mind, a strong argument in favour of them. If soldiers were not obliged by the Queen's regulations to attend Divine Service, they would be in danger of losing their weekly day of rest altogether. Some commanding officers would try to make them do drills and parades on Sunday as much as on any other day. But, of course, the chief reason why there are these Parade Services is that a public recognition of the Divine existence and Providence is due from institutions like the Army and Navy in a country not professedly atheistical.

I am afraid that the hour before soldiers fall-in for Church Parade is not as hallowed as every hour of Sunday should be. The men are tempted to use bad language to their helmets, swords, or bayonets when these require elbow-grease. Nor does it put them in the best humour for appreciating Divine Service to have—"Might be a little more burnish on that sword"; "There's a stain on that helmet"; "You haven't half-polished those boots,"

SERVICE AT SEA ON BOARD A MAN-OF-WAR.

MILITARY SERVICE IN THE OPEN AIR.

and other fault-finding remarks, addressed to them immediately before by the sergeant-major and adjutant.

To do them justice, however, many soldiers do attend to the Service, and even to the sermon, when the chaplain gives them anything to attend to. They can find their way about in the Prayer-book better than civilians of the same class: first, because the pages of the Prayer-book issued by the War Office are numbered; and secondly, because, willingly or unwillingly, they go to church more frequently. On one occasion a soldier told me after Service that I had read a wrong collect. When I complimented him on knowing what the right one was, he reminded me that few men go to church so regularly as soldiers. Indeed, what strikes most people for the first time they attend a military Service is its heartiness. Soldiers delight in singing hymns, and eight hundred or a thousand of their manly voices make, if not much music, certainly a very cheerful noise.

A Parade Service ought not to last longer than an hour, and it is often necessary or expedient to make it shorter. The reply of a judge to a clergyman who asked him how long an assize sermon should be was: "Twenty minutes, with a leaning to mercy." The Duke of Wellington seems to have been of the same opinion, for he used to say to chaplains: "Put all you can into twenty minutes, but I won't wait any longer." In these rapid days many commanding officers would not like to wait so long. If a chaplain goes on "gassing"—that is to say, prosing or talking nonsense, is not understood or is not heard—a volley of coughs will make him aware of the fact; and if he do not take the hint, the noise will increase so much that it will seem as if all the warriors sitting before him had suddenly been attacked with infantine whooping-cough. At my first station most of the troops were either cavalry or horse artillery. Having in my inexperience continued preaching on one occasion a little after the usual dinner-hour of the horses, demands for oats were neighed so loudly from the stables (the dumb ass, as it were, forbidding the madness of the prophet), that I had hastily to conclude, amidst the suppressed titters of the men, some of whom, no doubt, would have liked to give an extra handful of corn to their faithful steeds for rescuing them from a longer sermon.

Near the great military hospital at Netley, at which I was once chaplain, there is an asylum to which all soldiers who become lunatics when on foreign service are sent. Church Parade here was sometimes a curious experience. As a rule, however, the men were quite as well-behaved as an ordinary "sane" congregation. If a man would occasionally laugh out insanely, he would soon be frowned down by the shocked and forbidding looks of his companions. The public opinion of those who were less mad was always on the side of order and respectability, and kept in check others who were inclined to be troublesome.

But there is another kind of hospital with which army chaplains are familiar—that is to say, a hospital for moral complaints, more commonly called military prisons. The first Sunday I held a Service in one of the largest of these establishments, I was much surprised at the hearty way in which the prisoners answered the responses. They were not afraid to speak or sing out, as are so many other congregations. Alas! when I congratulated the governor after Service upon having such religious men under his charge, he took away all illusion with a word of explanation. He told me that the men, being on the silent system, found it a great relief to use their tongues in chapel. Certainly in no place were my sermons more attentively listened to than in that prison chapel, especially if allusion had to be made to any event going on in the outer world. I noticed this to be the case very much once at Christmas-time, when, having described the butchers', poulterers', and other tradesmen's shops as they were to be seen outside the prison dressed for the season, I tried to prove to my congregation that their Christmas, where they were, would be at least as happy, and certainly better spent, than it would be by them if they were free, but unable to control their appetites.

I have occasionally taken a Parade Service for a naval chaplain on board a man-of-war. This was a pleasant change, because they were harbour ships, and stationary. Not so, however, when at Malta I exchanged duty with a brother of the sea, and went for one trip on a troopship to Egypt and Cyprus. The first Sunday morning I felt like a criminal going to be executed. How was I, sea-sick as I was, to get through the service? It had to be done, however, for sea-sickness receives anything but pity in the Royal Navy, and is not tolerated in an officer. With what horror I contemplated the rigging of church between-decks, and the soldiers and sailors, officers and wives of officers, going to their places! When I began I had to lean for support against a signalling gun, but soon I forgot myself in my sermon, which was a rather better one than usual; and this made me well; nor was I ill again the rest of the voyage. Enforced work cured me, so sea-sickness must have much to do with the nerves.

"Remember, my boy," said a dying wine-merchant to his son, "that wine may be made of everything, even of grapes." We might parody this, and say that a Parade Service may be held everywhere, even in a church. There are some military churches, and they are not all ugly or deficient in fittings and furniture. In many places, however, we use a chapel-school: a building which, as its name implies, serves as a school during week-days. Sometimes, however, we have not even this accommodation, and then a riding-school, a gymnasium, a drill-shed, or, what is best of all, God's own cathedral under the blue sky, is used. All the time when I was on foreign service at Malta I had two open-air Parade Services each Sunday. Of course in the heat of summer these were held at hours so early that many people in England would think them almost improper for Sunday rising. These open-air Services were necessarily short, as sometimes the sun was becoming very hot, or the wind was so strong that leaves were torn out of my book (the seed of the word literally blown away) and my surplice sent over my head and eyes. Then it was tiresome for the men to stand in a square in one position all the time. Still, the scenery around, even if the chaplain had been dumb, should have preached eloquent sermons. The blue sky ought to have suggested the Heavenly Father's smile, and the waves dashing against the rocks could scarcely have failed to illustrate, for those who saw and thought, human life.

Military chapels and chapel-schools are used at different hours by Church of England, Roman Catholic, and Presbyterian chaplains. The Royal Engineers have invented most ingenious contrivances for settling theological differences. Altars are made for Roman Catholics that are easily moved aside, covered with a screen, or taken to pieces and carried into a boarded-off receptacle, before the Presbyterian Service begins. At one station I was provided with a Communion-table and railing so cunningly contrived that it was difficult to get a church orderly who could understand how to put together the several parts. It would be well if, in civilian life, churches were as much used as is, for instance, the chapel of Netley Hospital. From seven o'clock on Sunday morning until eight in the evening, this building is scarcely idle a single hour, one denomination of convalescents and officials taking the place of another. What a saving of stone and mortar, not to speak of its utility as an aid to toleration, it would be were this practice adopted in the civilian world! As it is, there is only too much truth in the answer which a driver made to a fare who remarked, when driving through a Scotch town, that it must be a very religious place because there were so many churches in it—"It's not religion at all; it's just their bad temper!"

Every soldier and sailor is "at full liberty to attend the worship of Almighty God according to the forms prescribed by his own religion." Protestants who do not belong to the Church of England are generally classified "with either Presbyterians or Wesleyans." "Other fancy religions," as a commanding officer once described them, must, for the sake of convenience, make themselves happy somewhere amongst Church of England, Roman Catholic, Presbyterian, Wesleyan, or Jewish congregations. But what about those who do not profess any religion? Such soldiers I have met. When being enlisted they are asked their religion, and answer, "No religion," or "I don't know." The sergeant puts down "Church of England," thereby paying that Cave of Adullam a high compliment.

A man must adhere to what at first he puts down, or allows to be put down, as his religion. He can only change afterwards by getting permission from his commanding officer; and frequently this permission is asked for reasons that are anything but serious. When I hear of a soldier wishing to change what he is pleased to call his religion, I say to myself, "Who is she?"—for I know that nine times out of ten a woman is at the bottom of it.

At Bermuda the Wesleyan chapel was a mile and a half from barracks, while the Church of England Service was performed in barracks. Probably, too, I preached shorter sermons than the Wesleyan minister. At all events, several Wesleyan soldiers suddenly began to admire my form of worship, and told their commanding officer that they wished to go to the Church of England Service. He said that they must talk the matter over with me, and get me to write a statement of their reasons for desiring to change "religions." What I wrote for one man was: "So-and-so finds a march of a mile and a half disagreeable when the thermometer stands at eighty-three degrees in the shade." I know a man who wanted to attend the Roman Catholic Service rather than the Church of England for no better reason than to avoid having to help to carry some forms that were required at the latter.

A commanding officer of my acquaintance had for some time been bothered by a soldier who vacillated between the Church of England, Roman Catholic, and Presbyterian persuasions. As the man seemed to be very little persuaded about any of them, my friend said to him: "To give you an opportunity of quite making up your mind upon this important subject, you will attend all three Services until you do so." The hours for the Services happening to suit, the man was marched to all three on the next Sunday. A single Sunday like this was enough to make him give his exclusive adherence to one of these persuasions, though which it was that received his final patronage I quite forget.

Some men like to get a seat as near the door of the church as possible, or in a gallery, or, if the Service is held out of doors, as far as possible from the chaplain. Nor are commanding officers always as careful as they might be to arrange troops in the field so that they can be all reached by the voice. I used laughingly to say to one of them that he seemed to think that if heard I might exercise a bad influence upon his men. Still, with all its drawbacks, a Parade Service is a great opportunity. We have before us a large number of young and healthy men, and it is our duty to warn them against the temptations of fiery youth, and direct them to Him who, when He beheld a young man anxious about his highest interests, loved him. May God forgive some of us chaplains for not making more of these opportunities!

A PRINCE'S PART.

BY ELIZA TURPIN.

"It is a prince's part to parlon."—BACON.

PART III.—"WITH THEE AWAY!"

CHAPTER VII.

"LESSONS sweet of spring returning" were everywhere. Summer had been quietly received into Autumn's embrace, and then revengeful and jealous Winter had killed both; and now the seasons were returning good for evil and commencing life anew.

The seasons are early, in the mild south. Though it was but the end of March, the apple-blossom was out, trusting to the month to withhold its blustering character in consideration of beauty. The brave daffodil defied wind and weather, and reared its smiling head against cold and rain.

I sat outside in the sunshine gazing aimlessly at a white cherry-tree which promised much for later on. But, I reflected, it was subservient to other circumstances; for might not the "wind in a frolic" turn its jesting to earnest and rob it of its power to fulfil its vaunting resolve?

"The next step in my career will be insanity," I thought, when I had attained this degree in moralising, "for I am altering very considerably. Fancy you, Leonora Talbot, daring to philosophise! It's too ludicrous!"

But, nevertheless, spring is very lovely. No one can deny this, from poet to gourmand who remembers young ducks and green peas.

It was just the time she loved so well—Nature conquering seasons and time and all regulations, and sending forth the herald, spring, in very gladness.

"Ah, Mona, where are you?"

Was she enjoying the English spring as I was? Or was she longing, à la Browning, "to be in England now that April's there?" (or soon would be, to be exact). For, somehow, I had a notion that she was not in England.

It was nine long months since she had left us, in as impenetrable as granite—as impregnable as the rockiest fortress fiction could invent or fancy picture.

"Do you think I should be worth the name of friend if I told you where she was, so long as I know she is safe and sound and in no need?" he asked, looking me through with his keen eyes.

He had a harder task in disposing of Lord St.

"You do not appear particularly pleased to see me."—p. 810.

her idyllic service of duty and honour and quixotic notion of what was best. Despite her request, made "for my sake," aunty had tried to trace her, but not with success. She had certainly left a station two miles from St. Alvers, and in an opposite direction to Metherton, on that July morning which seemed so far back, and had booked for London. And in that chaos she had contrived to be unnoticed, I supposed; for we could find out no more.

I went, at aunty's special wish, to Mr. Howard, and begged him to disclose Mona's hiding-place. He was Alvers. Mr. Callan, who was there, told me of the stormy interview.

"May I ask by what right you are so anxious to learn Miss Talbot's place of residence, my lord?" the lawyer inquired coolly, as was his wont when dealing with unruly clients.

"You can ask what you like," fumed St. Alvers; "but, unless you deal fairly with me, I will not answer."

Mr. Howard raised his eyebrows and shrugged his shoulders indifferently.

"I do not reveal my clients' secrets, or gossip about their affairs," Mr. Howard declared.

"Not if silence is greatly to their disadvantage?" questioned St. Alvers.

"Silence seldom is disadvantageous," returned Mr. Howard. "I am a trustee of the late Mr. Henry Talbot—I stand in the light of a friend to his daughter. In what way would it benefit her if you learned her whereabouts?"

"I could give her the protection of a man who loves her," was his reply.

"She needs none. She is quite secure from any harm, and has plenty of money."

Then St. Alvers tried persuasion; and who could plead so powerfully as he? But water never rolled off the proverbial duck's back so readily as the eloquence of Lord St. Alvers failed to move the lawyer's resolve. Frustrated, fuming, he left Mr. Howard, who was as cool and collected as if they had parted after a friendly chat.

Then he went to London, and wandered aimlessly about the great city. I cannot tell whether his madness led him to expect to find Mona on the stage, and anticipate a touching reunion somewhere in the wings, when, throwing aside her newly acquired fame, she would repose in the shelter of his loving care.

He came back to St. Alvers, and threw his whole soul into the repairing of cottages with a vehemence very inconvenient to their occupants, and with a sublime disregard for expense which threatened to ruin him.

The work of renovation at the castle was continued. And, oh! how hard is the killing of hope. For all over were Mona's favourite colours chosen, and her tastes brought to bear on his choice of furniture. He remembered that Mona had once admired rose-colour, and he had the little octagon room transformed into a veritable wild-rose. It looked pretty, but decidedly unserviceable. It is a colour, I told him, which fades so quickly.

"We'll have it done over again each time it fades," he asserted, with wild extravagance.

"Rather uncomfortable for its owner," was my remark. "It will be like perpetual spring-cleaning."

It was a current idea in the village that when Mona went away she had gone to aunty. Mr. Callan advised us not to contradict it, and everyone supposed Mona to be still staying with aunty's friends. If Drake suspected differently, he was too faithful to impart his suspicions to anyone.

I had told aunty pretty nearly all the story which led to Mona's departure. Poor aunty had wept, more or less, for about a week, during which period of sackcloth and ashes she remained in her room, waited on by her own maid, old Sarah, and myself. Sarah was silent as the grave.

I tried to comfort aunty with innumerable assurances of good being hidden in evil, clouds having silver linings, roses having thorns, until I really had hope myself that all would come right in the end.

"But where can she be?" aunty would cry repeatedly. "Why did she not confide in us? And London is such a dreadful place, and Mona so lonely and inexperienced. Miss Stayne is a willow-wand in Mona's hands." She forgot she was little more herself.

"Mona has plenty of sense," I assured her.

"I have heard of girls being reduced to selling matches in the Strand, barefoot and hungry, and sleeping in those horrible low lodging-houses, where it's far worse than the Black Hole of Calcutta."

"It could not be worse," I asserted, "for lots come out safely every morning. Besides, Mr. Howard knows Mona is well provided for."

"Young girls are so often imposed upon," she persisted. "And I only saw the other day a case of a body being found in a swamp——"

"Oh! aunty, really! How could she get into a swamp—only the swamp of despair," the last inwardly. "And as for Mona's selling matches—why, it borders on the realms of impossibility."

And now March was departing with the lamb-like meekness sometimes connected with the thought of its exit—but generally somewhat mythical, and existing principally in the verses of youthful poets. In fact, it was a spring such as our grandmothers romance of: the time "when I was young," when modern depravity and bad weather were not hand-in-hand.

We were in the drawing-room, and aunty had a newspaper. Judging by her close attention to its pages, I inferred she was reading of some peril which had befallen venturesome youth.

"Nora dear, have you ever thought of a convent—a nunnery?"

"Never very much. I'm not interested in them," I replied nonchalantly.

"I mean," she went on, "do you think Mona——"

"I am sure she has not gone into a nunnery," I cried, checking a strong inclination to laugh. "She's far too sensible."

I was not afraid that Mona was treading the broad way in the shape of a convent. That path, so monotonously void of either roses or thorns, was not in her line at all.

"But," I added, "it would be better than selling matches—more comfortable and respectable. Besides, it's so easy to be good where there are no inducements to be bad."

"Mona was always so sympathetic," aunty said, as if she were referring to the dear departed, and in a tone which implied that I was not so.

I went to the cliffs and listened to the vague complaining of the ocean, and thought of my cousin, who loved their sorrowing murmur so well. That led me to think of Mr. Callan: how kind he had been to us, and how he had assured aunty of the probable safety of her absent dear one, and advised her to respect the request made "for my sake," and give up the search for Mona. He had, too, been invaluable in calming Lord St. Alvers' impetuous anger and disappointment.

"Good afternoon," exclaimed someone.

They say if you think of certain fallen seraphim they are sure to appear. Not that Mr. Callan was a seraph, fallen or otherwise; and it was he.

"Oh! it's you, is it?" I remarked, with my face unaccountably reddening.

"You do not appear particularly pleased to see me," he said.

"You are mistaken," I stammered. "I am always glad to see you. You have been such a friend to us."

"Er—yes," he began. "I mean," he corrected hastily, "not at all. At least, I have done no more than anyone would."

He was growing incoherent, so I left him to regain his usual collected speech, feeling amazed at his momentary confusion. He generally annoyed me by his unassailable sang froid.

"Has Lord St. Alvers come with you?" I asked.

"Yes; he has gone to the Abbey. Your aunt told me you were gone for a walk, so I came to find you."

"We will return," I said, rising. "Aunt and Lord St. Alvers will be weaving all sorts of fancies about Mona. The latest clue is the cloister."

He laughed. Then he became grave.

"St. Alvers is no nearer his marriage," he said.

"He vows he will not marry Lucine Darrel. She will soon press him to keep his promise, I feel sure."

"Has he seen her lately?"

"Have you not the faintest idea who is Clifford's love?"—p. 811.

"No; she has gone abroad again. I believe she is at Nice. She told him last year that she would come to England this summer. I think she intends coming to St. Alvers."

"As its mistress?" I inquired anxiously.

"Yes," he replied; "and she is determined, when she likes. She is obstinate."

He never would acknowledge the presence of any virtue in Miss Darrel. I had grown to picture her as a specimen of the dragon tribe from hearing his derogatory description of her morals.

"Do you know," he said to me, as we crossed the lawn, "I have been looking forward so much to coming to St. Alvers again!"

"It is not the same now Mona is gone," I said, with a sad little sigh.

"Ahem—no," he said, in such a curious tone that I looked up at him quickly. There was an earnestness in his face which made me wonder—wonder if the girl he loved would care for him to be so lavish with his earnest glances—which made me wonder, with a flush, if he mistook my sometimes flippantly inclined talk for coquetry. So I gazed as icily before me as I could. I did not wish him to amuse himself with me when he was at St. Alvers and away from his sweetheart's watchful eyes. I did not care to let him take me for a flirt.

"You do not suppose," he continued, probably not noticing my chilly appearance, "that Mona is the only attraction in St. Alvers, do you?"

"It is a subject I do not wish to discuss," I replied, thinking I would check any undue familiarity in the bud. He seemed startled, and, turning to look at me, must have perceived the polar-like air which enshrouded my face and person generally.

"Have I offended you?" he exclaimed.

"Not at all," I responded, as we entered the house by the French window.

St. Alvers sat talking to aunt and looking unutterably lonely; it seemed to me so impossible to sever his presence from that of our missing one. He greeted me in a kind, brotherly manner, and remarked on my rosy cheeks, glancing the while at Mr. Callan, who was occupied, it appeared, in a profound and unprofitable study of vacancy. After tea St. Alvers asked me to show him my ferns, which transparent artifice I saw through at once.

"Have you heard anything, Nora?" he asked, as he looked at an exceedingly fine specimen of the fern maidenhair, and with a barely disguised eagerness in his voice.

"Nothing," I had to tell him.

He sat down on an ornamental "rock," and sighed. Then he went over all the old ground so vastly interesting to himself, and arrived at the same old goal—nothing.

"Nora," he said earnestly, "I feel almost guilty of going against her wishes in seeking her, but I shall never be at rest until I find her."

"Why will you not marry Miss Darrel?"

"Never! Loving Mona as I do, it would be a double crime. God only knows how dear she is to me."

I did not reply. I knew he was speaking but truth.

"You are a good child, Nora," he added, "to listen so patiently to all these ravings. It cannot be very interesting to a third party—these reminiscences."

I laughed a little.

"Mr. Callan will be the next to confide in me," I said.

"What do you mean?" he asked, with a queer smile.

"He has confessed to me," I replied, "that he is in love. But he has not told me who the lady is yet."

"Oh! he will do that," St. Alvers asserted readily.

"I suppose you know all about it," I surmised, thinking of the strange conversations these two must hold, both having the great theme uppermost.

"Oh, yes! I think I do. Have you not the faintest idea who is Clifford's love?"

"Why should I have? She certainly does not live near here, because he never goes to see her when he is at St. Alvers."

St. Alvers pulled his dark moustache and laughed.

"Poor old Clifford!" he said. Then we returned to the drawing-room; for the fernery was chilly, and it was growing dark. Moreover, the fireside was comfortable at this season; for, bright as March sunshine may be, it is apt to be deceptive, and it leaves no heat behind after it sets. I do not doubt that St. Alvers was warm anywhere. Love is generally supposed to usurp both food and heat; it supplies the place of all other luxuries and many necessities.

I never missed Mona so much as when St. Alvers was at the Abbey, and I felt lonely and unhappy to-night. I believe we all felt so, for there was little conversation. I had always heard that the society of people in love is extremely dull to any but the object of their tender passion. It seemed to be true: here was St. Alvers pining for Mona, and Mr. Callan sighing (not audibly) for his love. I wondered what her name was.

The next morning, as I sat breakfasting alone (aunt was fond of her first meal in bed), the letter-bag came. I opened it. There were not many letters; we had not much correspondence at St. Alvers Abbey.

There was a somewhat bulky missive for me, directed in the handwriting of Mr. Howard, the lawyer. Opening it, I found it enclosed another letter without direction or mark on the envelope.

"Queer!" I remarked inwardly, as I prepared to read it. Merciful Heaven! it was from Mona. There was no address, no clue as to her whereabouts. I read the following—

"MY DEAREST NORA,—It is out of my weakness that I write to you; but it seems such an eternity since I saw your dear face, and that of aunt. I am sure you have all been anxious for me, but I am well and—contented. Naturally, there is not much pleasure for me, away from those I love; but I should not say this, for I do not regret the step I have taken. I dare not tell you where I am, dear Nora, for you might, out of your love to me, betray me. But it is a pretty place, and I have found plenty to do. I have Nature as I love it best, I have the companionship of a kind woman, and the solace of my own memories—and—peace from a merciful God. I am thankful there is nothing in the past which I may not think of—no dishonourable action too dark to be aught but bitterness—as there might have been if I had caused a man to break his oath.

"Oh, Nora! I cannot write of him; I dare not. For I love him so—God forgive me! I often wonder if he is at the Abbey, under the old beech-tree; or by the sea sending a message to me in the song of the waves which tells me to be firm and resolute—to fear not.

"Tell dear aunt that I am well; ask her not to be anxious for me. I am busy and occupied, and it helps me to forget—no, to remember with less sorrow. I dare not send any message to him, only to do what he knows is right, advienne que pourra.

"I hope you are happy, dear. I often think of all the village-folk, and especially of little Dick. I wonder if he is quite recovered?"

"Now, dear Nora, farewell once more. You know the event which will clear my way to return. I shall hear of it from Mr. Howard. He sends me no letters now; it is my wish, and proceeds from my weakness, as I said before.

"Farewell—farewell, my darling. Remember me in your prayers.—Your loving MONA."

CHAPTER VIII.

AUNT wept most bitterly over the letter. She read and re-read it; she examined every stroke, as if to obtain a clue as to Mona's present dwelling-place between the lines. But, figuratively as well as literally, there was nothing but a dismal blank.

The same afternoon I met St. Alvers on the cliffs. He was gazing despondingly away over the billowy waves; there was a strong wind blowing against the tide; the sun was hidden by clouds; it was cold and dull. It was like his life—duty against love, interest gone—dreariness, and no warmth of happiness to arouse his young spirit to spring forth in joy. All his energy warped as it was rising by the grey clouds around.

"I have something to tell you," I began nervously.

"Have you?" he responded, apparently not thinking of me at all, and less of what I had to impart.

"It's about Mona," I said, to rouse his wandering mind. It was supremely effectual.

"What of her?" he demanded, almost fiercely. I had thought of preparing him gradually for the news, but he frightened me.

"I have had a letter from her," I blurted out.

He gazed at me in astonishment, not unmixed with incredulity.

"Where is it?" he asked quickly. "Where is she? What does she say? Show it to me."

"She does not give any address," I told him, ignoring the rest of his questions completely. Then I began to tell him what she had said.

"But show me the letter," he interrupted.

I hesitated.

"You cannot surely refuse," he exclaimed. "Am I not more interested in her than anyone? Have I not the best right to see it?"

"You ought not to have," I said, with a sigh. He laughed, but not merrily—hardly and sarcastically. Then he changed to tenderness, and put his hand on my shoulder, entreatingly looking at me.

"Nora," he said, "you love your cousin; I love my love. Are the two feelings comparable? And yet you would not do this for me!"

I felt quite uncomfortable, and like a mild species of torturer. If I had been eating the proverbial last crust in selfish gratification of my own hunger, unsharing it with one whom I had professed to love, I could not have experienced any more guilty sensation. I wavered no longer. I gave him the coveted letter with a hot flush of shame at my own greediness. No wonder that Lord St. Alvers seldom pleaded in vain!

"Nora," he said, when he had read it through twice, "she is an angel!"

I hoped not, but did not say so. He was too deeply employed in studying his angel's handwriting to notice the silence of anything so earthly as me, his companion of this sordid sphere.

"Do you know," he remarked, "I think she is abroad somewhere. The idea of messages across the water points to it."

"I do not like the thought," I said. "I cannot bear to think that the ocean divides us."

"It may be some Breton village by the sea. Or she might go from London to Newhaven and cross to Dieppe. You have been that way, have you not, into Normandy?" he inquired rapidly.

"Yes, we have. But do not try to find her. She asks us to leave her in peace. If you found her, settled and content, it would drive her from her resting-place and from any connections she may have formed. Perhaps she would go to a far greater distance from home than she is now."

"If I found her," he said, with a smile, "I should never lose her again."

"But you said you would not ask her to share the dishonour which would fall on you."

"I should take her right away—to some village where no one would know us, and where no breath of scandal should touch her. By my life's undivided devotion I would try to atone for the sacrifice she would make in marrying me. She does not care for society and the world. I care only for her."

This idea of his was rather alarming. It was dangerous.

"You would not do that," I said quietly. "You could not. You would not cut her off from the world to gratify your own selfishness. What would people say of her?"

He was but a mortal, and no paragon. He smiled again.

"She will judge and choose, when I find her," he said.

"I dare hardly hope that you will!" I ejaculated; "for she would not be able to withstand your pleading."

I trembled to think what power a love like his must have; what an irresistible influence he would have over a girl who loved him. Mona was firm, her will was strong, but ten times ordinary resolution a woman must have who conquers love by duty. Anyway, it was of no use arguing with St. Alvers. My one hope was that he would seek her in vain.

I knew Mona too well to think she could ever be happy under the circumstances which his wild fancy had devised. Hers would be a life of unavailing, though unceasing, regret for the weakness which had caused her to yield to his undisciplined love. I was utterly miserable after that.

And everywhere a dolorous air prevailed which nearly drove me mad. St. Alvers, with his dark eyes growing eager and tired in their keen longing; aunt in a chronic lachrymose condition which suggested immediate deluge; myself with a face like a February day to look back to me from every mirror near. Even Mr. Callan was forced to join in the general gloom, probably from politeness. Moreover, "when you are in Rome," etc.

"Nora," aunt said to me one day, "this cannot last for ever."

"Hardly," I agreed. Aunt frowned.

"Don't be cynical when matters are so serious. It is so much like disgrace for a young lady to run away. People must wonder."

"It's no disgrace. It is heroism!" I cried, in hot defence of Mona. "And people must mind their own business."

"They have so little to mind in St. Alvers," aunt said regretfully.

The next day I went to see Mr. Keverne.

"Nora," he said, "I am not curious or prying, but I have heard so many conjectures as to Mona's absence that I am becoming mystified."

"It is base for any person in St. Alvers to say a word against Mona," I exclaimed. Then, knowing how safe a secret was in his keeping, I told him all the story. He was deeply moved.

"I will do all in my power to check wrong surmise," he declared. "I would do far more for her. I have lived near her all her life. I know how good she is. May God help her to do what is right, and may He keep Lord St. Alvers from rashly leading her against her sense of honour."

And I echoed his hopes.

"It is lovely April weather," aunt said to me one day, in a slightly hesitating manner, "and you do not look well. Do you think you need a change of air?"

"No. One place is the same as another," I returned, with questionable knowledge of the variations of climate and scenery. Aunt looked disappointed, and the next time Mr. Callan called in she asked him if he thought I looked "myself." He seemed doubtful.

"Perhaps a change of air—" he began, and aunt caught at the straw instantaneously.

"Just what I say. Only Nora is so reluctant to leave home. I wish I could induce her to go—with me, of course—to Brighton for a time."

He lured me to the fernery with a hackneyed and distinctly unoriginal request about showing him the ferns, "if I did not object," and then began to lecture me on the advisability of a change.

"Your aunt is evidently longing for a little diversion," he said. "It would do her a world of good."

"And would bring back my expression so that I lent; and you once told me you had never been there."

And, in less than an hour from then we had decided to sail from Southampton to St. Helier in a week from then. Aunty was almost happy again, preparing am recognised without any trouble," I suggested, with a half-smile, thinking of his hesitation when asked if I looked like "myself." He did not reply.

"Surely you are not going out in this rain?" she cried."—p. 317.

"But not Brighton," I went on. "Anywhere but that marine London. Is there no quiet place which would satisfy aunty?"

"A quiet place would be no change." That was true. Surely St. Alvers was the very type of seclusion and repose.

"Then you advocate Paris or Brussels," I said rather crossly. "Or perhaps London will be sufficient for the start."

But he only laughed.

"I think the Channel Islands are charming, especially just now," he said. "Why not go there? There are plenty of excursions; English is tolerably prevaall the different suitable toilettes she would require, and in seeing that I was properly equipped for sailing, driving, picnics, or table d'hôte. It is fortunate she was so attentive to my wants, or I am afraid a sad exhibition of dress would have amused the eyes of the visitors with whom I came in contact; for I was not at all interested in the subject. No doubt, when I saw others around me in the full glory of fashion, my concern would manifest itself; for it is unnatural in the female sex to show no desire to look as well as possible, though, to be sure, plenty of women are unsuccessful in the attempt. We have quantities of evidence that men are above the vain consideration of wearing apparel. With virtuous obedience, they "remember the lilies of the field," and that Solomon in his glory was left far behind them. And there is no scope for displaying the raiment of the wise king in this matter-of-fact nineteenth century, when wisdom is not always synonymous with wealth or with gorgeous clothes. So, if Solomon failed, how much more would the modern Englishman, whose limit of finery is a "blazer" and flannels? Hence the virtue of necessity.

St. Alvers was openly sorry that we were going. Mr. Callan did not say much about it, but then he was the promoter of it all. I began to wonder if he wished to get us away.

He came to pay us a visit the night before we were to start. I was in the fernery when he came, and so saved him the trouble of resorting to deceptive means for getting me there. He came to me.

"It will be fearfully lonely when you are gone," he remarked, with an attempt at sentimentality. Such a speech should have been accompanied by a faint sigh, but I waited for it in vain.

"You will have Lord St. Alvers," I said, unsympathetically. "And you are generally busy. Then you can write letters."

"May I?" he asked, quite eagerly.

I looked at him in astonishment, feeling a strong desire to laugh.

"May you?" I repeated. "Why, if I said 'No,' what difference would it make?"

"All the difference. As a matter of course, if you said you did not care to receive a letter from me, I should not write to you."

"I did not mean that," I exclaimed, flushing. "I meant you could write to your—to that girl you like; you can send her specially long letters written in your spare time."

"Ah! yes," he said dubiously. "But I may write to you, may I?"

He sat down by me, and laid his hand on my arm.

"If you think that other girl won't mind," I said, with a little laugh, and shaking off his hand.

"Oh! hang the other girl!" he exclaimed, so suddenly that I turned, startled, to look at him.

"That is a very ungentlemanly way of alluding to her," I said slowly.

"Nora," he said, "there is no one else. I care for no other girl. The only one I care for is by my side."

I was too much astonished to speak.

"I don't understand you," I said, after a few minutes.

"I should not have spoken yet," he said slowly, "only for that rubbish you have got into your head about someone else. I do not love any girl but you—I have loved you ever since the day I saw you in the dell. When I said I was in love, I meant it for you—I was too uncertain of you to dare to tell you. Nora, do you think you could ever care me?"

"Do you mean to say," I asked him deliberately, "that all this time you have allowed me to think a lie of you, and you have deceived me, and yet you say you—love me?"

"You do not state it fairly," he remonstrated. "I have not been guilty of deception. I have told no lie."

"You have acted one," I said curtly. "That is worse, I think."

He did not speak. A thousand thoughts thronged my brain—my mind was whirling. We sat in silence for a time, with no sound but the plash of the little fountain.

"Will you forgive me, Nora?" he implored, breaking the silence.

"I have no particular reason for forgiving you," I said, as frigidly as I could. "I have nothing to forgive. Only I must say that you have scarcely acted honourably."

"Nora, I love you. I was afraid you were so—well, inexperienced in such matters that I had better wait for a time. I hoped to let you see I cared for you before I told you so."

"You have shown your affection in a peculiar manner—by deceiving me," I said coldly. "Do you wish it returned in the same way?"

I did not wait for an answer. I left him sitting alone in the fernery, and went to the drawing-room, where auntie was holding a conversation with Lord St. Alvers on the respective merits of Jersey hotels. I joined in the conversation with a vigour at once gratifying and surprising to auntie; but, had she asked me where Jersey was, I might have been at a loss to reply, I was so cross, excited, and hot.

Thinking that Mr. Callan was probably too hardened to care for words, I tried "silent contempt." I was extremely angered; my pride was wounded; and I had meant to ask him to send me all the news of St. Alvers and be on generally friendly terms!

"He has fooled me," I thought, in a grand rage; "he has deceived me."

"Good-bye, Nora," he said, in low tones, when he was going.

"Good-bye," with indifference.

"I hope you will enjoy your trip."

"I am sure I shall," was the reply, with such heartiness as one who doubts a statement supplies to his speech.

"I shall see you again—some day," he remarked, stupidly.

"As we are not going to cannibal regions, you may do so," I agreed, icily. Then I met his blue eyes—how kind and pleading his eyes were! And yet they say that people with true eyes must be open and good!

He dropped my hand and left me. And I actually shed a few tears that night when I remembered how we can be deceived in a person. He always had seemed so very nice. But double-dealing is intolerable.

"I believe he does like me," I thought, with gratification. "It is his punishment."

I was dreadfully miserable the next day. I bade adieu to the old familiar spots and the servants with the fervency and hopelessness which befits the departure of troops to Egypt or the expectancy of returning no more. Ten months since we had never seen St. Alvers—or his friend. How heavily shod are the feet of sorrowful days! How light-winged the time that is spent in joy!

I kissed her desk, her favourite books, her pet chair. Ever and again I recalled her, in the first flush of the beauty of awakening love, to my mind. I remembered her unconscious, queenly grace, the marvel of her long, dusky eyes, and the rare tint of her tawny hair. Oh! my cousin Mona! How I long for your ready sympathy just now!

Yet why? I am surely not specially unhappy. I am having a little revenge, and it is accounted sweet. I do not wish to quarrel with any old-established proverb; but, really, are they all quite as pleasant in practice as in theory?

St. Alvers was at the station. He saw us off and bade us farewell.

"Where is Mr. Callan?" aunty inquired.

"He's getting an article ready for the—well—some magazine or other. He does that sort of thing; finds it fills up the time he spends waiting for briefs—which don't turn up."

"Oh, certainly!" aunty agreed politely.

I, not feeling the faintest interest in Mr. Callan, made no comment.

"Mr. Callan is an extremely agreeable man," aunty said, awarding him the praise which was, with her, a species of presenting the Victoria Cross to a favourite soldier. When she pronounced the verdict "extremely agreeable" on a person, we knew she regarded that person with the utmost favour.

"I am glad you think so," I said lamely, watching the fields we were speeding past.

"He is one of the few men I like," aunty said, which was the remark she made on every man she became intimate with.

"He is one of the few (very few) that I do not like," I thought.

But as I stood on the boat that same evening and watched the dark ridge of the outline of England's little garden-isle drawn against a darker mass of cloud, and, turning, might behold England's shores dotted with the lights which betoken life and civilisation, the still small voice in which that very obtrusive female, Conscience, betrays her presence whispered to me that a girl whose dearest aversion was deceit was not entirely guiltless of that same defect. And I divined the girl's name to be Leonora Talbot.

CHAPTER IX.

BABBLE and chatter! The mixture of an inimitable patois with doubtful French and shaky English; here and there a strong British roar struggling for mastery in British fashion, sometimes in its native tongue, sometimes in French which would make the angels weep.

"If you can see a respectable vehicle, Sarah, hail the driver," aunty said.

Poor Sarah looked as if she were going to her own funeral; she had experienced all the ungraceful, undignified horror of mal de mer.

"If the host is not English, aunty," I said as we drove from the quay at St. Helier, "what shall we do?"

"Find someone who is," she declared.

But he proved himself a genuine Englishman, for which I was grateful—exceedingly so.

"There are not so many visitors here," he said, "as there are vehicles on the quay. They are deceptive. But the season will be early this year; soon I anticipate a rush."

"When the throng rushes in we'll rush out," I remarked to aunty, when he had gone.

"Ah! fellow-Saxon," I thought, as I viewed my next-door neighbour at dinner. "And young, too."

I was just wondering how to discover a "fellow-feeling" when he paved the way to conversation most amiably by upsetting a glass of wine into my lobster-curry. Such a friendly overture was irresistible. We were chatting at once.

"Do you know," I said, "I am so much obliged to you for upsetting your wine."

"Why?" in amazement.

"Because it has introduced us to each other."

"You are kind. But a more agreeable method would have answered quite as well."

"You are mistaken," I assured him. "Now, if you had passed me the water or the salt, I could not have laughed. You would have put me down as a little 'off.'"

"Well, since you are satisfied," he laughed, "I can say no more. But, I assure you, I haven't done such a silly thing before."

"Oh!" I sighed, "and I was just flattering myself that it was your original method of getting to know anyone—whom you wished to know."

He laughed, and looked at me from his blue eyes. How like they were to—someone's else. But surely, I thought, I will not spoil my pleasure by thinking of him.

"How long are you going to stay here?" I asked my new friend.

"Oh! I have nothing particular to call me away—"

"Government official?" I questioned, gravely.

"Don't!" he groaned, "I am not so guilty. I am only an idler."

Here was a "fellow-feeling."

"My name is Warwick—Herbert Warwick. My home is Stanton Oakhill, Yorkshire. You may know the name."

"Perhaps aunty will," I said, turning to her.

She said she had often heard the name mentioned by her friends of his county. She expressed herself as charmed to make his acquaintance. I felt rather pleased to know there was a—well, young man, near just to pass the time away.

He was down on the quay the next morning when I took a stroll that way. We watched the St. Malo boat steer through the rocky course away into the opal water and into dark green and violet-red shadows, and then walked back together. He was interesting, and not bad-looking.

"I came up with Mr. Warwick," I said to aunty; "I like him awfully."

"That's a doubtful expression—very," aunty remarked. "But, Nora dear, I do not think I should flirt too much with him."

"Flirt!" I cried. "Oh! do give me time to start before you reprove me."

"You certainly do show a partiality for the—other sex," she said. "I used not to credit Mona's assertions when she declared you were—"

"Not a flirt," I said. "I've had no chance—worse luck!" I added inwardly.

A few days later we were at dinner.

"There are some new arrivals," Mr. Warwick said to me.

"Any—I mean, who are they?"

"There's a gentleman—he's elderly, so don't look pleased. I think he has the gout, so I deduce bad-tempered. Then there's an elderly lady and a young one."

"Last, but not least," I laughed. "Are you not glad?"

"Completely overjoyed. Did you not notice a sort of suppressed excitement in my eyes when I came in?"

"If I had looked at them, I might have seen the emotion," I replied calmly. "Why, here they are!"

"Her face was white, and her eyes closed."—p. 813.

as the door opened, and three people entered with a stir and a bustle.

The girl was unique in her way. She was dazzling. Her hair was of purest gold, sheeny and abundant. Her eyes were like azure lakes of limpid, sparkling, melting liquid. Though not pretty in features, her style was captivating. Finding my gaze fixed on her alluring face, she assumed a conscious, prepared-to-be-admired expression which robbed her of seven-eighths of her beauty in an instant.

"Cher oncle, voulez—" she began in a clear, high-pitched voice.

"I'll vooley nothing," the cher oncle growled. "I hate the 'chopping French.' Give me good sensible English, and be content."

The slight, habitual frown between her high eyebrows was accelerated just a little.

"I beg your pardon. But it is the natural way to me—to speak in the French. I will try to rid myself of the péché mignon."

"At it again," her uncle said, in high disgust. "We'll have a missionary box, and you shall pay a fine every time you forget yourself."

"In a half-hour I should ruin myself," she declared.

He gave her up, and turned his attention to the elder lady.

"Have you quite recovered, Mrs. Frith?" he asked.

"Thank you, Mr. Darrel, almost. But I have not—"

What she had not I did not hear. The sudden, sickening truth had flashed into my mind with horrifying plainness. Why had I not known, the minute I beheld that golden-haired siren, that she was Lucine Darrel, and no other?

The room was receding—yellow hair, blue eyes, white hands were hopelessly mixed up with ferns and flowers, and floating away into space. With a mighty effort I brought my senses back.

I ate my dinner as well as I could. Auntie had not heard the name Darrel, and she suspected nothing; but when I reached our own room I turned to her, unable to keep the knowledge to myself.

"Auntie," I gasped, "did you see that girl?"

"Girl!" auntie ejaculated, looking round the room as if to find someone there.

I laughed.

"You are decidedly hysterical. No, no," auntie declared. "Do collect yourself. Here are the salts."

I threw the smelling-bottle aside.

"The girl with the yellow hair—" I began again.

"Yes, dear, I know," auntie said, soothingly. "She won't come here."

I subsided into a wild fit of merriment. When I recovered I was more collected.

"It's Lucine Darrel, auntie!" I said. "It's the girl who drove our dear one from her home."

"Gracious!" aunty exclaimed; "and is she mixing with respectable people? She ought to have a mark of Cain or—something," aunty wound up vaguely.

"Look here, aunty," I said, "she does not know us. Let us not know her. We'll just remain here and say nothing, and perhaps in time I can get to know her and tell her how unhappy she has made us. Then, just think, dear; we can advertise for Mona in an Agony Column—Come home at once; all made right. Then we shall all be happy."

"I think those things usually happen in books, not in real life," aunty demurred; but eventually she gave in, and we stayed.

Strange as it may sound, in a cool, unloving manner, Lucine Darrel and I became friendly. The day after she arrived was wet; but, in the afternoon, I was so tired of the small sitting-room that I took a cloak and prepared for a walk. On the stairs I met Miss Darrel.

"Surely you are not going out in this rain!" she cried. "But evidently you are English."

"I am," I replied, with conscious pride of the fact.

"Ah!" she retorted, "that is why you go out in the rain; it is you English who are so fearless. You boast of it—glory in it. You create opportunities to exhibit your courage."

"I'm not creating this one," I said, smiling. "But are you not English?"

"Parentage is nothing. Man is a creature of circumstance, and my circumstances have been wholly French; therefore am I not English," was her reply, given with a very expressive shrug. "But adieu! it is of no consequence."

She went to her novel, and I went my walk; but I would rather have stood out in the pouring rain until I died (which would not be long) than be Lucine Darrel for ten minutes.

"Have you enjoyed your walk?" she inquired at dinner.

"Immensely!" I assured her. "It does one good to weather the storm."

She laughed.

"The ethics of the weather is not a suitable subject for this dismal day," she said.

She sang to us in the salon after dinner a silly French love-song, which I am sure she despised as much as I did; for she came to me after and said it was very senseless.

"You do not believe in love?" Mr. Warwick asked.

"Certainly I do," she replied. "In some kinds. It is a luxury, and is not a necessity. Of course, it is useful for the novelist and the poet. It is their leading string."

"Lucine!"

Her uncle called her, and she went.

"Do you think love is a necessity?" Mr. Warwick asked me.

"Yes, I do. I could not live if I did not love aunty and Mona—I am sure I could not."

"No, of course. But other love?"

"I don't know of any other kind," I declared, with the most daring gravity.

Then our eyes met, and we laughed.

"But who is Mona?" he asked.

"My cousin," I said shortly. "I must go to aunty; she will think I am neglecting her."

"If you go, you will be neglecting me," he said.

"It will do you good," I retorted, smiling as I left him.

Several times I went for a stroll with Lucine Darrel. I found underneath her fascination and brilliancy was an undercurrent of calculation and coldness which might easily flow over a bed of malice and hatred. Her vileness was hidden under that smiling mask—nay, perhaps not hidden, but veiled. It peeped forth from her languishing eyes—it showed itself in the frown between her brows. It almost shone on her sparkling teeth.

Mrs. Frith was afraid of her. Who she was and what she was Lucine did not say. I took her to be a chaperon for Miss Darrel—one of the kind who is never in the way.

Mr. Warwick had arranged an excursion for the Darrel party and ourselves. He promised to show us the loveliest, most secluded spot imaginable. Lucine, as she declared, abhorred secluded spots; but then what else was there to do "pour passer le temps?"

"I do not like to associate with anyone of the kind," aunty said. "But I suppose we must go."

"Is not the scenery lovely?" I asked Lucine, as we drove through the well-kept lanes, past blooming orchards and laughing valleys.

"Ah! yes," she replied vaguely. "It's like all other scenery—trees, flowers, hills, valleys, and the sea. Sometimes they are differently arranged—the trees thrown out, or the flowers dead. Now the sky is blue, now grey, now crimson. One time the trees are miserably brown—then they are startlingly green. Some views are pretty, some splendid, some divine, others sublime. The choice of descriptive adjectives is a matter of skill. Voilà tout!"

"You bring it down to very little," I remarked.

"The Park on a May afternoon is worth all these," she said, smiling strangely. "There toilette is not wasted on birds and donkeys, or a few rustics. It makes others long for it. Here no one is envious or even charmed."

"Certainly not," I assured her, with laughing emphasis. She amused me, despite her worldly ideas and scheming nature. Perhaps Mona's words were true, and there was an element of good in all things and in everyone.

St. Edyn's Bay was a lovely spot—that unexpected blending of sea and land so unique in Jersey. Here the beauty of a wooded valley—then at once a crescent bay with white waves breaking on silver sand.

Lucine, Mr. Warwick, and I started for a stroll over the rocks after our picnic lunch, leaving the elder ones to rest by the sea. Miss Darrel's high-heeled shoes, more adapted for the Bois than for climbing, continually threatened to work her downfall. I was used to rocks and pools, and found it comparatively easy walking.

"Do you know," Lucine said to me later on, "you never told me where you live."

I felt a sudden fright. Had she looked into the visitor's book and seen our names there, with "St. Alvers Abbey, Devonshire," following? Had she known all along who we were? I did not know that St. Alvers had never told her one fact concerning the girl who had won his heart.

"I live in Devonshire," I told her, as indifferently as I could. What a practised deceiver she was! The name did not cause her to flinch or to colour in the least.

"Ah! Devon. Have you many acquaintances near to you? Do you visit much?"

"None at all," I said, thinking that our visiting people and acquaintances would amount to nil in her estimation.

She was standing on the extreme edge of a shallow precipice which overlooked some jutting rocks which reared their heads from the breakers. The seething sound of the water rushing amongst them was blending with the metallic shriek of sea-birds. Mr. Warwick stood a little way off, looking over at the white foam and listening to the cries of the birds which exult in solitary wildness.

"Do you know," Miss Darrel asked with studied unconcern, "a place called——"

And that sentence was never finished. She somehow or other lost her footing, and fell over the cliff on to the rocks below. It was not far to fall, but the rocks were sharp and dangerous, and I heard a loud human shriek over the rushing waters and birds' cries. Oh! surely she was not hurt seriously? I dared not think of the worst.

Mr. Warwick was over in a minute. I went to the side, and looked down. She was still then. Her face was white, and her eyes closed.

He was holding her in his arms. I saw at once that he alone could never lift her from the rocks. Every flat surface was brown and slippery. Foothold there was none.

"If you can find help," he called, "I can hold her for a time. Go to a cottage. The tide is coming in, so be quick.

I turned in from the coast, where all was noisy with the waves' roar, to the quiet valley. There were a few cottages, and I arrived breathless at the nearest—one with a pretty lawn and a rhododendron shrubbery before its white walls. I ran across the lawn to the rose-covered porch.

Inside was a lady, knitting. I commenced, in English, to ask for assistance. She lifted her head as I drew near, for I began my excited speech before I reached her.

When I saw her face, I stood still in the pathway and remained speechless.

"Miss Stayne!" I gasped. It was she. She viewed me in the anxious, hesitating way we regard a welcome visitor come at the wrong time. She turned to the door as it opened from within.

Into the porch stepped a figure—tall, graceful, thinner than of yore. I flew to grasp it, in a peculiar feeling that it might vanish again. A voice which had been lost to my ears through weary months exclaimed in rich, full accents—

"Nora!"

"Is it you?" I asked slowly, in an imbecile way, as if I could mistake her! "Oh! Mona."

DRINKING AT THE BROOK.

BY THE VERY REV. THE DEAN OF ARMAGH.

"He shall drink of the brook in the way, therefore shall He lift up the head."—PSALM cx. 7.

THESE are the closing words of the most remarkable of all the Psalms. That Psalm is more often quoted in the New Testament than any other passage in the Old; to it our Lord Himself appealed against the notion that Christ was no more than a descendant of their ancient kings; and it is to-day the greatest difficulty in the way of certain modern views about the Psalter. Moreover, it is the very foundation of the great Epistle to the Hebrews since it first proclaimed to Israel that its Messiah should be a priest; and, in joining this office with that of a conquering monarch, it proclaimed the utter downfall of the Jewish system, which gave these functions to altogether different tribes.

This verse itself has had many curious and surprising explanations, of which it is enough to say that their too deep subtlety, their wire-drawn ingenuity, refutes them. When a verse is obscure, and when we are certain of the translation and the context, we may reckon on finding two sorts of explanation, one sort of which we say, "Who would ever think of that?" and another, which makes us ask, "Why did I never think of that before?" Only the latter is a real explanation. Sometimes it is difficult to find the true meaning of a verse, and sometimes, when found, it makes a severe demand on our attention to work it out, but always, when really grasped, we find it straightforward and informing.

Now, such an explanation of this verse is not hard to find.

For consider of Whom it is asserted.

Jehovah has set Him on His own right hand, has sworn to Him, has made Him an eternal Priest. Every enemy is to be struck down. His favour and glory are to be supreme. And all this is spoken in the East, where magnificence of robes, of equipage and of festivity, every splendour and every luxury, go to the popular notion of high rank.

But yet they tell us that Eastern peoples are more easily impressed than any others by the strength of character which can lay all such indulgence on one side.

The plain coat of an English governor, the hardy self-exposure of English officers, are more wonderful to them than the royal state of Solomon, which left the Queen of Sheba no more breath in her.

That is true in everything which a great critic said about fine writing: the only style that never goes out of favour is simplicity.

And so the Psalmist writes of "his Lord" at the right hand of Jehovah, that He shall be refreshed along His conquering march, not with the rich wines of Helbon cooled in the snows of Lebanon, but, like any private soldier, from the wayside brook. And He shall need refreshment, having taken His full share of toil; without water, He should have begun to droop and faint: because He shall drink of the brook by the way, therefore He shall lift up His head.

This completes and closes the view of Messiah given us by this noble psalm. Already we knew of His high favour, His splendid and various offices, His magnificent and decisive victories. But now we find Himself, a Captain worthy to be followed, sharing with His men the dust, the heat, the weariness, the burning sun and thirst.

We are reminded of an historical event, when the troops of Charles the Twelfth, in sore distress and half inclined to mutiny, brought him a specimen of their bread, which was hard and sour and black. But, to their astonishment, the king ate it with a relish, and quietly answered: "It is not good bread, but it can be eaten." There was no more thought of mutiny in that camp, nor will such a leader ever lack men to follow, to suffer, and to die with him.

We march with a Captain who makes common cause with the humblest. The contrast in this verse between a splendid destiny and the simplest life was never so true of any as of Him. This contrast is what moves Paul to astonishment in the words, "God sent forth His Son, born of a woman, born under the law." We have not an high-priest who cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmity, but was tempted in all points like as we are, weary, athirst, and faint.

1. See how true this is of the lowest part of human life, the life of the body. For thirty years Jesus lived the frugal and simple life of a carpenter's son in a quiet village among the hills of Galilee. His first recorded temptation was to break His fellowship with us by claiming miraculous supplies, at least of bread; but this help, which He gave to others, He would not Himself employ. Never once did Jesus use His special powers for Himself to make a difference between His life and ours, or drink of other streams but such as ran by the wayside for all. His first miracle is to make large supplies of wine for a marriage feast; but, for His own part, He will sit by the wayside fountain, waiting, and will ask a lost woman to bestow on Him a cup of cold water. The fever of His cruel death was alleviated by the vinegar, the sour wine, of the private soldiers beneath His cross. Even after His resurrection, when He had already entered upon that sublime and mysterious life which it is our highest hope to share, He did not scorn to take of the fish which they had drawn from the Lake of Galilee, and, again, even of the cold fish which remained from a former meal.

How does the simple, unsophisticated, hard life of the Son of the Highest, whom God has enthroned at His own right hand, yet who drank of the brook by the way, condemn our softness, our self-indulgence, and our ostentation!—

"How do Thy mercies close me round!
For ever be Thy name adored!
I blush in all things to abound:
The servant is above his Lord."

2. Observe, however, that He does drink. You will not find one innocent pleasure, which came "in the way" to Jesus, and which He sourly or wilfully refused. He would leave a feast at once if called by Jairus to a sick-bed; but He knew that He was reproached for eating and drinking, nor would He refuse the feast of His friends in Bethany, though He felt His death so near that the ointment then poured upon Him would go with Him to His burial. How does His example affect us? We may refuse pleasures because we are weak, because temptations must be avoided, because we have no longer any choice except to cripple our life, or having two feet to be cast into hell fire, but this is not a thing to boast of. Or, like St. Paul, we may deny ourselves for our weak brother's sake, which is an honour, and a Christ-like thing; but the rule, apart from special cases, is that the best and truest life welcomes and is refreshed by all simple pleasures which sparkle and sing by our life's path, which do not require us to leave the road of duty that we may drink of them.

3. It is touching and wonderful to notice how true is this verse, as concerns the affections, the life of the soul of Jesus. Think of Him in the beginning with God, and then listen to Him saying, "I call you no more servants, but I have called you friends." "I say unto you, My friends." "Ye are they that have continued with Me in My tribulations." "Our friend Lazarus sleepeth." Think of the head of John reclining in His bosom, and hear the disciple asking little confidential questions, unrepulsed. We do not realise, though we confess the wonder, the condescension and the love of it, or else we would press nearer to Him; we would give our hearts to Him more frankly, knowing that He is still the same, that there is joy, open and frank, in the presence of the angels over one sinner that repenteth.

4. Not even yet have we exhausted the teaching of this verse. It is more marvellous still to think of the spiritual life of Jesus nourished and refreshed by the same means of grace which are available for us every one. As if we saw Him rise from the right hand of God, to stoop by the wayside and drink from the rills of earth, so does our heart burn within us when we observe our Master's constant use of the very means of grace which we so little value. Our prayers—how short they are, how formal, how easily interrupted. But He rose up a long while before day or continued all night in prayer: He prayed as He came forth from Jordan at His baptism, and when He chose the Twelve, and when He had fed the five thousand, and when He was transfigured, and in the garden. We easily absolve ourselves from public worship; but He was careful to frequent the synagogues, and attended the festivals in Jerusalem. We neglect the Supper of our Lord, concerning which He said, "Do this in remembrance of Me"—for My sake, do it; but with desire He desired to eat this passover with His people before He suffered. We rely on our own judgment and our conscience, and few of us make it a duty to instruct our conscience and keep it sensitive by constant study of God's Word. But He was never at a loss for spiritual lessons from the Old Testament, saying on every emergency, "It is written."

It is surely a bitter rebuke to us every one, that anyone watching our Master and His followers might suppose that He it was who needed help the most—that we were much the better able to dispense with it.

The brooks that refreshed Him on His march are not dried up; nor are they, like Solomon's fountain, sealed. And if our pilgrimage appears too long for us, if our spirits flag and our heads droop, can we wonder at this, as long as we neglect any help or ordinance which God has appointed, which Christ was not too proud to use? Let us follow His example, and we also shall grow brave again, and vigorous, and upright; drinking of the waters that are so free, so plentiful, and so refreshing, we also shall lift up our head.

THAT PEACEFUL TIME.

BY THE VERY REV. A. K. H. BOYD, D.D., LL.D., AUTHOR OF "THE RECREATIONS OF A COUNTRY PARSON," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER IV. ALWAYS SOMETHING.

T was not far North, in that quiet place often thought of:

but elsewhere, in a region which some would esteem as somewhat towards the North too. They were walking along a wooded avenue, and were drawing near a kindly dwelling, linked in memory with several who have gone away. Was it not yesterday that the venerable lord of that pleasant spot told the writer how he had brought a lovable genius, who was "dwining," there for a space of rest: and how the genius, feebly walking forth, sat down in the west wind under a blossoming tree, and looked about, and just said Paradise? There is a turn, near the house, where a vista has been deftly cut through branches, a round opening, where green leaves frame the picture of a little town, two miles off, and far below: dark towers and ruins cutting against the blue sea. They stood, and gazed in silence: and one said, quietly, but with pride, and not with intention of conveying information, That's Sin Tam-drevce. It seems odd to the stranger, though not to those accustomed to it, to hear the sacred name so pronounced. But surely, speaking of so solemn a place, one ought to speak accurately, and not without deliberation. The writer will not be hurried, uttering such a name. Let us say SAINT ANDREWS!

"He was educated there," one of the pilgrims went on, "the man we were talking of." Then the speaker went on: "He's a born orator: no man more so. Tulloch, who taught him any theology he knows, used to say that once on a time he was standing in the quadrangle of St. Mary's College, when the future preacher came in to make complaint of some injustice done him in the matter of a small scholarship. Tulloch had never seen the youth before. But our lost Principal was wont to declare that though in after years he beheld the orator sway-that mattered not. Criticism was impossible, then and there. The enthusiasm was tremendous. And there was not much in some of the stories: but how they were told! One comes back. A mother, questioned as to her daughter's approaching marriage. "A nice marriage?" "Just delightful, charming. Everything we could wish but only one. That is, the lassie just canna thole the man: she just hates him. But there maun aye be a something."

"Looked about and just said, 'Paradise?'"—p. 820.

ing a crowd of thousands, he never heard him so eloquent as when, with intense feeling, he told the story of his wrongs on that departed day. He was but a poor lad. But he was pleading for very life. And there was no question as to the pathos with which he did it."

Ever so many years after, when he was an old man, and had risen just as high as he could rise in that vocation, I was present where he was charming near four thousand people, playing upon the human mass like a great player on a grand organ; and eliciting the instant response whether in tears or smiles. Not quite smiles, indeed: rather howls. He told many stories, which had but a distant connection with his subject: but Anything in the nature of reflection on this touching legend would be superfluous. Suffice it to say that the narration was received with immense applause and laughter. Nobody appeared to have a thought for the poor girl, constrained to marry a wealthy and respectable man whom she detested. Possibly the reason was that nobody believed the story. I have no doubt whatever it was a pure invention. I do not say it was invented by the wild orator. But it was devised by somebody else. And then he accepted it, without any use of the higher criticism.

But the principle is sound. "There is aye a something." Long ago, I was talking with a worthy man, a Scotch parson, to whom a loss had befallen. The woman with the finest voice in his choir had got married, and gone far away. "It's a loss," he said. "But as ae door steeks, another opens. Something else will come and make up."

The words were wise. But let them not now be understood in the sense that when one good thing is taken, some other good thing will come and take its place. They are to be taken in quite a different sense : or (as I think I have heard my boys express it) "the other way about."

When some great trouble is taken away (and such an event sometimes comes, even in this troublesome world), for a while you are most thankful. You have peace : for a brief space, even what may be called perfect peace. But, gradually, when the real heavy sorrow has ceased to press you down, other lesser ones, forgotten in its black presence, assert themselves : come forward : grow in bulk and weight, and demand your attention to them. Circumstances in your lot, vexatious circumstances, but so small that a fortnight ago you would have been ashamed to think of them, begin to vex you now. I am supposing them real, these worries : but if all real troubles go, fanciful ones will come. Morbid fears : foolish remembrances of sorrows gone by long ago, and best forgot : vivid and stinging revival of old and even childish wrong-doings : till the needful normal amount of disquiet is here again. "There maun aye be a something." A certain degree of disquiet is due : has to be. Anything will serve as a peg to hang it on. You thought you would be perfectly thankful and peaceful if that great cross were lifted off you which for years has embittered your life : if only such health and strength were in your home as are in countless others : if some anxious work were well finished which you fear to die and leave unfinished, knowing that then it can never be finished at all : if some modest measure of success were at length permitted to crown hard and weary work which hitherto has come to nothing. And truly, when you come to know, you will be startled to find the deep assurance in many men of their ill-luck. I am not to write high-flown sentiment : or I might remind you of the firm faith which Dickens had, as you may discover in his most charming book, that if a man marries the right woman, it will be, for the grand matter of soul-satisfaction, exactly the same as if he went to heaven. Ah, look to the first page of your St. Augustine : and read : and remember. "Thou hast made us for Thyself : and our heart is restless till it resteth in Thee !" Much rubbish the Saint wrote : even such were the words to me of good Dr. Lindsay Alexander, pretty nearly his best Editor : but here are the words of true inspiration. Now, suppose such success sent as comes to one in a million : such a lot and such a home as come to one in a hundred thousand :

suppose the chiefest worldly blessing which can come to ageing folk, what homely Scots call "a well-doing family" : and have you not known how in such a case the ghosts of past care, humiliation, ill-usage, injustice, foolishness and wrong-doing, waken up and dog and haunt the unthankful recipient of blessings beyond number ? I have known "the dark ages" (so he called them) never cease from the memory of one of the most honoured and successful of men : the terrible struggle of those anxious years, long past and gone : the bitter recollection of having been victimised and cheated by smug folk who if they had any conscience were certainly never troubled by it : the sore memory (in brief) of a host of sleeping sorrows which ought never to have been awaked.

Do not say that all this is morbid : as though thus you made an end of it. I tell you it is common in human experience. The shadows of the prison-house, long escaped from, darken the sunshine and the freedom of this better day.

I have known one who, when great success came to him, and great popularity, never could get away from the bitter thought how he had been pinched and despised through years when he was just as deserving as now. When Edmund Kean, half-starved, was acting in barns to a handful of ignorant bumpkins, he was just as great a genius as when he was crowding Drury Lane. Dickens tells frankly how, at the zenith of fame, he wept aloud when he thought of the neglected little boy he had been. I knew the meaning of a line I read at the end of a manuscript sermon, written on the evening of a day on which it had been given to a dense multitude of educated folk. It ran thus : "First preached at Kennaquhair to forty-three people : several of them sound asleep."

There are those who, when anniversaries come round, will go back upon the awful blow that fell as on this day these years ago. And the old-time comes over them, in a grievous way. I am not thinking of the day on which one died : that ought to be "kept" for evermore : and the remembrance does good, not harm. I am thinking of crushing and humiliating trouble : sorrow darkened by shame. Pass from that, my friend. I do not say that madness lies that way : but of a surety ingratitude for the past and distrust for the future.

I have known those who for fear of growing conceited, resolutely and successfully put away the recollection of cheering things. This without any affectation. Hardly a soul, but themselves, knew the stern discipline they underwent. It was needless. Quite enough of takings-down will come, to keep us humble. That is, unless we be foolish quite beyond words.

There was a man, long ago, who told me how after many years of wearing anxiety, he came to a time in which he had absolutely no troubles at all. He had got (as Charles Kingsley said) "all he had ever wished, and more than he had ever hoped." It was all sunshine for a little space. He hardly knew himself for the same being. But then the something came: the something which has to be. He was possessed by an idea, which he could not dismiss, that somehow all the little provision he had made for his children would be lost. And this, for weeks of a bright summer, made up the normal load of care. It is certain that human beings set in the highest places, great nobles and kings, have had the heart taken out of all they possessed by the Red Terror: the fear of a smashing-up of society; of anarchy. A decent mortal, not in any way noble, but a humble retainer (he had got made a baronet for services rendered to an unimaginable monarch), said to an official of the London and Birmingham Railway who wanted to survey his little fields, that he would fight against railroads to the last, for "they would ruin the noblesse of England!" Poor soul! The "noblesse" was not ruined at all, but made a very good thing of selling land to the companies. But supposing for a moment that the "noblesse" could only hold on if the millions were prevented from travelling about (even as the American slave-holders could keep their place only while the slaves were not suffered to read and write), I fancy the nation would soon have made up its mind. It is self-evident now that the thing to be thought of is "the greatest happiness of the greatest number."

But there is entire freedom from fanciful fears in the family which looked out on this world through that little "window in Thrums." The man who works for eighteen shillings a week, thankful that his little children have their daily bread, has no alarm for a smashing up of society. And Southey, thankful towards the end of an honoured and laborious life when in a certain February he saw the means of support provided to the end of the year, would never be disquieted about the possibility of being bit by a mad dog, or of mass being some day said in St. Paul's, or of the Athanasian Creed ceasing to be said on certain great days. Very urgent and substantial possibilities of want and sorrow are in the foreground: and they quite shut out the view of transcendental eventualities. These urgent possibilities are very real: very terrible sometimes: but they deliver us from everything else: even as a mortal disease keeps off all lesser illness. But there must always be something. Ah, "born to trouble, as the sparks fly upward": that is, trouble will come as certainly, as naturally, as the sparks ascend. To "live happily ever after" is a thing which cannot be. And a very great trouble, crushing you down, is good for you in divers ways. It makes you absolutely forget lesser vexations: such cease to be, in that sombre presence. It takes the nonsense out of you: it sobers you: in a wonderful way. And it holds you in continual and most real dependence on Somebody who can feel for you and sustain you: who only can. In fact, it brings you to your knees. I am quite sure that most men and women who are going down towards the sunset have found this out by abundant experience.

If you get everything this world can give (one man in a million has done so), you grow sick of "the whole concern": to use Professor Aytoun's classical phrase. Perhaps, like the wicked old Duke of Queensberry, you are possessed by morbid longings for that which cannot be: as that the Thames should run dry. When someone said how beautiful a spot he had by that royal river, he said, in a voice which forbade the thought of affectation, "Oh that wearisome river! always running on, and never will run away!" Without supposing that, I fancy that nowhere does life turn to such listless vegetation as in some grand dwellings. How children remember! I was a little boy, not ten years old, when I heard a great lady, to whom someone had spoken of the loveliness of the scenes amid which she lived, say with a weary sorrowful voice, "It's not life: it's vegetation." I never named the incident till now. But I understood it as well as I do to-day. I said to my little self, "I thought people living in a place like this must be happy: but I see they're not." There comes back to-day, too, out of the misty past, another voice, strange in a child's ear. A woman too. "It's not trees and rivers one wants: it's men and women!" Ah, sad, sad, was that woman's after career! One thought it strange, a little later, to mark how the girls of a family of exalted estate, living in one of the most beautiful domains in the land, continually came forth from the Paradise within, to walk for miles along the public road which skirted it. There was the craving for change: the longing to break bounds. You understand. I am not thinking at all of the "satiety" of that vile humbug Childe Harold, who, while posing as one weary of everything, was in fact in a flutter of anxiety as to the success of the book in which he explained that he cared nothing for anything. He, and his delineator, were not so much very bad fellows, as extremely silly fellows, thinking it fine to be bad: and taking credit for having done many evil things they never did: even like certain contemptible idiots I have known. I was but a youth when I heard one such talking in phrases which were grammatically penitential of the terrible ill-doings of his life, and the view he had got of the rottenness of refined society. It was extremely plain that the real spirit was one of windy boastfulness : boastfulness of evil which in fact he had never done at all. I would have given much, that I might pat him upon his empty head : and say, "Oh, poor Rattle, you are a tremendous fool !"

surrounded with worldly blessings, kept vexing his soul because thirty years before he had been very ill-used, and that for a long time. I have known another who got up the inevitable something, by continually recalling how he had been

" 'It's not life, it's vegetation.' "—p. 823.

But while Byron and all his heroes were contemptible impostors, it is quite certain that mortals in no degree romantic, or even interesting, have of a truth attained to that general dissatisfaction which silly youths used to think very grand. I remember, vividly, a sour old man of no worldly standing, who, all his personal wants being fully provided for, and he having no one dependent upon him, did in fact attain to a discontent very analogous to that which made Porson, on a memorable occasion, ban "the nature of things." As he could only put his position in homely verse, people only laughed at him. But he was just as rational as Childe Harold, and a great deal more sincere. The refrain which closed each verse of his lyric poem ran as follows :

"As sure as daith I'm weary of the haill rickmatick."

The upshot of the matter is that if for any considerable time there be nothing really wrong, you will by-and-by invent or imagine something. I do not mean to grumble about. You don't grumble. But to be secretly unhappy about. I am not describing insanity. Only one who, when bullied at school. And one who, having risen high, and gained a reputation for wisdom, would harp (to a special friend) on the depressing fact that at a certain period of his early life, he had been (in his present judgment) quite the greatest fool in history. No doubt he had been. But few remembered it save himself. And he never forgot it at all.

Let me recall to the reader's memory certain lines of Archbishop Trench :—

"Some murmur when their sky is clear,
And wholly bright to view,
If but one spot of cloud appear
In their great heaven of blue.
And some with thankful love are filled,
If but one streak of light—
One ray of God's good mercy—gild
The darkness of their night."

Ah, my reader : the "some" are the selfsame people, taken at different times !

A closing word. Easily borne now is the sorrow, lifelong, and piercing, which is all over : easily borne, I mean, by survivors : even by such as would have sympathised deeply with it while it still lasted on. There is a pathetic fallacy here,

We recall with a smile what was no smiling matter to the poor soul who felt he had spoiled his life. "Ah, that worthy man: what a home his wife gave him for near fifty years. But it is all over now." Yes: but it is not a truism to say it was not over while it lasted. He was a pattern of staid wisdom: and his wife was a hopeless fool. He was an example of all the proprieties: and his wife barely kept out of the Divorce Court. Think of the wretched Premier, with a home which is matter of tragic history. Think of the miserable Lord Chancellor: how did he live and work at all? But then they are dead: and in the biographies the facts were lightly passed over. The thing may be briefly told in a half-page, and nearly forgot by the reader, which brooded like a black cloud over half a century of life: and made peace impossible.

They never tell, these wretched illustrious ones, what vulture is tearing, as at Prometheus. Nobody mentions what everybody knows. But that did not mend things, while the awful time dragged on. It was a terrible reality in its day, though the day is ended now.

INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

SEPTEMBER 16TH. JESUS AT JACOB'S WELL.

To read—St. John iv. 7—26. Golden Text—verse 14.

INTRODUCTION. After the conversation with Nicodemus at Jerusalem, Jesus and His disciples went into the country parts of Judaea, and there His disciples (iv. 2) baptised. Great crowds came about Him, attracted by His words, and probably by a report of His miracles. John the Baptist's disciples told him of the success of Christ's teaching, which drew forth from him a beautiful testimony to Jesus Christ as the Son of God. After that, Jesus left Judaea for Galilee, passing of necessity through Samaria. He came to Sychar (or Shechem), the first place at which Abraham stopped when he entered Canaan. (Gen. xii. 6, 7.) Here the bones of Joseph were buried. (Josh. xxiv. 32.) It lay between the Mounts Ebal and Gerizim. The well dug in the solid rock with water still remains.

I. LIVING WATER. (7—15.) The story. Christ, weary with journey and heat, sits on well. Disciples gone to buy food for mid-day meal. A woman of the city comes to draw some water. Christ asks for some—she is much surprised. Between Samaritans and Jews an old enmity. Former opposed Ezra when rebuilding Temple. (Ezra iv., v.)

Built a grand rival Temple on Mount Gerizim. Christ begins to tell her of the living water. What is it?

The Holy Spirit, which gives life to man's soul. In what ways is the Holy Spirit like water? It is God's gift to all who ask. (St. Luke xi. 13.) Its sources are deep in Rock of Ages. (1 Cor. x. 4.) It never fails, but gives strength which lasts.

It refreshes weary—with love, joy, etc. (Gal. v. 22.) It must be partaken of daily and eagerly.

It wells up within a man's heart, and its blessings last unto everlasting life.

The woman at once asks Christ to give her some.

II. HIDDEN SIN. (16—19.) A command.

Jesus tells her to fetch her husband and return.

He shows that He knows all secrets of her life.

The work of Holy Spirit is to convince of sin. (xvi. 8.)

So her heart is touched. She admits Christ is a prophet.

III. TRUE WORSHIP. (20—26.) (a) Where?

Is Jerusalem the necessary place for worship?

Why is not Samaritans' Temple equally good?

Both these Temples will soon be destroyed.

Soon every place will be open to God's worship.

(b) What? Samaritans' worship very imperfect.

Jews had knowledge of God in their Scriptures.

Soon all the world shall worship true God.

(c) How? No longer in types and outward things.

But with true, inward, spiritual religion.

God is Spirit—can only be met by man's spirit.

True worship is praying always in spirit. (Eph. vi. 18.)

LESSONS. 1. With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation.

2. "O Lord, Thou hast searched me out, and known me."

3. "Lord, teach us to pray."

SEPTEMBER 23RD. CHRIST'S PEACEFUL REIGN.

To read—Is. xi. 1—9. Golden Text—verse 9.

INTRODUCTION. Isaiah prophesied near the end of the Kingdom of Judah, at a time when the Assyrians were oppressing the country. He foretells the downfall of the Assyrian Kingdom, like a great cedar-forest felled by the woodman's axe (x. 34), to rise no more, and the stem of Jesse (father of David) prostrate, too, for a time, yet retaining its fertility (vi. 13), and sending up what seemed a feeble sucker—a root out of a dry ground (liii. 2), but in the end to attain to universal dominion. It will be best to read the passage verse by verse. The general idea is—The Peaceable Kingdom of the Branch, that is, Christ out of the root of Jesse.

1. A rod. A shoot growing, not from the stem, but from the stump after the tree has been cut down.

This shows Christ's humiliation. It is the lineage of Jesse, the humble farmer, which is to decay before the new plant springs up.

A branch. A sucker from the roots which grows into a new tree. So Christ's Kingdom has new and fresh growth.

2. The spirit. Rests on Christ as the Prophet who teaches and rules His people. There are six gifts, in three pairs, viz. :—

Wisdom and understanding refer to the intellect.

Counsel and might—to action requiring prudence and strength.

Knowledge and fear—to man's devotional life.

3. Quick understanding. Margin is "scent," meaning Christ's pleasure shall be in seeing men fear the Lord. (Is. liii. 11.)

4. Judge. The Messiah is an upright Ruler.

He shall combine justice with love.

The poor and the meek shall receive justice.

But the wicked shall have just punishment.

5. Girdle. Righteousness and truth around Him.

6—9. The wolf, etc. The joys of Paradise shall return. Christ's reign of peace shall come.

The strong and the weak will live in peace.

The oppressor and oppressed will dwell together.

The young will be safe from all alarms.

Love, joy, peace, and gentleness will be the rule.

All this will be universal as the sea.

All will know and love and fear the Lord.

His Church shall be strong, like a mountain.

All Christ's people shall be in peace.

LESSONS. Such is the promise of Christ's Kingdom. What can we do to bring it about?

1. Pray without ceasing—"Thy Kingdom come."

2. Work to bring others to know and serve God.

3. Let our light shine before men, that they may glorify our Father. (St. Matt. v. 16.)

4. Wait with patience for fulfilment of God's promises.

SEPTEMBER 30TH. REVIEW OF QUARTER'S LESSONS.

Golden Text—St. Mark i. 15.

INTRODUCTION. Have had twelve historical lessons on the early life and ministry of Christ, and one prophetic one on His future peaceful reign. What have all these lessons taught us about Him? The golden text sums up the whole in two thoughts. (1) Christ as a King comes to His people. (2) They must submit to Him with repentance and faith.

I. CHRIST A KING. His birth. (St. Luke ii.)

The place—Bethlehem, royal city. (St. Luke ii. 4.)

His title—given by angel—Christ the Lord.

The message of the angels—peace on earth.

His presentation in Temple. (St. Luke ii. 25—38.)

The Lord's anointed King foretold to Simeon.

Christ, object of worship both to Jews and Gentiles.

Visit of the Wise Men. (St. Matt. ii. 1—12.)

They bowed in homage before Him.

They gave royal presents to King of Jews.

Flight into Egypt. (St. Matt. ii. 13—23.)

Herod, through jealousy of rival, seeks His life.

Youth of Jesus. (St. Luke ii. 40—52.) As King—

He learns all things suitable to future position.

He who is to rule must himself obey.

Baptism of Jesus. (St. Mark i. 1—11.) As King—

He sends forerunner to prepare the way.

He submits to the same rites as His subjects.

Is declared Son of God—King of Kings.

Temptation of Jesus. (St. Matt. iv. 1—11.) As King—

Undergoes same sufferings and trials as others.

But conquers His great enemy, the Devil.

First disciples. (St. John i. 35—49.) Power over men called to be His ministers.

Andrew attracted by His royal words.

Nathanael owns Him as King of Israel.

First miracle. (ii. 1—11.) Power over Nature.

The servants of the bridegroom do His bidding.

The water in the jars obeys His command.

Cleansing Temple. (ii. 13—25.) Power over animals.

The sheep and oxen submit to Him Who made all.

The buyers and sellers obey Him instantly.

Nicodemus. (iii. 1—16.) The laws of His Kingdom.

Entrance only to those who become as children.

The King, lifted up, will reign from the Cross.

Pardon and life given to all who believe in Him.

Woman of Samaria. (St. John iv. 9—26.) Royal bounty.

King gives water of life to all who ask.

II. MAN'S SUBMISSION. Examples :—

The shepherds saw and praised Him.

The wise men worshipped and gave gifts.

Philip and Nathanael bore witness to Him.

The six disciples believed in Him.

The buyers and sellers were awed by Him.

Nicodemus was taught by Him.

Woman of Samaria convinced of sin.

LESSONS. 1. Thy Kingdom come in earth as i. heaven.

2. At the name of Jesus every knee shall bow.

OCTOBER 7TH. JESUS PREACHING AT NAZARETH.

To read—St. Luke iv. 16—30. Golden Text—Heb.

xii. 25.

INTRODUCTION. Lesson three Sundays ago was about the water of life and the woman of Samaria. Jesus, after passing through Samaria, travelled on to Galilee. He was everywhere received with favour. On the Sabbath days He, the young prophet, taught in the village synagogues. At last He reached Nazareth, where He had been brought up.

I. THE VILLAGE SERMON. (16—22.) Notice :
The preacher. Jesus, full of the Holy Spirit. Known to all in the place since His babyhood. But details of that thirty years' life unknown to us.
The place. The village synagogue or church. He had worshipped there all His life. Now comes again to teach as well as worship. Allowed to do so by the ruler of the synagogue. Stands up to show His willingness to be called on.
The text. A passage from Prophet Isaiah. (Is. l.) Probably appointed reading for the day. (Acts xiii. 15.)

Tells Divine mission and message of Jesus Christ. Anointed with the Holy Spirit at His baptism. Sent to preach glad tidings of salvation. The sick, the sad, the slaves, all blessed by Him. A message of pardon and mercy from God to all.
The congregation. All Christ's relations and friends.

See how attentively they fix their eyes on Him. What is He saying? "These words fulfilled to-day." No wonder they marvelled at these gracious words.

They only knew Him as Joseph the carpenter's son. Had yet to learn that He was the Son of God.

II. THE PREACHER REJECTED. (23—30.) Christ knew what they were thinking and wishing. He had done miracles for others—why not for them?

But He would not do miracles only to please men.

They must first accept Him as a Divine prophet. But a prophet is often rejected by his own people and hidden to go to strangers with blessings. As for example:

Elijah, rejected by King Ahab, was sent to bless the widow woman in Sarepta. (1 Kings xvii. 9.)

Elisha healed Naaman, a Syrian leper. (2 Kings v.) At this the congregation became very angry.

They understood the rebuke for their unbelief. Tried to murder Him Who spake the gracious words. But He passed calmly through them and escaped. So was "despised and rejected of men." (Is. liii. 3.) He came to His own, and they received Him not. What caused their anger? Jealousy. They could not bear His speaking of blessings to Gentiles.

So Jews turned against St. Paul. (Acts xxii. 22.)

LESSONS. 1. Christ's message one of pardon, peace, and comfort.

2. Without faith Christ's message is in vain.

3. The sin of jealousy. Leads to hatred and strife.

OCTOBER 14TH. THE DRAUGHT OF FISHES.

To read—St. Luke v. 1—11. Golden Text—St. Mark i. 17.

INTRODUCTION. After His rejection at Nazareth, Christ went to Capernaum, cast a devil out of a man in the synagogue, healed St. Peter's mother-in-law and many other sick persons. Then went into a desert place for quiet and rest for a time before making a tour of the villages of Galilee. To-day's lesson finds him at the seaside.

I. CHRIST TEACHING. (1—4.) The scene.

The place—the shore of the Lake of Galilee.

Two fishing boats lying on the sand.

A crowd throngs the shore—presses on Christ.

He gets into a fishing-boat belonging to St. Peter. Who and his brother Andrew had already been called once to be disciples. (St. Matt. iv. 18.)

The teaching. Probably the seven parables—Sower, Tares, Mustard, Leaven, Treasure, Pearl, Net. (St. Matt. xiii.)

Another lesson to be taught now by His action

Christ commanding. Three orders given.

Each a symbol of His work in man's heart.

1. Thrust out from land. Do something for Him.

Man's heart must be detached from the world.

2. Launch out into the deep. Give up all for Christ.

Commit your soul to the ocean of God's will.

3. Let down nets for draught. Work for God.

No work done in obedience to Him can fail.

II. CHRIST WORKING MIRACLE. (5—7.) The scene.

Simon tells how their toil has been all in vain.

Yet he will obey, having gained some faith.

Now the nets are let down—drawn slowly in.

They inclose multitude of fish—nets begin to break.

Partners are beckoned to come and help them.

Both boats are full and almost sinking.

Faith is rewarded, work blessed, success gained.

LESSONS. 1. Work done in obedience to Christ's command always must gain blessing.

2. Except the Lord build the house, their labour is but lost that build it.

III. ST. PETER'S CONFESSION. (8—11.) Notice :

Christ's power makes him feel his littleness.

He feels himself a sinner in presence of his Master.

A sense of unworthiness overpowers him.

How can he ever be fit for such a Master as this?

Let Christ go away and leave him in his work.

Christ encourages him; he has naught to fear.

Henceforth he shall do a better fishing work—

Catch souls, bring men to Christ, teach them.

LESSONS. 1. Knowledge of holy and almighty God produces sense of sin.

2. Christ came to bring peace, not fear.

3. Bringing others to God is the highest work.

"THE LPL LASS."

A STORY IN ONE CHAPTER.

THE early morning air was deliciously reviving after my long night's trudge through the dark Devonshire lanes and thick sandy soil; but I was mightily hungry, and the sight, at a sudden turn of the road, of a little ivy-grown farm-cottage was very welcome. The good people were evidently astir, for I caught a snatch of the Morning Hymn issuing from the little latticed window above as I stood in the porch—

"Praise to the Holiest in the height,
And in the depth be praise:
In all His works most wonderful,
Most sure in all His ways!"

It was a child's voice—a voice of peculiar sweetness and musical charm. I knocked gently at the door; a woman in snowy apron and cap opened it, and ushered me in as if I had been expected.

"My man 'll be down in no time," she said, leading the way to the kitchen. "Ye looks ez ef ye'd journeyed a weary mile or two, an' could do wi' a bit o' breakfast."

Thanking her, I threw myself into a chair and watched her movements. To this day I remember every detail in that kitchen: the large open range, the hissing kettle, the purring cat at my feet, the bright pots and pans on the chimney-piece, the canary threatening a shrill oration in a cage by the window, and the quaint weather-wise clock in the corner by the door. Presently the brightest little sunbeam of a child that ever dazzled an artist's eyes danced into the room and up to my side with a friendly greeting. She was about twelve years old—a mere babe to a young man of twenty, starting in life with sanguine hopes for his future greatness; and I laid my hand on her nut-brown hair, and met her engaging look with a smile of admiration. She had all the Cornish type of beauty: large black eyes, olive complexion, and the fullest, rosiest lips that I have ever seen.

"What is your name?" she asked abruptly; she did not speak with her mother's broad dialect, but her accent was prettily touched with the West Country sound.

"David Charrington. What is yours?"

"Anna Crake. Isn't it ugly? But yours is a very dear name—David, David. Do you know what it means?"

"No, tell me."

"Beloved. Do a great many people love you?"

"Very few, Anna. I have no parents, or brothers or sisters."

"Oh! but who mends your clothes?"

"My landladies," I laughed. "I am a painter, and travel about a great deal, and I have to get them mended as I can."

She scanned my attire up and down. Then she darted away through the kitchen door into the yard, and returned with a milk-pail and stool in her hands, and an orange-coloured sun-bonnet tied under her chin.

"I am going to milk the cows," she said. "Don't let father eat all the hot cakes."

Just at this moment the farmer entered the kitchen and gave me a hearty welcome, and his wife returned from the inner room with a dish of bacon, fried potatoes, coffee, and some steaming cakes, the name of which I never could pronounce, but which were a kind of scone. We all fell-to with hearty good-will, and the farmer and I discussed the glorious summer and the prospects of harvest. In the middle of the meal Anna returned, and the farmer popped the plate of hot cakes on my knee.

"That's my li'l joke," he whispered. "Hold 'em tight a bit"

She gave him a great hug as she passed to her seat opposite to me, and took the scolding from her mother for being late up with a pretty droop of the head.

"Father," she cried presently, darting her quick eyes round the table, "where are the hot cakes?"

"Them ez comes late shouldn't ask greedy questions," he twinkled: "leastwise, when there's a gentleman present."

She looked at me searchingly.

"Have you eaten them all, David?"

"Come, come, lass, 'ted'n fer sech ez you to take liberties wi' the gentry."

She tossed her head.

"He called me Anna," she answered, "and he told me his name was David."

"Quite right, Anna," I laughed. "I was the person who took the liberty. But will you do me a favour if I give you the cakes? Will you let me paint you milking the cows?"

The farmer and his wife flushed with pleasure, and Anna answered demurely—

"If you please, sir."

"Say David," I said, taking the cakes round to her side; "and do let us all be friends."

It was soon arranged that I should send for my luggage to the village where I had left it, and take up my abode with them for a time.

"We took in a laädy painter las' summer," Mrs. Crake told me, "but she was a bit too fine to stop long in the plaäce, an' I wasn't altogether sorry when she went; she put all sorts o' maäzed things in the lassie's head: an' she was always too speritty ez 't was."

Anna had gone to school when this conversation took place: a little school set up by a former rector's daughter. This explained the child's educated speech, and perhaps many of her pretty, refined movements, and her gentle manner; for I got to know the school-mistress, and found in her a delightful type of the old school of gentlewomen ; and many a pleasant hour I spent in her society when she came to tea with the Crakes, or when she passed me sketching, and stopped to watch me at work. From her I learnt many a touching story of good Dick Crake, and I soon found out for myself his sterling honest character and lingering on. We had grown great friends, and Dick Crake would call me "David, lad," with no more detestable references to "the gentry."

At last I had to return to town for the winter exhibitions, and with great reluctance I bade them good-bye.

"Will you ever come back?" she asked."

gentle kindness of heart. I commenced at once on my picture of "The Lil' Lass," as her father always called her. At first she provoked many difficulties. It teased her to sit still when she was not actually milking, but soon I found I could bribe her with tales of foreign scenes and gay London assemblies, and then it was a temptation to keep her longer than I needed, for her intelligence and pretty delight fascinated me.

In the evenings I played draughts with the farmer, and his wife and little Anna sat in the porch sewing ; the child singing softly or jumping up now and again to catch the evening moths and frolic with the cat. So the summer passed, but autumn beauties kept me

Anna ate no hot cakes that morning, and there was a wistful droop in the pretty mouth. Crake was to drive me to the station in his cart, and the child stood at the gate to see us depart.

"Will you ever come back?" she asked, as I folded her winsome face in my hands and kissed her brow. "Bend down your head, David ; I want to whisper a secret to you : the lady who was here last summer told me she would come and fetch me one day, and take me to the fine world ; then I should meet you at all those grand parties in London."

I held her from me. "Ah, child ! you are happier here," I cried. "You would be spoilt in the gay world."

And I left her pouting. But she threw me a rose that 'till lingered untouched by the frost, and when I turned at the bend of the road I saw her enter the cottage with her sweet head bowed on her breast.

I knew the picture I had painted of her would have brought me, if not much money, certainly some amount of fame, but I could not bring myself to part with it, and I hung it in my room, and dwelt often long and tenderly over the simple, beautiful memories it recalled to me. I could not go to the Crakes' the following summer, and for three years after that I had commissions that took me into foreign parts. Too much a lover of my art to court society, I was somewhat amazed on my return to England to find myself the lion of the London season.

One night I had gone to an "At Home" at Lady Lisle's—also an artist, and for many years a friend of mine—and was sitting by her side talking, when I was arrested by a bright musical laugh from the other end of the room. I got up and craned my neck to see to whom it belonged, and someone instantly took my place.

"One minute," Lady Lisle said, smiling to the other man that she would be back directly. "I want to introduce you to a little protégée of mine. She is a West Country girl, and so pretty; and I fancy you have met before."

She took me to the corner of the room where the laughter was, and there, in white silk and pearls, radiant with health and beauty, stood "The Lil' Lass." In a moment the colour deepened in her cheeks, and both her hands were stretched towards me.

"Oh, you have come at last! I have watched for you every night. Lady Lisle told me you were in England, and we have wanted to surprise you. Do you remember," she rushed on, taking my arm, and leading me away from the crowded room—"do you remember I told you she promised to make a gay lady of me? You did not know it was Lady Lisle? No; and I never knew she knew you till the other day, when she told me all about your grand, grand pictures. And what do you think of me?"

"You are just the same little Anna."

"But I am ever so old now. You don't know how old I feel! I have travelled a little, and have heaps of masters to make me clever, and all that."

"But how did you ever get your parents' consent?"

"They made a little fuss at first, but they gave in at last, and now they are very glad."

"You go and see them sometimes, then?"

"David! Of course!"

Her beautiful eyes filled with reproachful tears, and she took her hand from my arm.

"Forgive me," I said. "I scarcely know why I said it. I don't think anything could spoil you, Anna, though I did once. But tell me: what is to be the end of all this?"

We were standing in the conservatory, and she turned her face away as I spoke, and buried it in some flowers.

"Lady Lisle wishes me to marry," she faltered.

"And is that your wish, too?"

"No. Don't you remember when I was a child I told you once I would only marry the man I loved."

"Well?"

Her face was still turned from me, but her voice was steadier now.

"The man I love is infinitely above me in every way, and—and he does not care for me: not in that way. So I am going home very soon, and I am going to take Miss Graham's place."

"The schoolmistress?"

"Yes; she died last year, you know, and there is no one to teach the village children; the National School is too far off."

Someone was coming towards us. It was Lady Lisle's brother—Duncan Lisle, a handsome officer, who had distinguished himself in the last war.

"We want you to sing, Miss Crake," he said; "but am I interrupting?"

"Oh no," she smiled, with quick animation. "Mr. Charrington and I are old friends; he has stayed at our farm. And I shall see you again?" she questioned me.

"I hope so," I said, watching her pass away on Duncan's arm. Was this the man she loved? I did not doubt it. But surely the child was mistaken; if ever man had admiration and love written on his face, it was this man. How like Edith Lisle's vagaries to educate this beautiful farmer's daughter for an alliance with her own house. Was I pleased or not? I was honest with myself, and I knew I was not. My dream was spoilt. For years I had treasured the memory of the sweet winsome child who had crept so closely into my life in those few months, and I had grown to think—foolishly enough—she was more mine than anyone else's, and now—

A voice from the music-room fell on my ear—rich, pure, soulful—and I paused in my walk and listened. Could it be little Anna? Yes, it was the same voice that had sung the Morning Hymn, but now it was deeper, fuller, aye, passionate—the voice of a woman, and a woman who loved. I was strangely shaken. When it ceased I sought Lady Lisle.

"I must be going," I said. "You have done wonders with your protégée; I wish you every joy with her."

She looked up surprised.

"You have guessed my secret," she said, "and you do not think it wise?"

"What happiness can it bring," I cried, "to draw this child gradually from all the natural influences of her life?"

"But I have not done so. When she returns to her people, she is as much one of them as before. There is no concealment of her parentage."

"I know, I know," I interrupted irritably; "but it can't be so always. When she is married to Duncan, do you think he will like to mix the society that is dear to her with his?"

"No; he is not like yourself: he could never make friends or own as relatives people who speak such a—"

"Hush!"

Anna was coming towards us. She looked paler, but lovelier still, and when I met her eyes, looking me through and through, I knew I loved her—not as a child, not as the winsome lassie I had loved before, but as a man loves a woman but once in his life.

I bade them both good-bye, and I made up my mind to keep away from her until her marriage with Duncan was arranged. I packed up my things, and started off once more on my travels.

It was midsummer when I passed through London again. On the night of my arrival I was told a man from the country had been making inquiries for me, and before I had been many hours in the house he called again. Instinctively I knew it was none other than Dick Crake. Did he come to bring me bad news of Anna?

Yes, it was Crake—but a shadow of the former man; his rubicund countenance was pale and haggard, and his gait feeble and uncertain.

"My dear friend, what is the matter?"

He sank into a chair and covered his eyes.

"Anna, the Li'l Lass, is dyin'!" he sobbed.

Presently, bit by bit, I got the story from him.

"They wanted to make a fine lady of her, David, an' to marry her to a smart soldier-man; but her heart warn't took wi' he. From a bit o' a lass she's loved but wan, an' though it was jest a hopeless job, she wouldn't take up wi' nobbody else. Well, when she see'd what was 'spect of her she jest went maazed fer a bit, thinkin' it was ungrateful like to them ez bin so kind to her to say 'No,' an' she got frettin' an' frettin' 'bout it till they see'd she was ill, an' sent her home. The soldier-man followed, an' stayed a day or so in the plaice. He'd got good looks, but he warn't like yer, David; he couldn't cotton to our waays; an' I think he slawed up a bit: leastwise, he telled the Li'l Lass she mustn't think they minded her refusin', an' she must jest git well an' sperrity again—fer, after all, he said, p'raps they mightn't 'a suited. My old woman was in a fine raage; but wimmen can't niver onderstan' wimmen; an' I knawed it was jest the best thing that could 'a happened to the lass; an' I thought she'd git well soon enough now 't was all auver. But though she's ez brave ez mor'n most wimmen, an' set hard to work at the teachin', an' nursin' sick folk, she's jest gone on pinin' an' frettin' to herself, an' now she's laid by wi' a low fever, an' she's dyin'." His voice choked, then he said: "An' it's all fer love o' yer, David lad."

I threw my arm round his neck and said but two words. In half an hour we were rushing by express to the West, and before the night had closed in I was bending over Anna's bed, and had folded her little wasted form to my heart.

"You have not come from pity?" she whispered, her great eyes looking into my soul.

"My little tender, faithful Love!" was all I answered, and she read all the rest for herself.

And what the doctors could not do for her, Love and Nature did, and before the year was out good Dick Crake and his wife had given "The Li'l Lass" into my keeping for good and all. LILIAN STREET.

THE GNAT AND THE BLUEBOTTLE.

A FABLE.

BY ALFRED J. BAMFORD, B.A.

HE Puppy had been playing all the morning. He had first amused himself by chasing the Chickens in the yard; then had gone into the field and tried to frighten the Cows, but they had only looked at him with mild wondering eyes, and had refused to take his noisy yelping seriously. Finding this, therefore, unsatisfactory, he had returned to the yard, where he found the Cat, which seemed to offer a possibility of fun for him; but she had taken him altogether too seriously, and, instead of running away from his worrying, as he expected her to do, she had treated him as a foeman worthy of her steel—or claws—so that he had to beat an ignominious retreat, marveling how it came about that his nose was smarting so. He felt depressed for a few moments after this, but it was for a few moments only; he soon recovered his spirits in the exhilarating game of trying to catch his own tail, to the increase of his pride in that member for its dexterous eluding of his pursuit. He was quite vain of possessing so clever a tail.

But by this time he was tired; so he threw himself down carelessly in the garden for a doze, and, in so doing, broke a corner of the web of a Spider, making that creature wonder what would happen next. The Spider, however, being of a practical disposition, soon set about the repairing of her web. While she was doing so, a big Bluebottle came buzzing along, and, after a little preliminary investigation, settled on the Puppy's ear. The Puppy twitched his ear, and the Bluebottle flew off. Taking a few turns round, the Fly came back to the Dog, and this time settled on his nose. The tickling caused by his settling on the Dog's ear had half-awakened him, but the light touch of his six slender feet upon his nose—always a sensitive organ, and just now, thanks to the Cat, specially sensitive—thoroughly aroused him. He was wide awake in an instant, and made an angry snap at the Bluebottle. Fortunately for that insect, however, he missed him. The Bluebottle settled on a leaf just over the Puppy's head, and the Puppy, though still lying down, watched with his eyes ha'f open, evidently ready to make another attempt if he came within reach.

The Bluebottle was looking at the Puppy, lost in study. At last he put his conclusion into words: "I can't see the use of live Dogs!"

He was only speaking to himself, but his words called forth a reply, uttered by a thin shrill voice in a rather supercilious tone: "Do you not, now? Well, there is a proverb that 'A live Dog is better than a dead Lion'; but perhaps that is a word of wisdom that has not entered your dull comprehension."

The Bluebottle looked up to see who was speaking to him, and there, over his head, was the Gnat, dressed in faultless taste, dapper, neat, and looking down on the Bluebottle with a very superior-person kind of air.

But the Bluebottle did not feel at all oppressed by the sense of the Gnat's superiority, for he did not recognise it. He was not at all inclined humbly to accept instruction from her, and so answered, somewhat scornfully: "'A word of wisdom!' 'A live Dog better than a dead Lion,' indeed! Well, that's maybe a sample of the wisdom to be expected from a wizened, underfed shadow like you, but anybody that has a body—that is, a body big enough to be seen —could tell you that a living Dog is not so good as a dead Dog, let alone being better than a dead Lion. The use of a dead Dog to lay one's eggs in is obvious enough, and the wonder is that the world has not been more largely made of useful carcasses; but the use of live Dogs— Bah! you cannot even settle on them without risking your life! The use of live Dogs is as far to seek as the use of live Gnats, and that is saying a great deal."

The Gnat had drawn herself up, with her first pair of legs lifted in an admonitory manner, as is the habit of Gnats. "You exhibit more ignorance than I should have given you credit for—or perhaps I ought to say discredit, rather," said she. "You talk of laying eggs in dead bodies—a most objectionable suggestion, I may remind you, and not only unpleasant, but devoid of any justification in fact. I have seen many eggs laid; indeed, I have myself been laying a number this morning. But the place where eggs are laid is, of course, the surface of the water, of which there ought to be a great deal more than there is. What could a Gnat larva do if hatched out away from water on a dead body, I should like to know?"

"What a Gnat larva would do under those circumstances I cannot say," responded the Bluebottle, "but I know very well what our Blow-fly larvæ will do." And he chuckled at the thought.

"When I said 'Gnat larva,'" replied the Gnat, a little irritated at what she considered the vulgar self-possession and merriment of the Bluebottle, "I, of course, meant all larvæ, for it is natural to think of all taking example from the best."

A Crane-fly had been silently listening to the conversation. Like the Gnat, he had felt that the Blow-fly was sadly at fault in supposing that the world would be better if it consisted more largely in carcasses for Blow-flies to deposit their eggs in. But when the Gnat showed herself equally confident that the surface of the water was the only proper place for the laying of all eggs, the Crane-fly thought it time for him to speak, and so he began; but, being an awkward, diffident insect, he began in a humble and apologetic tone, which was not calculated to command attention. The Bluebottle did not hear a word he said, for the Gnat's last remark so tickled his fancy that he was at once attacked by a most inordinate and uncontrollable fit of laughter. But the Gnat understood the Crane-fly to explain, or at least suggest, that neither the one nor the other could be considered the universal and necessary place of egg-laying—that his family, for instance, had been accustomed for generations to place their eggs in the ground: were, indeed, furnished with an ovipositor of exquisite construction for this very purpose. Since it was obviously useless to say anything to the Bluebottle, he being incapacitated from hearing anything, the Gnat vented her indignation of wrath on the poor Crane-fly, and soon sobered him by her rebukes.

"Let old Daddy-long-legs alone," said the Bluebottle, recovering himself. "He's got more sense than you have, at any rate. His folks don't seem to know quite the best thing to do with their larvæ, but they at least save themselves your folly of drowning them in puddles."

And the Blow-fly was off into another fit of laughter at the thought of the prim little Gnat laying down the law for the universe, though he had not been struck by the absurdity of it when he had done the same thing himself.

In an oblivious carelessness of movement, owing to the violence of his laughter, he rolled full into the web which the Spider had been quietly repairing during their discussion. He was sober in the instant he felt the clinging touch of the Spider's snare. The Spider rushed to seize him, but did not find him easy to manage, for he had strength and weight, and the struggle between them was severe. In the end the Bluebottle got away, though not altogether scatheless. He felt glad to have escaped so great a peril, but did not feel proud of his appearance, for, in addition to his wounds and bruises, his wings and body were entangled in fragments of web, and he was conscious that he did not just then wish to be seen by any of his friends. But, to his dismay, a gay and frivolous Butterfly came fluttering by, and, seeing him with all the marks of recent conflict upon him, instead of congratulating him on his escape, as she well might have done, rallied him on the figure he cut. Now, he shared, with a good many others, the weakness of being more easily moved by ridicule, and by the remarks of others about one's personal appearance, than by the force of their arguments, or even sometimes by the dictates of conscience. So, though the Butterfly's words were but the ridicule of a trifler, they mortified him grievously and evidently. He was ready with no answer to the Butterfly. He made no attempt to hide his vexation from the Gnat and the Crane-fly, who both heard what the Butterfly said.

The Gnat was so pleased to see him thus disconcerted, that she danced with delight, and in so doing incautiously got against the Spider's web, out of which the Bluebottle had broken. But she had not his strength, and could not battle with the Spider as he had done.

By-and-by the Spider, talking comfortably to herself, said: "It's a small matter to me where you lay your eggs, so long as I get you at last; and if your foolish debates about it make you forget yourselves, and so fall the more readily into my hands—why, so much the better. But I wish I had been able to hold on to that Bluebottle!"

"THE GREATEST MAN IN THE WORLD."

A SERMON DELIVERED AT THE METROPOLITAN TABERNACLE. BY THOMAS SPURGEON.

"Verily I say unto you, Among them that are born of women there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist: notwithstanding he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he."—ST. MATT. xi. 11.

ANY good men are overshadowed. They are themselves most excellent, and they may have contributed very largely to the prominence and popularity of those who now tower above them; but they are almost ignored by the multitude, and are often treated with all too little consideration by those who have stepped to their high places by the help of these less fortunate brethren. The world, as a rule, applauds the acrobat who climbs to the apex of the human pyramid rather than the men by whom he reaches to that eminence, and who have most of the weight to bear. The soldiers who happen to have been foremost in the fray deserve all honour for courage and daring, but they are not less worthy whose lot it is to sentinel the host or to bring up the rear.

We are too apt to lavish our plaudits on those who take a leading part, and to forget the rank-and-file. I ask not for less praise for the generals but for more for the privates. "This ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone." Every man should be estimated on his own merits, with his environments duly considered. One blamed the snail for his slow progress, forgetful that he carried his house on his back. The bird would not be so fleet of wing if it had to carry its nest; nor would the butterfly flit so flauntingly if he had still to bear about even the remnants of the house he occupied during the chrysalis stage. Ah, me! we little know how some are handicapped in life's hard race. Comparisons are odious. Let every candle stand in its own socket.

All honour, I say, to those who play a secondary part—to those who are content to be behind the scenes. It needs no little grace to occupy a subordinate position.

From those whom they herald and exalt they have a right to expect the kindest consideration. They have sacrificed themselves for others' advantage, and should be loved and cherished in return. He who reaches the top of the wall by the shoulders of another should stay to help his helper up. It is the least that he can do.

I am led to these reflections by the story of John and Jesus. The Baptist was God's appointed herald of the Messiah, and we may say reverently that the latter owed much to the former. The preparation of the way before the King is a matter of no small moment. He was, of course, eclipsed by the Christ he harbingered. He was a burning and a shining light, but "The light of the world is Jesus."

Still, this is no reason why we should ignore the messenger. We must not think less of Jesus, but we may think more of John. The Lord Himself set a glorious example in this as in all matters. The King speaks of His forerunner in the highest possible terms. He would not add to His own importance by disparaging His faithful herald. And He would have us give John his due. We must admire the sun the most, but we are more than willing to admit the charms of the moon, and to confess that the stars have a beauty all their own. The day-star, in particular, interests us, as it points with golden finger to the radiant East, and seems to say, "The glad, bright day is dawning." So John, himself a star of the first magnitude, announced the rising sun, as on Jordan's banks he cried to all, "The Kingdom of heaven is at hand," and ere he dropped beneath the horizon, exclaimed, "Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world." If we praise the star, we really praise the sun from which its glory is derived. Jesus called John the greatest man in the world, but no one knew better than He that the Baptist's was a reflected glory.

We will glorify the grace of God in him, and honour the King by admiring His precursor.

John's character is truly sublime, and well worthy of imitation. What though it must be admitted that it is best to aim at the very centre of the target and to copy the master rather than the servant? yet some who, looking at Christ's perfect example, cry in despair, "It is high, I cannot attain to it," may feel more able to attempt an imitation of the Baptist, and so be prepared for the still harder lesson. Stepping-stones and mounting-blocks serve a useful purpose. Only let us not be content with reaching the lower standard. We who have so often said to Jesus—

"Be Thou my pattern; make me bear
More of Thy gracious image here," cannot rest content until we have made the best copy possible of the copperplate headline at the top of the page.

In the first place, let us contemplate A COMMENDATION OF THE HIGHEST ORDER. "Among them that are born of women there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist." What unstinted praise is this! Here is no sign of slight upon the man whose glory is necessarily on the wane. He is in prison, but Jesus will not add affliction to his bonds. On the contrary, He will rejoice if His well-deserved praise helps to mitigate the bitterness of his lot. Oh, that this mind were in us. Then of those who supplant us, and of those whom we outrun, we shall cherish the kindest feelings, and speak only words that help and heal. Work this in us, O, magnanimous Master!

Remember, I pray you, that this unqualified eulogium is from the highest authority, and has in it nothing of flattery. Jesus knew what was in man, and spoke only as He found. He who was Himself the Truth abhorred all forms of untruthfulness. Flattery is lying. Let us say all the good we can, even of those who are not most admirable, but we must never say what we know to be false or exaggerated. We will keep silence if we cannot speak well of a man, but our praise of the worthiest must not partake of fulsome flattery. It is as evil a habit to give more than is deserved as it is to withhold what has been fairly merited.

Happy are they of whom their Lord speaks well. He does not grudge His praise. Enoch had this testimony that he pleased God. Even now we may hear Jesus say, "Well done," and see His cheering smile. He does not leave us to guess concerning His approval. His Spirit witnesseth with our spirits that we are delighting Him with our obedience, and zeal, and love.

Christ's verdict is worth more than all others. Down goes the scale if Jesus's approval falls into it. If He withholds His smile, the fawning flatteries of so-called friends are distasteful;

if He approves, the censure of a crowd falls harmless on our ears.

Christ's love to John outweighed the malice of Herodias, it brightened even that dark cell in lonely Macherus, and prepared him for what men call "the worst." So we, too, can sing—

"Let Thy face upon me shine,
Tell me, Lord, that Thou art mine;
Poor and little though I be,
I have all in having Thee."

But we must speak more particularly concerning John. His career was startling. The promise that was vouchsafed before his well-nigh miraculous birth pointed to an extraordinary life. "He shall be great," said the angel, "in the sight of the Lord, and he shall be filled with the Holy Ghost even from his mother's womb." And so it came to pass. There is no part of his career that is not bright with a strange glory—a halo hovers over all. His father's penalty for unbelief, his God-given name, his wilderness training, his marvellous ministry, provided sufficient ground for this remarkable encomium. And all this, as Jesus knew full well, was to be consummated and crowned by a martyr's death. What wonder that He who knew the end from the beginning, who saw that His forerunner would be faithful even unto death, said of him, "Among those that are born of women there is not a greater prophet than John the Baptist." None of those who went before had had careers more striking or lives more eventful.

His character was sterling. Career is not so important as character, nor does it afford so good a test of greatness. Some of the most eventful lives have been those of mere adventurers. John's life was full of incident; but it was his inner life that made him truly noble. He was the greatest man mainly because he was the greatest saint. If this be so, we may all become illustrious. We may never be wealthy, but he is worth most who is most worthy. The prizes of the schools may be beyond our reach, but we may be wise unto salvation, and wise in winning souls. The chief rooms may not be reserved for us, but we may sit with Christ in the heavenlies even now.

Think of John's heroic devotion. "What went ye out into the wilderness for to see?" said Jesus: "a reed shaken with the wind?" If so, they were sorely disappointed. They saw rather—

"A tower of strength, that stood foursquare
To all the winds that blew."

John was no vacillating orator, no trimmer, no bulrush springing from the mire and swaying in the softest zephyr. Some seem to count it their business merely to win applause and to please the people. John was no ear-tickler. He spake all things that were commanded him of God.

He hurled his denunciations broadcast. He was no respecter of persons. If even Herodias merited rebuke, she escaped not. He kept on the track of righteous indignation against all sorts of evil, and if royalty got between the metals, so much the worse for the queen. I remember to have heard of a little lad, who, reading aloud in the Scriptures, came to the passage which records that "an excellent spirit was found in Daniel." The word "spirit" was too much for the young beginner, so, stumbling at it, he rendered it spine. The difference was not so very serious. Certain it is that an excellent spine was found in Daniel, for neither the king's decree nor the lions' den induced him to budge an inch from his holy habit, nor to alter his course a hair's breadth.

One of the great wants of this age is men of principle—Josephs who will yield to no temptation, Elijahs who fear not to face the foe single-handed, Daniels who—

"Dare to have a purpose firm,
And dare to make it known!"

We want more of John's holy audacity, of Peter's boldness, of Paul's unflinching determination, and of the Master's steadfastness of face. Oh, to clear the swamps of reeds, and to drive down to the solid earth the strong and seasoned piles on which a worthy fabric may be reared. May Omnipotent Grace transform the flags of the marsh into cedars of Lebanon!

John's self-denial is also most commendable. "But what went ye out for to see? a man clothed in soft raiment? Behold, they which are gorgeously apparelled, and live delicately, are in king's courts."

There is little doubt that our hero could have enjoyed the patronage of the Court if he had pleased. Evidence is not wanting that Herod was kindly disposed towards the prophet. It would not have been difficult to curry favour, He might readily have been arrayed in fine linen, and have fared sumptuously every day. A man of such striking personality and remarkable gifts could have made his way in any walk of life, and have earned the due reward of talent and success. But he had no such ambition, or if it ever rose within him—for who can tell what secret struggles he knew?—he quickly subdued it, and remained content with such things as he had. Instead of palaces, he probably had caves and dens of the earth for his abode; he was clad in a rough garment of camel's hair, and with locusts and honey out of the rock he was satisfied. Doubtless his health gained by such habit and diet. The fresh air and freedom of the wilderness, the pure water of the river, the homely fare, all conspired to assist his physical and spiritual well-being. But we do not readily choose that which is best for us. The savoury pottage of Egypt is more palatable than the manna of the desert. Or, at least, a change would be very acceptable every now and then.

The ease and pleasure of gilded society has a charm all too potent for most hearts, and many even of the Lord's own who would not pander to others are far too apt to pamper themselves. John came neither eating nor drinking. They said he had a devil, but Jesus seemed to say "Herein lies, in part, the greatness of this prophet of prophets." We shall do well to copy him, at least in spirit. A little more literal fasting might not be amiss. There would be more dumb devils cast out if prayer and fasting were more in vogue. A week of self-denial is better than none, but a lifetime of it is none too long.

Who can help admiring the magnanimity of the son of Zecharias? His other graces shine with mild, soft radiance, but this is the brightest star in the constellation. It was his chief delight that He who came after him was preferred before him. He did not yield because he had to, nor did he retire simply because there was no alternative. He revelled in being superseded. It was honour enough for him to introduce the Messiah. He counted himself unworthy to be the sandal-bearer of the Lord; and as to baptising Him—it seemed out of the question till he was straightly charged to do so. He did not cling to his office unduly, or try to bolster up his decaying influence. Instead of attempting to maintain his own popularity, he cried—may I not say with something approaching gusto?—"He must increase, but I must decrease." He was a burning and a shining light, but he was more than willing to pale his ineffectual fires when the True Light shone. This he did as gracefully as do the fading stars before the rising sun. All honour to him for this!

Was this always as easy to him as we suppose? Was not this second Elias a man of like passions with ourselves? But he had learned wherein true greatness consists. The servant of all the disciples is the greatest of all. Christ's slave is everybody else's master. Oh, to catch this spirit! The most difficult instrument in the whole orchestra to play is the second fiddle. Yet some musician—and a skilful one, too—must play it. Who will volunteer?

Are there not some brave hearts ready to take an apparently insignificant part—to be overshadowed and eclipsed for Christ's sake and the Gospel's? We cannot all be leaders. We must, at least, commence among the rank-and-file. Who would not prefer to be top-sawyer? He gets the benefit of light, and air, and elbow-room. His mate below is unseen, and cramped, and heated, and the sawdust is apt to fall into his eyes. But he deserves at least as much credit, and as good a wage, as the more prominent workman. Let us reserve our warmest admiration for those whose modesty places them in the background, or whose magnanimity keeps them from the uppermost rooms at the feast. They shall surely be called up higher by-and-by.

We are beginning to see why the great Teacher spoke so highly of His predecessor. A startling career and a sterling character may well provoke His praise.

A third reason for this eulogium is found in the fact that John's calling was striking. He was a prophet. Christ's "Yea" proves that. In another place Jesus calls him Elias, for he came in the spirit and power of the prophet of fire. In many respects he resembles the hero of Carmel. But he excels him as he does Moses, and Isaiah, and Jeremiah, and Eze-kiel.

Honoured names these! but John's has greater lustre. He was "more than"—nay "much more than a prophet." It was his happy lot immediately to precede the Messiah. He was the herald of the King, the harbinger of the day, the star which sings of the rising sun. He was the loop or link coupling the two testaments. He was by no means unworthy—as we have seen—of his high vocation, but it was that honourable post which caused him to be the noblest of the seers. His character made him the greatest man in the world, his office constituted him the greatest among prophets.

Moreover, he was a successful preacher. Even Isaiah had to cry, "Who hath believed our report, and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?" But John's ministry was followed by remarkable results. As often happens, he became popular though he did not seek for popularity. The multitudes flocked to hear him, nor did his censures thin his congregation. Matthew Henry quaintly reminds us that "God owned His ministry and made it wonderfully successful for the breaking of the ice, and the preparing of the people for the Kingdom of Heaven." His converts were by no means few; confession of sin was heard on every hand, and Jordan's waters were constantly stirred by the baptism of repentance. From his opening day until the sad and sudden close of his ministry the Kingdom of Heaven suffered violence. As the throng nowadays surges round the portals of a place of popular entertainment, each person striving for early admittance, so there was a rush and a crush to hear the prophet of whom other prophets prophesied, and an eager entry through the door of the new dispensation. There is little wonder, surely, that he was great in the sight of the Lord, for whose feet he made so efficient a preparation. We, too, will admire the man whom the King delighted to honour, and since "imitation is the sincerest flattery," we will seek to be what he was, so far as it is possible to us. We will cultivate his gracious and generous spirit, that we, too, may be messengers before the face of the Messiah. If

"Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime," we shall do well to take him, than whom are more renowned has been born of woman the greatest man in the world—as one of our brightest models.

From this high commendation let us turn, in the second place, to THE REMARKABLE LIMITATION with which our text concludes: "Notwithstanding, he that is least in the Kingdom of Heaven is greater than he." Have you been wishing, my friend, that you could be as great as John? Did the high ideal just set before you cause you to long for such lustre as his? Or perhaps you have already feared that it is too bright for you. Here is a word of cheer for you. It needs no effort on the part of a true believer to be as great as the Baptist! You are already far greater than he! However insignificant your post, however few your talents, however uneventful your life, you exceed and excel even him who was incomparable in his day and generation.

You are the greatest man in the world, since you are greater than he who once occupied that proud position, for so the Lord Himself declares. But how can these things be?

By "the Kingdom of Heaven" we understand not heaven itself—it is rather the palace of the great King—but the reign of grace and truth which came by Jesus Christ, the dispensation of the New Testament which was commenced by the personal appearing of the Son of God, sealed with His precious blood, and crowned by the gift of the Holy Ghost. Jesus did not mean that the redeemed in glory are greater than they that remain, nor that John will have a less excellent place in the heavenly land because he was only a herald of the Gospel times. He could not have meant that the character of later-day saints is nobler than that of John, for alas! alas! there are few enough to compare with him. The best among us are as garnets are to rubies when compared with Christ's forerunner. In intellectual power, purity of heart, and devotedness of spirit, there are few to equal him.

Wherein, then, lies the advantage of "the least in the Kingdom of God"? It is evident that if John was the greatest of his order, ours must be a much more noble one, since the least member of it has higher honour than the foremost in the previous dispensation.

For, first, our privileges are greater. We occupy a spiritual vantage ground. As a dwarf upon a hill-top sees further than a giant in the vale, so we have loftier standing and clearer views, babes in Christ though we be, than the Anakim on the low-lying plains of prophecy. On them the shadows of coming events were ever falling; on us the true light shines.

Zaccheus, little of stature though he is, is greater than Zacharias, the father of the Baptist; and Johanna, the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward, is greater than John himself; for the least of the greatest is greater than the greatest of the least. The disciple of Jesus is evidently greater than the disciple of John. And when we remember how greatly Christ transcends the Baptist, it is not difficult to see that the Messiah's humblest follower is greater than the noblest of his predecessors. The page-boys in the train have higher honour than the heralds of the procession.

It is also true that our gifts and powers are greater. We may not employ our ten talents to such purpose as John did his fewer advantages, but they are ours, and we may put them out to usury. John, the disciple, was endowed with gifts that John the Baptist did not possess. "John did no miracle," but all the immediate followers of Jesus rejoiced that even the devils were subject to them. They had, moreover, the opportunity of profiting by Christ's example, and by the inspiration of His presence, and precepts, and promises. These were all good gifts from the Father of lights, gifts to which the harbinger of the daylight was necessarily a stranger. And we are scarcely less favoured than the disciples, for, though we have not Jesus in the flesh, His example is recorded for us, His law-honouring life and His atoning death have both been completed "long, long ago," and His promises remain yea and amen for ever. Because Jesus has gone unto His Father, He that believeth on Him shall do greater things than even Christ accomplished.

Such is the wondrous prediction of our Lord. The Holy Spirit has been granted in fuller measure since the Saviour's ascension, so that the poorest and feeblest saint knows more of His outpouring and indwelling than did the precursor of the Christ. If the least in the Kingdom of God is necessarily greater than John, how much more glorious than he might we become, did we take full advantage of our special powers and privileges!

Certain it is, too, that our knowledge is greater. What though even now we know only in part, and see but darkly, we see more than the old-time seers, and know more than the ancients. There is much more to know, for one thing. The veriest tyro in the university of Gospel Grace is more advanced than a graduate of the school of the Law and of the Prophets.

"How happy are our ears
That hear the joyful sound
Which kings and prophets waited for,
And sought but never found."

What a Teacher we have—the Divine Spirit! What a text-book is ours—the Book of Books! The law was our tutor to bring us to Christ, but He Himself now instructs by the Holy Ghost and the sacred Scriptures. Ought we not to make splendid progress? Oh, that we were as apt to learn as He is apt in teaching! Methinks that John would have outstripped the most diligent among us had he enjoyed one half of our advantages.

Nor must it be forgotten that ours is a grander message. John was almost a Gospel preacher, but not quite. Sorrowfully it must be admitted that there was much more of the Gospel in his addresses than there is in the sermons of certain of the preachers of to-day. The Name that is above every name finds all too little mention in some pulpits, and the atonement is relegated to the background, or robbed of its very essence.

John spake of Jesus, and pointed Him out as "the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world."

But this was all that he could do. It is ours, not to prepare the way before Christ, but to proclaim that He is the Way to God. "The Kingdom of Heaven is at hand" was John's declaration; we declare that Christ has opened the Kingdom of Heaven to all believers. John pointed forward; we point backward and upward.

The Baptist introduced his hearers to the Captain of our Salvation, putting on the harness; we speak of One Who has not only put it off, crying, "It is finished!" but Who has returned in triumph to the heaven He left so willingly. Christ crucified and ascended is a theme immeasurably grander than Christ embarking on His mission of mercy.

He is greater who urges to allegiance to the King once crowned with thorns, but crowned with glory now, than he who only exhorted to repentance because that King was just about to be made manifest to Israel. What a noble calling is ours who are put in trust with the Gospel! What high honour belongs to all the saints; for are they not a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people? We have no reason to be envious of John. However simply we may tell it, the story of the Cross and of the empty tomb is at once more pathetic and more potent than aught or all that the Baptist could proclaim; and the greatness of a messenger depends mainly on the importance of his message. Oh, that we may walk worthy of so high and holy a vocation!

There is one matter that must not be allowed to slip. If our advantages and opportunities are more than John's, OUR RESPONSIBILITIES ARE CONSEQUENTLY GREATER. "To whom much is given, of him shall much be required." If we live in so bright a light, the reflection from us should be correspondingly brilliant. With such amazing privileges we ought to outstrip those who went before. Like Ahimaaz, we run by the way of the plain, so we should overrun the Cushites who have had to climb the hills of difficulty.

Let us ask ourselves, "Are we thus bright and fleet?" Shame on us if we are outshone and outrun by Old Testament saints!

Dear Saviour, trim our lamps, and grant us new supplies of grace! Quicken us in Thy way; so shall we become truly great, and to Thy great name shall be ceaseless praise. Amen.

AN AUTUMN LOVE-STORY.

I.
HE Rector of Orlestone sat in his study, gazing into the fire. He was alone; he was always alone, for though he loved his sheep, and tended them, they were not companionable. He had lived alone now these many years—how many he sighed to remember. Once upon a time—oh! but before the Flood—he had been young and strong and hopeful, and had loved a woman passionately: so passionately that honour and his plighted word had become as nothing to him, and he had broken faith with the gentle girl he was engaged to marry. And then he had found out that his passion's queen had no least intention of marrying him. As he looked in the fire this October evening, he remembered so well how she had told him that that on which he had staked his whole life's treasure could never be.

"I must marry a rich man," she had said, "for my poor father's sake;" with tears and many kisses she had said it, and he, with kisses and the tears the heart bleeds in solitude, had believed her.

It was many years now since he had left behind him the world that held her, and had accepted the Rectory of Orlestone, with its miserable £150 a year. There were no rich folk in the parish. The only big house in the place was the Hall, and that was shut up, and had been to let ever since he had first come to the village. So, with his meagre stipend and his many hungry sheep, the Rector of Orlestone went short of most things, and had seldom either enough fire or enough food; not that his sheep were ungrateful or ungenerous. Many a tree-stump found its way to the rector's back yard; many a rabbit was found against the kitchen door, with no word to explain its presence. The rabbits were, in plain English, stolen; but the old housekeeper had no foolish sentiment about poaching and the like, and the rector ate what was set before him without interest and without question. And so body and soul were kept together, and the rector grew to stoop a little, and his hair grew grey, and he took to spectacles, because his kindly grey eyes would no longer serve him as once. And still o' nights, when the curtains were drawn, and the wind outside was wild in the laurels and cypresses, when the bare thorny rose-sprays tapped at the window like bony fingers, he sat by his fire, and thought of the woman he had loved, and loved still. He had her portrait in the secret drawer of his shabby old writing-desk—the one that had been his father's. It lay there with a few old letters and the slender watch-guard made of his dead mother's hair. And sometimes he would take out the portrait—the bright girlish face—and look at it, and sigh, yet with a half-gladness that the knife was still sharp in the old wound.

Celia Ringwood, the woman who loved him, whom he should have married, had told him that time would dull the pain. But time had not dulled it, and he was glad. He had given up ambition and friends, and dreams, the old life and the old life's hopes, to shut himself up alone with the plain daily duty—and this love-memory. And if the memory had failed him, had grown dim, what would have been left to him? Celia Ringwood, in her little lonely house in the market town, thought there might be much. Through all his trouble she had been his friend. She too had shut herself up with a memory: had set herself to be what she could to the man she loved. If he had wanted love, she would have given it. He only wanted friendship; that too she could give. And she gave it. She settled in the town nearest to him, and lived her lonely, orderly old maid's life for fifteen years, contented to be near him, to know that hers was the only companionship he sought, the only sympathy he needed. He came to see her once a week, and talked about the parish. Once he had been used to talk of the other woman; he did not mean to be cruel; she had taken his confession of his unfaithfulness so calmly, and so gently begged to be his friend, that he at once believed she had never cared for him. But such talk was over now. He had not spoken of her now for years. Celia began to think, almost to hope. Then she looked in the glass at her faded face, her pale hair, from which all youth's colours had gone; and she sighed a sigh that was half a shudder, put on her demure bonnet and cloak, and went out through the rain to see a child who was ill, because that was the only ease for her heartache. And the rector sat and looked into his fire, and the wind moaned in the trees, and the ashes fell from the grate like soft ghostly footfalls. And to her and to him, in their several places, it seemed as though the tune of life must always run on with the same sad refrain to it: "Lost and in vain—lost and in vain—lost and in vain!"

II.

MISS CELIA RINGWOOD was washing-up the breakfast things—not, as all genteel people in stories seem to do, in the parlour, but in a workmanlike manner in the back kitchen. She had just hung up the tea-cloth to dry, when her heart stood still, and then began to beat violently. At thirty-eight one's heart can beat just as quickly as it can at eighteen, and much more painfully, if one hears a certain footstep on the threshold or a certain hand on the door-knocker. Miss Ringwood heard both. She was so conscious of having too much light in her eyes, too much joy-colour in her cheeks, that she delayed a little before going to the front door, so as to teach her face to look ordinary again.

"Good-morning, James," she said sedately. "This is an unusual and pleasant surprise." Some of the light still lingered on her face, but the rector did not observe it; his own thin face was slightly flushed, and his grey eyes were shining.

"May I come in?" he said. "I want to talk to you."

She led him into the little parlour—spotlessly neat—all the old furniture polished and gleaming, and the pale October sunlight striking aslant across the room through the half-lowered Venetian blind. Miss Celia instinctively turned the blind so that the sunshine should not fade the carpet, and said—"Well?"

"You've always been such a true friend to me," he said nervously. "I've always told you everything."

"Yes," she said; and her heart knew his errand even before he spoke.

"Celia, her husband is dead, and she has taken the Hall at Orlestone."

Celia Ringwood held out her hand to him. The light went out suddenly in her face, but it left the kindly mouth and eyes as he had always seen them, and only one who had loved her would have noticed the change.

"Only last night," he said, "it seemed to me that there was nothing left in life but duty and the blessed faith in the life to come. But now—oh, Celia!—I feel young again."

"Shall you ask her again to marry you?" There was a harsh note in her voice which she herself noted with dismay. But he did not perceive it.

"Yes, of course," he said simply.

Miss Ringwood bit her lip.

"You are very poor," she said, "and Lady Mountdew is very rich. People will say—she might think—"

"You don't know Eva Mountdew," he said proudly.

Celia was ashamed of her words before he had answered them.

She held his thin hand a moment between her soft palms, and looked at him wistfully.

"Whatever happens," she said, "I know you will not forget old friends." Her voice trembled a little as she said it.

"Dear Celia," he answered—and some faint sub-conscious stirring of remorse made his voice very gentle and tender—"Dear Celia, I am very selfish. You have been too patient with me; you have spoiled me."

She laughed a little, and took her hands away.

"An old maid must have something to spoil," she

"You are ill, and you never sent for me."—p. 811.

said. "If it had not been you, it would have been a cat or a canary-bird. When shall you see her?"

"This afternoon. She has asked me to come up to tea. She has let the Ashford people furnish a few rooms, and she is camping out, as she calls it, till the rest of her furniture comes from London."

There was a pause. Then he got up suddenly, and began to walk up and down the narrow space between the door and the window, with knitted brows and hands clasped behind him.

"Well?" said Miss Ringwood.

"It isn't that I doubt her constancy," he said, "but I don't know whether it's fair. I'm old, you see, and I have grown dull. It is rather like offering her the dry husks of—of—"

"Of what she threw away fifteen years ago."

"You are unjust," he said.

"No, no; I didn't mean it, James. Now you must go. I am very busy; and be sure you come and tell me all about it. Good-bye; you need not be afraid because your hair is grey. If she loved you— Well, good-bye."

He went off down the street with a new hopefulness in his step. When he was gone, Miss Ringwood went up to her own room; she leaned her elbows on the little white dressing-table, among the prim wool mats and the little daily text-books, and looked again at herself in the glass. Her eyes were very sad, though no tears stood in them. Presently a smile stirred the corners of her mouth, where a dimple still lingered.

"After all," she said to herself, "she is fifteen years older too."

Then she blushed at the too feminine thought, and the new colour in her cheeks became her so that she turned away from the glass in confusion.

"But he is just the sort of man not to care how old anyone was if he loved them."

Then the pretty colour faded quite away, and Miss Ringwood went slowly down-stairs to cut out petticoats for the Dorcas meeting that afternoon.

III.

FOR four days Miss Ringwood looked hourly for the rector. He had brought his sorrow to her always; surely he would bring his joy too. On the first day she did not doubt that he would bring it; on the second day she told herself that she did not doubt it; when the third day had almost dragged itself out she was a little frightened at the bitterness of her own thoughts. Why should he come to her now? It is not happy lovers who need confidants. How, indeed, should he find the time to come to her now? All his spare moments would be spent in Orlestone now. He was sitting in some warm fire-lighted room, with that other woman's hand in his—how should even his thoughts find their way to the little lonely parlour in the High Street? He might at least have spared time to write. It would not have been so hard if there had been a letter. Next morning there was a letter. It was not from him; she saw that, while yet it was in the postman's hand, for she had been watching at the window, and had run to the door when she saw the postman cross the road. It was from his housekeeper.

"Please forgive the liberty," it said, after decent heading of address, date, and "Honoured Madam"—"but master is very bad, and he say 'No doctors.' He has been ailing this three days. If you was to think fit to come over, you might persuade him for his good.—Yours obedient to command,

"EMMA WELLINGS."

"I'm going out," she cried to her little maid, "at once."

"Without breakfast, mum?"

The girl's wondering eyes brought her back to the world where one minds what "people say," and she recollected that there were no trains to Orlestone till eleven. Those three hours, even now, Celia does not care to remember. She sat alone in her parlour, thinking, thinking. She had had such hard thoughts of him; and now he was ill: dying, perhaps. In a passion of desire to do something for him, she packed a basket with beef-tea, and eggs, and port wine—the little luxuries she kept for her "poor people"—and took it with her when she went at eleven. Surely never train crawled so slowly. As she got out at Orlestone Station she heard a porter speak a name that turned her sharply round—"Lady Mountdew."

Yes, that must be she in the booking-office, talking to the station-master. Celia remembered with a pang that it was this tall woman in the heavy crape who had the right to tend him. Miss Ringwood was woman enough to consult the time-table on the wall in such fashion as to be able to see, and see plainly, Lady Mountdew's face. Such a face! she thought to herself, with a sudden strange thrill at the heart, whether of pain or pleasure she hardly knew. A stout, middle-aged, vulgar face, with a pink set colour and heavy bright red lips. How often she had heard of Eva's blue eyes! They were blue still; but steel-blue, round and prominent, and the busy crow had set his foot about them. And the gold hair, such a poor coarse gold now! It was a face through which shone no soul at all. As Miss Ringwood passed her, she put up her long-handled eye-glass to stare at the "little person with the basket."

The shortest way to the Rectory lay through the fields, and Miss Ringwood took it. She hurried on through the keen sweet air, devoured by a burning anxiety that consumed all self-consciousness, all personal doubts and dreams. When she saw the blue smoke curling from the red chimneys of the Rectory above the laurels and cypresses, she quickened her pace, stumbling a little now and then on the rough pasture.

The housekeeper opened the door.

"How is he?" Celia had to clear her throat twice before the words would come.

"But poorly," the woman answered. "He was out up at the Hall Tuesday; and all day Wednesday walking the wet woods, as I well know by the state his boots was in. And then he coughs all night, he does, and the next morning he sends out his breakfast, and so it's gone on; and he won't let me send for the doctor—and—well, yes, p'raps it 'ud be better for you to see him at once."

Celia clenched her hands as she went in. He did not hear her open the door. He was sitting gazing into the fire, with his head on his hand and his elbow on his study table. His head was bowed, and Celia realised for the first time that he was no longer young. He looked, indeed, an old man.

She laid her hand on his arm, and he started and looked up at her with a look of sudden joy and tenderness she had never hoped to see. But it faded at once. "He did not know who it was; he thought it was—someone else," she said to herself, but not bitterly.

"You are ill, and you never sent for me. And you never came, as you promised," she said, with only the gentlest reproach.

"I could not," he spoke hoarsely, and then a fit of coughing took him, and he sank back in his chair.

"But you are ill," she said. "I must send for a doctor at once."

"But he could do me no good. What nonsense it is!" he went on irritably. "Who told you I was ill? I'm all right, only very tired."

"I've brought you some beef-tea and things."

His brows contracted. "Now, Celia, I will not have it. There is nothing the matter with me." The grieved look in her eyes stopped him,

"You always trusted me before."

"I did—I do—I will! Celia, I went to see her. It is all over. I have wasted all my life on a shadow."

"She does not care any more?"

"She never did care, I think. She did not even know me at first. She only wanted to see the parson about her pew, and sent for him as she sends for anything else she wants! She did not know me at first, and—when she did. . . . I have thrown away life, and youth, and hope, and love, everything, everything, for the sake of a woman who never was at all, except in my dreams and my fancy. And there is nothing left in life."

"Poor James!" she said; she had taken off her prim bonnet and seated herself near him. "But all your poor people: you still have them to live for."

"That's what I keep saying to myself, but all the sunshine is gone, and it looks such a long way to the end."

"But it is better to know the truth," she said, rather lamely.

"I didn't know, I didn't realise before, and that was why I couldn't come to you. Oh, Celia, you don't know—I didn't know till just now, all that you've been to me all these years; and but for my own folly and madness you might have been with me, close at my side, all these long, long years; for you did love me once, didn't you, Celia?"

She was silent.

"At least," he went on hesitatingly, "if you had been my wife you would have learned to love me."

"Learned to love you! Oh, my dear!"

Her tone thrilled him to the soul. Her head was down on the arm of his chair, and his hand very gently and uncertainly touched her smooth faded hair.

"You don't mean— Why, Celia, my dear, my dear!"

For her arms were round his neck, and her face against his, and for that one good minute the long lonely years of sorrow seemed not too heavy a price.

"And now," said Miss Ringwood, lifting from his shoulder a face that had grown young and pretty again—"and now perhaps you will take the beef-tea!"

COLPORTEURS AT WORK.

BY G. HOLDEN PIKE, AUTHOR OF "THE LIFE AND WORK OF CHARLES HADDON SPURGEON."

THE revival of colportage in the British Isles belongs to the second half of the nineteenth century, and it appears to have been followed by the best results. Leaving out of the reckoning the private enterprise which provides Bible-carriages and so on, we have three chief societies: two in England and one in Scotland. In the aggregate, these employ some hundreds of men, each having his own district and constituency to look after. Provided that he has tact and qualifications for the service, the colporteur is sure to win his way, to become a favourite of the people, and to become, as it were, indispensable in his own little world. What the colporteur is, and what he does, is best known to the poor of his district; but the itinerant bookseller also makes friends among the more well-to-do householders of his round, becoming in course of time a welcome visitor among them. Thus, in the course of the same morning a colporteur will be found selling a penny book to a peasant in the village street or to a housewife at the wash-tub, and a few minutes later he will open his tempting pack on the drawing-room carpet at the vicarage or the hall. He is a man of cosmopolitan sympathies, having persons of all ranks for his patrons. At times his visits may prove of as great advantage to the rich as they do to the poor. At all events, many who do not belong to the poorer classes set a high value on the humble colporteur's ministrations, especially in time of sickness or of trouble.

The colporteur as I have met with him, and travelled with him over his district, is a Christian worker sui generis, but he would toil to little purpose if he were not in love with his calling or if he had not special qualifications for it. His social position is that of a better-class working man: one who cannot boast of any great acquirements in the departments of grammar or literature, but who, nevertheless, can hold his own in a religious dispute, preach a sermon such as those of his own order will value, and otherwise live such a life as will be in itself a Christian testimony.

Colportage in England is spoken of as a revival, because the Reformation itself is supposed to have been advanced by those who silently and secretly carried evangelical books in packs containing cloths, silks, etc. It was a hazardous thing to do in what would then have been called the enemy's country, but it was effective in carrying Luther's books to the most remote districts. That all passed away, however, and in the degenerate days that followed, colporteurs of another kind may be said to have come upon the scene both in England and on the Continent. In France, in the days preceding the Revolution of 1789, the itinerant booksellers, who were the chief distributors of the people's reading, were regarded as the beasts of burden of literature, while the booksellers proper were said to be its caterpillars. In the days of the tyranny which provoked the great sanguinary outburst these book-hawkers were ever in fear of the police, while they were so ignorant that they were commonly unable to see the difference between a prayer-book and a political pamphlet. While merely seeking to earn a livelihood, these poor men were declared by patriots to be the assertors of public liberty, though, as victims of the tyranny which prevailed, one of their number would occasionally be sent to the Bastille, or be found chained up in a country market-place on market-day as a public offender.

What followed in our own country during the first half of the present century is well known to readers of old-time books, such as Mayhew's work on the London poor. The abolition of all the "taxes on knowledge" has had the effect of destroying the low hawker's trade by cheapening newspapers and multiplying periodicals of a popular kind; but probably the corrupt press is now even more active and disastrous in its effects than was the case when St. Giles's poured forth its stream of demoralising trash. If we contrast the earlier years of the Queen's reign with the present time, we shall not find much that is reassuring in regard to this subject. The boys have now demoralising serials; while, for the girls, millions of penny or halfpenny novels are printed in London, whence they find their way all over the country like swarms of devastating locusts.

Hence the need and value of the colporteur, who, if he be the right man in the right place, has one of the finest fields of Christian enterprise open to him. His calling is essentially an aggressive enterprise; and the late Lord Shaftesbury held that what had been done on the Continent and in the British Isles sufficiently proved that the period of trial or experiment had been passed, and that success was sure to follow any well-directed effort. The Earl was of opinion that colportage as a system was necessary to prevent the purveyors of bad literature from having the field all to themselves. The great philanthropist spoke as one who was well acquainted with the extent of the evil which required to be counteracted; and therefore it was that on one occasion he distinctly declared that "few, except those who have been forced into an investigation of what is said, done, and written by the circulators of impure and seductive literature, can form an estimate of the number and variety of their efforts, and of the zeal and subtlety in which they are conceived and executed." The pictorial art and literary talent expended upon the impure productions is also characteristic of the present day, as compared with the coarser modes of writing in vogue a century ago. As a means of counteracting the bad and promoting the circulation of what is good, the late C. H. Spurgeon thought colportage to be second to no other agency. Perhaps the best authorities on the subject are the men themselves, who appear to be very generally of opinion that their calling represents one of the necessities of the age. As an itinerant bookseller, his service does not clash with that of any other ardent Christian worker; he rather represents the complement of their service. Thus, we find him welcomed by clergymen and nonconformist ministers alike, who see in him a temperance advocate, a local preacher, and a sick-visitor as well as a seller of books. To distribute his wares widely and effectively is always regarded as the colporteur's chief duty, however; and as successful sales are a test of active service, the man is always anxious to have a good account to render in regard to sales. At the same time, colportage is a philanthropic undertaking rather than a commercial enterprise, and as such, entails an annual loss, to be made up by subscriptions, of £40 for each district. At first sight this may seem to be a comparatively heavy item, but in the way of really philanthropic work there is nothing cheaper that can be done.

The cheapness and effectiveness of the work was often dwelt upon by the late C. H. Spurgeon; and on one occasion it was well illustrated by the late Dr. Samuel Manning, when, in speaking before a number of colporteurs and their friends, he compared the work in general to a well-aimed ink-pot. When imprisoned in the Wartburg, Luther, according to a well-known legend, is said to have been visited by the devil, at whose head he aimed his ink-stand. It was thought that there was nothing so likely to make the arch-enemy flee as a well-directed missile made up of printer's ink. "Depend upon it, it is more powerful to exorcise the devil than all the holy water that ever has been sprinkled by priests from the beginning of the great apostasy to the present time," said Dr. Manning.

The hard-working colporteur, as I have met with him in his country district, has appeared to be a man made for his work. Hardy in constitution, and showing a simple piety which knows nothing of the doubt or difficulty which troubles more learned personages, he goes about his service with a straightforward earnestness which is reassuring in times like these. Though poor, like the greater part of his constituency, the colporteur is above the average of his class in intelligence, and, unlike the French packmen of a century ago, he is commonly well acquainted with the quality of the wares which he offers. This affords him a double advantage: for it enables him to speak about the character of the books which he recommends. He thus makes himself agreeable to the people, who welcome his visits because they have learned to like the man. Perhaps he who has best mastered his business makes his way to the esteem of the elders through the hearts of the children, who in a peasant home are often found to be the chief readers of the family. What the better-educated children like, their elders will be sure to regard with respect, and many will listen with keen interest to the reading of such works as they could only imperfectly read for themselves. Beyond all this, the colporteur is greatly valued as an adviser and as a visitor of the sick. In the latter capacity, more especially, he is greatly valued; and no wonder, for under the most favourable of conditions the peasants have none too many friends who volunteer to visit them, or whom they really care to receive. In the person of the colporteur, however, they have a friend, whose unaffected voice has the true ring of their own patois, and whose heart is in thorough accord with their own shortcomings and aspirations.

The districts worked by the colporteurs naturally vary greatly, so that the energy or capacity of a man cannot always be estimated by the amount of his sales. I have taken notice of the colporteur in a large manufacturing town, for example, when it has been evident that he has occupied vantage-ground. His lot was not only thrown among those who had more money to spend than the agricultural peasantry: the town had advantages which were naturally wanting in the villages. Parts of his own town, as well as the outlying villages, can be visited during the week, and then on each Saturday night he could spread the most tempting-looking stall among other or more ordinary bookmen in the market-place. As a man capable of making the most of his opportunities, he is there quite in his element. His wares are of a price to attract working-class customers, who, having once become purchasers, may acquire a taste for reading. As it is with the professional, so is it with the working-classes: when individuals begin to buy books, they will continue the habit, so that it is not impossible for an energetic agent to get together what is known as a connection. Whether that connection be large or small, the man will most likely command our sympathies while carrying on his operations. There may be even a ludicrous difference of one man's takings as compared with another's; for while a man in the Cheddar district once took £303 18s. 9d. in the year, another's receipts in the Midlands amounted to only £27 14s. 2d. These cases may be taken as showing the two extremes; but to properly estimate the value of colportage we have to take the average all round. The man of small takings may really be doing pioneer service of the greatest value. He may even see that himself, and be correspondingly encouraged, while the man in a more commanding sphere may be depressed by symptoms which betoken a turn in the tide. The shrewd members of a committee take their estimate of a man correctly, but they do not always look first at the sales.

In the non-manufacturing parts of England the colporteurs' district is one of great natural beauty, charming during a great part of the year, but a place in which the pedestrian bookseller has to rough it, at some risk of strength or health giving way. He has to conquer prejudice and to make friends. In villages entered for the first time he may have to work a revolution in the reading tastes of the people before he can hope to make much headway among them. Many will show a liking for sensational fiction and records of crime, all illustrated by flaring pictures, some of which will be in colours, and the wisdom of having something better must be advocated. If he has the right sort of tact, the man will win his way little by little; and at length, when the good has outrun the bad, the humble colporteur is master of the situation. Having conquered the people without their knowing it, he has won their respect, and to miss the sight of the colporteur's face or the sound of his voice would be to lose a friend who could ill be spared. When he has thus established his claim to favour, the work of the colporteur among the common people aids that of all others who are their friends. His wish is to be opposed to none, but to seek the co-operation of all.

The best side of the colporteur's work is often best described in his own words, and the following vividly shows how he reaches the poor as well as the more well-to-do classes:—"Leaving a village one morning on a strange road, I presumed to call at a beautiful house, which proved to be a clergyman's, and offered my books for sale; and in a few minutes I had the pack open, and a goodly number of the household round it. Presently, on leaving the door, I had taken 9s. 2d., and went on my way in triumph, thinking I had made a good start for the day. I have called many times since, and have been kindly treated." Then, again:—"One evening, passing a farm-yard just as the men were leaving work, I stopped and opened the pack, and began to exhibit the contents, and one purchased, and another purchased, until presently I had sold about ten shillings' worth of books on the spot, which would evidently not have been purchased but for my passing by."

Some years ago I was greatly interested in accompanying a colporteur over his ground in the Westminster district, which numbers among its attractions the charming and extensive park of Longleat Hall and the gigantic Saxon White Horse cut in the chalk of a hill-side. My companion was a man who had more than once received a testimonial on account of effective service. As a preacher on Sundays, and as a visitor of the sick, his work extended far beyond the mere carrying of the pack, and in one cottage after another his appearance was hailed as that of a welcome friend, and not of the intruding bookseller. What interest was excited when the pack was opened, and books in cloth, and in parts with attractive covers and splendid pictures, were exposed to view! At last, when one apparently well-to-do cottager took up a part of our old friend, "Cassell's Illustrated Family Bible," and held it at arm's length like a discerning connoisseur, admiration could be restrained no longer, so that he naturally exclaimed:—"I be in a good mind to take in that there." After being assured that he would always have his money's worth in a good Family Bible, there came the question—"How many parts be there?" "Forty parts at a shilling each, and a presentation picture." After some hesitation—"Shall I—shall we have it?" to which the wife discreetly answers, "Oh, just as you like; you know"—the colporteur is told to "Put me down," and he goes forward, conscious that he has done a good stroke of business. My companion had a wonderful stock of anecdotes to tell of rough adventures on the road, oftentimes at night, and when he was a long distance from home. At one time he used a kind of tricycle; but in any case a colporteur must be strong enough to be capable of carrying 60lbs. a distance of twelve miles without breaking down.

"I be in a good mind to take in that there."

The subject is a wide one; and did space allow, something might be said about colportage in Scotland, and the still more arduous work carried on in foreign countries by the agents of the British and Foreign Bible Society. These latter not infrequently show a heroism which is worthy of all praise, and which evidently comes of a strong love of the work. Almost less enviable than all is the lot of the colporteur in London. In a poor district like Bethnal Green his trials are almost greater than those of the City Missionary, on account of the chronic poverty and ignorance which prevail. Instead of sweet fields and country lanes, with their hedgerows and flower-banks, he has to go into crowded streets and close courts, where, after ascending semi-dark staircases, he may knock at one door after another, only to discover a state of things that renders the purchase of books out of the question. He will have his Saturday-night book-stall, however, and in one way and another makes many friends. Colportage is evidently one of the works which ought to be stimulated rather than neglected.

THE SCIENCE OF THE SOUL.

BY THE REV. ARTHUR FINLAYSON, AUTHOR OF "EVANESCENT PHILOSOPHIES," "ETHICS OF ATHLETICS," ETC.

TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES.

SCIENCE cannot overturn religion, but it may shake it. And the faith of many is liable to be undermined by fears as they become entangled in the maze of certain scientific theories, and find themselves in danger of drifting from the old moorings. Therefore, it is well to remember certain great principles which will prove a safe anchorage, and reassure us that science is the friend, not the foe, of religion.

1. Christianity is not opposed to science, nor is science hostile to Christianity.—It seems strange that anyone acquainted with history should suppose to-day that there is any necessary antagonism between science and religion. No doubt there have been mistakes on both sides in the past. Scientists commit many errors in consequence of neglecting the light of revelation. Theologians have also fallen into grave mistakes in consequence of misinterpreting the teaching of Scripture respecting physical things. But if we look back through the vista of the centuries, we see that the Church of Christ (using the word in its widest sense) has been the nursery of science and the home of true philosophy.

The names of bygone worthies of science who were also believers in the Christian revelation rise up in the vista of the past, and add their striking testimony to the fact, which the principle we emphasize repeats and confirms in all ages. Such names as those of Roger Bacon (1214—1294), Nicholas Copernicus (1472—1543), Francis Bacon (1561—1626), René Descartes (1596—1650), Blaise Pascal (1623—1662), Isaac Barrow (1630?—1677), Robert Boyle (1626—1691), John Locke (1632—1704), John Ray (1628—1705), Gottfried W. Leibnitz (1646—1716), Isaac Newton (1642—1727), George Cuvier (1769—1832), John Dalton (1766—1844), Michael Faraday (1791—1867), David Brewster (1781—1869), John F. W.

Herschell (1792—1871), Adam Sedgwick (1787—1873), Sir J. W. Dawson, the Ex-President of the British Association, or Professor Stokes, who has in turn been called to fill three positions held by Sir Isaac Newton—as Professor of Mathematics, as President of the Royal Society, and as Member of Parliament for Cambridge University; these and other names bear eloquent witness to the fact that the Church of Christ has been the nursery of science and its foster-mother.

2. Where such antagonism appears, the fault may often be due to imperfect knowledge on one side or the other.—The canon of Scripture is fixed and closed; the canon of science is open and progressive. It may therefore sometimes appear that there is between the two an antagonism. And it may therefore be a sign of truth that such discrepancy or want of harmony between the verdict of Scripture and that of science be clearly marked. But the discordance may be due to the middle-men of science or of theology, who purvey science or theology, or what they consider to be science or theology, to the intelligent multitude. And in such a case it becomes important to enquire, What is the precise verdict of theology? What is the precise verdict of science? No single fact in science has ever discredited a fact in revelation. A scientific hypothesis or a pious opinion may be the means of creating confusion, but a little careful examination and a calm judgment may show a way out of the difficulty, by relegating these to their proper place instead of placing them in the category of well-ascertained facts. Professor Stokes, as President of the Royal Society, declared: "The cry about an opposition between science and religion is not only raised by professed sceptics, but, worse still, accepted and echoed by defenders of religion. In these days, when the truth of all scientific conclusions was assumed, to hear that religion was in conflict with them was to have doubt thrown on the truth of religion. Only those who get their science at first hand are in a position to estimate the evidence for scientific statements, some of which might be well established and others the merest conjectures. Those who got them at third or fourth hand lumped them all indiscriminately together as equally trustworthy. The answer to such objections usually is, either that the scientific statements are only conjectures, or that they are true, but not opposed to religion." In other words, discrimination is necessary. There must be no hasty and reckless acceptance of all scientific theories, and no ingenious distortion of Scripture meanings to suit vague and unproved hypotheses. By attention to this principle the difficulty will either disappear or be greatly reduced.

When opponents say that science has proved this or that, and therefore the Bible cannot be true, we go a long way to meet this common and successful argument by replying, "I am not prepared to say whether your difficulty is right or wrong, but there must be a mistake somewhere, because men like Professor Stokes find no difficulty in believing." The number of believers, as we have seen, includes many of the most penetrating and profound minds, bred under those very conditions which are supposed to render impossible faith in things transcending ordinary human experience. And the fact that we have had five Lord Chancellors in succession—Lords Hatherley, Cairns, Selborne, Herschell, and Halsbury: all of them sincere and devout Christians, and all of them legal luminaries, men accustomed to weigh and sift evidence, men who are in the habit of analysing their thoughts and distinguishing between what they really believe and what they fancy they believe—is not a bad argument in favour of the truth of the Christian religion.

3. Science and theology are each useful in their proper place.—Professor James Clerk Maxwell, one of the greatest of modern natural philosophers, whose work on "Electricity and Magnetism" and whose scientific investigations have made him famous, was, in the full sense of the word, a Christian. As Professor of Experimental Physics in the University of Cambridge, he obtained a fame which entitles him—in clearness of mental vision, in power of penetration, and in the possession of that patient determination to which Newton ascribed all his success—to be ranked with Faraday. Now, Professor Maxwell asserted that he had examined every form of atheism which he had met, with the result of finding that all ultimately required the recognition of a personal God. And he solemnly affirms: "I think men of science, as well as other men, need to learn from Christ; and I think Christians whose minds are scientific are bound to study science that their view of the glory of God may be as extensive as their being is capable of." These are weighty words, coming from so eminent an authority, and nothing could more powerfully illustrate and enforce the principle here inculcated: that science and revelation are twin gifts of God, which it is our duty to thankfully receive and gratefully use to our own and to others' profit.

4. Science is useless as a substitute for revelation.—That we may be perfectly impartial, we quote from one of the leading scientific journals of the day: the Lancet, the cultured organ of medical science. This independent witness frankly declares:—"We may turn our backs on religion, and repudiate revelation, but we have nothing better to turn to. No single fact in science is inconsistent with or opposed to the hypothesis of inspired or derived vitality, or the work of a Creator. Indeed, there is a need for this or some other hypothesis in the explication of physiology. The scientist is at liberty to reject religion as an aid to science, but if he does this on the ground that what religion has to offer is hypothesis, he must on the same ground reject the hypothesis of life as a property of protoplasm. All true men know this." These are words worth remembering by all students of science.

THE WITNESS OF BIOLOGY.

The theory of spontaneous generation, which has been struggling for a foothold in the biological world for so many years, has to-day been quite given up. So far as science can settle anything, this question is settled. Spontaneous generation is exploded. The mature decision of science to-day is expressed in the old axiom, omne vivum ex vivo. To-day all really scientific experience tells us that life can be produced from a living antecedent only. Science cannot bridge the chasm between the organic and the inorganic, or between the living and the lifeless forms of matter. Life is the cause of organisation, and not organisation the cause of life. Professor Tyndall, Dr. Dallinger, and Pasteur, by different methods and experiments, have demonstrated the fallacy of Dr. Bastian's experiments, made with the view of proving that life can be spontaneously generated. The highest authorities in biological science to-day affirm, with complete unanimity, the failure of spontaneous generation. Lord Kelvin, better known as Sir William Thomson, declares: "I am ready to adopt it as an article of scientific faith, true through all space and all time, that life proceeds from life, and nothing but life." Professor Huxley declares categorically that the doctrine of biogenesis, or life only from life, is "victorious along the whole line at the present day."

The attempt to revive the doctrine of abiogenesis resulted in its burial. Dr. Bastian, after a series of elaborate experiments on the "beginning of evil," revived the doctrine of spontaneous generation: i.e., that matter can spontaneously generate life. In his experiments, after every expedient to secure sterility life appeared in myriad quantity. Professor Tyndall repeated Dr. Bastian's experiments, with additional precautions to secure absolute sterility suggested by the most recent science, with very different results. He varied the experiment in every direction, but matter in the germless air never yielded life. Dr. Dallinger came to the front, and by a different method proved the fallacies underlying Dr. Bastian's experiments. Without leaning either to biogenesis or abiogenesis, he gave himself to the working out by microscopical research of the life-histories of the minute forms of life, the mode of whose origin was in dispute. He traced the life-histories of these minute organisms, and worked them out successfully, showing that, so far from their having origin in not-living matter, they actually arise in spores or germs, fertilised by a genetic process, like all the higher and more complex forms above them.

These experiments have practically closed the question. Professor Huxley distinctly affirms, in the light of the latest research, that "the properties of living matter distinguish it absolutely from all other kinds of things, and that the present state of our knowledge furnishes us with no link between the living and the not-living." This is a sufficiently bold and clear statement, and is made by one who has scientifically mastered the results of researches up to the latest date. Tyndall, though confessing that he wishes the evidence were the other way, is compelled to say: "I affirm that no shred of trustworthy experimental testimony exists to prove that life in our day has ever appeared independently of antecedent life." Dr. Dallinger asserts: "The conviction to-day of the largest number by far of the most competent biologists is, that down to the uttermost verge of organised existence, out to its very edge and in its lowliest condition, it is yet true that only that which is living can produce that which shall live."

Biological science to-day is therefore an eloquent witness to the existence of a great First Cause, the Author of Life, and the mystery which science cannot pierce, and the darkness in which pure science would grope, is relieved by the light of revelation. Every elementary molecule of matter, science tells us, has its specific properties; and Sir John Herschell asserts: "These molecules possess all the characteristics of manufactured articles." And Professor Dana affirms: "Geology appears to bring us directly before the Creator, and leads us to no other solution of the origin of life than this—Deus fecit" (God produced it). Those who are dazzled by the conjectures of false science should remember this: spontaneous generation is discredited. The transition from not-life to life is abrupt. The break is absolute and clear. These are the latest conclusions of the highest scientific authorities of our day.

THE WITNESS OF REVELATION.

Where science cannot help us, revelation comes to our aid. There are problems which science cannot solve which Christianity answers. "The cosmic questions are connected not only with this world, but with the whole universe. What are the questions of this kind which science says she is unable to answer, and which religion has answered? Questions of origin:—

"How did the first atom of matter come into existence?

"What was the origin of force?

"What was the origin of life?

"These great questions are answered in the Bible.

"Is God a person?

"Can God control the laws of nature?

"Will God answer prayer?

"What is God's character?

"What is God's relation to mankind?

"These questions are not only unsolved by science, but there is not the least indication that they ever will be solved in this way. They belong to an earlier stage and a higher sphere than it is given to man to penetrate. The first page of the chapter which treats of 'Origins' is a sealed book unless to those who read it in the first chapter of Genesis." * Science is useless as a substitute for revelation; and to remember this is the soul's true science. Christianity is scientia scientiarum. The queen of all the sciences is the Gospel of Jesus Christ. The soul cannot live on syllogisms. Science cannot bind up a bleeding heart. Logic has no balm for the soul. Revelation is a fact. Sin is a fact. Salvation is a fact. Christian life is as much a fact as physical life. That the life and death of the Lord Jesus avail to cleanse the conscience and to purify the life of man is, in its own way, as much a fact as any "fact" of science or of nature.

Theological science can at no point be separated from general science. Some knowledge of every department of human investigation must always be included in every system or Theological Encyclopædia as auxiliary to the theological sciences themselves. But theology outruns and overlaps all other sciences. And the student of science who ignores the grandest of all sciences, or deliberately shuts his eyes, ears, and heart to the truth of the Divine revelation as contained in God's Word, is like the chemist who denies that the ultimate reality can be known because he does not find it in his crucibles and retorts, or like a deaf man who questions the fact of sound because he cannot smell it.

ARE YOU SCIENTIFIC?

In the investigation of mathematical or physical truth, character counts for little. Men of the worst character may in such inquiries achieve the most triumphant success. Not so with the science of the soul. In the search for moral truth the heart cannot be separated from the head. In religious inquiry character is the keystone in the arch of moral investigation. "Prove all things," but "hold fast that which is good" while so doing.

Religion does not shrink from the stern test which modern science insists upon applying to all things—the test of experience. "Two and two make four—that is mathematics; hydrogen and oxygen form water—that is chemistry; Christ crucified is the power of God unto salvation—that is revelation. But how do you know? Put two and two together, and you have four; count, and see. Put hydrogen and oxygen together, and you have water; test, and you will prove it. Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved; believe, and you will know. Each demonstration is unanswerable in its own sphere." Man's religious nature is as real as his physical nature, and implies a spiritual as much as the latter implies a physical world. "O taste, and see how gracious the Lord is!" The test of experience will witness to the reality and use of the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

A GOOD-FOR-NOTHING COUSIN.

BY MARGARET S. FAILL.

CHAPTER XIV.

RACHEL.

SURELY

Ruth had had a bad dream, which the morning light would soon dispel? She tried to throw off the heavy weight which seemed pressing on her heart, but, alas! the effort only brought back the stern truth to her mind. It was no dream, no delusion. Across the passage, in a darkened room, they had laid Lance, and the silence of death which reigned there cast its solemn gloom over all the house. Some faint sounds from the room adjoining hers reminded Ruth that her sister and old Miss Douglas were in the house; but they might have lived there all their lives for any curiosity she felt concerning them. The old lady came out of the room occasionally, but Rachel was unable to leave her bed. Ruth heard this without any emotion. Perhaps she had no feeling left—possibly her heart had turned to stone, too—but no: it ached too intensely for that. Nothing seemed real but this intolerable deadly load that hung upon her, and would not be shaken off, and which yet appeared like some bad nightmare.

It was on Monday that Miss Douglas, coming to the door of her room as Ruth passed, told her that her sister wished to see her.

"Don't let her excite herself too much," the old lady said warningly, "for she is still very weak. And now I shall leave you alone together;" and then Ruth found herself in the room face to face with Rachel.

Was this really the meeting which she had looked forward to for years? How often, in fancy, she had pictured the scene; and how difficult she would have found it to believe that she could be so unmoved! Still, as she went over to the bed a faint excitement stirred within her. She had only time to catch sight of a pretty, pale face on the pillows, when a pair of soft arms were thrown round her neck, and warm kisses pressed her cheeks.

"Dear Ruth," said a caressing voice; and somehow the tone and action brought a rush of tears to Ruth's eyes, although it sent a thrill of warm feeling into her heavy heart. "Ah, poor Ruth!" said the soft voice again; "but you mustn't fret so much;" and she gave another kiss. "Do you know," she went on, as Ruth forced back her tears, "I thought I should never have lived to see you. It was dreadful!"

"How did it happen that you were in the same boat?" Ruth asked, sitting on the edge of the bed, but still having her hand imprisoned in Rachel's soft, clinging clasp.

"Oh," said Rachel, sitting up, "this is how it happened: We were coming to see you—for ever so long we have talked of it, but somehow it always got put off. First, auntie wished to pay a visit on the other side of the loch, and we thought we could get across by the steamer. We found that the steamers didn't suit, owing to the season; but they told us we could get over in a sailing-boat. I was rather afraid; but it looked so calm, we decided to venture. When we found the boy in the boat, and heard the man call him 'Master Douglas,' auntie thought he was like me; so we knew who he was at once. Poor boy! he kept on telling me not to be afraid, when the squall came on. I can't bear to think of it. I was sure I was going to be drowned;" and she gave a shiver. But after a minute she looked round with a smile. "Are you glad to see me, Ruth?" she asked, with another embrace. "I am to see you."

Ruth could hardly have applied the word "glad" to any of her present feelings: her heart was too sore for that; but Rachel's tender embrace and caressing tones had a comforting and softening effect on the sharpness of her grief, and bending down, she returned her sister's kiss.

"I have always wished to see you, Rachel," she said, half sadly; "but just now nothing can make me glad."

"Cousin Archie brought her."—p. 351.

It was on Tuesday, the last day of March, chill and cold, that they buried Lance. Perhaps Ruth had not fully realised her loss until they carried the boy out through the little gate where only a few short days since he had so gaily passed, whistling, and had turned to wave his cap. At this memory her tears flowed freely, and she wept until she was thoroughly exhausted, so that when she made her appearance among the others in the evening, her eyes were red and swollen, and her cheeks pale and haggard.

That same evening, when the lamps were lit and the fire was burning brightly, Rachel came down to tea for the first time. She was dressed in a tea-gown of the most delicate shade of pink, and made a bright spot in the dull room. She looked like some fragile hot-house plant, which a rough breath of wind might blow away. Jack rose and gave her the arm-chair near the fire, and Miss Douglas was greatly concerned lest there should be the slightest draught; so while everyone was bustling round the invalid, Ruth had time to observe her fully. The tearful interview in the bed-room had not left any very clear impression on her mind, but she became aware now—although it had not struck her before—that Rachel was a beauty. All her features were so delicate and dainty, even her feet and hands were tiny; and as she sat in the large arm-chair, with the firelight shining on her sparkling rings, she looked like a creature unfit for every-day use. Everybody came round her and attended to her as if she had been a princess; but she received it all with such a charming manner, that it seemed only natural and right. Miss Douglas regarded the two sisters, and as her eye travelled from the one face, curved into soft smiling lines, and then on to the other, which was sombre and heavy-eyed, she wondered how she could ever have mistaken them, even for a moment. Poor Ruth was indeed looking wretched. Even her eyes, always the most striking feature of her face, were dim and lustreless, and her whole air was dejected and listless. The old lady was sorry for the girl, who was so plainly suffering and unhappy; and she went over to the sofa beside Ruth, and made some effort at consolation. But her method, which was of the rousing-up order, could not be considered very felicitous. Ruth's wound was too recent to bear rough handling at present, and she winced under the well-meant remarks, uttered in such brisk tones.

"Well, well," Miss Douglas was saying, in conclusion, "the ways of Providence are a great mystery—the youngest in the boat was taken. But the Lord knows best, and we must submit to His will."

Ruth thought the old lady was submitting remarkably well; but she herself could not yet acquiesce in her affliction with such Christian resignation. She rose up a little wearily; and even when Miss Douglas added, cheerfully: "You know that I have undertaken to pay all the funeral and mourning expenses," she was ungrateful enough to feel as unsoothed as ever.

A few days later Ruth had carried up her sister's breakfast, and was lingering at the bedside for a little talk.

"Now, Ruth," Rachel said brightly, "I want to hear all about the people here. You haven't told me anything yet."

"There are so few people," Ruth responded. "The minister and his wife; a few small farmers and boatmen; the shop, and post-office—I think that is about the extent of the village."

"Oh, that wasn't what I wished to know;" and Rachel put out her hand, with a little laugh. "Tell me about the men—the unmarried ones," she added, with charming frankness.

"There are hardly any," Ruth said doubtfully; "except, of course, Mr. Wilson, the schoolmaster."

"Well, what is he like?" Rachel asked, in a tone of interest. "Young and nice-looking?"

"Oh, young enough, and well enough-looking, I fancy," Ruth said indifferently.

"You fancy!" her sister exclaimed, raising her eyebrows. "What a funny girl you are, Ruth! Evidently you don't flirt most with him."

"Flirt with Mr. Wilson?" Ruth echoed, with contemptuous surprise. "Certainly not."

Rachel laughed.

"Then, who else is there?" she persisted. "There must be another man."

"There is Mr. Lewis," Ruth admitted reluctantly; "but I don't think he could be called young."

"Well, is he rich, or handsome, or anything? Is he the favoured one?"

"I think he is rich," Ruth replied, ignoring the last question, and wishing she could ignore her blush at the same time. "He is an artist," she went on quickly, to prevent Rachel making any remark, "and lives with his two sisters. You used to know them long ago, when we were children."

"Oh!" cried Rachel, who had noted the blush; "you should have mentioned him first. I'm sure he is the one. You must take me to see them, and perhaps the artist will want to paint our portraits—unless," she added, catching sight of the expression on Ruth's face, "he has done yours already. Has he?"

Ruth nodded affirmatively.

"Then he might do us together," Rachel suggested. "I daresay you had great fun in the studio."

"Indeed no," declared Ruth, with a lively recollection of her last unpleasant interview there. "Nothing would induce me to sit again."

She made this assertion with such emphatic earnestness, that Rachel, in spite of the former blush, was constrained to believe its truthfulness.

"But tell me, Ruth," she asked, "if there is no society, and only two men whom you don't care for, how on earth do you manage to exist?"

"Couldn't you exist under those circumstances?" and Ruth looked round at her sister.

"Good gracious! no," the young lady responded fervently. "I couldn't live without society, and some flirtation;" and she laughed frankly and naturally.

Ruth regarded her with some surprise. This way of talking was quite new to her. Indeed, Rachel was a complete revelation to her, and unlike anyone she had ever met. However, as she betook herself out of the room she sincerely hoped the idea of visiting the Lewises would not seriously recur to Rachel, for if so, what excuse could she manage to make?

Little Katie had taken a great fancy to her newly found sister, and followed her about admiringly wherever she went. The little girl chattered away, and imparted a great deal of information, to which Rachel only lent half an ear. At last Katie bethought her of her French doll, which was surely beautiful enough to excite some admiration; so she ran off, and proudly returned with it, arrayed in all its finery.

"What a grandly dressed lady!" said Rachel, taking it and examining the costume with some interest. "Where did she come from?"

"From France," Katie replied proudly. "Cousin Archie brought her."

"Who?" asked Rachel quickly, rousing up instantly to thorough attention. "Who is Cousin Archie?"

"Oh! don't you know?" cried Katie, delighted with the effect of her words. "He's our cousin, and he's awfully nice; and is a soldier, too."

"Does she mean Archie Douglas of the Seaforths?" Rachel said wonderingly, turning to her aunt.

"But Archie Douglas isn't your cousin, child," said the old lady sharply, just as Ruth was entering the room.

"Do you know Archie Douglas, Ruth?" her sister cried, in a tone of surprise. "You never told me."

And so his name had been mentioned at last; Ruth had been expecting it for some time. What would they say about him? Would her doubts be dispelled or confirmed? But she turned to answer Rachel's remark.

"I never thought of mentioning him," she said; "you didn't, either."

"And he never told us he knew you," Rachel went on, as if unable to recover from her surprise.

"People generally do know their cousins," said Ruth, somewhat coldly. "It seems to me that our family is exceptional in that respect."

"But he isn't your cousin," declared Miss Douglas, with energy; "not even a second or third one. He is only distantly related. So he is 'Cousin Archie' here, and I suppose you admire him immensely?"

"Now, auntie, of course she does," struck in Rachel laughingly. "If you were a young girl, you would too. Every girl does; he is so handsome."

"H'm!" grunted the old lady, "if he is only handsome—"

"Oh, but he is so attractive, too," interrupted Rachel, leaning her pretty face saucily against the top of her aunt's chair. "You don't suppose a girl cares if he is a little wild or has a few debts?—Now, don't speak, auntie: you know you're ever so fond of him yourself. And how well he does everything: how he rides, and plays tennis, and flirts!—and she gave a little laugh: "but, oh, Ruth, you should hear him sing! You can imagine nothing more delightful."

Did not Ruth know how delightful it was? As her sister spoke, the parlour at Lakeside, and her own emotions as Archie's voice thrilled through her, rose up in her memory. But now the recollection was robbed of all charm. Every girl admired him—everybody liked his singing. Should she hear next that "Maid of Athens" was his favourite song? The result of this eulogium on his gifts and graces was to rouse up a sort of unreasonable irritation against Archie in her mind.

"He looks really splendid in his uniform!" Rachel was going on. "You remember how vexed he was, auntie, that day when——"

"Of course I remember such an unpleasant scene," Miss Douglas said, with severity; "and I wonder you are not ashamed to talk of it."

Rachel had begun to laugh; and as Miss Douglas still looked severe, she threw her arms round the old lady's neck.

"Now, auntie dear," she said, "you needn't look at me as if I had done something to be ashamed of. How could I help it?"

"There, there, away with you!" and she pushed aside the coaxing arms; but the tone sounded more indulgent than the words.

Rachel jumped up, still laughing, and flitted over to the window, gaily humming a tune. Ruth regarded her with a sort of wonderment. What a bright sparkling creature she seemed—like a butterfly in the sunshine. Her laugh was as joyous as if sorrow could never come near her. Somehow this gaiety jarred on Ruth, whose own heart was so heavy. Of course the loss could not be the same to Rachel, but surely she might feel it a little—she who had so narrowly escaped the same fate.

"One thing is sure," declared the young lady, tripping back from the window: "Archie Douglas must marry a rich wife; and his mother thinks a princess would be hardly good enough for him."

"His mother is a very foolish woman," Miss Douglas asserted, with asperity; "but I know someone whom she would be quite content to have for a daughter-in-law, and she is by no means a princess."

Rachel laughed again.

"Ah! but she would think it a great honour for that 'someone,'" she said. "She thinks there never was anyone like her dear boy Archie."

Ruth, who had thought her cup of suffering too full to contain another drop, found that this conversation gave her an extra pang. But she could stand no more of it. She rose up, and said to Mrs. Lennox that she would go down to the village for anything that was required, and call at the post-office for letters. It was the first time she had thought of going since Lance's death; but to-day the air of the house had become too uncongenial, and any movement seemed preferable to the silent endurance of listening to such talk.

CHAPTER XV.

IN THE CHURCHYARD.

RUTH made her way slowly down the hill, feeling like a different person from the girl who had so gaily and thoughtlessly traversed the same road only a few days ago. The conversation to which she had just listened made her feel sadder than ever. "What were Archie's good looks to her?" she thought wearily. Miss Douglas was evidently astonished to learn that the young man had been here, and she would not even allow Ruth to call him her cousin; Rachel had made no secret of her admiration for him; and her aunt's reference to the "someone" his mother wished him to marry left no room for doubt as to whom she meant. Well, had she not been warned about Rachel and Archie from the beginning? Why should she have imagined that this universally admired young man could ever be anything to her? As she put this question to herself, she listlessly raised her eyes from the ground, and saw him. Yes, it was Archie; there was no mistaking that erect, easy carriage. He was a long way off, but even at that distance she knew him.

"Did you wonder why I never came?"— p. 853.

A sudden wave of colour swept over her face; and all at once, by the quick flutter of her heart, which she had thought broken, Ruth knew her own secret. It came upon her with the suddenness of a shock; but there was no denying it. She knew now why Mr. Matthew had appeared so distasteful to her, and why Rachel's words had carried such a sting in them. Instinctively she tried to fight against the conviction; but deep down in her heart she knew that she loved Archie.

All this time, as they were gradually approaching, he had never noticed her. Ruth's blush had subsided, leaving her quite pale again, when he looked up to the top of the steep inclination he was ascending, and saw her.

A quick smile of pleasure lit up his face on the instant, and, lifting his hat, he hurried forward.

"Ruth!" and he had clasped both her hands in his and was looking down at her. But the smile faded from his face at the sight of her sad expression. "Oh, Ruth! I am so sorry;" and at the tone of sympathy in Archie's expressive voice the tears came into her eyes.

"Thank you," she said, half turning away; but no more words would come.

"You were going down to the village," Archie said. "May I go with you?"

"Oh, won't you go on to the house?" Ruth asked. "Rachel and Miss Douglas are there now."

"I know," he said; "but if I may, I should rather turn back with you. My time is so short—I have only one day's leave; and I must take the boat back to catch the London night express. I thought I must see you, Ruth, and I came as soon as I heard. You never sent me any word." he added, in a slightly reproachful tone, "or I should have come to the funeral."

"None of us had time to think of anything," Ruth said sadly; "it was so dreadfully sudden. I don't seem able to realise it yet."

"Poor Ruth!" he said gently; "I can understand. It doesn't seem true to me, either; but I thought of you all the time."

"How did you hear?" she asked.

"Aunt Douglas wrote to my mother, and she sent on the letter to me."

Then for a while they walked on in silence.

"You are going this way?" Archie asked, indicating the path to the churchyard, when they reached the foot of the hill.

Ruth bent her head in assent, but did not speak. She was grateful to him for divining. It was sweet to have a little sympathy after Miss Douglas's comfortable admonitions about resignation and Rachel's light-hearted gaiety. Archie was sorry, too; he had been fond of Lance, and the boy had returned the feeling. It made it seem less lonely, standing by the grave, to know that someone who felt for her was by her side.

He held open the gate of the little churchyard, which was the only cemetery, and she passed in first. She moved round to the familiar spot where her grandmother lay, and which she and Lance had been in the habit of visiting on fine Sundays. The freshly moved turf indicated where the ground had been disturbed, and a faint scent of lilies reached her as she drew near. A beautiful wreath of fresh white flowers lying on the mound showed from where the perfume came. She turned an enquiring look on Archie, who was behind her.

"Yes," he said, in answer to the unspoken question, "I put it, Ruth. Poor Lance! I wish I could have done something more for him."

He stood by her side, while the tears slowly dropped down her cheeks, but they were less bitter than many she had shed. Whatever faults might be imputed to poor Archie, he could not be accused of the lack of a kind and feeling heart.

He said nothing at all by way of consolation at first, but let her cry on silently. Then he took her arm gently, and spoke in a subdued tone.

"Let us sit down here, Ruth dear," he said, drawing her towards an ancient flat tomb-stone, from which the letters were almost worn away. "We can stay as long as you like."

Ruth allowed herself to be led, and left the hand which he had taken in his clasp. It seemed less desolate to have something to take hold of—something warm and comforting. It assured her that everything had not vanished away; the world was not so cold as she had fancied. After a time her tears ceased to flow as she dried her eyes.

"Ruth, did you wonder why I never came or took any notice all this time?" Archie asked her, breaking the silence.

"I don't think I did," she returned, shaking her head. "I couldn't think of anything but my own sorrow; and," she added, with a dreary sigh, "I feel as if it would always be the same. I am afraid I have become very selfish, for I find I can't bear anyone to laugh, or seem happy, or talk about other things."

The young man looked at her with an indescribable expression in his eyes for a moment, but if he had been about to speak, he checked the words on his lips, and remained silent. After a pause, he spoke again.

"I am glad," he said, in a somewhat low tone, "that you did not think it was want of feeling which kept me away. I was afraid you must be thinking very badly of me."

How could Ruth tell him that she had felt the less she had depended on him the better it would be? She reproached herself now that he had come, and proved himself more sympathetic than anyone else. He was grave and serious, and not the slightest trace appeared of his usual gay spirits, which would have grated on Ruth's present feelings. She had misjudged him, evidently, and thought less of him than he deserved.

"I knew you were fond of Lance," she said, turning to him with some compunction; "but don't think me unkind if I tell you that when he was gone nothing else in the whole world seemed of any consequence."

"I understand, dear Ruth," he said softly, pressing her hand. "It was selfish of me to expect you to think of me at all;" and as he spoke, it occurred to Ruth that she had never known how soft his blue eyes could look.

No wonder Rachel had called him handsome. Each time Ruth saw him she was struck afresh by the fact. To-day, however, it was not his good looks so much as the tender kindness of his expression which she noticed. Something in the glance vaguely disturbed her, and recalled her sister to her mind, which made her remark, almost suddenly—

"You know that Rachel and Miss Douglas are still here. Had we not better go back now?"

"I haven't time, Ruth," said Archie, looking at his watch. "Won't you stay here a little, and talk? You know I came a long way to see you, and you haven't yet told me all about the accident. I should like to hear, if it isn't painful for you to tell."

But it was a relief to Ruth to be able to speak of it to sympathetic ears, and she needed no persuasion to remain. It was sweet to be in his presence; already a feeling of solace seemed stealing over her heart.

It was a mild afternoon for the beginning of April, and the softness of the air mingling with the faint perfume from the flowers gradually lulled Ruth into a dreamy feeling more in accordance with the peacefulness of the scene. The sky was a soft grey, and among the bare branches of the trees a few tender green buds were beginning to appear. The influence of spring, hopeful and soothing, made itself felt, and for a long time the two young people sat silent in this quiet deserted spot, which seemed removed from all the world. Archie idly drew patterns on the path with his stick, and now and then glanced at his companion. She was leaning forward, her chin supported by her hand and her elbow resting on her knee, while her eyes were dreamily fixed in front of her.

"Ruth," Archie said at last, "I wish I could have helped you a little. I can only say over again how sorry I am, and that doesn't do you any good."

"Oh yes, indeed," Ruth returned quickly. "I am glad you don't tell me to be resigned, as Miss Douglas does. It is so easy to say that when one doesn't feel any loss; but I cannot see why Lance was allowed to drown when all the others were saved. It doesn't seem fair, somehow."

"Poor Ruth!" Archie murmured again softly.

"I know I ought not to say so," she added; "but at first it is hard to see why it is all for the best, as Miss Douglas says."

"That is so like Aunt Douglas," Archie remarked drily; "she is so fond of giving advice, as I ought to know very well;" and his tone was slightly grim, as if the recollection of past admonitions was by no means agreeable. "Yet I'm bound to admit her advice is all first-class. Pity one can't always think and act according to orders."

Of what was he thinking? Ruth wondered; and it flashed across her mind that no doubt his conduct must often have laid him open to the strictures of Miss Douglas. She cast a swift glance at him, but his face bore no traces of shame or regret; it was only grave.

"I should like," he went on, "to hear the old lady hold forth at our mess. Wouldn't she just surprise some of the fellows! She'd tackle a whole regiment with pleasure, and give them a fine lecture on their duties. Mark my words, Ruth"—and here a slight gleam of fun sparkled momentarily in his eyes—"you will have some special advice before long."

"About what?" Ruth asked, in some surprise.

"You'll soon see," he returned, smiling; "but I hope you won't follow it."

Was it anything to do with himself? she wondered, and looked half-doubtfully at him; but his air did not in the least express consciousness. He was looking down, with a shade of amusement about the corners of his mouth; but then, Archie never did look confused or embarrassed. Ruth wondered if he ever looked ashamed, or did he always hold up his head as if he must be in the right? But she would not judge him.

What if others spoke hardly of him?—what, indeed, if he had many faults? After to-day she would always feel grateful to him for his sympathy in her trouble. She rose, with something like a sigh.

"I'm afraid I must go now," she said. "Isn't it getting late?"

"If she had thrown a bomb-shell into the room, it could hardly have created more sensation than did this quiet announcement."—p. 856.

Archie looked at his watch.

"I have still an hour," he said, rising up, "which I can spend with you, Ruth. Shall we go to the village first?—I suppose you are going to the post-office?—and then I could walk back part of the way with you."

They walked slowly out of the quiet little churchyard, and made their way towards the village. They passed the cottage to which Lance had been taken, and at the sight of it Ruth felt a lump rise in her throat. But she was not alone, and the sense of companionship was sustaining.

They went into the shop together, and when Ruth had done her business there they proceeded towards the post-office. Archie said he would go in and ask for the letters, and in a few minutes he came out with quite a packet of them, which he handed to her.

"I had no idea that you knew Webster," he said, in a surprised tone. "The woman made me read the addresses to see if they were right, and I recognised the writing," he explained.

"I don't know him," Ruth declared, with equal surprise, as she looked at the letters. "Oh, I see, 'Miss R. Douglas'; that must be Rachel. They are all for her and Miss Douglas."

"Oh, that's it, of course. I might have known," said Archie. "It seems as if I had been taking a private peep at her correspondence; but I really couldn't help myself."

Ruth glanced at him, and fancied that his expression was slightly displeased. Perhaps Webster might be a rival, she thought. No doubt Rachel had many admirers, and probably Archie did not know that he himself was the favoured one, of which fact Ruth was instinctively aware, her own feelings enabling her to divine more clearly those of her sister.

"I will go past the school with you, Ruth," Archie said, as they turned their steps towards the glen; "and then I am afraid I must turn back to catch my boat."

So there were only a few minutes left of his society, and perhaps this would be the last time she should enjoy it all to herself. Ah, well! had she not been sufficiently warned? Everyone had told her, plainly enough, that Archie could never be more than a friend to her, and yet this did not, any the less, prevent his voice from sounding like music in her ears or make his presence less pleasing to her. A profound melancholy seemed to enfold her as they reached the school. It appeared like years since she had run in there while Lance went to turn back the Misses Lewis. Mr. Wilson, who had now more time on his hands, was standing at his door as they approached; but Ruth merely bowed to him, and passed on. The sight of him standing there was so familiar, it seemed as if Lance would rush out from behind, as he had so often done when she came to meet him.

"That was where I saw him last," Archie said gently. "Do you remember? I went down with him the morning I left."

Ruth bent her head in assent, but did not speak. They walked on for about five minutes, and then Archie stopped.

"I am afraid I must go no farther," he said regretfully. "Ruth," and he took her hand, "you have been glad to see me, have you not?"

"Yes," she said simply. "It was very good of you to come."

"No, not good," he said quickly; "I wished to come. If I came again, very soon, should you still be pleased to see me? or would it be too often?"

"Oh, do come whenever you can get away," Ruth returned, in a voice which she felt most inadequately expressed her feelings. "We shall all be pleased to see you. Miss Douglas and Rachel will be here for some time, too."

"I'm afraid Aunt Douglas will have some rather unpleasant conversation with me," the young man remarked, with a slight grimace: "something which I shall not enjoy; but"—and his sunny smile broke over his face—"let us hope somebody else will make up for what I go through."

Ruth did not look at him. Her eyes were fixed sadly on the ground, and it was not till he spoke again that she lifted them.

"And now it must be good-bye," he said. "I hope you will look better when I see you again, Ruth dear. I wish I could have comforted you a little."

"You have been very kind," she murmured. "Good-bye, Archie."

"Good-bye, Ruth," and for a moment he pressed her hand in both of his; and then she found herself walking on alone, with her eyes full of tears.

Surely she had managed to keep them back until he could not see them? She did not know; but now they would not be suppressed, and as she hurried on one or two fell on her cheeks. At the turning in the road she could not resist taking one last look back. There stood Archie, a tall figure on the lonely road. He took off his hat when he saw her look round, and waved it until she disappeared round the corner.

CHAPTER XVI.

IN QUEST OF ADVENTURES.

WHEN she reached home, Rachel came running to the door, and kissed her as she came in.

"We thought you were lost, Ruth," she said, drawing her into the room, where the lamps were being lit, as it was now quite dusk. "I have been wearying for you dreadfully."

To Ruth, who was unused to demonstration, the caressing touch and words seemed very sweet, and she smiled as they entered the room together.

"Well, your walk has improved you, anyhow," said Miss Douglas, looking up as Ruth appeared. "You look like a different girl already, now that you have a little colour in your cheeks. It is quite wonderful," she added, looking from one to the other of the sisters, who still stood together, "how like Rachel you look."

Before Ruth could make any reply to this remark, which was clearly considered a great compliment, Mrs. Lennox, who cared nothing at all about people's looks, interrupted by asking—

"But what kept you all this time? Did you go to see Miss Lewis?"

"No," returned Ruth calmly; "I met Cousin Archie."

If she had thrown a bomb-shell into the room, it could hardly have created more sensation than did this quiet announcement.

"What!" exclaimed both Rachel and her aunt simultaneously. "Archie Douglas here?" and then Miss Douglas added, somewhat sharply—"Why didn't he come up to see us? I suppose he knew we were here?"

"Yes, he knew," Ruth replied; "but he said he had not time, as he had to catch the boat back."

"And you mean to say he has gone away without seeing us?" the old lady demanded, with rising indignation.

"He must have known about my accident, too," said Rachel naïvely.

Her accident! Ruth stared at her in dumb amazement.

"How long has he been here, might I ask?" inquired Miss Douglas, pursuing her investigations as if Ruth had been in the witness-box.

"He didn't say by which boat he came," Ruth replied indifferently. "It was some time to-day."

"And you mean to say that he arrived to-day, and has gone already? What on earth did he come for?" and the old lady fixed her eyes on Ruth as if she were responsible in some manner for this extraordinary proceeding.

"He came to say low sorry he was about Lance," Ruth answered coldly; "and," she added steadily, "I think it would have been very strange if he had taken no notice."

"Oh yes, I daresay," said Miss Douglas shortly; "but since he was here, he might have had the politeness to come to see us—considering how much he is indebted to me, too."

To this, Ruth had no remark to offer. She kept silent, feeling annoyed with Miss Douglas's tone; not so much for its implied appropriation of Archie as for the apparent disposition to blame her for the young man's omission. Rachel had unmistakably expressed her conviction that he must be affected by what had happened to her especially. Perhaps she had reason for thinking so; but at least Archie had been kind enough to make this one visit of sympathy without obtruding any other subjects on her notice. When he came again, and she saw him with Rachel, then all doubts would be at an end.

"I suppose he asked for us?" Rachel inquired presently.

Ruth remembered that he had not; but she feared that a blunt "No," would elicit another burst of surprise, which she dreaded to encounter; so she tried to temporise by saying hastily—

"Oh, I told him, of course, that you had both recovered."

"Fancy his coming so far for one day," Rachel went on; "and I'll be bound he travelled in a Pullman, too; he's such an extravagant fellow."

"Indeed he is," agreed Miss Douglas. "I wonder whom he expects to pay for all his follies?"

"It is a pity he isn't rich," Rachel said regretfully. "Poor fellow! he really ought to have the best of everything; and I'm sure he would be miserable if he ever had to do without his horse, or—"

But Ruth did not wait to hear the end of the list of Archie's possible privations. As she was not being directly addressed, she took the opportunity of leaving the room in order to remove her hat and jacket.

The same evening, as Ruth was accompanying Katie up-stairs at the latter's bed-time, they passed Rachel's door, which stood wide open, and displayed a fire burning brightly within. Rachel was flitting about inside, and, seeing them, called them in.

"I have just been looking at my jewel-case," she said, pointing to a leather box on a little table. "I have all my jewellery with me; so it really was a mercy we hadn't our luggage in that little boat, or it would all have been lost. I didn't care about the valise—there wasn't anything important in it. See, I got ever so many of these when I came of age;" and she opened the lid and displayed a glittering array of trinkets. "Oh, we did have such a day!—a garden-party, and a dinner in the evening; it was on the fifteenth of June, and a glorious day," she added, with unnecessary explanation, as Ruth naturally was aware of the date of her own birthday; although, to be sure, it had passed quite unnoticed. "I don't think I ever had a more exciting time," Rachel went on, her eyes sparkling at the recollection. "I had heaps of presents; and really I had hardly time to eat for listening to all the compliments and pretty speeches—not that I believed half of them," and she gave a well-pleased laugh. "Those were auntie's presents," and she picked up a diamond brooch and a pearl necklace; "and this was from Archie Douglas," and she pointed to a bracelet with pearls and diamonds. "He was the handsomest man in the room," she added, somewhat pensively. "But, dear Ruth," and she threw her arms round her sister and kissed her, "I did really mean to write to you that day. I had a present too, all ready for you; but somehow I couldn't get a moment to myself for writing; then we had Archie Douglas and some other men staying, and they took up all my time afterwards. Auntie had been telling me that I ought to write to you, and although I hate writing, I meant to do it; but it got put off and put off, until it was too late. Then auntie said she would take me to see you, and I was so glad. You'll have the present now, Ruth dear, although it was a shame of me to be so long;" and with another hug, she pressed a morocco case into her sister's hands.

It was with very mixed feelings that Ruth thus heard the reason of her twin-sister's remaining so long a stranger to her. Latterly, at least, it had not been the fault of Miss Douglas, but merely the carelessness of Rachel herself that kept them apart. Still, with Rachel's caressing arms around her, and her present (a pair of gold bangles, on which a large R in pearls formed the only ornament) in her hand, Ruth found it impossible to be vexed. These affectionate ways (even now, when she knew it was merely a "way") always touched her, so she returned the kiss, and said—

"Well, I am glad you have come at last, Rachel. We must try and make up for lost time now."

The next afternoon, as the two girls sat by the window, Rachel remarked briskly—

"I think I must go out to-day, and see if I shall not be as lucky as you, Ruth. I feel quite ready for some adventures now."

"Adventures?" repeated Ruth, in surprise. "I'm afraid you won't have any here."

"Why? didn't you have one yesterday?" said

"I can't," and Ruth pointed to the black frock she was making for her little sister. "I must finish that to-day; but I am sure Katie would be delighted to go, and she would do quite as well."

Rachel looked doubtful for a moment.

"Does Katie know them all?" she asked; but on

"He excused himself."—p. 858.

Rachel. "When is the best time to meet them? and where?"

"Them—whom?"

"The men, of course!" and Rachel laughed frankly. "I'm dying to talk to some again."

"I am afraid there isn't any fashionable hour," said Ruth, with a slight smile. "I should say just now would be as good a time as any to meet Mr. Wilson or Mr. Matthew, and they are the only unmarried men of the place."

"And is it far to the school?"

"About two miles." Then, as Rachel shook her head hopelessly, she added—"But Mr. Wilson often walks up the glen."

"Oh, then, let's go at once," Rachel cried brightly, jumping up.

being reassured on that point, she smiled again, and gaily made for the door.

"But, Rachel, it is so cold to-day," Ruth observed.

"Do you think it wise of you to venture out until you are better?"

Rachel stopped with her hand on the door-handle, and looked back archly, her pretty face dimpling over with smiles.

"Oh, I am always well enough to enjoy myself," she declared unblushingly. "To-morrow, if auntie suggests any horrid sewing, I shall feel quite ill again, I daresay; but just now I know a walk is the best thing for me;" and her laugh echoed merrily through the passage as she danced off to her own room.

"I hope you won't be disappointed," Ruth remarked, some ten minutes later, as she stood at the door to see the other two depart. "I am sure if poor Mr. Wilson knew he was wanted," she added, with a smile of half-contemptuous amusement, "he would walk miles to oblige you."

"We'll let him know for the next time," Rachel called back lightly, as she tripped away.

Ruth returned to the room and picked up her work, with a slight smile still hovering about the corners of her lips as she thought of Rachel's frankness.

Meanwhile, the others set out in quest of adventures. The day was more chilly than the preceding one, and the afternoon was already far advanced before they started, so at first they were glad to walk pretty smartly. Rachel, however, was not much of a pedestrian, and soon began to slacken speed.

"Are there no houses at all, Katie?" she asked of her little sister, looking round at the silent hills in some dismay. "I don't see a living creature but ourselves."

"Oh, often we don't meet anyone till we reach the village," Katie responded easily; "but we can see a farm round the next turn," she added cheerfully, by way of encouraging her sister, who, she feared, might be tempted to return too soon.

This information did not appear very inspiring; still, Rachel was determined not to be too easily daunted.

"Let us walk slowly, then, Katie," she said, "so that we won't have so long a road to go back again."

But although they walked slowly, pausing now and again, and looking up and down the road, not a creature was to be seen.

"Perhaps we might rest for a while," Rachel suggested, as they approached a low wall which looked invitingly like a seat.

They sat down accordingly, but it was rather cold, and everything remained as quiet as before. The sky began to cloud over, and showed symptoms of drawing to rain. Katie chattered away briskly, quite pleased to sit on the wall and have Rachel all to herself. Rachel, however, paid little attention, while her eyes wandered over the chill-looking landscape.

She was just about giving up her expedition as hopeless, when a step, which had not been audible through Katie's chatter, sounded at her side, and a figure appeared round the bend of the road where they were sitting.

"How do you do, Miss Douglas?" said a man's voice.

Katie looked up quickly, and seeing Gordon, expected to hear her sister make a disclaimer; but Rachel did nothing of the kind.

"Very well, thank you," she responded at once, with a charming little smile, putting her hand into the outstretched one before her.

Gordon had only given one glance at her, and then shaken hands with Katie, so he did not perceive his mistake.

"The last time we met, Miss Douglas," he began, with some hesitation, "I was the bearer of bad news" — and then he paused.

"When was that? I don't remember," said Rachel, with a soft little laugh.

Gordon looked quickly at her, and an expression of astonishment crossed his countenance. He had not known of Rachel's arrival, and for a moment he was completely at a loss. Surely this was Ruth? and yet the voice was different, and now that he looked thoroughly the face was quite different, too. Then the truth flashed across him, and he knew who she was before Katie had exclaimed—

"But this isn't Ruth: it's Rachel!"

"Then have we not met before?" Rachel asked, smiling. "As I'm not Ruth, Katie, you ought to introduce us."

"It's Mr. Gordon," Katie explained, concluding she had complied with all formalities, as he was already aware of her sister's name.

Rachel's eyes sparkled with amusement as she looked, in the frankest manner possible, at the gentleman thus presented, and burst into a rippling laugh of enjoyment.

The look and laugh were irresistible, and carried Gordon away at once. His lips relaxed into a smile, and he laughed in a manner not at all habitual to him.

"I ought to apologise," he said, with more animation than usual, "for thrusting myself upon you like this; but for the moment I mistook you for Miss Douglas."

"Well, so I am Miss Douglas," Rachel declared smilingly—"so you weren't far wrong. But weren't you going our way?" and she rose from her hard seat. "I am afraid we must move on, as it looks rather like rain."

It not only looked like rain, it felt like it also. The drops began to patter quite heavily as she spoke, and the sky became blacker and blacker.

"I have an umbrella," Gordon said promptly. "May I shelter you as far as your own gate?"

Rachel had one too, but she did not mention it.

"Oh, thank you," she said; "but are you sure it isn't taking you too far?"

"Not at all," he responded, almost eagerly. "I was only taking a walk, and have plenty of time."

"Katie, dear, you may have this umbrella," Rachel said; but after that there was no more notice taken of the little girl. The other two seemed to find plenty to say for a first meeting, and although it was raining they did not walk very quickly. Rachel's laugh rang out gaily every now and then; but poor Katie, who was struggling along by herself, and who was unable to hear the conversation, owing to Gordon's intervening umbrella, did not find the walk at all amusing.

When they reached the house, Rachel invited Gordon to come in to see the others, but he excused himself, saying that it was rather late, and that he hoped to call very soon.

As the two girls entered the door, Ruth was descending the stairs.

"Well, did you have any adventure?" she asked.

"Indeed we did," Rachel responded, with animation; "we met Mr. Gordon. Why didn't you tell me about him, Ruth? I like him very much, and I believe there are ever so many more whom you're keeping private. Now, I'll tell you that I am expecting a visitor shortly; so there will be another man for us;" and with that she ran laughingly into the parlour.

Up-stairs in their bed-room, Katie gave a graphic account of all the proceedings to Ruth, adding, with some indignation, in conclusion—

"And Mr. Gordon even forgot to shake hands with me when he went away. I don't think he wanted me to hear what they were saying, either. I don't like him; and I don't think I like going walks with Rachel," she finished, in an aggrieved tone.

(To be concluded.)

HOW TO BRIGHTEN LIFE.

II.—HINTS TO VICTIMS OF THE HUMDRUM.

THE sub-title of this little paper may possibly put certain readers in mind of that famous chapter on snakes, which is so often quoted: "Chapter X.—On Snakes. There are no snakes in Iceland." For to many folk—and they by no means the most favoured by circumstance amongst us—there is no such thing as humdrum. What! they exclaim, life dull, monotonous, with a deadly sameness about it, do you say? To us this exquisite world teems with happiness and vitality; every person we meet is of the keenest interest to us; every day we live brings sorrows and vexations, of course; but also it brings its joys. The earth seems to us one vast storehouse of the beautiful gifts of God, and if we but go the right way to work there is not a human want or aspiration for the fulfilment of which He has not provided. Why! cry they, when there is so much to see and do and learn and enjoy, whether our lot be cast in a tiny village or in the heart of a great city, how is it possible to be the victim of a fancied bogey, which, we assure you does not exist?

But such receptive and contented natures might as well talk in Sanskrit for all that they are understood by their more despondent brethren, who, if they had an answer ready (other than the lack-lustre stare of non-comprehending eyes, which is apt to distinguish them), might perhaps couch it somewhat like this—

How much alike is every day!
One meal's the same as any other;
Each man I meet upon my way,
Is really very like his brother.

In fact, whate'er the poets say
Of sunny sky and verdant sward,
To me the whole of life is grey:
'I'm deeply and profoundly bored!'

It is for the possible consolation of these unhappy folk that the following suggestions are offered; and since, in striving to cover too vast a space, the point is often missed, they confine themselves solely to women. Well, to go at once to the root of the matter. The difficulty to contend against in the previously discussed case of the tired workers was having too much to do: in the case of the victims of the humdrum it is decidedly the fault of having too little. Now absolute employment, whether salaried or voluntary, must of necessity be put out of the question, because (logically, or there would be no boredom) either the will and the energy to undertake it are lacking, or else the powers that be, and which are represented probably in this instance by a mistaken father, have vetoed the idea. But beyond and outside this tremendous power of remedying dulness, there remains an infinitude of things to do which are delightful in the doing if we only have the wit to think of them, and which would assuredly make us brighter, happier, and consequently more useful members of the community, than at present.

Education, for instance. That sounds a dry word to certain minds, but it gains immensely in attractiveness when construed into meaning pleasant hours passed in picture galleries. The National Gallery, for example, was not wholly built to afford Londoners the patronising opportunity of pointing it out to country cousins when passing through Trafalgar Square, though I believe that to be the most general use to which it is put. Nor were its contents placed therein solely for the purpose of providing a studio for art-students, though the art-students themselves sometimes behave as if they thought so.

No; amongst its wider uses is that of affording free instruction and delight to the nation at large, and it is for you—you who are strumming with idle fingers on the window-pane, and vainly longing for something to do—to avail yourself of both. It may require an effort at first. Most sick folk do require to make an effort before they begin the regimen which is to cure them; and inertia is a symptom exhibited by most victims of the humdrum. But when once in the galleries the taste will grow—l'appétit vient en mangeant—and a weekly visit will be eagerly looked forward to. The chief traits of the various schools will be learnt: the names and dates of their disciples ineradicably fixed; the methods of the painting will be compared; and gradually—a delicious sensation—one's own Why? will be answered by one's own explanatory Because.

And then the results of these weekly visits will make themselves felt in a way which is threefold:— (1) in an increased self-respect which invariably follows upon the use of the senses and powers with which God has endowed us: (2) since knowledge is power, in a pleasing reputation amongst a small home circle as some sort of an authority on art: (3) in a widening of interests, and consequently of enjoyments.

Substituting for the name of the National Gallery that of others equally well known, these remarks apply to other cities quite as potently as to London, and more especially when situated in the north, where many of our finest pictures find temporary or permanent homes. But education can be carried on, and, accordingly, the dulness of existence can be lightened, every whit as easily in the country as in town.

With botany, for example, one can make great headway, and after a certain amount of knowledge has been accumulated, a delightful interest to the pursuit can be added by the exchanging of specimens with other collectors. There will be no difficulty in this. Advertisements are plentiful in the right quarters, and I know of more than one pleasant friendship which has grown into a hardy plant from a similar slender stem.

Then, again, there is the archaeological fever, with which anyone with a fair show of enthusiasm can be inoculated, and which undoubtedly grows by what it feeds on. One lives, perhaps, in a country village for years, and though tolerably content upon the whole with the jog-trot routine and narrowed interests of the people, would be mightily surprised if told of the wider interests of the actual ground, and that one was living in a perfect fairyland of wonders.

Yet such is the case. That your quaint old parish church is built in three distinct styles of architecture has probably never been noticed by the rustics of the congregation, but surely you might find out the reason why. Away to the left stands an old village cross, one of the very few now left in England; over the fields to the right can be seen the stocks, these latter redolent of Shakespeare's days, and the former—well, one loses oneself in the mists of bygone ages, and the sermons delivered at its foot, preached possibly by some wild fanatic who was arousing enthusiasm for yet another crusade; the peasant parliaments which have made it their meeting-place under the leadership of some inglorious Hampden; the crowds of motley-clad children whose sole knowledge of written characters consisted in the half-effaced time-worn legend—these are but a few of the people and scenes it conjures up. And what of the wars of olden days? That stretch of meadowland at which you glance every day of your life, was it once a battle-field?

In short, take haphazard any given few miles of English land, and take a man well posted in his subject, and the result will be an account which, whatever its style, is so interesting as to matter, that outsiders will yearn to explore that particular spot. The book may not be written, and the man may not be there, but you are, and unless you work up the subject thoroughly by the aid of previous notes and the evidence of your own senses, you are in the position of tantalising to the verge of frenzy other women who vainly envy you both your leisure, and your opportunity.

Another most admirable plan is to take up a hobby; and, indeed, this is of such grave importance that it has frequently been urged in regard to the upbringing of children as a thing to be inculcated as much as industry, or any other virtue. And in point of fact, does it not make us ashamed of ourselves if for one moment we reflect upon the much that is being done to beautify and ennoble God's world, and then realise that we are but the drones in a hive? That other men should have laboured, and that we should enter into the fruits of their labours, is part of the Divine scheme for the working of the universe, and we do so to the full in this wonderful nineteenth century, with all its wealth of preserved treasure, and all its marvellous new creations. But it certainly was never intended that we should merely take, and never give. We have entered into the fruits of others' labours, but where are our labours into which others again are to enter in their turn?

It seems on the first blush of it rather a downfall to be thinking so seriously, and then to propose some self-made humble employment; but there is unflinching comfort in the commendation, "She hath done what she could." For we can all of us do something, if not with our heads, then with our hands. Of course, it would be ridiculous to include the fine arts, where mechanical skill plays but a secondary part to head-work of an advanced order; but for purely manual production of some kind or another, where no greater amount of brains is required than that furnished by an average intelligence, I firmly believe everyone to be fitted.

It should be borne in mind that the necessary implements, and (in cases when it is also necessary) the tuition, can just as easily be acquired in the country as in towns. I bought a swinging lamp and candlesticks of hammered iron in Venice, but they were not more beautiful (and the cost was about the same) than those I subsequently procured in a Dorsetshire hamlet; and while I have eaten many a dinner in Parisian hotels, I have never had food more daintily served nor better cooked than in a Hampshire village, to which a teacher from the South Kensington School of Cookery had recently been sent. The education grant is not intended solely for the capital, but for the good of the nation at large; while educational enterprise, such as the extension of university teaching, is willing to send lecturers to any place where a sufficient number of students is guaranteed.

It is entirely a question of effort and will whether one wants to learn or whether one doesn't; and, if not in one way then in another, each can find the groove to which she is more especially suited.

Perhaps it is book-binding, which I have seen schoolroom children of twelve and fourteen carry out most creditably. Of necessity, this hobby engenders neatness and accuracy, and, unless the person who takes it up be a very hopeless individual indeed, it will lead her on to the study of book-binding in general, with all its fascinating detail of special editions, and so forth.

Brass-work is another attractive and cleanly occupation. So is iron-work; and with both these hobbies, ambition may run riot, since, if perfection be attained—no; let us be courageous, and say when perfection is attained—they are suitable offerings to dedicate to God's service in churches and mission-halls. While long before that wished-for consummation, the trays and lamps, and so on, will be eagerly welcomed alike by those for whom they bear a personal message of love, and by those to whom an artistic nature allied to a scanty purse, renders a beautiful gift as something to be viewed literally in the light of a god-send.

Some women are heaven-born cooks, and have only to descend into the kitchen to find this out, and to double their value and halve the boredom from that time forth. Others, again, cordially detest the very sight of a saucepan, but may positively shine as modellers if they but give their skill the chance.

Another point is amusement, and it is an invigorating and delightful fact that the best amusements are the cheapest. That very few of us have found this out is due, I fancy, to two causes, one being that, as Ruskin contends, we set but slight value on that which is easily obtainable; and the other is that, according to the dictionaries, the word humdrum, when used as a noun, means, "a silly or a stupid fellow." And many people are exceedingly stupid in this particular, victims of the humdrum above all.

For instance, Londoners. If we were told when abroad that one of the finest botanical collections in the world could be viewed by bringing a certain amount of pressure to bear in the proper quarters, many of us would go to endless trouble and expense to see it. But since, it happens to be at Kew, and can be seen for nothing at all, how many ever go there? Again, no person of average intelligence would stay in Paris or Brussels without paying a visit to their museums, yet many people live and die without once visiting our own, which are on a far more magnificent scale.

Away from ready-made amusements, and forced to create one's own, I really think that, upon the whole, we are better off, precisely on the same principle that the child who has an empty box and a few buttons to play with, is generally a jollier little mortal than the child surrounded by costly toys. For the latter has usually lost the power of amusing himself; and dwellers in town are often in much the same predicament.

Golfing and skating have earned nothing but favourable reports from their devotees; while everybody knows that concerts of home manufacture yield a vaster quantity of enjoyment than the finest by paid artists, and that Mrs. Jarley's Waxworks to an audience of humble friends is preferable, in point of fun, to the best rehearsed tableaux-vivants to a more critical audience.

But best of all country amusements is the exercise of that grand old virtue, which St. Paul himself recommends, of hospitality. Dinner-parties may be outside the scope of many, but the other end of the scale of expenditure is every whit as enjoyable, and "people dropping in in the evenings" cost nothing but the warm welcome which is unpurchasable.

Oh, poor victims that you are, would that I had the power to alleviate your misery, not by influence, for I have none, but just by coaxing you not to stand in the radiant beauty of the sunlight, and, veiling your eyes, cry aloud that you stand in the darkness. If no profusion of wealth or beauty appertaining to things can touch you, you "the heir of all the ages," then turn from things to people, and see if they will not quicken your fainting soul.

Don't pass your maid upon the staircase with the thought that so thoroughly are the times out of joint that the wryness of the world even extends to Betsy's face, but go after the girl, and ask her what is the matter. A great amount of nonsense is talked about non-interference in another's trouble, and about each heart having a right to its own secrets, and so forth; but, however sensitive your Betsy may be, she will be able to read the interest and sympathy in your eyes, and will not only forgive the "interference," but love you for it. In return you will hear perhaps that Joe has not written, and so be permitted a glimpse of a humble romance which is being enacted under your very roof.

Give the postman a cup of hot coffee those wintry mornings, when the knocker, slipping from half-frozen fingers, disturbs you at your breakfast. Those two minutes spent daily in his company, as he stands dripping upon the mat, and gulping down the hot beverage, will gradually lead you into an intimate knowledge of Mrs. Postman, and of the baby who came last month, and of how Martha is getting on finely in her new place. That cup of coffee means a whole shoal of new interests for you, and will add intensity to the after-breakfast blessing.

Prove to your friends that not only is your sympathy like the goodness of God, from which it takes its spring, of unfailing supply, but also that you possess that rare gift of holding your tongue. Then you may be far from rich, and equally far from clever, but gradually you will be honoured by the confidences of those in your little world who are either very happy or else very sad. And then? Well, then your present trouble will have vanished. It will mean many prayers and much self-sacrifice before you are fitted to hold so high a post, but some such dear women there are, and why should you not add to their number? It will mean, too, absolute heart-ache at times, although at brighter seasons it will bring you pure happiness; and instead of feeling there are too many hours to be lived through somehow, you will have hands, and heart, and head, completely occupied. You will talk probably somewhat less, and will not complain of effort as you used to complain of boredom, but your face will be more eloquent. For whether it hold a little touch of pathos in it, and hint of tears unshed, or whether it be bright with the reflected sunshine of others' confidences and love, it will, in either case, bear upon it the impress of content. You will look what you are—a woman who has found her niche, and for whom, consequently, life holds neither boredom nor humdrum.

SWEET CONTENT: A STUDY.

BY SYDNEY C. GRIER, AUTHOR OF "RICHARD JENKINS, MASTER," ETC.

HER real name was Gloriana Weston, but everyone who knew her well called her Sweet Content. It was to her father that she owed both the actual and the pet name. When she was born, he was in the middle of writing his monumental commentary on the "Faërie Queen," and wanted to name his daughter Britomart, but compromised matters with his horrified wife by consenting to the scarcely less remarkable title of Gloriana. And again, when she was about seven, and the ludicrous inappropriateness of the stately name for the rosy chubby child became every day more manifest, he came out into the garden one afternoon, fresh from his critical survey of seventeenth-century poetry, and humming the refrain of a song which haunted his memory. "O sweet content! O sweet content!" he sang over and over again, and then laughed as his eye fell upon the little girl sitting soberly on the grass at her mother's feet, making daisy-chains.

"Why, here is a name for the little one!" he cried. "Wife, you must never scold me again for calling her Gloriana. From henceforth she is Sweet Content."

The name was so absurdly appropriate that Mrs. Weston only laughed mildly, and forbore to scold her husband for his ridiculous fancies. She thought that the new title would quickly die out; but it did not. One friend of the family after another adopted it, and its use remained when its owner had left childhood behind her, and had grown up into a slim little creature, with fluffy yellow hair and a round sensible face.

"It is such an old-fashioned, Puritan sort of name," her friend Edith Barnard, the doctor's daughter, said to her one day, when a strange visitor had been exclaiming at its oddness; "and it suits you capitally. You are such a dear, soft, contented, happy thing. I have never heard you grumble in my life."

"Well, you see, there is a silver lining to every cloud," laughed Content.

"Ah! but some people can always see it, and some can't. I am one of those who can't."

"Look for it, then," said Content.

"That's an unkind thing to say, when I have just told you I can't see it. I suppose I am too much occupied in lamenting over the blackness of the cloud itself to notice it. But tell me, Sweet Content, do you really believe that everything that happens to you is for the best?"

"I don't see how we can help believing it if we love God," said Content softly. "But I haven't had any real troubles, Edith, so I can't tell what it is to be really tried."

"But you have your little trials and disappointments, as we all do," sighed Edith, "and

"Now, Sweet Content, tell me truly: are you contented with Fred?"—p. 861.

yet you never seem to mind—or, at any rate, not for long."

"I try to think that the disappointments are best for us, too," said Content. "There is a text," she added hesitatingly, "which is a help to me sometimes: 'God having provided some better thing for us.'"

"Oh, Content! but that has really nothing to do with it," cried Edith.

"No, I know it hasn't really," said Content; "but it seems to put into words what I feel, don't you see?"

"But if you could always feel like that, you would never have any troubles at all," said Edith.

"No, I suppose not," said Content simply. "But one doesn't always live up to one's belief, Edith; and I am often dreadfully discontented."

"Oh, nonsense!" cried Edith. "I don't believe that. No; you must remember that I am watching you, Sweet Content, to see whether your theory will work. I don't want it to fail, you know, but I am curious about it. Now I must hurry home. I was in the blues when I came, but it always does me good to have a talk with you."

Mr. Weston felt much the same with regard to his little daughter. They were very much alike in mind: ready to be pleased with their surroundings of the time, whatever these might be, and unwilling to change them. But of late Mr. Weston had begun to see that his quiet, inoffensive life, passed in pursuing studies which benefited no one but himself, and in writing books which no one but his wife and daughter ever read, was not what the world calls successful, and he was also beginning to doubt whether he had done well to sink in the production of these books such a large proportion of the small property which was all he had to leave his family. These moods of doubt and remorse seized upon him at times, and it was then that a talk with Sweet Content was wont to bring him comfort. She thought him the best and wisest man in the whole world, and would not permit him to blame himself; and she had faith that all would be well for the future. Her mother was not like her. Mrs. Weston longed that her husband's talents should be displayed in a wider sphere: that her daughter should see more society, and that of a more select type than the village afforded: and that the family income should be permanently increased. Sometimes the sight of Sweet Content's faith and trust was almost an irritation to her. She felt that her husband and daughter were a pair of unpractical dreamers, who would neither rise nor let themselves be raised by their own good-will, and that she was the only sensible person in the family. But the time came when she looked back with mournful pleasure on the quiet days which seemed to her to pass so uselessly, and when she thanked God for the trust and happiness which had brightened her husband's last hours. For Mr. Weston died suddenly—a peaceful, painless death—and his widow forgot all the little clouds which his tastes had raised between them in life, and scarcely murmured even when she discovered the extent to which his ignorance and generosity had involved the little property which was all on which she and her daughter could depend. They were obliged to move from the large rambling old house in which Content had been born, into a much smaller one: a change which was like an uprooting to the girl. But no one heard a murmur from her lips, and her tears on leaving the old home were kept for times when her mother would not be saddened by the sight of them. It was she who took the lead in rendering the new house as home-like as possible, and her persistent cheerfulness went far to reconcile her mother to the change.

"After all, it is really a very nice little place," said Mrs. Weston, when they were finally settled, trying to imitate her daughter's cheerful tone.

"And we have each other still, mother, whatever we have lost," said Content.

"And Fred," said Mrs. Weston, jealously.

"And Fred," echoed Content obediently, but without enthusiasm.

People had wondered long and vainly what had induced Sweet Content to engage herself to Fred Pargiter, for they did not seem to have a single taste in common. He was a lawyer in the county town—a rising man, but one who was considered by his professional brethren as pushing rather than plodding. His motive for wooing Content was an open secret all over the village, thanks to the tongues of the gossips. It was Edith Barnard who first hit upon it, and she did not hesitate to communicate it to others, for she had no liking for Fred Pargiter. Poor as the Westons were, Sweet Content had "expectations." An old uncle of Mr. Weston's, who maintained an implacable enmity against his nephew, had, nevertheless, declared his intention of leaving his money "in the family"; "and this," said Edith, "Fred had heard through a cousin of his, who was Uncle Antony's legal adviser." Be this as it may, Fred had proposed to Content, causing thereby a commotion in the Weston household. Mrs. Weston was feverishly anxious that she should accept him. All through her own married life she had felt the pinch of poverty, and it had chafed and fretted her. Never, if she could help it, should Content suffer as she had done. And here was Fred Pargiter, a good-looking man, with a tolerable income and excellent prospects, who would make her a splendid husband, and she chose to shilly-shally, and say that she did not want to marry. It would be a sin and a shame to refuse such an offer. Good husbands were not so easy to find in these days that penniless girls could afford to be fastidious. Fred's affection was most disinterested (for Mrs. Weston fondly believed that Uncle Antony's testamentary intentions were known to herself and her husband alone), and ought to be rewarded. These views she instilled into Mr. Weston's mind in season and out of season, until he became firmly convinced that earth could offer no greater happiness for him than to know that Content would be Fred Pargiter's wife. As for Content herself, she wished, as usual, to do what would please everyone else best. Fred Pargiter did not in the least resemble the heroes of her girlish dreams, but he was kind and pleasant, and she believed him to be good. She did not think that she loved him: at least, not in what she had always imagined to be the right way; but she liked him very much, and shrank from hurting his feelings by refusing him. She shrank also from disappointing her parents. The material advantages which occupied her mother's mind did not appeal to her; but when she saw her father looking anxious and troubled, and found his eyes following her appealingly, she could not hesitate any longer.

"Would it make you happier, father, if I said 'Yes'?" she asked.

"Indeed it would, my child," he answered, so earnestly that Content stifled her misgivings, and wrote off an affirmative answer to Fred Pargiter at once, determining only that she would not hear of a speedy marriage. To this, however, he made no attempt to compel her (because he wanted to wait and see whether she was really Uncle Antony's heiress, Edith declared afterwards), and they settled down into a long engagement. Content did not belie her name, though she found that the roseate view she had entertained of the delights of an engagement was as much mistaken as her youthful idea of love had proved to be. She was not of an exacting disposition, but she felt that she had some reason to expect Fred to conform to her wishes in matters in which she overcame her shyness sufficiently to appeal to him to do what she asked. When he laughed at her, calling her a little Puritan, and went his own way all the same, she was saddened, but not embittered, and never thought of uttering a complaint. Edith, who was vehemently desirous to see her released from a man who was not half good enough for her, did not, however, consider herself bound to silence on the subject.

"Now, Sweet Content, tell me truly: are you contented with Fred?"

"No one ever finds anyone else all they would like," was Content's vague and ungrammatical reply.

"But do you think that it will make you happy to marry him?" persisted Edith.

"I hope it will make him happy—and my mother," said Content reluctantly.

"It is possible to be too content," said Edith oracularly. "If you don't take care, Content, you will find that you have made trouble for yourself instead of avoiding it."

"But it can't be wrong to be contented."

"It's wrong to be content with what is wrong," said Edith. "Be brave, Content. You ought not to marry him if you don't love him."

"I do love him—in a way," said Content. "I mean, of course, not like people in books, but if he is satisfied, you know—"

"He is only satisfied because he doesn't care for you a bit himself," was on the tip of Edith's tongue, but she did not say it, and Content went on hurriedly—

"It would break mother's heart, Edith, and it would hurt him so dreadfully, too. I can't do it. And besides, it might not be right. I don't know that I don't love him in the right way."

"If you loved him in the right way, you would know it fast enough," said Edith, as she departed. "Oh, Content, I never thought you were such a coward!"

But although Content could not summon up courage enough to break off her engagement, Edith's wish was destined to be fulfilled, if not quite in the way she would have desired. If Content had been the only person concerned, she might have gone on her way and married Fred Pargiter to please her mother and himself, as she thought, and have repented her timidity when too late, but there was a factor in the case of which she had not dreamt. Uncle Antony died less than three months after his nephew, and left all his money to a Home for Crippled Dogs. Content had only heard mysterious hints about the fortune which was supposed to be coming to her, and it had never seemed sufficiently real to her for its loss to affect her much; but it was a heavy blow to Mrs. Weston, who had counted largely upon it.

"You see, mother," said Content, "we are no worse off than we were before. To lose what we never expected is not very dreadful."

But Mrs. Weston could not accept this philosophical view of the case. She knew Fred Pargiter's character a little better now than she had done before the engagement took place, and she could not avoid asking herself how this would affect him. The answer to this question was soon supplied. Fred took an unexpected holiday, and his letters were few and far between. Then there came rumours from the other side of the county to the effect that he was occupied in courting a rich heiress there, and finally there came a letter from Fred himself. He found that he had misunderstood his feelings, he said. The sentiments which he entertained for Miss Weston were not those of a lover, but of a friend, and he had felt for some time that they were not suited to one another. He had no doubt that Mrs. and Miss Weston had also observed this, but he hoped that he should always be permitted to remain their sincere friend. To obviate any possibility of this most elegant epistle's failing in its purpose, the news of his engagement to the heiress followed almost immediately. There was no pretence even of a decent interval between the two events, and no possibility of concealing the fact that Sweet Content had most undeniably been jilted. All the villagers—even those who had disapproved most emphatically of the engagement—united in heaping execrations upon Fred; but this was no balm to Mrs. Weston's soul.

"This is my punishment," she said. "I urged Content into the engagement, and now he has thrown her over. Come what may, I will never interfere in her love affairs again. She shall settle them for herself."

"And a good thing too!" muttered Edith, to whom she spoke. "If poor Content is only let alone, instead of being persuaded to marry for her mother's sake, perhaps she will be able to develop a little courage at last. Oh! how could she wait until that wretch jilted her?"

Edith actually stamped, in her exasperation at the thought, and she could not resist letting Content know what she thought on the subject.

"My brother Tom says that Fred Pargiter ought to be kicked," she told her; not adding that it was only with difficulty that she had prevented Tom from undertaking the duty of chastisement himself.

"But I thought you wanted the engagement to be broken off!" objected Content.

"Not in that way!" cried Edith. "Why, you ought to have done it yourself, and not left him the chance. Oh, Content, you do make me so angry! I believe you are so glad to be free that you don't mind how it came about."

"It is a relief," confessed Content. "Isn't it wonderful, Edith, that the loss of the money, which seemed such a disappointment, should have done this?"

"Oh, Sweet Content, don't!" cried Edith. "Your arguments are too deep for me. Only remember what I say, and don't get wrong another time."

In spite of Content's satisfaction in her broken engagement, she had a good deal to bear for some time. Happiness seemed impossible, and even improper, to Mrs. Weston, after their various misfortunes. The change in their social status, the loss of the expected fortune, and above all, Fred Pargiter's treatment of Content, ought to be enough, she felt, to "'Brave? no!' cried Content, turning an indignant face upon him."—p. 867.

"An illustration of your favourite theory, I suppose," said Edith. "Well," she added ungraciously, "I hope you will learn a lesson for another time. You can't expect always to lose a fortune just in time to save you from an engagement you had no business to run into. Tom says——"

"What?" asked Content, as she paused.

"Well, I don't want to hurt your feelings, but it wasn't very complimentary. He said it was a curious thing to see how far a good woman would go in doing wrong with the best motives."

Content flushed crimson.

"Yes, I see it now, Edith," she said. "It was wrong, but I was afraid to break it off. It was want of faith, you see. I ought to have thought that if dear father could only be made happy by my doing wrong, it was evident that he wasn't meant to be happy in that way."

bow them both to the earth. But Content refused to be bowed to the earth either with shame or grief, and this seemed to Mrs. Weston both unkind and unbecoming. She was not so clear-sighted as the village gossips, who had at first declared that the girl bore it beautifully, but were soon compelled to relinquish their hypothesis of a bleeding heart masked by a smiling face, and to admit that to be jilted was possibly the best thing that could have happened to her. It was Mrs. Weston's frequent, but secret, lamentation that a girl who had been jilted so openly need never expect to find another suitor; but when the village had had ample time to become established in its conclusion as to Content's happiness, it gained a new sensation through someone's observing that "young Dr. Barnard" was a somewhat frequent visitor at the Westons'.

Tom Barnard was a quiet, rather slow young man—as unlike as possible to the brilliant Fred; and even his sister had never guessed that he adored Content in secret. His outburst with respect to the breaking-off of the engagement had caused Edith some astonishment, but as he never again alluded to the subject, she did not suspect that his desire to punish Fred sprang from any deeper cause than a brotherly interest in the girl he had known from babyhood. He had settled down now as his father's assistant, but Edith could not guess that during his long rounds the frequent subject of his thoughts was Sweet Content. Still less was it possible she could know the reason of his holding back so long after Content was free, but the truth was that her acceptance of Fred had disappointed him extremely, and had been a great shock to his faith in her. It took long for this faith to be re-established, but Tom was convinced at last; and when this was once the case, he lost no time in making it evident. To all the interested observers something else became evident too, for Content bloomed like a rose in these days. Her mother watched with fear and trembling. Was it possible that the long chain of misfortunes should have such an ending as this? But Content herself had no fear. Her dreams had found their fulfilment at last, and she knew now—as Edith had prophesied she would know—the difference between the right and the wrong way of loving. That such a joy should have come into her life after her past lack of faith was an additional wonder and delight, and she was quite persuaded that there was no girl in the world so fully and undeservedly happy as she was.

But even while she was still lingering fondly over these thoughts, there was a cloud gathering which was to overshadow her happiness, and it broke upon her one morning. Tom had been in the evening before, and had lingered later than usual, trying hard to say something which he could not manage to put into words. When he was alone with Content, he could not succeed in saying what he wanted, and whenever he was just going to speak, Mrs. Weston always happened to come into the room. He went home dispirited at last, but remarking that he would look in the next night to bring the Times, which his father always passed on to Mrs. Weston, and Content bade him good-night with a little quiet amusement in her heart. How could she foresee that the early post would bring news which was to separate them? She ran out to meet the postman in the morning, and danced gaily up the garden-path with the letters.

"Two letters for you, mother," she said, coming in, "and a great big one for me. I don't know the writing. I daresay it's patterns of stuffs, or an appeal for something."

She tore it open, and presently Mrs. Weston, absorbed in her own letters, was roused by an exclamation of dismay. She looked up to see Content staring at the letter with a face of absolute horror.

"My dear child, what is it?" she cried. "Some bill of your father's, which has never been paid yet? Never mind; we will manage it somehow."

"Oh no, no!" said Content, shivering. "Read it."

"From James and Jennings?" said Mrs. Weston, taking the letter. "Is it really Uncle Antony's lawyers, Content? Why, is it possible? A later will discovered—the property to be divided between you and the Dogs' Home. My child, what is this?"

"I suppose it's just that," came in a muffled voice from Content. She was crying bitterly, with her face buried in the sofa-cushion. "Oh, mother! must I have it? Can't we write and say that the Dogs' Home may keep it?"

"Content, are you mad? What do you mean? What reason can there be why you should not have the money?"

"It's Tom," moaned Content. "I am sure he was going to say something to me last night, but somehow he could never manage it, and he will never speak now."

"And a good thing too. You can do much better," Mrs. Weston was just going to say; but she remembered the declaration she had made to Edith, and heroically refrained. "Why should this affect Tom?" she asked cheerfully. "It is no fault of yours."

"No; but—oh, mother! you don't know him as I do. He would be afraid people would say he came after my money. And I don't know—but I think he would be too proud to live on his wife's fortune."

"My dear, if he is so foolish, I don't quite see what you can do for him."

"Mother, would it be very wicked not to tell anybody about the money at present? I know he wanted to speak last night, but he was too shy, and perhaps he will do it to-night. Surely it wouldn't be difficult to keep it a secret about this new will for a time?"

"And deceive Tom? My dear Content! And what about the explanation and confessing the truth? Would he respect you, or could you respect yourself? Dear child, don't be so ready to conjure up misfortunes. If Tom really loves you, he won't let your money keep you and him apart."

"Another man might not, but Tom will," persisted Content. "You will see, mother."

And Mrs. Weston, did see, though at first she could scarcely credit the possibility of Tom's possessing such a strained sense of honour. But Edith came in after breakfast, and, after learning the news, carried it home, and Tom came no more. There were plenty of other visitors at the cottage during the next few days. Lawyers and lawyers' clerks, and representatives of the managers of the Dogs' Home came down from London, and everyone in the village who had the smallest pretensions to being on calling terms with the Westons, came to see how they bore their good fortune. The result was rather a disappointment. Content, they said, looked like a ghost, and her mother was quite miserable about her. Edith Barnard was out of patience.

"I shall change your name, Content," she said. "You are not in the least contented; you look as unhappy as you can be."

"Sometimes it is easier to be contented with our troubles than with our blessings," said Content, with a gleam of her old fun. "We get resigned to trouble, I suppose, but one blessing makes us think we have a right to more."

Edith shook her head gravely, and went away to rouse Mrs. Weston into alarm about her daughter.

The result of their interview was seen the next day, when Mrs. Weston said, almost timidly, as they rose from lunch—

"I don't want to hurry you, dear, but don't you feel that we ought to be thinking of leaving this place? There is Uncle Antony's house standing empty and waiting for us, and your presence is really needed in London while they make these final arrangements."

"Yes, I suppose we must go," said Content, moving abruptly to the window.

She stood for some minutes looking out, and then turned, and said, in a tone of strong resolution, "Give me this one afternoon, mother. I am going to do something dreadful!"

"My dear child!" remonstrated her mother.

"No, I am not going to propose to Tom, mother, though it does sound rather like it, doesn't it? I think that privilege ought to be granted to heiresses as well as to queens, don't you? You see, Fred wouldn't marry me because I was poor, and now Tom won't marry me because I am rich, so I must do something myself."

"Do be careful, dear."

"Yes, mother, I will. I have thought it all over, and I don't think it would be right to leave things like this. I love Tom, and I am sure he loves me. If it was some misfortune which parted us, I could bear it: but this wretched money! I want to give Tom a last chance, and if he still holds back I shall think, as you said, that he does not love me well enough to disregard what people may say about him. So wish me success, mother—no, wish that what is right may happen: what is best for us all."

"Ah, Sweet Content! love has taught you courage now," said the mother, watching her as she went out, and resigning herself to a long anxious afternoon of waiting. "If Tom holds back after this, he deserves to lose you: that is all I can say."

Later in the afternoon, Tom Barnard, coming back through the fields from a long round, caught sight of someone on the wooden bridge that crossed the stream. The slight figure leaning over the hand-rail and the fluffy golden curls were unmistakable, and Tom's heart began to beat tumultuously. He had carefully kept out of Content's way since the news of her fortune had come, and he had hoped desperately that she might depart without his having to bid her farewell. His first impulse now was to retreat by the way he had come, trusting that she had not seen him; but he felt that this would be cowardly, and he walked on as calmly as he could. After all, to see her once more! to speak to her again! He made a desperate effort to appear cool and unconcerned, but his voice shook when he began to speak.

"How do you do, Miss Weston? It's a—nice day for a walk, isn't it?"

It was a damp, dismal afternoon, and the observation was therefore scarcely appropriate. Content, who had been dropping stones into the water, turned round suddenly, with a wildly beating heart and a very white face.

"It rained this morning," was the only thing she could find to say; but the sight of her face had changed the current of Tom's thoughts.

"I say, I do hope you haven't been ill," he said hurriedly. "Edith or the governor ought to have told me. I should have come round, you know; at least, I mean I should have called to enquire. You ought to have a change. But you are going away, aren't you?"

"Yes, we are going away," said Content. "I don't care much for the village now. Everything is so different."

"You mean that you find the people behave differently to you because of your money?" he asked.

"Yes, horribly differently!" said Content energetically, throwing a stone down the stream as far as it would go.

"Edith will be awfully lonely without you," he said. "It has always been a joke in our house that she cared less for any of us than for Sweet Content."

"Oh, please don't use that name any more!" cried Content. "I am going to change, and be called Gloriana. The other is not applicable. I'm not contented at all."

"But you have every—advantage," pursued Tom awkwardly, his hungry eyes fixed upon her averted face.

"I haven't!" she flashed out. "I wish I was living in the old times, when men were brave and things were nice."

"And men are not brave now?" he asked, as cheerfully as he could.

"Brave? no!" cried Content, turning an indignant face upon him. "They are afraid of what people will say, and they let the thought of that ruin a girl's life."

"I—I don't think you are quite fair to me, Content," he said, with difficulty. "I gave you up because of your money, and it was very hard."

"Did I ever ask you to give me up?" cried Content. "Was it my fault that the money came? Why should you punish me for it? Isn't it bad enough to have a lot of money thrust upon you that you don't want, without your treating me as if it was some crime of my own?"

"Content, don't!"

He took a step forward, but she held up her hand.

"You know you were afraid of what people would say. You leave me to be alone all my life, with no one to help me, and all that property to manage, when I don't know anything about it, because you are afraid."

"On my word of honour, Content, it isn't that. I knew that with that property you might marry anyone you liked, and I wasn't going to ask you to bind yourself to me."

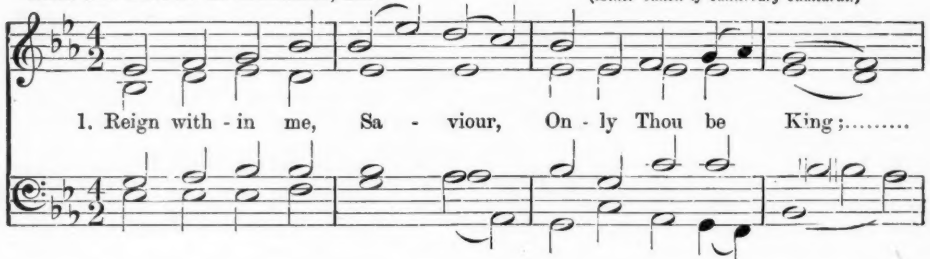

"Then if you weren't a coward, you were distrustful and unkind. Did it never strike you that I had a right to be consulted on the subject?"

"Mrs. Weston," said Tom, when he brought Content back to the cottage some time later, "I understand that you have been thinking of changing this young lady's Christian name. It isn't necessary. She assures me that she is, and I hope she always will be, Sweet Content."

NEW LIGHT ON OLD TEXTS.

BY THE REV. TRYON EDWARDS, D.D.

(Ecclesiastes xii.)

TWO mistakes as to this chapter have been made by almost if not quite every one of our best commentators : (1) In understanding the imagery of the sixth verse, as well as that of the preceding five verses, to refer to old age ; and (2) in treating the remaining verses of the chapter as if each was a distinct and independent apothegm, as in the Book of Proverbs, and not as consecutive and closely connected parts of a discourse or sermon which is marked by a manifest unity of argument and appeal from beginning to end.

The figures of the first five verses, as all agree, plainly do refer to old age—to its feebleness and decay, and so to its unfitness for attending for the first time to the things which make for our peace. But in the sixth verse the imagery is suddenly and entirely changed, and the emblems are no longer those of weakness and lassitude and decay, but of youth in all its vitality and vigour and earnestness, seeking as the first and great thing the enjoyments and pleasures of the world, and ignoring and neglecting the claims of God and duty, when, as in a moment, life is suddenly ended, and then is seen and felt to have been spent in vain, and worse than in vain, as to all the great and designed ends for which life was Divinely given ! And the whole chapter has a oneness of thought and appeal and motive, admirably fitted to impress its earnest lesson on the young, to whom it is so particularly and pointedly addressed.

The paraphrase that follows may illustrate both the great object of the chapter and the fitness of its striking and varied imagery to set forth and impress the aim of the sacred writer or preacher.

"Remember," he would say, "remember your Creator now, in the days of your youth, for (1) old age, even if you live to it, is no fit season for attending, for the first time, to the one great subject, when feebleness and pain and decay are weakening thought and unfitting for decision ; but (2) do not count on living to old age, for the silver cord may be loosed in the midst of its strength and brightness, and the golden bowl be broken, and the pitcher broken at the fountain, and the wheel broken at the cistern just as you are drawing up and quaffing the draughts of worldly pleasure—that is, you may be cut off suddenly by death in the very heyday of youth and health—in the very midst of your thoughtlessness of all but worldly enjoyments ; and then, alas ! you will find that your life has been but vanity of vanities—worse than utter vanity, as to all the great ends for which life was given, and for which you will, but too late, see and feel that you ought to have faithfully improved it !"

And then the preacher goes on to say that, as a wise and experienced counsellor, he would press his exhortation with the strong words of soberness and truth. These he would drive home and fasten on the mind as nails driven in a sure place, saying to the young, that though they might make books without end, and study till the flesh might be utterly weary, they could find no more or stronger motives for seeking God's favour now than the two he has presented : viz., that old age, even if they live to it, is no fit time for first remembering the great Creator ; and that it is daring presumption to count on living to old age, for at any moment death may suddenly come, and then, if God's favour has not been found, it may be for ever too late, and life will have been in vain, and worse than in vain—utter loss and eternal ruin !

"Hear, then," the inspired preacher would say, "the one great lesson—the conclusion of the whole matter : 'Fear God, and keep His commandments' now, for this is (not merely the whole duty of man—for the word duty is not in the original Hebrew) the whole of man—all he was made for—and all that he ought supremely to desire and seek as consistent with his high nature, and as the only way of duty and happiness, as will soon be seen at the great and final day, when God shall bring every work into judgment, and character and conduct and destiny shall be decided for ever !"

BELINDA'S BABY.

A STORY IN FOUR CHAPTERS.

BY E. S. CURRY, AUTHOR OF "MISS GATLE OF LESCOUGH," ETC.

CHAPTER III.

THE "STORY-MAN."

THE philosopher found himself returning home the next morning, with a sense of expectation and pleasure that he had not been conscious of feeling for some time. If he had been told that it was because a baby was beneath his roof, he would have smiled at the impossibility of such a reason.

But it was, nevertheless with a keen sense of relief, and even delight, that as he crossed the tree-shaded lawn which lay before his house he beheld a little white-bonneted figure seated on a heap of freshly-mown grass in a barrow, which Thomas was wheeling.

She held up her hand, and waved a welcome after her own fashion, as he emerged from the shrubs and advanced towards her.

"So, missy," he said pleasantly, "you are still here?—No one been about her, Thomas?" he asked.

"No one, sir; not as I've heard tell of."

"She seems quite happy, eh, Thomas?" the philosopher asked, regarding the bright little face benevolently through his spectacles.

"Happy ain't the word for it, sir. I've never seen such a baby afore; so good to be so little. Not but whether she did not prefer the barrow and Thomas. When she found her eyes on a level with the philosopher's spectacles, she lowered her eyebrows in a surprising manner, and scowled at the keen eyes which the spectacles shaded.

Apparently, however, she recollected the wonderful and fascinating gift which had proceeded from behind the grey moustache. A smile trembled on what she could be naughty, if she tried," he added reminiscently, recalling a little battle with Peggy at the chicken-house. For Peggy, in pursuit of a fluttering young fowl, had essayed to climb the ladder, and to squeeze her little round body into the aperture which the fowls found large enough. Thomas had removed her with difficulty, much to her wrath. He went on—

"Eyed them suspiciously."—p. 871.

"There ain't no screamin' for her mar, and no frettin's. And Mary said she just laid her little head down on her pillow after she'd said her prayers so pretty, it a'most made us cry—me an' cook was a sittin' lookin' on—and off she went, and slep' all night. An' when she woke, Mary says she was a cooin' to herself as good as gold, makin' believe to be telling her nurse and her mar all about everything. It do seem a pity, sir, as she can't stay."

The philosopher stooped and lifted Peggy up into his arms.

At first, for a moment, she seemed to be undecided her lips, the scowl vanished. With her little fat palm she softly patted the grey beard, and advanced her mouth for a kiss.

"Story-man," she whispered softly to herself—and the words were like the soft breath of wafted flowers in June across the old man's face—"Peggy yikes you, Story-man," she reiterated.

And she entered the house on the philosopher's arm.

Indoors, Mary was loud in her praises of the "goodness" which had distinguished her little charge; and whilst Peggy sat in calm contemplation, listening to her own praises, Mary produced a paper parcel, which she proceeded to unfold.

"I just ran out, sir," she explained apologetically, "and bought a thing or two she wanted. I couldn't abear to see her little socks. And her frock with no pinafore—not fitting for such as her. And her things is all marked, sir; you'll have no difficulty in finding her home: 'Peggy Cardyne,' as plain as plain."

But the philosopher pretended not to hear.

He leant forward, and lifted up the little white things Mary had unfolded.

"And what are these?" he asked, with interest, laying his large hand softly on the frilled daintinesses.

"This is a little frock, sir. And this is a pinafore, and these are some socks. You see, sir," said Mary explanatorily, "a baby like that is used to clean things every day, and oftener. And cook said I was not to stint. She said you'd wish her to have of the best. And these little silk socks was so taking."

At this moment Peggy's feelings and the sight of familiar garments prompted speech.

"Them's Peggy's," she remarked appropriatingly, showing her white teeth and dimples as she smiled at Mary. "Take Peggy's dirty fock off, please. It are full of grass."

"Shall we come up-stairs, then, darling?" said Mary coaxingly, holding out persuasive hands.

"No," said Peggy sturdily, from the philosopher's knee. "Peggy are here. Untie my fock, please." She turned with an appealing look into the philosopher's face.

It was a comic sight. Peggy sat her ground determinedly, whilst the mystic strings which fastened her garments were slowly and with difficulty fumbled with and untied—Mary standing by, directing the proceedings with a beaming face.

When her socks were removed, Peggy gave a scream of delight, and lifting up her little pink feet, laid them across the philosopher's arm.

"She ain't afraid of no one," commented Mary, looking on admiringly.

"Faver tickles Peggy's toes wiv kessin'," said Peggy, screwing herself up in a delighted anticipatory wriggle. Then, after waiting expectantly for a moment, for the game she was accustomed to, and the philosopher not proving equal to the occasion, Peggy raised one foot yet further, and pressed her pink toes on his mouth.

With the touch of the moustache on her sensitive skin, she uttered a shriek of delight, gave herself a shake, wriggled up on to her knees, and laid her soft little head against the old man's face.

"Story-man," she said, clasping her arms round his neck, whilst her rings of hair got under the spectacles into his eyes, and made him wink—"Story-man, has you dot a little girl?"

Peggy paused for a reply—but none came. Only the arms which encircled her drew her into a closer pressure, and a little softly breathed sigh issued from under the fierce moustache.

"Cos muvver can't give you Peggy," Peggy reasoned, in the soft whispers which often formed her means of communication with her friends. "Faver can't spare Peggy."

And then, for the first time, the happy little face grew clouded. It was as if her own words had brought recollection, and desire for the loving faces to which she was accustomed.

She looked round the room anxiously, and out of the window across the lawn to the trees beyond.

"Muvver!" she called, a little unsteadily. And then for a moment she waited, listening, her luminous eyes dilating, as a sudden conviction of loneliness passed across her mind.

And then she returned to her caresses.

"Take Peggy out walkin'," she entreated softly, after a minute, again looking anxiously, with a little pucker on her face, round the room. "Peggy would like to go to muvver and little Paul," she confided appealingly, rubbing her soft cheek against the hard and bony one; and a suspicious little quiver came into her voice.

In an instant Mary was down on her knees beside her.

"Peggy shall go a walkin', darling," she promised hurriedly. And she explained to the philosopher that Peggy was waking up to her lost condition, and beginning to fret for her mother.

And the philosopher roused himself at Mary's words.

"Poor soul!" he said absently. And he gathered himself up, and braced himself to what he recognised as a duty.

He was walking off into the world outside, with Peggy's soft curls pressed against his face, when Mary ran after the pair with a clean soft bonnet—one of her purchases—in her hands.

Peggy struck out with her fists, half in play, half in earnest, and signified her determination to go bonnetless. It soon became evident that, unless she were speedily returned to her proper guardians, she would be spoilt, for no reasonings of Mary's could induce her to have the bonnet tied.

She allowed it to be tilted on her head, asserting that that was the "popper way," and that "Nurse did it so," and thus sat triumphant, the philosopher quietly sympathising.

And the two crossed the common—the man carrying the child, taking the same route which they had traversed the day before—until the pond where Peggy had disported herself came into view.

The sight of the water brought the recollection of boats and boys; and with a cry of exulting reminiscence, Peggy wriggled out of the philosopher's arms, and steadied herself on her own little legs. Then, after a preliminary shake, she trotted off to the pond.

Now, the philosopher's awakening conscience had impelled him to go in search of a police-station, and he was making his way thither, with the intention of giving notice of Peggy's whereabouts, with a view to her restoration to her proper owners, when this diversion occurred.

When he beheld her heading straight into the pond, his alarm was great, and he wished Mary had accompanied them. He strode after Peggy, and put out a detaining hand just as she was about to prance into the water; and he was not a moment too soon. As it was, Peggy suffered herself to be stopped, and merely glancing up into his face with an engaging smile, slipped her fingers into his, and stood delightedly watching on the edge of the pond.

There was nothing in the attitude of either of them to invite suspicion, and yet a policeman, hovering near, eyed them at first suspiciously, and, after reference to a paper he brought out of his pocket, with apparent certainty, and drew up behind the two, so as to bar their retreat.

Presently he drew nearer, and gently touched the philosopher on the arm.

"I'm afraid I must trouble you to come with me, sir," he said, coughing slightly.

"Yes?" said the philosopher absently, allowing Peggy to pull him a step or two nearer to the point where a little white-sailed boat was sailing gallantly in to shore.

"I was on my way," he said simply, turning.

The man stared. Here was a rummy cove, he thought; but as he remembered the reward, his mouth watered.

He eyed Peggy all over her little round body. How was he to know that the minutely detailed description of her dress which he held in his hand was in almost every respect wrong?—that the soft white frock was trimmed with lace, and not with embroidery?—that it was covered with an overall of the same soft material, and that her little socks were silk, and not cotton? Such details were not in his line; but he felt sure of his prize.

"Would you like a cab, sir?" he asked respectfully, seeing that the philosopher, drawn by Peggy's insistent pulls, seemed inclined to edge round the pond; which might be a ruse in order to effect an escape.

"A cab? Why?" the philosopher asked, again intervening to prevent Peggy's daring little feet being planted in the water. "Oh no, thank you. It isn't far."

"Me boat!" shouted Peggy ecstatically at this juncture, with extended hands, and her feet dancing up and down in delighted expectation, as a dashing little cutter sailed perilously near the bank. But a judiciously managed string took the little vessel into the middle again, with a course to the opposite shore, and Peggy wrung her hands and danced in impotent wrath. She flung some unintelligible objurgations after the receding boat, and then again looked up into the philosopher's face with the engaging and cherubic smile which was her master-key to all society—a thing no beholder could withstand.

"Naughty boat!" she murmured confidentially. And then she became aware of the hovering figure of the big policeman close in her rear.

Peggy knew no fear. Her mother sometimes trembled at the daring little spirit, and wondered what the adversity would be that would avail to break it. If she had but known! She need have feared no trouble for Peggy. The beautiful daring spirit was never to be broken in this world!

"Man," said Peggy solemnly, giving the philosopher a tug to engage his attention, and pointing with her white finger straight up into the policeman's face.

"Now, sir," said the man encouragingly—"now little missy ain't lookin' at them boats. Now's your time. I think you had better come."

The philosopher stooped and took Peggy again into his arms. It never entered his head that he was under suspicion of stealing her, and that he was now, in fact, under compulsion, being taken to the police-station.

The trio turned away from the pond, Peggy with solemn eyes, in which lurked a curiously examining cynical expression, fixed steadfastly upon the policeman—until, as he told his wife later, he felt "all creepy-crawly down his back."

"Never did I see such an observin' baby as that 'n," he repeated over and over again. "No wonder they priced her so high."

The confidential terms on which Peggy and the philosopher seemed to be, somewhat staggered their guardian in his opinion of his own shrewdness. Here was no unwilling victim of a theft. Instead, Peggy's little fingers caressed with soft movements the philosopher's face as it lay within reach of their touch.

But she kept her eyes wide open in a persistent stare, on the burly man who walked so close beside them. He was a new study for Peggy: someone who had as yet taken not the least notice of her. She found him very interesting. Peggy was wonderfully cosmopolitan in her tastes.

Just as they reached the edge of the common, and were about to emerge on to the high road, an advancing procession of two began to cross it towards them.

Suddenly a piercing shriek rang through the air, a cloud of dust arose in the road, a girl rushed forward and flung herself violently on the philosopher, snatching the baby from his arms. At the same moment, the ragged boy, her companion, becoming aware of one of the stern presences it was his aim in life to elude, started off at a rapid run down the road. Without a moment's hesitation the policeman involuntarily followed, whistling shrilly and striding after the departing gamin like a giant in seven-leagued boots.

Meanwhile, the philosopher was left planted on the grass, staring blankly at a dirty-faced dishevelled girl who had sunk down on to the turf before him with Peggy, submerged by caresses, in her arms.

When Peggy came to the surface, crumpled and bonnetless—for it could not be expected of an untied bonnet to remain in place under so violent an attack,—she first planted herself steadily on her two legs, then tossed back the waving brightness from her face, and proceeded to effect an introduction between her two companions.

After her usual fashion, and with her usual smile, she held out her hand, and solemnly pointed a finger at the crouching Belinda.

"Lin," she said, with an amused chuckle. "Ain't she dot a dirty face?"

The philosopher peered at Belinda.

"Do you know this little girl?" he asked politely.

Belinda sprang up and confronted him, flashing wrath.

"Know her? Me? My own baby!—Oh! Peggy, ducky darling, did they steal you away from your own Lin?" she vociferated.

Peggy gazed at her solemnly, not comprehending the emotion, but, according to her custom, equal to any occasion.

"Lin," she said, with reproachful severity, "you's a dirty face!"

"What do it matter, so long as you're found?" said Belinda joyfully, recklessly undoing the education which throughout her short life had been impressed on Peggy, that cleanliness was next to godliness.

And just then appeared the breathless policeman, with Sparks held tightly by the collar of his ragged little jacket. Peggy, standing bonnetless, flanked on one side by the philosopher, on the other by Belinda, exchanging suspicious and distrustful glances, surveyed the new-comers with the air of one to whom nothing comes as a surprise; and further astonished the philosopher by greeting this ragged and grimy waif with her own pretty little gesture of welcome.

"Boy!" she ejaculated in beaming delight, advancing a step or two nearer to him; and then she directed a scowl at the policeman, as she detected his detaining grip. But the man, watchfully observant, suspecting the whole scene to be a ruse on the part of the philosopher, held the ragged jacket tight.

When he saw Peggy, the clouded face of the captive became wreathed in smiles; eyes and teeth shone and sparkled, in eloquent delight.

"You've come back?" he said, by way of greeting. "Where 'ave yer been?"

But it was not Peggy's way to be bothered by questions, and she only surveyed him silently.

And now arose a complication. What was the policeman to do? It was rather a retired spot, and no help seemed to be forthcoming. How was he to get the whole of this party—evidently in league together—to the station? The philosopher tried to solve the difficulty.

"This girl," he said, turning to Belinda, "asserts that the baby is hers. And she seems to be speaking the truth," he added dubiously. "Eh! what do you say?"

"Gammon!" said the policeman derisively; "don't think to come over me that way. This 'ere baby," he went on, gazing down at the serene face of Peggy standing in the midst, "ain't no more hers than she's yours. You'll all have to come with me."

"Peggy hungry," volunteered Peggy at this juncture.

"Peggy wants her dinner," she went on insistently, turning to the philosopher and lifting her arms. "Take Peggy home to her dinner."

"Upon my word, that will be the best thing to do first," the philosopher assented gladly.

And as Peggy again declared herself to be in immediate need of food, the policeman, into whose brain some inkling of the philosopher's real position in the affair was beginning to pierce, accepted the offer of lunch for the whole party.

"So as I don't lose sight of any of you, I ain't particular to half an hour or so," he said graciously; "seein' as the young lady seems in a hurry for her dinner," he added, winking at Peggy.

CHAPTER IV.

FOUND.

ABOUT an hour later, Mr. and Mrs. Cardyne gained the common to which Belinda's telegram had allured them, and paused on its margin to consider their next movements.

As they walked slowly over the much-trodden grass,

"Are you goin' to stop me from taking my own baby to my own missus?"

their anxious eyes turned in all directions. They were so evidently looking for somebody, that it was little wonder that the common-keeper, even before they spoke to him, had observed their anxious movements.

"Have you noticed a young girl, dressed like a nursemaid, with a ragged boy?" Mr. Cardyne asked, as they approached him.

"I can't say that I've so to say noticed her, sir," the man answered; "but if it's a party as was hereabouts an hour or so ago, they've all been took up by the police."

"What party was that?" was the quick question.

"The gentleman as lives in that house behind them gates," pointing across the common to the gates in question, "has picked up a little girl. Is it yours, mem?" he broke off in quick sympathy, at the sight of Esther's face. "An' the policeman had his hands full. Yes, now I come to think of it, there was a girl as well as the boy. But if it's about the baby, she's safe and sound, and I was to say you was to go there."

Esther put out her hand hurriedly and shook the man's hand, and Mr. Cardyne, having gratified equally his own feelings and the man's, by a gift for the good news, followed his wife's hasty steps.

Tremblingly, both father and mother walked up the avenue; but even before they reached the lawn, the sound of Belinda's voice, uplifted in agitated wrath, left them in no doubt as to her presence.

"Are you goin' to stop me from taking my own baby to my own missus?" they heard her demand; whilst their first glance through the trees sent a quick thrill of rapture through their hearts.

There was no mistaking the little figure sitting on Thomas's barrow, full of grass, Sparks grinning as he wheeled her an inch or two, under the immediate observation of the policeman. Standing by was Belinda, at hand was a sun-bonnet—not Peggy's—as Belinda had just been obliged angrily to confess, into which, however, she had been trying to wheedle Peggy, with the intention of stealing her away when no one was looking.

Belinda had seen cause to distrust the philosopher, and as the policeman, in his embarrassment, would not allow any one of the party out of his sight, this had seemed to Belinda the best plan of action. She had engaged Sparks to provide sufficient diversion to allow of this plan being carried out.

But Peggy spoils it. She would not have her bonnet on. And not even to restore her to a heartbroken mother, could Belinda bring herself to consider it seemly to take her through the streets without it.

The policeman held his notebook in his hand, and was bewildered in trying to make his instructions as to Peggy's clothing agree with facts.

"They do bully a chap so if he takes the wrong cove," he confided to Mary, who was enjoying her part in his perplexity. "Are you quite sure of what you tell me, miss? Because if so, that ain't the little 'un at all. She couldn't have gone and changed all her clothing; now, could she?"

"She's very clever," said Mary archly. "She's posed my master once or twice; and he's not a fool." To herself she said: "I'm not going to have that precious baby taken up by the police—not if I can prevent it."

The policeman turned to look at the philosopher, who, sitting on a garden-seat near, was gravely watching Peggy through his spectacles. She had forsaken his knee, under the superior attraction of Sparks and the wheelbarrow, and he was meditating on the instability of feminine favours.

Suddenly the air was rent by a scream from Belinda; and whilst the whole party on the lawn, with the exception of Peggy, anxiously regarded her, Peggy scrambled hastily over the side of the wheelbarrow. The philosopher, whose attention was the first to return to her, heard her muttering hurriedly to herself, "Muvver and faver!" And then the little legs toddled at their extremest speed across the lawn.

There was then a blank as regarded Peggy: she became absorbed into a large and enveloping embrace.

When she emerged, she was breathless and dishevelled, but sparkling; in delighted possession of her father's shoulder, whence she surveyed the assembly like a queen. For it was quite an assembly by this time: what with Belinda and Mary, the policeman and Sparks, to say nothing of the sympathetic Thomas, pausing in his work to watch the tremblingly radiant mother greet the bewildered philosopher.

It took the whole afternoon to recount, and hear, and adjust, Peggy's adventures. Mr. Cardyne accompanied the policeman for a time, and returned to find Mary regaling the whole party, including Sparks and Belinda, with tea on the lawn. The philosopher was looking very grave, as he witnessed Esther's joy and gratitude, and the soft little murmuring caresses which passed between mother and child.

"I am much ashamed of myself, madam," he found himself saying once: "I ought to have guessed yesterday what you would suffer, from my own pleasure in my little guest, and I ought to have sent at once to the police."

And after he had said it, he looked so funny about the eyes, that Peggy, with some idea of sympathy probably in her mind, had paused in her occupation of stroking her mother's cheek, and had slid down out of her arms. Steadying herself by the philosopher's knees, she had looked solemnly up into his face.

"Story-man," she said, to engage his attention, and bring his wonderful gift to remembrance.

And when he stooped with a gratified smile, and lifted her to the resting-place she had found when there were no mother's arms available, with her fair hair straying across his beard, he began again to weave before his hearers the beautiful imaginations of his mind. Sparks and Belinda drew near and listened too, one sitting on the grass open-mouthed and open-eyed, the other in uncomfortable respectfulness on the edge of her chair, very conscious of a morning frock at the wrong time of day. So Mary had found them when she brought out the tea.

And after that, Mrs. Cardyne had gone indoors to hear Mary's tale of all Peggy's goodnesses, and had bestowed a warm kiss on the gratified girl for her kindness, besides arranging for a more substantial recognition later.

By this episode in her life, Peggy added to her large circle of friends. Sparks, who had never cause to repent his part in her abduction, the household of the philosopher, and the philosopher himself, all became her slaves.

Her belief and trust in the "Story-man" caused a unique friendship between them, which has never ended; although one lies under the daisies in a little hillside churchyard, and the other still looks forward in hope.

"A child's kiss,

Set on thy sighing lips, shall make thee glad."

SHORT ARROWS.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

THEY KNEW NOT WHAT THEY DID.

SOCRATES said that all vice is ignorance, and certainly ignorance was the cause of many of the crimes that blacken the pages of history. This was forced upon our attention on a recent occasion when we visited a place in Strasburg, where in the middle of the fourteenth century two thousand Jews were burned, accused of having poisoned the fountains and wells, and thus giving rise to the plague which at the time desolated the city. Of course it was disobedience to sanitary laws, and not the Jews, that caused the plague. Ignorance was anything but "bliss" to these poor Jews and to the people who were stricken with plague.

WE HAVE GIVEN OUR WORD.

When Blücher, with his gallant Prussians, whose timely arrival at Waterloo prevented Napoleon from employing his reserves against Wellington's troops, had been for hours toiling across wet and spongy valleys towards the scene of action, the patient and weary troops became nearly exhausted. "We can go no farther," they frequently exclaimed. "We must," was Blücher's reply. "I have given Wellington my word, and you won't make me break it!" All of us who have been baptised have given our word. We have promised and vowed to fight under Christ's Cross and banner against the world, the flesh, and the devil; and surely there ought to be a little more of Blücher's spirit in us. Let us say to ourselves, when we are in the face of temptation, "I have given my word, and must not break it."

NOTHING TO THE PASSERS-BY.

When staying at Frankfort-on-Main lately we went to see the house where Goethe was born and lived several years. As we stood looking up for a long time at the old-fashioned five-storey house, the people in the street seemed astonished at our interest. They were so accustomed to the place that it did not call to their minds scenes in the boyhood and youth of the great writer as it did to ours. So it is that custom can render stale the most memorable places and events. It is this which makes us Gospel-hardened and indifferent to the most wonderful miracle of love that can be imagined. We have heard and read so much of the Cross of Christ that now too many can, as it were, pass it by as if it were nothing.

WOMEN'S RIGHTS IN CHINA.

A pleasant feature of Chinese domestic life among Christian converts (writes a correspondent from a mission-station in China) is their increased appreciation of their girl-children; in such homes they are welcomed and loved, and as they are almost sure, in due time, to be sent to mission-, day-, or boarding-, schools, they grow up respected and useful members of society. "It is our aim," a missionary of great experience and marked success in school-work said to me yesterday, "that all our girls should leave us equipped for the earning of an independent livelihood, and thus be saved the necessity of marriage for their support: a necessity which so often plunges a Christian girl back into heathenism." We give the likenesses of three young women from among this lady's pupils. One of the three, very happily married to a native Christian schoolmaster, is teaching Chinese to a lady in our mission: another is just betrothed to a highly respected Korean Christian; while the third, now living under her mother's roof, is in charge of our girls' day-school, and giving us great satisfaction.

MORE "QUIVER" HEROES.

On the night of the 16th of May last, a fire broke out at a warehouse in Portland Street, Manchester, and a man was seen upon the gutter below the roof of the burning building. The gallant rescue of the unfortunate man is best described by Mr. J. Lacey Savage, the superintendent of the Corporation Fire Brigade, who was an eye-witness of the occurrence:—"The gutter, which is six or eight inches wide and a quarter of an inch thick, at the bottom of an almost perpendicular roof, is 67 feet 6 inches from the ground. The escape was placed against the building, but the angle at which it was pitched, together with the weight of Firemen William Lawrence and John Clayton, who ascended, caused the top of the ladder (the upper part of which was perpendicular) to come about three feet short of the gutter. Lawrence got as near the top as he could, while Clayton, who was behind him, placed his arm for Lawrence to stand on while he reached the gutter with his hands, when he pulled himself up on the roof assisted by Clayton. Lawrence passed the man over the gutter towards where Clayton was standing on the ladder. At this moment the crowd commenced to clap, when I turned round, stepped forward, and requested the people to keep quiet, which they did. This occupied some seconds, and when I turned round again and looked upward, I noticed that Clayton had descended a few feet with the man in front of him, and that he was steadying him on the ladder, while Lawrence was on the top of the ladder, commencing to descend. . . . During the few moments that my attention was drawn from the ladder to quieten the crowd, my assistant (Mr. Muir) saw Lawrence lower the man over the gutter towards Clayton on the ladder, and the next moment Lawrence hung down from the gutter and got on to the ladder." In the name of the readers of THE QUIVER we decided to recognise this signal act of bravery by the award of the silver medal of THE QUIVER Heroes Fund to each of the two firemen, and the medals were publicly presented by the Lord Mayor of Manchester, Sir Anthony Marshall, at the Albert Street police parade-ground.

THE POWER OF LOVE.

Near the foot of the tower of Antwerp Cathedral there is a splendid iron canopy. It is the work of Quentin Matsys, a blacksmith of Antwerp, who fell in love with a painter's daughter, but was refused by her father, who would bestow her hand only on a painter. He abandoned the anvil and took to the easel, and eventually far surpassed her father in his own art, as paintings in the museum at Antwerp testify. So it is that love is the great inspirer of all excellence; and if love for an earthly being can do so much, what work may not be expected from those who really, and not only in name, give their hearts to Christ?

ONLY CORNS!

A friend of the writer when staying at Baden-Baden thought that he ought to drink of the waters and take baths. He observed, however, that most of the people who did this were sufferers from some ailment or another. Being in good health, my friend could not find an excuse, so to speak, for drinking all these glasses of hot water. Happy or unhappy thought! He had corns, and would drink for this reason. People ought to be very content when they have no worse ailment than this. Corns of all kinds in life are disagreeable enough, but before grumbling about them look out of your window, and you may see some poor cripple who has no feet at all, or perhaps only one foot, to have corns upon.

"THOU GOD SEEST ME."

On the ceiling of many Greek churches may be seen painted an enormous eye. This is intended to represent the Eye of God. It is well to be reminded that this Eye is upon us in church, but we must not think that we are more seen there than elsewhere. Perhaps the difference between a truly religious person and one who is not consists in this: that the first feels he is always being watched over. He looks to the Eye of God for guidance, reproof, correction, encouragement, in all times and places.

A DOG'S LIFE.

To those who think of dogs as only the friends and playmates of men, it is very painful to see how very seriously they are made to take life in Belgium, Germany, and parts of Switzerland, where they are beasts of burden, and have to draw carts. It is very pathetic to observe their efforts to play, though in a cart, when they meet a brother-dog who is free. And how patient and good-humoured they are! Their masters seem never to pet them or address a civil word to them, and yet the dogs are always faithful and most willing to work. In another respect, too, they are patterns to human workers, and that is in their knowledge of the times and places when they ought to take rest. When the milk which they have brought is being distributed, they lie down and wait until it is time to continue their round of calls. Has the life led by dogs who have been made beasts of burden given rise to the phrase that "So-and-so leads a dog's life" when we mean a miserable one?

A LIONESSE WITHOUT A TONGUE.

The overthrow of the tyranny of the Pisistratidæ was concerted at the house of a woman called Leena. When put to torture, that she might disclose the secrets of the conspirators, fearing that weakness might overpower her, she bit off her tongue, that she might be unable to betray the trust placed in her. The Athenians raised in her honour the statue of a lioness without a tongue, in allusion to her name, which signifies a lioness. People will tell lies and talk scandal to gratify vanity or for some other petty miserable reason. They will not suffer the smallest inconvenience, much less pain, in order not to offend in word. How the example of Leena should shame them!

LADY JEUNE'S PHILANTHROPIC WORK.

"I have had some money given me that I do not quite know what to do with."—"Indeed; that must be an unusual experience."—"Well, the money is to send out poor children into the country, and the arrangement of that sort of thing is somewhat out of my line—I have not time for it, in fact."—"Give it to me: I will superintend the proper use of it. You know I am in touch with a number of poor children in the East End."—"Not a bad idea. I think I will entrust you with it."—"Yes; a lady with some leisure, and knowing a number of poor children, would have better opportunities than a busy editor and member of Parliament. You are so busy instructing other people and making laws for us all—"Ha! ha!" he interrupted, with a chuckle, "that is the trouble of it—they do not allow me to make the laws. If I had my will—"—"England would be a much pleasanter place to live in than now," she said, laughing. "Well, well, you do your best, you know; and a man cannot do more."—"In any case, you shall have the money," he answered. And so it was arranged, and Lady Jeune's Fresh Air Fund for Poor Children came into existence. This conversation, imaginary though it be, embodies a solid fact. We understand that a certain London editor and member of Parliament (Mr. Henry Labouchere), having some money given him, Lady Jeune said she would superintend the work. She began with about £500, which has increased to upwards of £1,800 per season for this object. Sir Francis and Lady Jeune's country residence is at Arlington Manor, near Newbury, Berks; and these children are boarded out in Berkshire, and Oxfordshire, and Essex; while, as Lady Jeune is one of the managers for schools in Bethnal Green and Shoreditch, and also a member of the General Purposes Committee of the People's Palace, she is able to select really deserving cases for the benefit of the fund. Last summer she sent the celebrated judge Sir Francis Jeune. Her philanthropic efforts afford an apt illustration of the altruistic work which can be conducted by ladies of leisure and of social position on behalf of their poorer brethren and sisters.

CHARITY AT HOME.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee." That woman must have obeyed these words of her Saviour upon whose tombstone was placed the beautiful epitaph which may be read in a certain Yorkshire churchyard—"She always made home happy."

about 1,200 children into the country. The benefits of such work are obvious; but not the least may be a genuine love for a country life fostered in the hearts of some children by a few days' sojourn; and they may in after-days return to the scene of these pleasant holidays to carry on their life-work in rural districts, thus counterbalancing to some extent the rush of labourers from the country to the great towns, which is so marked a feature of our time. This Fresh-Air Fund, however, does not exhaust Lady Jeune's philanthropic efforts. She has a Rescue Home in North London, having a big laundry, while her ladyship has also work in hand on behalf of factory girls and wearied mothers; and a visitor to Arlington Manor might find there, not a party of distinguished guests, whose names would bulk large in the public eye, but a company of work-girls from East London. Lady Jeune has been twice married, her first husband being Mr. John Stanley, brother to Lord Stanley of Alderley, and her present husband

SPIRITUAL APPETITE.

It is not only for the food of our bodies that we ought to be thankful, but for that of our minds and souls. Why should we not say grace after receiving mental food, as, for instance, when we have read a good book, or after spiritual sustenance, as when we have attended a hearty service, or conversed with an improving friend? Healthy souls hunger for spiritual food, as healthy bodies do for that which is material. How thankful, then, should we be "that our Heavenly Father hath given His Son our Saviour Jesus Christ, not only to die for us, but also to be our spiritual food and sustenance"! God has given many means of grace, many kinds of soul-food. We in England are so much favoured in this respect, that the very abundance of our privileges tends to make us indifferent and thankful. In countries where there are few places of worship, people go long journeys to attend them, while we who live at home pick and choose and run from one preacher to another. There are many people who do not go to church to worship, but to sit in the seat of the scornful and criticise the clergyman and the choir. One sometimes thinks that if all places of worship were shut up for a year, we should return to them when opened more thankful for the spiritual food they supply, and in a more devotional spirit.

WHENCE OR WHITHER?

Professor Huxley relates that, attending a meeting of the British Association in Belfast nearly forty years ago, he had promised to breakfast with the eminent scholar, Dr. Hincks. "Having" (he says) "been up very late the previous night, I was behind time, so, hailing an outside car, I said to the driver as I jumped on, 'Now drive fast, as I am in a hurry.' Whereupon he whipped up his horse, and set off at a hand-gallop. Nearly jerked off my seat, I shouted, 'My good friend, do you know where I want to go?'—'No, yer honner,' said the driver, 'but, anyway, I am driving fast.'" Like this Irish Jehu, too many rush through the business of life without ever stopping to ask themselves Whence, or Whither? Being without moral thoughtfulness, they are flighty and flippant, and have no decided opinions nor any steady purpose in life.

SOME NEW BOOKS.

Dr. Maclaren of Manchester has already earned the gratitude of thousands of preachers and teachers by the publication of his "Bible Class Expositions," and the volume on "The Acts of the Apostles," just issued by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton, can only strengthen and add to the debt. We believe we are right in saying that for the selection of the lessons themselves Dr. Maclaren was not responsible, but for his clear-sighted and suggestive expositions of them the credit is his, and will be gladly given by anyone with practical experience.—We cannot all agree with Count Tolstoi's views on all subjects; but there is much to admire in his character, and the cheap edition of "Tolstoi's Boyhood: Written by Himself," translated by Constantine Popoff and published by Mr. Elliot Stock, deserves a large circle of readers.—Messrs. Morgan and Scott send us a memorial volume of sermons by our old friend and contributor the late Prebendary Gordon Calthrop. "The Future Life, and Other Sermons," is the title of the work, which will need no word from us to ensure for it a warm welcome from all readers of THE QUIVER.—From the Baptist Book and Tract Society we have received a copy of "The History of the English Bible," a popular work that has already met with considerable success in the United States. It deals not only with the history of each version, but with its influence upon the spiritual life of the nation and of the world.—Mr. Elliot Stock publishes a practical little work which he calls "Notes for Boys (and their Fathers)" on Morals, Mind, and Matter, in which is enshrined a good deal of "sanctified common-sense." And an earnest "Devotional Companion to the Pulpit," from the same publisher, appeals specially to preachers.—Uniform with their well-known series of half-crown books for girls, Messrs. Longmans have just issued new and cheap editions of three capital stories—Mrs. Deland's "Sidney," to which we referred in these pages when it was first published, Mrs. Molesworth's "Neighbours," and "Keith Deramore," by the author of "Miss Molly." With these three comes a fourth work in the same dress (though it is not a story), Mrs. Grey's "Last Words to Girls," a book that should be in the library of every household wherein girls have a place.

THREE MEMORABLE SAYINGS

the Duke of Wellington has left behind him. He said "that education without religion would surround us with clever devils." He said to one who pushed aside a poor man who was going up before him to the communion-table, and bade him "make way for his Grace the Duke of Wellington," "Not so; we are all equal here." And when a young clergyman was speaking in disparagement of foreign missions, he rebuked him with, "Sir, you forget your marching orders: 'Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature.'"

A GOOD RESOLUTION.

A friend of Dr. Whewell tells us that a few years after Whewell had taken his Bachelor's degree at Cambridge, he said, "I have determined to leave the world a little better than I found it." Most people begin Christian work with a similar resolution, but many of them have not the gift of continuance. If they had this, and God's blessing went with them, the world would be very different from what it is. None of us singly can do much for its improvement; but how would it be if everyone did what is in the power of each, according to the state of life in which God has placed him?

THE DISTINGUISHING MARK.

On the night of the 30th June, 1849, the French advanced upon Rome, which was defended by some 15,000 Garibaldians. Having made a breach in the walls, they entered the city and stormed the barricades successfully. The Italian patriot, himself wounded, recognised the uselessness of further prolonging the struggle, and said to his devoted followers, "Soldiers! I offer you hunger, thirst, cold, heat, no pay, no food; whoever loves Italy follow me." Cutting their way through the enemy they made their escape to the mountains. But the struggle for freedom, though it had for a time failed, was persevered in, and later on led to a triumphant issue, and the unity of a free Italy under Victor Emmanuel. This law of sacrifice runs through the world's history. The good that humanity has gained is by the blood of martyrs and heroes. Sacrifice is the distinguishing mark of the Christian. "If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow Me."

QUESTIONS.

121. It is said that Jesus sat on the well at Sychar. What is known of that place?

122. In what way was it true, as the woman of Samaria said, "Our fathers worshipped in this mountain"?

123. In what words did our Lord reveal Himself as God to the woman of Samaria?

124. By what illustration does the prophet Isaiah set forth the peace which should come into the world through the preaching of the Gospel?

125. St. Paul, in writing to the Galatians, says, "When the fulness of time was come God sent forth His Son." What words of our blessed Lord refer to this same fulness of time?

126. What lesson do we learn from our Lord's words, "The time is fulfilled"?

127. What do we know of our Lord's first return journey to Galilee after the commencement of His ministry?

128. What remarkable event occurred at Nazareth when our Lord revisited it after His baptism?

129. What saying of St. John concerning Christ was literally fulfilled at Nazareth?

130. What lesson do we learn from our Lord's conduct while living at His home in Nazareth?

131. What was the effect of our Lord's first miracle on the Lake of Gennesaret?

132. It is generally considered that St. Peter was one of the oldest of the twelve Apostles. What reason have we for this opinion?

APOSTLES TO YOUNG MEN.

George Williams

THE jubilee proceedings of the Y.M.C.A. have revived discussion of the old problem which has perplexed and interested active Christian people for some generations—how successfully to deal with our young men. How far they have suggested the right answer, it is no part of this article to consider. But, whether they have or have not satisfied every mind upon this point, they have assuredly reminded us of one element which, humanly speaking, seems essential to success. They have shown us the value of personal influence—the power of a single personality. The world-wide organisation of the Y.M.C.A. owes its existence and efficiency—not solely indeed, but very largely—to the warm-hearted philanthropist whom we are now come to know as Sir George Williams. And in pondering the vast influence which one devoted life has had upon and through that Association, the thoughts of every Londoner will instinctively turn to another organisation and to another worker—to the Polytechnic in Regent Street and to Mr. Quintin Hogg. The two men have had much in common. Each has lived to see a great enterprise spring from a small beginning; each has watched his enterprise with an affectionate solicitude which has something almost pathetic about it; each has gladly spent with almost regal munificence, in order that the enterprise might not be stunted in its growth; and each, too, has cared most of all that the work done should be distinctively Christian; “as well,” indeed, “for the body as the soul,” but decisively and peculiarly for the soul.

Sir George Williams was born at Dulverton, Somersetshire, on October 11th, 1821. It was at Bridgwater that he began business, and at Bridgwater, too, that he definitely ranged himself upon the side of God. In the year 1841 he came up to London, and entered as an assistant the house of Messrs. Hitchcock and Rogers, in St. Paul's Churchyard. In that establishment he found a few other young men like-minded with himself, amongst whom his influence was at once felt. His desire, thus early, to help others has been justly described as a "passion for souls;" but even those who have only known the transparent sincerity, the geniality, and the persuasiveness of his manner in a green old age, can well understand the influence he as a young man rapidly obtained in St. Paul's Churchyard. Those were days in which the assistants in houses of business worked longer, fared worse, and in all respects were treated with much less consideration than is justly looked for now. It was proportionately difficult to lead what was emphatically a consecrated life. But the young assistant from Somersetshire lacked nothing of the moral courage which the circumstances demanded. He and his friends were not afraid to read and pray together, and the little circle presently developed a formal organisation. In 1842 they constituted the body which, as the St. Paul's Missionary Society, kept its jubilee in December, 1892. They met in those days in one of the bedrooms; but if there were difficulties, there were also, quite early in the movement, some remarkable encouragements. For Mr. George Hitchcock, the head of the firm, owed, as he himself put it, his "own spiritual birth, under God," to this very agency. There was a worthy recruit, whose influence whilst he lived—and even since, where his memory is cherished—was wholly on the side of God. Other early recruits whose accession created more or less sensation were the chairman of the "Free and Easy" which then met at the "Goose and Gridiron" hard by, and a notorious infidel, a Mr. J. T. Brown, who afterwards became the trusted Superintendent of a Sunday-school.

The first meetings of the young society were held in Mr. Williams's own bedroom; then in the room where now he often gathers friends for a meal in the City—a small panelled room on the second storey in Paternoster Row, now bearing upon its walls many photographs of Y.M.C.A. conference groups, with portraits of such men as the great Lord Shaftesbury, Dean Alford, and Henry Venn. Under that roof was gathered the little meeting which set on foot the now world-wide organisation, the Y.M.C.A.—an organisation at present represented at over 5,200 centres—an organisation claiming a total membership in all lands of more than 467,000. Of its growth or of its activities it is needless here to speak, save in so far as to say that at every step of the way the influence of Sir George Williams has been felt. Many others have worked for and loved the organisation, but to Sir George it has been as a child of his own. The outside public were impressed when they learned that, together with Mr. J. D. Allcroft, Mr. Samuel Morley, and Mr. R. C. L. Bevan, he had put down £5,000 to secure Exeter Hall for the Association; but that act was only an incident in a life of devotion to its interests.

The development of the work for all young men has not lessened his interest in that connected with the great house of which he has for many years been the head. The establishment is one of the few in which the day regularly begins with a religious service, attendance at which is purely voluntary. There are two chaplains to the house, and the passer-by in Paternoster Row about 7.40 a.m. may always hear the sound of a hymn coming from its second floor. But the religious atmosphere of the place is neither official nor artificial; it is personal and real. The spirit in which Sir George deals with the helpers in his own house of business is well illustrated by a few words he said at the Jubilee gathering of the St. Paul's Missionary Society: "Changes are constantly occurring, as is only natural, in a house like this; but I make it a point usually to ask those who leave such questions as these: 'Have you found the Lord since you have been in the house? Have you become a Christian?'" And those who know Sir George are aware that in any such question from him there is nothing unreal or perfunctory, but rather the tenderness of a father. He has never held that business must be divorced from religion, or religion from business. In the little room off the counting-house in Paternoster Row, where so many have interviewed him, he has put to men questions—plain, straightforward, yet full of sincere and unaffected concern—such as too few have the courage to speak.

Nowhere perhaps is this almost paternal interest more clearly illustrated than at the annual meetings of the organisation already described as the St. Paul's Missionary Society. The late Mr. George Hitchcock used to say, "I have two families, one in the City and one at Norfolk Crescent." He did his best to make the members of the one family interested in the affairs of the other. That tradition Sir George Williams has fully sustained. To have seen him preside at one of these meetings, with Lady Williams, his sons, and his daughters-in-law around him; to have heard there the almost patriarchal way in which he would talk of a son's marriage or the birth of a grandchild, is at once to have grasped how fully he has sought to carry out this family ideal in his own commercial life. It was at such a gathering that one of the oldest of the staff bore this remarkable testimony to the principles on which Sir George and his sons, as well as Mr. Hitchcock before them, have worked:—"The theory on which this house is constituted is, that it is a business household or family, having what may be called a corporate personality and character, with duties and responsibilities; and the heads of the house have determined, be the staff what it may at any particular periods, that the character of the house shall be a religious character, and that there shall be religious institutions in it."

It is this character which gives a peculiar happiness to the results of the spiritual work done amidst the great household in St. Paul's Churchyard. It is scarcely too much to say that there is hardly a corner of the world in which men may not be found who owe the turning-point in their spiritual life to the influences exercised there. Not a few missionaries in the foreign field have come from the ranks of the St. Paul's Missionary Society. Nor is the home ministry without its recruits. Going to a town in the North, Sir George found in the vicar of an important parish there one who, to use Sir George's own words, "Lived in this house, and through the morning services gave his heart to God." As for the world of commerce, there are business men up and down the land who look up to him with a regard which is almost filial.

In personal habits, whether seen at St. Paul's Churchyard or at his home in Russell Square, Sir George is simple and unaffected. In religious opinions, though himself a Churchman, with a son in holy orders, he has always shown an unaffected interest in all sound evangelistic enterprise. The City Mission knows him as the warmest of friends; the Bible Society finds in him an advocate who believes heartily in the power of the press, and most of all when the book is the Bible; Nonconformist missionary agencies bring him to their platform. But whilst "ready to every good work" he remains, in a sense that is almost unique, a friend of young men.

Mr. Quintin Hogg was still unborn when the presence of George Williams was first felt in St. Paul's Churchyard. A public-school boy, reared at home in the midst of the strongest religious convictions, with the prospect of enjoying the amplest means, he early formed the resolution to live for others. He left Eton in 1863, and, as a young man of eighteen, very soon began to work for the neglected boys of London. The origin of the institution housed under the roof of the old Polytechnic in Regent Street may be found in a gathering of shoeblacks, mudlarks, and others in the Adelphi arches. The evolution was gradual. It is traced from those arches through some very unattractive premises in York Place, Strand, and a more attractive home in Long Acre, to the Polytechnic itself; or, to describe the development in another way, from a Ragged School to an Institute so comprehensive as to defy description in a sentence. For thirty years Mr. Quintin Hogg has given himself to this task; and yet he is still in middle-life. The Regent Street Polytechnic is a monument of which any man might be proud; but a better one is found in the lives of the 100,000 young men who have been more or less influenced by his means.

It is not my purpose to describe the Polytechnic, its manifold attractions for young people, its spiritual agencies, its very complete educational work, its social side, and its recreative or athletic side. The facts are more or less well known, and the Polytechnic has been freely taken as the model for like institutions all over the country. My purpose is to deal with the personality which, as in the case of the Y.M.C.A., has fostered and guided the growth of so great an organisation. It is impossible to think at all of the Polytechnic without thinking of Mr. Quintin Hogg; the union is everywhere too close. He lives in Cavendish Square: but the window of his library looks out on to the back of the Polytechnic, and from the adjoining room, in which his secretary works, he can step at once into an outlying classroom, which, if in reality a part of his own house, is used for Polytechnic classes of his own. He often begins the day with young men. Breakfasting with Mr. Quintin Hogg one morning, he told me that he had just returned from a bicycle ride with some of the members. He knows them by name, and believes in personal intercourse as the only way of understanding and working such an institution. That belief is not in him a theory, it is an experience. He goes amongst the members at their classes and their recreations; he takes parties with him to Brighton; he has camped out with them; he has gone abroad with them. To them he is not so much a philanthropist of princely munificence as a personal friend of wonderful charm.

Some critics may possibly venture a guess that the "personal influence" policy, whilst most delightful in theory, must in practice prove unworkable. They hazard the conjecture that it must end in anarchy. The issue hangs, no doubt, upon the character of the "person"; but in Mr. Quintin Hogg's case the policy is completely successful. It was so in the old days of the original Ragged School, when his own presence would instantly quell a tumult that suggested immediate disruption. It is so now; only the tumults never arise. They have, to use his own words, "no chucker-out" at the Polytechnic; nor have they ever had to expel a member for disorder, insubordination, or rowdiness in any form. So far from anarchy resulting, the system has succeeded beyond all expectation in fusing together the various classes resorting to the Polytechnic. The son of well-to-do parents will stand at his lathe in the engineering school next door to the son of the poor man. It is good training for both, but not many can bring this about.

One thing, however, may be taken for granted. The personal influence of Mr. Quintin Hogg and his helpers would never have wrought what it has save for one fact—it is penetrated with the spirit of Christ. The intense love for his fellow-men which members see in the founder of the Polytechnic is born of a love for God. That is why the educational and the recreative work of the Polytechnic has never thrust religious work into the background. The Christian influence is true and all-pervading. Mr. Hogg's own Bible-class is such a sight as few clergy are ever allowed to see in connection with their own work. The services taken by Dr. Lunn have such congregations as would satisfy the most exacting incumbent. That the results are widespread and lasting no one who has examined the facts can venture for a moment to doubt. There are some who, having seen Polytechnic members appearing by the score at an athletic meeting, have wondered whether the gymnasium, the cinder-path, the cricket and football field, and the rowing-club have not hindered spiritual enterprise. Mr. Quintin Hogg emphatically says that it is not so. Upon what may be called the social side of all such work he lays the strongest possible stress. It is in supposing that this social side can be left to take care of itself that he believes the greatest peril of the new Polytechnics lies.

Experience has already shown that this forecast is true; but, alas! the Church of Christ does not give us a George Williams or a Quintin Hogg at every step of the way, and good intentions are not in themselves a sufficient qualification for work so exacting though so happy. To them the nation owes one debt of gratitude, and the Christian Church another. For, apart from the primary influences of the great enterprises they have fathered, there are others scarcely less valuable. In an age of exaggerated self-seeking, the cynic finds it easy to write up the dispraise of faith. But lives such as these in turn laugh the cynic to scorn. Their motive and their power are of God. To the angel each might say, with Abou Ben Adhem, "Write me as one who loves his fellow-men;" for the motto of their lives must have been the too little followed warning of St. John:—

"This commandment have we from Him, That he who loveth God love his brother also."

PART IV.—THE LIGHT REVEALED.

CHAPTER X.

X MIGHT have gone on hugging Mona for a century and not have remembered how I came to be there, only she, having more presence of mind, must have dispelled all thoughts that I had dropped from above or come alone.

"How did you get here?" she asked. I told her as well as I could, mentioning no names. Leaving Miss Stayne to prepare a couch and other necessities, Mona called a servant—a clean middle-aged person—to accompany us to the beach. Amélie carried an old door, to serve as a stretcher. Mona had cushions and blankets.

"Mona," I said, as an embarrassing possibility dawned on me, "don't tell this girl—or anyone else—who you are."

"Why not?" she asked.

"I will tell you afterwards," I gasped, as we hurried along. "But promise."

"Very well," she agreed. "I promise."

Lucine Darrel was still unconscious when we reached her. It was each minute growing a more difficult task for Mr. Warwick to hold her from the deepening water.

As she lay on the improvised stretcher she looked fearfully pale. Her fair hair hung in heavy masses: her eyes were closed. I felt strangely like another person—an outsider watching myself: it was all so weird, so dream-like.

Lucine's leg was broken. There was a severe cut on her white forehead, and a red stream had mingled with her golden tresses and flowed to the pillow on which her head lay.

"Amélie must fetch the doctor," Mona said. Lucine Darrel lay on her bed, and she was bathing the gash.

"There is Mr. Warwick," I said.

"We haven't a change of clothing for him," Miss Stayne announced. "He must go to bed until his own are dry."

"I will fetch the others," I said. "Mona, you must tell Miss Stayne not to say anything to anyone about our relationship. And I will tell aunty."

When I found the rest of our party and had heard

"You are so good, . . . I wish you would kiss me."—p. 889.

Mrs. Frith's bemoanings, Mr. Darrel's growls, and aunty's anxious exclamations, and we were on the way back to the cottage, I drew aunty aside.

"Aunty dear," I began nervously, "I have discovered someone." She looked at me curiously.

"A long time since we lost someone—we have been wearied with longing for her ever since. We shall weary no more—she is here."

She hung heavily on my arm.

"Nora, this is not one of your jokes?"

"Mona is here," I answered simply.

She spoke no word for several minutes. Then I told her of our plan to say nothing of our knowing her. She agreed as to its expediency.

But when we arrived at the cottage, the first thing she did was to faint right off—a not inconvenient mode of concealing her feelings.

But it became evident that something must be done with old Mr. Darrel and Mrs. Frith: there was also Mr. Warwick to dispose of. Whilst the doctor was setting Lucine's broken limb I racked my brain for some means of persuading them to return.

They were seeking to diminish the inconvenience of the unfortunate accident in a truly English fashion—in other words, they were having a cup of tea somewhere. The doctor had speedily found out who was of the most use to him, and was being assisted by Mona. Miss Stayne also remained in the room.

I resolved on my plan. When the operation was over I sought Mona.

"Mona," I asked her quietly, "can you bear to hear some startling news?"

"Yes." She crimsoned all over her lovely face, and then paled to an almost deathly whiteness. My poor darling! she had not forgotten.

"The girl who lies in that room—the girl to whom you have been attending so carefully—is she who brought you here," I said, in a quick utterance.

"What do you mean, Nora?" she asked, surprised.

"It is Lucine Darrel," I replied. I shall never forget her wild startled eyes as she realised what I meant. I explained to her in a few words how it was we were together. She rested her head on the frame of the window, and looked out into the fair skies and across the earth's loveliness with the sign of a great struggle in her deep dark eyes. She was not quite perfect enough to caress the serpent which had stung her without pausing to shudder as she recalled the sharpness of the sting.

"Her leg is badly fractured," Mona said at length, in clear tones. "Her head is severely bruised. The doctor says she is not to be moved. He says she is in danger. Nora, she will stay here."

"You are an angel!" I cried, with hot tears in my eyes.

"I am not," she said slowly. "But for his sake—oh! I am no angel—I cannot even do an ordinary act of charity—nay, courtesy—without feeling a motive."

I remember Lucine once saying that motiveless kindness existed nowhere on earth. Was her cynical view of human nature wholly wrong?

The next day we were alone—that is, aunty and I stayed behind, and Mr. Darrel, Mrs. Frith, and Mr. Warwick returned to St. Helier. They took a great deal of persuading—especially the last-named, who wanted to find apartments at St. Edyns or sleep in a coal-shed—but the end was all I cared for: they went.

"I shall come over every day to see if I can assist you in any way," Mr. Warwick said before he went.

"I hope you won't," I thought. "And if you bring the other two, I shall annihilate you."

It was a strange, miserable, happy time that followed. There was Mona once more—strong, gentle, and sympathetic (as aunty had remarked).

There was the safe peaceful feeling of having her once more to lean on and confide in. There was a sweet happiness in trying to atone for all the love she had missed in the months of her absence and for that mighty love she had cast aside.

Then there was the anxiety of watching by Lucine's bed of pain—days and nights so long and weary, when her life seemed to hang on a thread as frail as one of her own golden hairs. The bruise on her head had caused concussion, and the pain of her broken limb added to the agony. During weeks of unconsciousness, more or less, with short lucid intervals, Mona nursed this girl as carefully as if she were a loved and loving friend.

She told us all the circumstances which led to her being at St. Edyn's. She had arranged to meet Miss Stayne in London, and they had stayed there for a few days. Miss Stayne had been to Jersey with the family she had lately left, and was quite enthusiastic over its charms. So Mona decided to go to the little island for a visit.

Once there, it seemed useless to leave it. So long as she was away from the temptation she longed to withstand, it mattered little where she was. They had seen an agent at St. Helier, and he had given them a list of houses to choose from. This one was fixed upon on account of the beauty of the surroundings; its seclusion and repose.

It was then already partly furnished, and it was altered by Mona to add to its comfort. When I consoled with her on spending the winter alone and in such an out-of-the-way spot, she laughed.

"I made everything very comfortable," she said, in the old way of turning her disadvantages to a jest. "Of course," she added, "I missed you, dear. If I had dared to send for you we might have been quite happy here."

It was almost ludicrous to notice aunty's concern for Mona. She followed her about with anxious eyes; she made her consume an alarming quantity of fresh eggs and drink quarts of new milk. She even went to the length of compounding some dish herself (which attempt at cookery was a distinct failure) out of eggs and milk for Mona's consumption. I believe it did resemble custard, but it was a piteous mockery of anything with a name. I am afraid aunty's knowledge of the culinary art had lain too long dormant to be aroused with any success.

Mr. Warwick came over to see us on most days. I could not imagine why he stayed so long in Jersey. Mr. Darrel was ill at the hotel, and Mrs. Frith was kept there in attendance on him. In my heart I felt a wicked desire that he should not inconveniently hurry to recover. For I saw that it would be long before Miss Darrel could be removed with safety. In one of her lucid minutes she asked where she was.

"You are in a cottage at St. Edyn's, near where your accident happened," Mona explained.

"But you: you are no cottage-girl," she said, in a feeble voice. "You are a lady, and no cottager."

Mona hesitated for a minute.

"I am not a native of this place," she said.

"I am only living here for a time."

Lucine wandered a great deal in her delirious ravings. She spoke of her past life—she alluded several times to the gaming saloon in the Rue St. Honoré.

"Mon père, play no more to-night. You will lose—we shall be ruined. No, I will not ask St. Alvers to come here. If he sells his soul, it shall not be at my bidding—I will not." Then would follow long ramblings in French, much of which I did not understand. One day I went and bent over her, and asked her if she knew me.

"Vous," she said in low tones, which rose as she proceeded; "you are watching him, you guard him, but I will have him yet, Clifford Callan. Love him! why should I love him? I hate him! But he has wealth and an honourable name—I lack both. But I am no silly Anglaise—"

Then her speech was drowned in long moans. I could imagine how more than painful it must have been for Mona to listen to these ravings. To hear the name of him for whom her love was still a living flame issuing from those unconscious lips must have been the very exquisiteness of misery. For absence had not stifled her memory—time could not weaken her love.

We sent for Sarah from St. Helier. That sensible person only remarked—"Well I never!" when she beheld Miss Stayne, and "Blez thy pretty face!" when she saw Mona. As usual, she was silent: that is, with regard to our business. For she had not been in the house an hour before I heard mysterious shouting in the kitchen, and discovered Sarah and Amélie quarrelling like Turk and Jew.

The one anathematised the other as a "furriner" and "chattering upstart." The other railed in the particular branch of the French language extant in the Channel Islands against Sarah, and called down all the departed saints, hermits, and martyrs to bring confusion on her devoted head.

"Whatever is the matter?" I questioned.

"T'ould idiot!" Sarah cried. "En doan't know a respectable person from a snarlin' ould 'ooman like herself."

"Then I wrote a long letter to—Mr. Callan."—p. 893.

"What is it all about?" It was "all about" the preparation of some invalid recipe, and I left them still quarrelling, and neither of them understanding the other.

The days formed weeks, and capricious tear-stained April was weeping and smiling itself away, weaving from its tears a flowery crown for Queen May, and preparing garlands of hawthorn and roses for her bride-like head. Lucine's danger was over, but she lay weak and helpless, with her blue eyes following Mona's every movement, and learning to love the sweetness which was all to her comfort.

"You are so good," she said one day, in her low tones. "I wish you would—kiss me."

When Mona raised her head her eyes were dewy with emotion.

"I know you not," Lucine went on. "But I know your goodness—it is greater than that of anyone I know or have ever known."

"You forget me!" I cried, laughing, hoping to give the conversation a lighter turn.

"You are good, but quite different. This one," indicating Mona, "is heroic; I feel it."

"Indeed I am not," Mona declared, walking to the window. "But, Nora," in changed tones, "come here. There is something wrong."

There was. In the middle of the lawn stood Amélie. A little way off was Sarah, with a long broom.

"They are fighting!" I ejaculated, in great delight. "No, we aren't," Sarah cried from below. "But en cums nigh me I'll limb en."

"I'll go down," I said.

"Sarah, do give me that broom," I urged, when I stood on the lawn. "What is it now?"

Before she had time to reply the gate opened and Mr. Warwick came in. Sarah retired rather quietly from the field of glory.

"They are always at daggers drawn," I laughed, explaining matters.

"You should give them some Dr. Watts," he advised.

"One would take no notice and the other would not understand. It might lead from bad to worse."

"If you can leave the 'birds in their little nest,'" he said, "will you come down to the sea?"

"Oh yes," I said. The staunch old ocean, shimmering in the gleam of sunshine, was rushing between the rocks with hoarse roars of triumph. It gloried in its eternal existence, mocking time, as having no scythe sharp enough to cut it off.

"I have something to say to you," the man at my side began. "May I say it?"

"Freedom of speech is perfectly legal," I replied lightly, ignoring his seriousness.

"Don't jest," he said. "Nora, I have learned to love you."

"Bad taste," I thought. But I said nothing. I was at a loss.

"You have mistaken your feelings," I said, after a pause.

"I wish I had," bitterly. I looked around. To run away would be so undignified. Tears—well, I really could not produce any.

"I like you immensely," I assured him. "I value your friendship. But I could never—love you."

"Not in time?" eagerly.

"Not in a million centuries," I asserted, thinking it as well to let him know at once.

"You are candid."

"I like you too well to be otherwise. If I liked you less I would turn away without a word."

"Then it's all up," he said hopelessly.

"Believe me, I am doing what I believe to be right. I am doing as my heart and conscience bid me."

"You have little need for the latter," he said.

"You are so true and good that its services must be seldom required."

After that distinctly mistaken compliment I subsided into silence, wondering if, after all, I might be a little better than I thought I was.

"I am going back to Stanton," he told me, as we walked to the cottage. "After that I shall trouble you no more."

"Oh! you haven't troubled me," I assured him, in doubtful solace.

"I believe you," he said bitterly.

"Good-bye," he said, as we reached the gate. And we bade each other adieu—for ever. A year afterwards he was killed in a Hindustani revolt, while fighting for his country. Some kind friend sent me, at his request, a lock of his fair hair and his dying love—which gifts I value as I value few others.

"Where is Mr. Warwick?" Mona enquired, as I went in alone.

"Oh! gone," I replied, with such supernatural indifference that she smiled. "He has spoilt himself by proposing to me," I added, rather crossly.

"Well, 'need a body froon?'" she asked, with another smile. "He is young, good-looking, agreeable, and—rich."

"I fail to appreciate the combination of virtues."

"That means—you appreciate them in someone else," she returned. "Has anyone else ever disgraced himself so utterly to you as poor Mr. Warwick?"

"Yes, one has. I am disgusted with men. But this last did not deceive me. He is the better one."

"Shall I fetch him back?"

"Mona, don't be foolish. Of course not!" I exclaimed pettishly.

"We don't always like 'the better one,'" was the very peculiar statement she made as she left me.

CHAPTER XI.

WITH the favourable influence of the June-tide warmth and brightness, Lucine's convalescence was free from relapse or drawback. Extreme weakness rendered her unable to do anything but lie and listen to Mona's soft cooing accents as she read to her, or sometimes conversed.

"I love to hear you speak," Miss Darrel said to her one day; "there is something so soothingly monotonous in your tone. It appeals to me and rests me."

As soon as Lucine was pronounced out of danger Mr. Darrel had taken himself off to London. He said urgent business called him away; and Mrs. Frith went too, at Lucine's bidding. Mrs. Frith was too weak to resist Miss Darrel's will—in fact, she acted on everyone's advice but her own.

When our invalid was well enough to come downstairs and lounge outside in a great easy-chair, aunt would sit and gaze at her as if she were some peculiar species of animated dynamite cartridge, and might "go off" at any minute. Poor girl! she looked quite harmless now—thin and pale as she had grown.

So far as being thin goes, I felt quite guilty when I perceived my own unreduced plumpness. For Mona was like a Maypole, Lucine emaciated and worn, and Miss Stayne had got to a stage of fleshlessness when the next step suggested that she might "rattle" when she walked.

"It's of no use trying to pose as a love-lorn maiden," I thought one day, as I viewed myself in the largest glass the cottage boasted—about twelve inches square—"with all this tiresome embonpoint taking the sentiment out of it all."

I had not strength of mind to live on dry toast and water for three months, so I tried to persuade myself that "becoming plumpness" was not a grievance, as Miss Stayne said.

"Nora," Lucine said one day to me, "you always call this girl by her Christian name—this beautiful Anglaise. Would she consider it out of place if I did so?"

"Of course not," I affirmed.

"One day," she continued, "I heard her address Mrs. Venner as 'Auntie.' It is curious."

"It is," I said idiotically.

"I would not pry into their affairs—I owe them too much already," she said, with a new-born delicacy even in the broad hint.

"Can you keep a secret?" I asked.

"Can I not?" with a bitter laugh.

"Then I will tell you. It will do you good. Mona is my cousin. A year ago she left home to avoid a man who loves her, and whom she loves. The day we came here I found her."

"It is like a tale!" she exclaimed. "Truly, it is miraculous!"

Ah! it was a marvellous hand which had brought us all together there.

"But why leave him," she asked, "if she loves and is loved?"

"To save his oath—to leave him free to marry the girl he is betrothed to."

"Ah! she is a saint."

"She gave up everything," I went on. "She, for the sake of a woman who scorned her, gave up love and happiness."

Lucine sighed. "And she has bestowed on me care unlimited. She is so truly noble, and I—ah! the contrast. It is horrible. If I could undo the guilty past and live again, I would live differently."

"It is not too late," I said, going over to her side. "Lucine, you can always amend your life, if you will. Oh! if you have been hard or cruel, give up your harshness. Think of that girl who has renounced all, and count mercy and honour before self."

She looked at me wonderingly.

"Why, Nora, who could have thought you could speak like that? You might know—Bah! impossible!"

I trembled with fear and hope.

"Ah!" she resumed, "I have been hard and cruel. That is nothing. But I have been wicked, vile, and worthy of no regard. I have lied and helped a dying man to lie, and so to go from the world to work out his misery beyond the grave. And it was all to ruin a man's peace—it will spoil his life."

My mind was whirling. What could she mean?

"I should like to tell you, for you are a good child." Her tones were alternately excited and dragging wearily. "But you are so sweet and fresh—unsullied by the world. Why should I tell you a tale like mine?"

"Perhaps it might ease you," I suggested, fearing to lose it.

"That cousin of yours—she is a saint. All the blackness of earth might wash at her feet and leave them without stain. Oh that I were as good, as soilless! But all this is only shocking to your ears—you, who know no falsehood and treachery."

I had told a few—just a few—little white lies at different periods; but I let that pass. I had also on my conscience several small deceptions I had practised, but I resolved never to slip again. For if this was what it brought one to—why, it was not worth doing.

"Tell me anything which will relieve your mind," I said, knowing how grief lightens itself when shared.

She hesitated, and then continued. The birds were singing contentedly. The scent of summer rested on the warm air. How can sin and shame have a place in so fair a world?

"It was like this," she said: "I was young—fresh from the convent; and I suppose my wickedness had lain that long time dormant. But my father, he led me, and I did not withstand. All that led to my falsehood I need not tell. I saw him, St. Alvers, at Florence first, and mon père says that I must wed him. But he did not advance himself to me in the least—mariage de convenance was not in his disposition to contract.

"We waited and waited. He hung round us, as you English say, and my father became poorer still. At last we took an apartment in the Rue St. Honoré, in that city of hell—Paris. Ah! fair, smiling, merry Paris! Dead Sea fruit are its pleasures to so many. St. Alvers had nothing to do—he was rich. He was as well to be there as elsewhere. I know my father borrowed money from him—it was his gold which paved that ruinous road, the salon of ours. I will not tell of the miserable men who came there and gambled away the food from their children's mouths. One night a man more desperate than any before lost heavily. He turned to my father, and the room rang with curses. I went in and stood amongst the excited men, and tried to calm them. 'What is the matter?' I was saying to a man at a table, when a shot rang out through the room. My father was the injured one.

"I can scarcely speak of the wretched time that followed. Mon père, he said I should be left to my uncle's mercy when he was gone. And then he unfolded to me his devilish scheme. 'I knew old St. Alvers,' he said; 'can nothing be made of that?' Well, there was a poor Anglaise who lived with us as servant—her name was Miriam Stone. She is called now Frith, and she was weak and foolish. I forced her to be our accomplice. I threatened her with all horrors if ever she betrayed us. This was our plan: Miriam took down in her writing a statement to say to St. Alvers that his father had sent to mon père once when he thought himself to be dying abroad. It said he was too ill to write himself, but he dictated it to another who was attending on him. It was addressed to his old friend Darrel.

"It said in its wicked lines that the dictateur could not die with an unconfessed sin—that he must tell it at last. He left it to his old friend's mercy to disclose or withhold the knowledge of the crime he would confess. It read something like this: 'I once sinned deeply, but I was driven to it. Darrel, I wronged the innocent. I have suffered a stained name to rest on those who deserve it not.'

"Well, we had said that mon père, who long before had been imprisoned for forging a cheque of an old consent to my arrangement. I am soon to be a dead man—to return to the dust from whence I came. Lucine is now but an orphan; marry her, and she burns this condemning evidence. You save the honour of your name.' But he would not consent—at first. I bore this humiliation in silence. I hated St. Alvers friend of both old Lord St. Alvers and my father, was innocent. We wrote as if St. Alvers (the old lord) was confessing all this. He said he had been the guilty one himself.

"'It is too late to draw back now, Nora,' Clifford said."—p. 895.

"We provided for everything. 'I had overstepped the allowance from my father,' the letter ran—'I was in need of money. I forged the cheque, and—double crime—I shifted the crime to the shoulders of an innocent man. My friend, you were imprisoned. It is years ago, but I cannot die with the wrong I did you on my soul.' Young St. Alvers was mad when he read this. 'My father,' he said—'whom I thought the soul of honour!' Then my father sat up in bed.

"'Guy,' he said, 'no one need know this if you will then, and for spite I would keep him in my power—under my foot. 'What was the amount of the cheque?' he asked. 'Two thousand pounds,' he was told. He sat down and wrote another cheque for three times that sum. 'There it is, with interest,' he said; 'and I will see that Miss Darrel never lacks anything.' But mon père, he was determined. He would publish this disgrace all the world over. England should jeer at the baseness of one of its most noble houses—robbery, and worse than that. He had let another suffer for himself, as his son was led to believe.

"At last he swore a solemn oath that only by my hand should his promise to marry me be broken. Then my father gave me the confession—the mock confession—to burn on the day I was made his wife. And I hated him so that I could not bring him to love me—I hated him so that I resolved to keep him to his unwilling bond. Since then he has been to me to ask for his bond to be broken, and I would not. And yet he told me he loved with his whole soul.

"I do not mind that," I said, "only, if you love her so well, be careful not to drag her name, as well as your own, in the dust. Forget her before we marry."

"And he went from me. Now, can you again watch me with your cousin, whose life is stainless?"

She ceased with a weary wail.

"Lucine," I said, in the silence that followed, "the one he loves is Mona."

"Mona!"

I took her hands.

"Now you can give her the reward of her mercy."

She sat up in her chair.

"Before Heaven I vow it!" she said; "she shall have all I can give her."

I went away and left her. Then I wrote a long letter to—Mr. Callan.

* * * * *

A week later, as I stood just in the road near the cottage, Miss Stayne came out and asked me to order some chickens for the next day's dinner. As I was setting out on the errand a trap drove up, and seeing a gentleman alight, I naturally stood to watch him. It was Mr. Callan. Instead of sending a message, he had come.

"I am so pleased to see you again, Nora," he said, as he greeted me.

"You are far too kind," I replied. "I hope you have not suffered any inconvenience in coming."

He smiled.

"Were you going for a walk?"

"Yes, I was. Will you not come in?"

"I will send my luggage in and come with you—if I may," he announced coolly.

"But you are tired," I began feebly.

"Not now," he assured me, and we went along the white road together.

I had so much to tell him—the narration took quite a long time. I could tell all my fears, and, above all, my hopes for Mona to him, knowing full well how ready his sympathy was.

"You do not look so well as you did—are you quite well?" he remarked.

"I think so. But am I thinner?" eagerly.

"Yes," he said reassuringly.

I sighed: I was sceptical.

"We will wire for Guy. A hint to the effect that Miss Talbot's arms are waiting will bring him here like—er—a shooting-star."

"What a dreadful simile!—he's nothing like a star," I retorted.

"It doesn't matter. Wings of love would do."

"Worse and worse," I returned, deeply disgusted. "Your mind is unhinged."

"It is—you are right," he answered; but I detest sickly sentimentality and languishing looks. I wished he would be sensible.

Miss Stayne, Aunt, and Mona were on the lawn when we returned.

"If there is a man within ten miles, Nora will scent him out," Mona cried, with a laugh—which remark was distinctly malicious.

"What a blessing! we shall have those chickens," Miss Stayne whispered to me. "Why, Nora, don't look so vacant—you have surely been to Mère Finette's! Child, have you?"

My silence was eloquent.

CHAPTER XII.

"NORA, I have an idea."

Mr. Callan was the speaker.

"Such a novelty deserves publicity"—cruelly.

"What is it?"

"You and I—in fact, we (delicious little pronoun!)—will go to meet St. Alvers."

"Perfectly brilliant! He is coming to-day?"

"Yes," was his reply. "What a general surprise it will be!—a sort of young Vesuvius in our midst."

"Do you mean that for anything clever? Shall I laugh or look wise?" I asked.

"The latter course is impossible. Nora, do you remember the night you left St. Alvers?"

"Quite well. We had a Charlotte Russe for dinner—favourite dish of mine."

"But after dinner?" he protested.

"Oh yes. I believe we had pine-apple; I forget what else—aunt might remember. Aunt"—in a loud voice—"can you recollect what we had for dessert the night before we came to Jersey?"

"My dear, no!" aunt replied. "Why do you ask?"

"Mr. Callan would like to know," in perfect solemnity.

"I assure you it's of no consequence, Mrs. Venner," Mr. Callan said, looking daggers at me.

"It was a strange thing to ask," I said, looking quite coolly at him.

"You little vixen!" he breathed softly.

"I dare not go to St. Helier with you if you use bad language."

"I think," Miss Stayne began, as if anyone wished to know her thoughts, "that Mr. Warwick should have written to us before now."

"Very kind and well-bred young man," aunt commented. "Nora, has he written to you?"

"Not yet," with a stolen glance at Mr. Callan.

"And so attentive as he was to you!" Miss Stayne continued. "Really, I thought—"

"What a pity you did not mention it to me!" I interrupted. "Something might have been done."

An hour later Mr. Callan and I were driving to St. Helier.

"Nora," he remarked, quite casually, "they all seem very fond of that—Worcester—Warwick."

"They do show a disgraceful fondness for young men."

"Did you like him?"

"Oh!"—with a long sigh—"I did."

"He came to see you often?"

"Every day. Once he missed a day, and I grew so thin—quite emaciated, in fact—that they all feared galloping consumption.”

“It’s no use a man throwing his love away on a heartless flirt,” Mr. Callan growled, whipping the horse.

“Not the least. If you are doing so, take my advice and draw up in time.”

“A man of my age ought to have more sense,” he savagely.

“Width and wisdom do not always grow together,” I returned, quite sweetly.

“Nora, are you heartless?”

“Well, no—I think not. I have a perfectly whole heart at present.”

“Did that man—suffer at your hands as I am doing?” he went on, getting dangerously earnest and rather disagreeable.

“Far worse,” I replied revengefully.

“Nora, will you listen to me?”

“I think I am doing—very patiently,” I replied, in a much aggrieved tone.

“And may I tell you again what I told you on the evening before you left St. Alvers,” he questioned, eagerly scanning my face.

“You need not trouble”—dead silence—“because,” I added slowly, “I can remember it quite well. I shall never forget it.”

“Do you mean—”

“Yes, I do mean that,” I returned; and then we ended by being ridiculously happy.

St. Alvers was at the hotel at St. Helier, having landed in the morning. Owing to the hint Mr. Callan had given him, he had acquired, as he foresaw, the speed attributed to anything which flies on Cupid’s wings. But we told him nothing.

Lucine was prepared for his coming, but she to whom he came was in ignorance of our plot.

“Nora, shall I see—her?” he asked me as we drove rapidly along the park-like way.

There was only one “her” in his world. I glanced at his dark eager eyes, and the desire to tell him “Yes” almost overcame me.

“Be patient,” I advised.

When we entered the garden Lucine Darrel and Mona sat together on the lawn. But St. Alvers had eyes which were blinded to all save one; he walked slowly to her.

Lucine broke the silence.

“Lord St. Alvers, it is you. Well, all explanations can now be given, and then you can—kick me out.”

He disregarded her pleasant suggestion.

“Mona!” he cried, half-incredulously; but she waved him back.

“Since you are here, it is to Miss Darrel you are come,” she said quietly.

“Indeed it is not, and she knows it!” he declared, with a supreme carelessness of Lucine’s feelings.

“Listen!” Lucine cried, imperiously. “I have a little tale—a romance—to tell you. You will find it highly interesting. If St. Alvers can take his eyes and mind from Mademoiselle Talbot for one minute, I will retire, after my story, and leave him to contemplate her face at his will.”

St. Alvers looked at Lucine in much the way he might have regarded a lion ready to spring at him.

Then she told in full the tale she had before told to me. When she finished there was no sound except the music of the summer, the rustle of leaves, the hum of insects. Away in the sky, a lark, winging its flight to realms between heaven and earth, was sending forth its throbbing melody to wondering man.

“Do you mean to say,” St. Alvers exclaimed, breaking the spell, “that you shamelessly avow yourself a criminal of the most despicable character?”

“Your unflinching accuracy is not at fault. Yet, stay. Shamelessly—no. Not for you—whom I despise—do I confess. She—who is ten thousand times too good for you—is the one who has won your freedom.—Nora, if you will give me your arm, I will go in.”

Mona stepped forward. “Wait,” she commanded. “Lucine, you have acknowledged your sin. It is almost equal to repentance. Before you go, tell us you repent.”

“I do. I repent because my conscience has given me no peace—because the fear of detection was ever on my mind. But as for all else—I am indeed hard—wicked.”

“No; you misjudge yourself,” Mona went on entreatingly. “Oh! commence now a life worth living, and strive for atonement—and peace.”

Lucine looked at her glorious eyes and imploring face.

“Some time,” she said slowly, “perhaps I may—may be at rest. But go. Be happy and forget me.”

“Never!” taking her hand. “We will forget and forgive all the past, but not forget you.”

And so Lucine was forgiven.

* * * * *

The Abbey—the dear old home once more. We sat again under the old beech, whose leaves were mellowing to brown and gold, and deserting their home at the invitation of every zephyr which sighs sadly past. As I thought that ere the branches were clothed again with green I should have left the old home for ever, I sighed with the winds.

“What is it, Nora?” Mona enquired.

“Oh! leaving it all seems so dreadful. Yours is not such a bad case as mine. I go to London, and you will be only at Castle St. Alvers.”

She flushed all over her lovely face as I alluded to her happy future.

“Mona, you must come for a minute,” called aunty’s voice; and Mona, with a distracted glance at me, went. Soon after, Guy came across the lawn.

“Where is she?”

“Aunty and Miss Stayne are both within.”

“You envious, malicious child!” he laughed. “Where is Mona?”

“Oh! you’ll soon have her altogether,” I said, smiling, “so give her a little peace now. You will probably attain a great age—so may she. If you have fifty years of three hundred and sixty-five days of each other you may be wearied.”

“Impossible! Eternity would be resolved into limited time, and fly as time flies, if she were by my side.”

“You are extravagant in your conversation. I must find Mona. She may reason you into common-sense," I said loftily.

Mona, listening, or pretending to listen, to aunty's discussion as to the relative merits of brown and blue for a travelling-dress, and with an expression of Cranmer at the stake in her sweet face, was shamelessly relieved to be freed.

"The wedding cannot take place unless Mona decides necessary arrangements," aunty declared, in a tone which was intended to dismay St. Alvers, but was a decided failure.

"We'll have it without arrangements," he announced calmly.

"If, Guy would not be for ever here—" I began inhospitably. But he reduced me to silence.

"You are jealous," he said, laughing.

"Of you?" I asked contemptuously. "I should not like a vehement creature like you to deal with."

He went across to Mona at the window.

"Come along outside, my darling," he said softly.

"I really ought to decide—"

"Rubbish! leave it to the others. I do not care one bit how you come to me. Only come, and I will be more than satisfied."

"As Nora says," Mona told him in low tones, "it will be for a long time."

"I pray that it may be, dear love—for ever."

Aunty and Miss Stayne had left the room. I felt that "two are company," and followed. In the hall there was a stir as of an arrival.

"Nora!"

And in another moment I was in his arms.

"That is not consistent with Nora's views, Clifford," said a deep voice at the back. "She says she does not like vehemence, and that married life is a failure, the time spent together being too long. So beware!"

"You are taking a mean and paltry revenge," I returned, laughing. "I was not speaking of myself."

"It's too late to draw back now, Nora," Clifford said, in a low voice.

"I do not wish to," I replied.

"Nora," Mona said to me that night, as we sat talking in her room, "I had a letter from Lucine Darrel to-day. I am sure her repentance is lasting and sincere. Now that her uncle is dead, she is going to live in some little village in Surrey with Mrs. Frith. I hope she will find true happiness at last."

And among Mona's wedding-gifts was a tiny diamond star. Only those nearest and dearest to her ever knew that this emblem, which she wears even now, is from a woman whose treachery nearly ruined her life.

But among the visitors who are proud to go to Castle St. Alvers, Miss Darrel is one of the most frequent and the most welcome.

THE END

AN UNFASHIONABLE SLUM IN LIVERPOOL.

RICHMOND FAIR.

BY ARTHUR G. SYMONDS, M.A.

ENTRANCE AND STAIRCASE,
RICHMOND FAIR.

RIGHT in the heart of the poorest and most populous district in Liverpool lies one of the quaintest relics of bygone days that may be seen in a long day's march. Round it streams the busy, noisy life of the crowded city. The streets and houses in the neighbourhood are all of the regulation modern type—dull, prosaic, monotonous, ugly, like the lives of most of their inhabitants.

In the worst slums of our great cities there is generally a something which redeems them from this characteristic. Their irregularity of construction, their dilapidation, their gloom, and that sense of the mystery of crime and sorrow which pervades them, lend some picturesqueness to their outward appearance. The courts and alleys are crooked and winding; the angles of the houses are broken and rounded; and the darkness of the shadows themselves suggests unseen possibilities which possess the attraction and the terror of the unknown. But these long straight lines of bricks and mortar, small-sashed windows, and narrow doors, which we call "houses"—all of one pattern, all of one size, all of one colour, distinguishable one from the other only by their numbers, like convicts in a prison yard—oppress the eye and the mind with a dreary sense of uniformity and sameness which is both physically painful and morally enervating. I have always had a strong sympathy with the man in one of Disraeli's earlier novels who expressed his detestation of "the agony of precise conceptions." Life to me would be unendurable without variety, for which I would always willingly sacrifice symmetry. If I could be made Ædile of Great Britain, and endowed with such plenipotentiary powers as were granted to Baron Haussmann in Paris during the late Empire, my first and chief work would be to break up these regular rows, and introduce colour, light, and variety into their dreary monotony.

To a man holding these views the pleasure afforded by such a spot as that which I am going to describe can well be understood.

Not far from Scotland Road—the great thoroughfare constructed in the early years of this century his horse's flanks, he rode over the hounds or headed the hare.

The old gateway of the Kennels, still bearing its emblem of two hounds and a horn, may yet be seen; but no other trace is left either of the kennels or of the archery ground which occupied an adjacent field. Here the "Mersey Bowmen" used to meet, in a garb not unlike that in which the Free Foresters of to-day disport themselves—a green coat with white lappels, and a cocked hat surmounted by a cockade of feathers—and practise the ancient art for which Englishmen were erst so famous, and which won for England the battles of Agincourt and Crécy against the prowess of the mailed chivalry of France.

RICHMOND FAIR.

to connect the northern with the southern parts of Liverpool—lies a street called Richmond Row. Formerly this was a country lane leading from Liverpool to the village of Everton. On one side of it was a lake or reservoir, through which a brook flowed; and in the adjacent field stood the Kennels in which the "Corporation Hounds" were kept, and from which the pack was brought out to hunt the hares which seem to have been then as plentiful in the district as they now are at Altcar, where the great coursing meetings are annually held. Thither rode the sober City merchants and the gay young sparks from Liverpool, the squires and the farmers from Everton and the adjacent villages, and the proud lords and ladies of Knowsley and Sefton; while occasionally some jolly tar, who was spending his holiday ashore, enlivened the hunt and vexed the huntsman's soul with his whooping and hallooing, as with pig-tail streaming in the wind and white-trousered legs stuck out wide from

It was somewhere about 1785 when buildings were first erected in this locality, and the rustic lanes and green fields began to be covered with houses; but for many years after that date it was still "a far cry" from the centre of Liverpool. All the more strange, therefore, was it that two brothers, Thomas and William Dobb, should select this place for the erection of a market for the sale of Yorkshire woollen goods. Perhaps their reason for so doing was that the merchants from Yorkshire travelled by this road into Liverpool, and thus their commodities would be intercepted before they reached the central city market. But whatever their reason may have been, we learn from the City Records that the venture was so successful that in 1788 a resolution was passed to the following effect:—"That the Records be searched, and a case be stated for the opinion of counsel, respecting the proper mode to be pursued to suppress the attempt now making to hold a market or fair for the purpose of vending different manufactures, at a place erected by Messrs. Dobb and others, near St. Anne's Church, called the Woollen Hall."*

From this it is evident that no small measure of success attended the scheme, in spite of the apparent unsuitability of the position of the market, so far away from the business centre of the town. Not only were markets and fairs held there periodically, but several permanent shops and "emporiums"—as they were then called—were established in the building for the sale of woollen goods and carpets. The prosperity of Richmond Woollen Hall, or Richmond Fair, as it was generally called—the latter being the only name by which it is now known—lasted for some years. But the exigencies of modern trade, which tends to concentration in a locality easily accessible by all engaged therein, gradually drew away the tenants, and the Yorkshire merchants rode past its doors and took their wares straight down to Liverpool, where their customers could find them most readily.

It was quite by chance that I lighted upon this interesting place as the subject for this paper. My artist friend, Mr. Fitton, and I had been wandering about Liverpool in search of an "unfashionable slum," and under the guidance of a resident friend, who knows the city well, we had visited many localities which are both unfashionable and "slummy," without finding one that we thought either sufficiently interesting or sufficiently picturesque for our purpose. Before starting on our peregrination we had consulted other residents, and on our way we interrogated several intelligent postmen and obliging policemen; but not one of them suggested or even named Richmond Fair. Since our visit I have spoken to many Liverpool people about it, and have found only one—a leading Corporation official—who even knows of its existence. In his "Memorials of Liverpool" Mr. Picton gives a short historical sketch of the place, from which I have borrowed some details; and in the passage in which he compares it to "a dilapidated Eastern caravanserai or one of the Russian bazaars" he shows that he fully appreciated its weird charm.

As we walked along Richmond Row, we noticed a low archway leading by a narrow passage into an open court. Into this we turned, and presently found ourselves in a large open area, of about 1,200 square yards, in the shape of a carpenter's "straight-edge," like this 7. All around this area is a building of two storeys in height, except at one end, where there are three storeys; and both on the ground floor and on the first floor covered wooden galleries, opening into the area, run continuously; that on the upper floor being supported by wooden pillars and protected by wooden railings. The building is divided into a number of small chambers or tenements, mostly single, but some few, especially at the higher end, consisting of two or even three rooms. Access to the upper storey is gained by a winding staircase let into the side of the archway through which we entered, and there is another similar entrance and stairway at one of the further angles of the area. Against the walls, at irregular intervals, are large wooden chests, which probably served originally as shelves and counters for the goods of the woollen merchants at the fairs. The wood-work is all of rough, unpainted timber, grey with age and exposure, and polished in parts by the friction of the arms and backs of the inhabitants, who seem to spend a good deal of their time leaning against it. Over the railings, and on ropes stretching across the area in different directions, hang garments of many shapes and hues, telling plainly of the occupation of the washerwomen, who live here in considerable numbers. The area is unpaved, and is lighted at night by a single gas-lamp standing near the centre.

Robinson Crusoe was not more astonished when he saw the print of a naked foot on the shore of his desert island than we were when this picturesque scene met our eyes. "Eureka!" said I, appropriately expressing my pleasure in classical language. "It will do fine!" rejoined my companion, with an artist's enthusiasm. And we both set to work at once to extract all the artistic beauty and the human interest that we could get out of the place.

Pulling out his sketch-book and pencil, Mr. Fitton leant against one of the wooden chests I have mentioned, and proceeded to make a drawing of the area; while I went to interview some of the inhabitants. Seeing an open door on the ground floor, and a tidy-looking woman inside the room, I entered into conversation with her, and soon learnt not only her own personal and family history, but that of many of her neighbours. She was the widow of an ex-official of the Corporation, who had been engaged in the scavenging department, and since his death many years ago, and that of her only son, who had been a sailor and was drowned at sea, she had supported herself by going out "cleaning." The single room she occupied was clean and tidy, and comfortably though very humbly furnished; while the prints pinned on the walls, and the photographs of her late husband and son placed over the fireplace on either side of a memorial card of the former, in which she evidently took a melancholy pride, showed that she was one of the better class of tenants.

From her I gathered that the inmates of Richmond Fair are as a rule quiet, respectable people. Many of the men, she told me, are employed by the Corporation in various capacities, and while we were talking I noticed a policeman coming off duty enter one of the tenements on the opposite side of the area. Of the women who work for their living several are laundresses; some are charwomen, like herself; and a few are hawkers of flowers and fruit. One girl she pointed out to me earns a livelihood by hawking sham jewellery and trinkets, and though this young lady had a somewhat jauntily and even saucy look, my informant said she was "a good girl," and very kind to the old mother whom she supported out of her earnings. Not quite so satisfactory was the character she gave of the orange-girl who appears in the initial sketch, and who deliberately posed herself with conscious vanity against the outer wall when she saw Mr. Fitton making his drawing of the archway. She was, however, evidently a favourite in the neighbourhood; for the crowd which gathered round us on the opposite side of the street addressed her in affectionate language, exhorting her to "smile and look pleasant," and encouraging her by assurances that "He's got you!" "He won't be so long!" and "It's a real good 'un!" (meaning the likeness) when she appeared tired. So interested were they that they strongly resented the attempts of two policemen to make us all "move on" because we were causing an obstruction; and one of the bystanders came up to me and whispered behind his hand, in a confidential tone, the numbers of the two officers, evidently expecting that I should report them for their officious interference.

demanding the shilling she had sent him to borrow. Dexterously slipping under her arm, he dodged behind me, and from the safe distance of two or three yards on the other side, he bluntly told her of the refusal of her request, which she took far more good-humouredly than I had expected. Then turning to me, she asked me if my friend's name was "Benson"; "because," said she,

A COSY CORNER FOR GOSSIP.

While I was conversing with the old charwoman my attention was attracted by a noise and hubbub in that part of the area where my friend was sketching; and just at that moment up ran a ragged little urchin, saying that he had been sent by Mrs. Wiggins to ask my good dame to lend her a shilling. The request was promptly and firmly refused, and anticipating that the result might prove physically painful to the little chap, I walked back with him to the scene of the noise. There I found my friend surrounded by a crowd of little urchins of both sexes, while on either side of him stood two sturdy old dames, vociferating loudly, and threatening the children with dire pains and penalties if they went on "bothering the jintleman." These threats were greeted with loud cries of contempt and challenge; but the crowd rapidly dispersed in all directions when one of the old women rushed forward with outstretched fist. On seeing us she raised a shrill cry of "Jo-ee," and clutched at the boy at my side,

"he favvers a nevy o' mine o' that name; and he's in the same line of business, too: leastways, my nevy, he's a painter and a decorator, he is." On my politely disclaiming for Mr. Fitton the compliment she had paid him, she explained that their anxiety and vigorous efforts to protect him from "them childer" had made her and her friend very thirsty, and perhaps I would not mind lending her the shilling which Joey had failed to borrow. As the sketch was finished, and we were anxious to pursue our investigations unmolested, I consented to oblige her, while we secured immunity from the children by entrusting a small coin to Joey to be laid out in the purchase and distribution of sweets.

These he bought at the shop—the one and only shop in the Fair—to which we were escorted by the whole regiment of youngsters. It stands on the ground floor in one corner of the area, and consists of a single room like most of the other tenements, but adapted by very simple arrangements for its commercial purposes. An old orange-box covered with paper serves for cupboard and shelves, and a table drawn diagonally across the doorway inside the room acts as counter. In one corner stands the tenant's bed, in another her round table and chair. Bottles of "pop" and of sweets seemed to constitute the chief part of her stock-in-trade, but she told us that she sold many other things as well. She greeted us very cordially, and with a quiet dignity invited us to come inside the counter and sit down till she had served Joey. "If I had known you were coming," she said, "I would have made the place more tidy; but you're welcome to draw what you like, and to come again if you can't finish now." During the day, she told us, she goes out "cleaning," and only opens her shop in the afternoon and evening; and though most of her customers are "very poor folk," they pay very honestly for what they buy, and she seldom makes a bad debt. Her opinion of the tenants generally was a favourable one, though she admitted that a few on the upper storey are occasionally inclined to be noisy, which is very trying to those below them, and disturbs their sleep. The landlady, however, who has the letting of the tenements, makes very particular inquiries into the characters and antecedents of all applicants, with the result that most of the tenants are respectable people, whose tenure usually lasts as long as they can pay their rents.

After we had finished with the shop, we went up-stairs and walked round the upper gallery, stopping by the way for a sketch and a talk with two women who were leaning over the railings. They had been washing clothes, and had just finished hanging them on a line that crossed the corner of the area. They were evidently honest, hard-working women, and afforded a strong and pleasant contrast to a heavy-faced, sodden-looking man, who came slouching up, with his hands in his pockets and a short black pipe in his mouth, and tried to join in our conversation. Not wishing to lose the pleasant impressions we had so far gained of the Fair and its inmates, we cut short his complaints about the hard times and the difficulty of getting work by giving him a small douceur, which I was ashamed of myself for giving him, and proceeded to the opposite angle of the gallery.

Here we found a veritable "cosy corner." In one doorway sat a nice cheery-looking very old man, contentedly sucking at a pipe held with difficulty between his toothless gums. Leaning against the railing hard by were two women, one middle-aged, the other young, with their sleeves and skirts tucked up, evidently come out for a breath of fresh air from the room opposite, where a washing-tub was steaming. The younger woman, as we came up, put down a pail which she had filled with fresh water from the tap in the gallery, in order to "have just a look" at a tiny baby—her own, we guessed at once—which was sleeping quietly on the lap of an old woman seated on a stool in the next doorway. From the roof overhead hung a large wicker cage, in which a thrush hopped restlessly from perch to perch. It was a picture full of human interest and charm, and at the same time of a beauty which appealed irresistibly to my friend's artistic instincts, and made him pull out his sketch-book at once. A difficulty, however, presented itself in the refusal of the old woman to let herself be sketched. In reply to the entreaties of the young mother, who was evidently proud to have her first baby drawn, the grandmother expressed profound contempt for "folk as let 'emselves be made pictures of," so that he—nodding her old head towards the artist—could "put 'em in shop winders and make fools of 'em, or else put 'em in the Porkypine [the Liverpool Punch] for other folk to laugh at and poke fun at 'em." However, at last she was persuaded to give my friend a sitting, and we were much amused to see her straighten her white cap and smooth its strings under her chin and generally prune herself for the ordeal. While Mr. Fitton was busy with his pencil, I kept the old lady in good humour by listening to a detailed account of her family history, which began with her own childhood some seventy years ago, and ended with a minute description of the parentage, birth, and ailments of the babe on her knee—her daughter's first baby, the very proximity of which to her old bosom seemed to awaken memories of her own childhood, wifehood, and motherhood that had long lain dormant there.

The shadows of evening were closing round us, and lights glimmered feebly from the windows of one dark little tenement after another, when the sketch was finished. Through the dusky galleries walked weary men and women who had "gone forth to their labour until the evening," and were now returning to home and rest. Older children joined the younger ones in play in the area below, and mothers' voices were heard calling the little ones to come in to tea and to bed. The thrush over our heads piped its vesper hymn—the same sweet God-taught hymn that thousands of its free and happy fellows were piping at the same hour in leafy woods far away. As the babe stirred on her knee, the old grandam crooned to it in quavering voice a soft lullaby, with which perhaps she herself had been soothed to sleep by her own mother when she was a little baby seventy odd years ago.

The tramp of the tired feet in the galleries, the voices of the children at play, the thrush's sweet carol, the old grandmother's crooning lullaby, the happy housewife's song, mingled in pleasant harmony, through which, like a sad undertone,

"The hum of the busy city
Came up to my ears from afar,
Like the sound of the murmuring ocean
As it dashes across the bar."

FAITH AMID THE UNKNOWN.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A.

"But if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up."—DANIEL iii. 18.

UT if not"! These three short words—almost as short as they can be—are easily said with the lip, but hard indeed are they to be said from the heart. The man who can say them as Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego said them is a great man in the Kingdom of God. When one thinks of the poverty of one's faith—of how little we, passing on from the faith which says "God is able to deliver us: God deliver us," can go on to say, "But if not"—alas! we are ashamed even to take these words into our lips; still here they are, and here for our instruction; and now let us contemplate them with great humility, and pray God that they may have an effect upon our spiritual life.

These three grand words, involving more than we can express—involving everything to these three men—come from a deep source: they are an outcrop of character; they are a culmination of spiritual attainment; and we are let into the secret of how they are able to be spoken from something else which was said a few moments before: "O Nebuchadnezzar, we are not careful to answer thee in this matter."

With us, then, would probably be the clouded brow, the anxious deliberation, the halting speech, even if, by any means, we have been able to say that "If not" at the last. But the moment Nebuchadnezzar's threat was uttered, these three men answered it out of minds already made up—yea, rather, out of a fixed condition of mind, which required no making up at all. To hesitate is—oh, how often!—to be lost; but there is no place for hesitation here. The threat of Nebuchadnezzar was hardly out of his lips before the answer to it was ready: "We are not careful to answer thee in this matter. Even if our God does not choose to deliver us when we know He can, we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up. The God who appears to desert us we will cleave to still, and if He leave us to our fate, we will not, at the cost of displeasing and denying our God, who will not help us, desert His service or deny our faith."

Now see what, on a little consideration, comes out of these three wonderful words.

And to see this, first return for a moment to what I have already incidentally mentioned.

The determination of these three men not to obey the king in whose hands was their life and death is the outcome of a principle which to them is law. Obedience to a human Sovereign commanding sin was pitted against obedience to a Divine Sovereign forbidding it; and the determination to obey God and not man, no circumstance—the most desperate, the most inexplicable, the most trying to faith—could even for the moment shake.

I want you to dwell for an instant on these three words as presenting the inexplicable to the minds of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego. It would be utterly inexplicable why God should desert them. To them there could be no reason for this; they were brought face to face with a terrible possibility—anyhow, with a dreadful supposition; and upon that supposition they had instantly to make up their minds. And now, what was their mind? that even should God act as they expected Him to do, as they knew He could do, then amid the darkness—and shall I say the disappointment?—the bewilderment of this apparent desertion, they would still hold on to Him in the revelation which He had already given to them of Himself as their God. They would do their part to Him, and leave it to Him, even amid this thick darkness, to do His part (how, they knew not, but how He would) to them. "But if not" (ah! how much is to be understood, as quickly following these words in their minds), they would do the right, and leave all else to Him.

Now, brethren, with what humility and shame must we put our mind and our experience by the side of theirs. We, too, expect God to act in such and such a way—we have great faith about it—about His power and His will; but can we hold on to Him, if He will not honour our faith in the way we expect: if, instead, there be presented to us only the dark and the unknown (but God in it, nevertheless)? Can we trust God Himself apart from His actings: that was what Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego did—they were prepared to hold on to Him in the old given revelation of Himself, and to rest in what He was, and not in how He would act.

In this case God did act as Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego believed He would, but they were prepared even for His not doing so. And give us grace to have a like mind, for there are passes in the spiritual life—ay, and in the temporal life too—when He will not act as we expect; and after the "if not" will be darkness to us—only a darkness in which we must believe there will be God, and God for us.

Then let us do our part to Him, leaving it to Him to do His part to us. Our concern is with ourselves. Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego concerned themselves only about themselves: what God would do they left to Him.

There was no speculation about God's action at all; there were no grounds on which speculation could be founded. If God does not interfere for them in the visible way of which they knew, they do not know how He could interfere or what He would do. One thing only they knew: that their duty was clear; there was light upon that, though there was not upon anything else. These three confessors were ready to do their duty, casting themselves wholly, ignorantly, upon God. They could not see even one step before them. The terrors of the unknown are almost, if not entirely, the worst which can come upon us. The stopping short of those words "But if not," where they do stop, shows us that these terrors were before those confessors of their God. They were sure of Him amid the unknown.

Brethren, it is comparatively easy to cast ourselves upon God when we can see what His course of action will be—when we can see what is the exact amount of sacrifice that is involved; but that is a very different thing from having to do with the measureless unknown. There is such a thing as Consecrated Ignorance. You see it in part in Abraham when he went forth not knowing whither he went; you see it in Job when he said, "Though He slay me, yet will I trust Him"; you see it in Paul going up to Jerusalem, though he knew not what should befall him; and it may be seen now and again in some (often the poorest) of God's saints; but oh! how few can say—

"Peace, perfect peace—the future all unknown, Jesus we know, and He is on the throne."

"Consecrated Ignorance!" with its grand fearlessness of consequences: it will carry a man through anything; for consecrated ignorance is the sublimest faith.

And there was far more in this declared ignorance of those confessors than at first sight appears. They had just spoken of what they knew and believed; they knew that God could deliver them, they believed that He would; but their ignorance, consecrated and hallowed by faith, lifted them higher than any present development of that knowledge and that faith—when they said those words, "But if not," they out-topped both their knowledge and their faith.

Oh! it is a grand thing to soar away beyond our own faith—simply to be with God, whether He is in darkness or in light, and whether we be blinded by that darkness or that light. This is almost too high for us: we cannot attain to it; but these three men had attained to it, and it comes out in these words: "But if not." Let us try, brethren, in our measure, to do this when we are troubled amid life's manifold trials, and amid the trials of the soul, too. Perhaps we also, like these three men of God, have great faith, but it is not equal to the strain on it of the unknown. Oh, that we might be able to pass beyond our faith to our God!—in the unknown my unknown is with God; and in God, and not in my faith, must be my peace.

The three confessors knew that God would do the best. There might, for all they knew, be a better in their case than an escape from the burning fiery furnace, and by these words, "But if not," they left that to Him. The "We are not careful" held good not only as regards Nebuchadnezzar, but also as regards God.

"Can there be anything better than what I have lost, or that which I cannot get?" is only too often the speech of our faithless hearts. There may be a better, but it is known only to God.

The one concern of the three confessors was with the revealed, and that they had in God's law—they should bow down to and worship no other god but Him. Their countrymen were exiles in Babylon for this very thing: because they had bowed down to idols. Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego did not go beyond the revealed, or want any other influence to operate on them but that—they apparently did not give the furnace a thought. Let the worst come to the worst, they would obey God, and God alone.

And now, brethren, let me gather up very shortly the substance of what has been said into some plain and daily life practical teachings for ourselves.

We have unquestionably brought before us in these three little words such high truth in the Divine life that but few of us can attain to it—many, perhaps, cannot even understand it; but there it is, and to be able to go into it even a little will greatly lift us up. But the height of this teaching lends itself to every man who in common life wishes to avail himself of it.

These words can help you in your thoughts—the habit of thought out of which action comes.

Standing, as it were, by the side of the burning fiery furnace, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego preach to us to-day, and say: "Trust when you cannot explain—trust when you cannot see—trust when circumstances are desperate, provided it be indeed in God you trust. We do it; try and do it too. Leave God to work out His goodness to you how He will. It may come to you through great loss, even as it would have done to us, had He pleased that our flesh should have been shrivelled and our bones calcined in the fire. When you are put into circumstances in which you can neither know nor see, be content not to do either—your one, and only, and all-sufficient comfort and security being that you are in His hands.

"Go behind things; go behind circumstances, be they good or bad; and leave yourselves with God, who is behind them all.

"Suppose the worst comes to the worst, do what God orders, if you have a clear revelation of His will. Leave the consequences of carrying it out with Him.

"To escape loss and hurt even by His protection might not be the highest gain; behind this may be richer, though at present unknown, higher gain."

And who carried out all these things to the full but the Great Confessor and Martyr too—the Captain of our salvation—Jesus Christ Himself? How can I end this Old Testament teaching without glorifying Him—the Great Teacher of the New? He worked out the great “But if not” to the bitter—or shall I not say to the glorious?—end. He uttered it in Gethsemane when He said: “Not My will, but Thine, be done.” He acted it when He said, “Father, into Thy hands I commend My spirit,” and gave up the ghost. He left it all with His Father, and the great “But if not” was carried out. The worst had come to the worst with Him indeed.

From the furnace of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego—from the cross of Christ—from the Old Testament and the New—there comes the one testimony of unlimited obedience—unlimited trust. God help us poor creatures to learn from them both. Our whole life might be changed, ennobled, almost glorified, if the spirit of Christ be in us, in obedience and faith committing all to God—the spirit of the three confessors, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, who said these three memorable words: “BUT IF NOT.”

FRIENDS.

"They had a merry meal."—p. 906.

THEY were an oddly matched pair of friends—this dainty little lady who knelt upon the cushioned window-seat of her nursery, and the ragged shock-headed boy who turned catherine-wheels for her benefit on the pavement outside. Nobody would have thought they had anything in common—not even the Professor, whose big hollow-set eyes saw more than most people's; but when his little daughter confided this new interest to him, he saw it at once, and quite shared her pleasure.

"You see, Dad, it was like this," the little maid explained: "I was looking out of the window, an' pretending it was six o'clock instead of only four, an' that you were coming round the corner very soon. Then the boy came, an' we looked solemn at each other, an' solemn, until we both cared."

The Professor quite understood. He knew that upon a sudden exchange of smiles a friendship could be built up, and so why not upon the bond of melancholy between two lonely children?

"He was all alone, my pet, of course?"

"Of course," echoed Clemency, feeling that Dad always understood. "I wanted to see you very badly, and he wanted something very badly too, only I don't know what it was. An' then he tumbled over in that funny way, an' he looked at me, an' I laughed. Every day when he goes by now he tumbles, an' that's how it is."

"Ex—actly," said the Professor thoughtfully. "It is always pleasant, isn't it, dear, when the first gift comes from the one who has least to give? You must find out something about him."

"I will," said the child promptly, replying to that part of his sentence of which she grasped the meaning. "I will talk to him to-morrow, out of the window."

This would not be difficult, for as there was no one in the big house besides Clemency and the Professor—there were also the servants, of course, but, except nurse, they all lived either at the very top or else at the very bottom, and so they need not be counted—the nursery was what would have been the drawing-room in any other home, and was only a little above the road.

So next day when the boy came into sight, Clemency opened the window, and pushed aside the clustering daffodils which grew in the green box on the sill.

"Boy," she called softly, "can you hear me?"

The boy nodded.

"I am very much obliged to you, boy, for being funny. I am a bit lonesome sometimes—that is what my nurse says, 'a bit lonesome'—an' it's nice of you to make me laugh. What is your name?"

"Dick."

"Where do you live?"

"Up at Granny's: Smith's Court."

"Are you ever lonesome, Dick?"

The boy stared dumbly at the yellow head surrounded by the yellower daffodils, and at the big serious eyes. Then he glanced down at his own rags, through which the skin gleamed whitely, and up to the gloriously shining sun overhead. Yes, he had never put it into words before, but he supposed he was lonesome.

"Whiles," he said laconically.

"Will you come and have tea with me to-morrow?"

"Eh?" cried the boy, with another mighty stare.

"In the house? Me with you?"

"Why, yes," returned Clemency: "that is what I mean. Come to-morrow at five, Dick, an' we'll have plum cake."

Here she closed their talk abruptly by shutting the window, and Dick departed in a wonderful state of amazement and delight.

He was a little Norfolk lad, and had only been in London for half a year, so instead of bursting out with a full account of his invitation to the first acquaintance he met, he held his tongue wisely, as Norfolk folk do; and on reaching his home, he sat down to ponder how he could best fit himself for so unusual an event.

The result of his meditations was that as a distant clock tolled the hour of five upon the following day, it was a very shining and clean little person who knocked humbly at the area door, and one whose shirt, in spite of various slits, was as immaculately white as that of any visitor who boldly mounted the front steps.

"The young lady: she told me to come," he faltered.

The maid smiled encouragingly.

"Yer t' come this way," she answered in pure cockney, and led him into the presence of a very grand gentleman indeed, Dick thought.

In point of fact, he was much better dressed than the Professor, and did not do half so much work. He was the butler.

This functionary explained at some length that it was not with his approval that Dick was there at all. He didn't hold with such mixing of gentlefolks' children with brats from the streets, but he supposed it was all right. He had been sent to spend an hour in Smith's Court last night, finding out who "Granny" was, and could not lodge any objection against the hard-working charwoman, of whom her neighbours spoke with respect. Neither could he find a trace of fever or illness of any kind, so again he supposed it was all right. Dick wasn't to dare sit down in Miss Clemency's presence; he wasn't to stay long, nor expect to come again; and he wasn't to handle anything. Also he wasn't to tell her about himself in the hope of getting money.

Thus the butler, who, just because he was a butler by nature as well as by trade, could not read the honesty in the frank blue eyes, nor realise that there are noblemen in rags as well as in broadcloth.

The effect upon Dick was depressing in the extreme. He wished he had not come; and when at last he was taken up to the nursery, he felt horribly shy and uncomfortable, and was red to the roots of his hair.

But no one could long be shy with Clemency.

"Thank you, Griffiths. An' please ask nurse for tea at once," she said to the butler, and then held out her hand to Dick with the dearest little smile imaginable.

Dick gaped with wonder. He had never heard a child give an order in his life, had never been in so large a room, nor touched such a piece of daintiness as its small owner. He stood before her as erect as a ramrod, and quite a head and shoulders taller than this white-robed fairy, and told himself that the warning had been quite unnecessary, for never, never could he summon courage to sit in her presence. Yet the next minute there they were, the pair of them, tucked up cosily, feet and all, on the broad window-seat, Clemency's soft fingers still lying in his strong horny young hand.

"Tell about yourself, please," she began, in clear crisp tones; and in the low sing-song drawl of his native county, Dick obediently "told."

It was a commonplace little history: a four-roomed labourer's cottage for the first eleven years of his motherless life, and there helping to earn his own living, with but brief spells of schooling, at the multifarious odd jobs which spring ready to the hand of a country child; then tramping to London with father when times grew bad and man after man was dismissed his work; father's death, and the staying on with granny.

"She is proper good to me, she is," reiterated Dick gratefully, "for I am naught to her. I got to earn a shillin' a-day, and for that she lets me bide, an' feeds me."

"Is it hard?" questioned Clemency, in an awe-struck whisper.

She was hanging on his words, which sounded to her those of a fairy tale. How lovely it must be to tramp the country like that, and have no German and French governesses to tease an idle brain! She wondered if she could persuade Dad to let her lead a life like Dick's.

"No, 'tisn't hard," the boy said; and was in the midst of a detailed account of the errands he had run that day, the babies he had "minded," and the horses he had held, when nurse brought in the tea-tray, and called to both children to come to the table.

It was fortunate for Dick that Clemency, who had a good memory for names, instantly remarked that he knew Cossey, for nurse had a cousin whose friend's sister had once lived there, and so she liked the boy at once, which was a silly reason when she might easily have found a better, but no sillier than one-half the reasons for knowing people which sway far cleverer women than nurse.

So they had a merry meal, and when it was over Clemency "told" in her turn, and related how she did lessons all the mornings with Fräulein or with Ma'm'selle, and played in the afternoons in the dull Bloomsbury Square, the gate of which fronted the house, and how she gave Dad his breakfast and half his dinner, but only half, for in the middle of it she went to bed.

"Is it hard?" Dick asked. He did not mean to mimic her, but such a life compared to his own struck him as terrible.

Clemency shook her head.

"It is lonesome," she said. "I told you so."

The two children looked at each other. The same longing, tempered in the boy's case by a humility which amounted to reverence, shone in the eyes of both. It was Clemency who put it into words.

"We will be friends," she said solemnly. "We'll put each other into our prayers, an' have secrets. An' we'll be sorry for each other when people are nasty."

"Yes, miss."

There was so much Dick wanted to say, that his throat seemed to close at those two words.

"An' you 'll come again soon?"

"Yes, miss."

"Nurse wants you to go now. Good-bye, dear Dick,"

"Good-bye, miss, and thank you kindly."

It seemed strangely fortunate to Clemency that a few days after she first took to chattering about her friend, Dad suddenly bethought him that the household urgently needed a boot-boy. He had a long talk with Dick upon his own account, and subsequently begged the disgusted Griffiths to get the boy some suitable clothes, with such a cheerful confidence in his willingness to assist, that the butler was forced to take the newcomer under his especial charge.

"Master is that simple, he might be a babby in long-closes; and I don't 'old with such doings," he grumbled below stairs. "But when he sez, 'Griffiths, I'm sure your own kind 'eart will indooce you to 'elp this 'ere poor waif,' wot's a man to do?"

What, indeed? So, against his will, Mr. Griffiths began to be interested in the boot-boy, and though he bullied him a little, he would not let anybody else do so; and he even endured patiently when messages came from Miss Clemency that she wanted Dick in the nursery.

Truth to tell, his patience in this particular was taxed tolerably often, for as the Professor had taken the boy into his house to oblige his little daughter, he felt that after that it would be absurd to put a limit to their intercourse. So at least twice a week, and sometimes oftener, the friends saw each other, and had grand talks.

"You have two governesses, you see, darling, so we will try a tutor as well," the Professor explained to Clemency. "He will teach you quite as much as they."

"Out of books, Dad, in lesson way?" Clemency enquired, with big wondering eyes.

"No; out of human nature—God's way," the Professor answered slowly; and though he was never at home to overhear these same talks, he knew they prospered, and that Clemency learnt apace.

What it meant to go hungry: how some people handed coppers, and some threw them at you, and which sort you liked better: and how the whole earth, when one's father was a farm-hand, seemed to sing "Cake and milk, cake and milk," during the harvesting: but how the winter's wind moaned always "Bread and water."

All this she learned, and more besides, and she taught in return, though the teachings were very often without words at all. For she let Dick hold her best doll, Lady Rosabella; she ran to greet him at the nursery door with a smiling face; and she never let him go without a little sigh, which meant "I'm sorry."

This was veritably an education for Dick, for it taught him that somebody loved him, and, as the Professor would say, that, too, is "God's way."

So the weeks grew into months, and September came, and with it Clemency's birthday.

Everyone in the house gave her presents, and the aunts in Northumberland—"birthdayaunts," Clemency called them, because she never heard of them at any other time—sent her some as well; so she had twenty in all, which nurse said was eleven too many for a little girl of nine.

Dick gave her a rag doll, and this she liked so much that she took it to bed with her, and played with it for two whole afternoons. Then she sickened suddenly. Dick, who had counted on going up to her as usual, was kept below, and a great hush fell upon the house. Doctors came and went, until, like a blow they had been trying to ward off, the nameless horror became a surety, and fell upon the saddened hearts of those who loved her: scarlet fever.

Dick never forgot the day when the cause was traced, and he was sent for to the Professor's study. The rag doll which had been given him on the birthday itself, when he had run home to see granny: the rag doll which had been rescued by the charwoman from a heap of condemned playthings which had belonged to a little fever-stricken child: the rag doll, the medium of ignorance, carelessness, and love, was the means of Miss Clemency's illness.

"Will she die, sir?" Dick asked the question with chattering teeth.

"They think so," said the Professor drearily. "But you mustn't blame yourself, my lad. It was a pitiable mistake, an accident. You could not tell."

Not blame himself? Dick crept away. His brain whirled, and his heart beat painfully. Not blame himself? "She is my friend," he said huskily, "and I have killed her!"

The other servants found vent for their sorrow in leading him a hard life.

"If it hadn't been for you, our Miss Clemency u'd been well," quoth the cook reproachfully; and the rest followed her lead.

But Dick scarcely heeded them. The beautiful little life, wrapped round with every luxury and charm which love and wealth could devise, the life on which such high ambitions and fond hopes had been set, was failing fast. Dick understood this but dimly. All he realised was that his little friend was going away, and the remorse which was shaking him culminated in a cry, which sprang from the very bottom of his heart: "God, take me instead!"

As time passed on—was it days or weeks? Dick

Clemency's bedroom, and it may have been some undefined feeling that he would like to get as near her as he could.

It was late twilight, and darkness was coming on apace, but he steered his way past table and chair, and knelt down upon the rug where the children had often stood together.

did not know—this idea possessed him. He was so densely ignorant as barely to be able to sign his own name, and the sum of his Christian knowledge was very much on a par with his general education; but still, he knew the great outlines, and the awful tragedy of the voluntary death of the Christ was a very real thing to him.

"Greater love hath no man than this: that a man lay down his life for his friends."

Little Clemency learnt a text every Sunday morning, which, with infinite pains, she taught to Dick during the week, and this had been the latest.

"For his friend," Dick had been crouching down in the back kitchen, forlorn and forgotten, but with the sudden remembrance of the words he lifted his head, a new-born joy illumining his pallid face. It was more than a hope: it was the ecstasy of faith. He would save Miss Clemency, for the power to do so was given to the one who loved her most. "For Christ's sake," he added humbly, as if the unspoken thought had been a prayer, and then he crept from his hiding-place, and ran lightly up-stairs.

Probably he could not have said why he went straight to the Professor's study. It faced little "Dick gave her a rag doll."—p. 906.

"For his friend," said Dick again; and with that, he started his petition.

It was a strange prayer. How he loved her, and how good she had been to him; how he had harmed her, and she was dying; and how he begged he might die instead!

"I ain't pretty, like her, but I'm strong," sobbed Dick. "Whatever you want her for in heaven, oh, God! I'll do it as well, for I am rarely strong. Let me lay down my life for my friend, like He did. Let me die. Kill me right away, oh, God! an' let the master keep Miss Clemency instead."

Strung to the utmost of his powers, he staggered to his feet, and flung his little lean arms above his head.

"Kill me! kill me!" he cried wildly, and stood trembling at the silence.

Then a sob answered him, and strong arms encircled the swaying figure. For the moment it seemed to the bewildered boy that it was God Himself who had gripped him, but it was a familiar voice that stammered the blessed words: "She will live, my lad. She is better;" and he slowly realised that it was the Professor to whom he was clinging.

Is it not often so? Do we not often mistake the two? But a short half-hour before, the Professor had been trembling at the near approach of the angel of Death. Since then Dick had been imploring its dread presence. And now he, too, learned, as the Professor had learned before being arrested on the threshold of his study by the piercing quavering voice, that the name of that nearing angel was not Death, but Love. The crisis was over, and Clemency was to live.

"Go on believing, boy," said the Professor solemnly. "The God of unselfishness heard you. The doctors had given up all hope. It is very wonderful."

"Yes, sir," said Dick mechanically, as he closed the door after him; but in his heart he did not think it at all wonderful, for hadn't God promised to listen? And weren't he and Clemency friends?

"It is not at all wonderful," he repeated stoutly; and he was right.

GEHAZI: A STUDY.

BY THE VENERABLE ARCHDEACON G. R. WYNNE, D.D.

AMONG the less prominent characters of the Scriptures, not the least striking is the servant of Elisha, Gehazi. We meet with him first when Elisha commissioned him to find out what was the dearest desire of the Shunammite's heart, to whom Elisha wished to make some return for her large hospitality. Gehazi, evidently fairly skilled in knowledge of character, discharged the commission satisfactorily. Later on, we find him charged by Elisha to place the prophetic staff on the face of the Shunammite's dead child, and so to revive him by this symbolic act. The attempt unexpectedly failed. It is possible that the disappointment on this occasion may, for the first time, have led Elisha to suspect his servant's singleness of heart; though, doubtless, we all look on the test as one of tremendous severity. Hard as some may possibly find it to believe in the miracles of Elisha, we can scarcely conceive of a delegation of his powers. Time passed on, and a severer test was in store for Gehazi. This time it was not a test inflicted by the prophet's will, but by circumstances. The Syrian leper, Naaman, had just come, with his glittering retinue and his freely offered gifts, to the lonely tower where Elisha dwelt. The miracle had been done which was begged for at the suggestion of the little captive maid, herself one of the obscure characters I have referred to. Humbled, but healed, the Syrian general, like the eunuch of Queen Candace, was going on his way rejoicing, and full of resolution to own none but Israel's God, when out of the depth of Gehazi's heart sprang the thought that Naaman had been unnecessarily spared by the noble unselfishness of Elisha. Gehazi hastily resolved to take somewhat of him. He cannot have taken long to deliberate. He followed Naaman fast, and concocting a false story as he ran, imposed on his generosity, and obtained a handsome gift.

Brief was his enjoyment of his ill-gotten valuables. Swiftly, as on Adam and Eve, as on Ananias and Sapphira, the judgment of God fell upon him. The noble indignation of Elisha followed fast on his spiritual perception of the wrong that was done. The impression he had just made on Naaman of the pure disinterestedness of a prophet of God was marred by the covetousness of Gehazi. Naaman was regretfully turning in his mind the idea that, on second thoughts, this stern prophet was not quite unlike other men, as he had imagined. And, doubtless, while he gladly made his present, he was saying to himself that men are all alike: that no one in the world is proof against the offer of a fee. He little thought of the tragedy which was even then being enacted in the tower of Carmel. There Elisha, his eye terrible with holy indignation, was scathing the unmasked hypocrite with blazing words. "Is it a time," he cried, "to take gifts of material value, when God is seeking by my hand to impress the lesson of free grace?" And Gehazi bowed under the storm, and, now too late discovering how poor is the gain which is purchased at the price of honour, felt already the rising of the withering disease to his guilty face; and the next moment the curse had grasped him, and he went out from Elisha's presence a leper as white as snow.

There are plain lessons which every moralist must gather from the story—the exceeding shortness of the time during which ill-gotten gains may be enjoyed; the mournful sequence of sowing to the flesh, and of the flesh reaping corruption. These lessons he who runs may read. But there is another less obvious lesson which presents itself—that is, the strange power possessed by the human heart to resist holy influences; the power granted to us in inscrutable wisdom to turn a deaf ear and a blind eye to the words and example of the best men we know; above all, man's fatal power of refusing to yield his heart to the clearest evidence of the presence and the holiness of God. The Lord Himself, in a remarkable parable, puts into the mouth of Abraham the words, "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead." And the fourth Evangelist, in one of the most despairing sayings of the New Testament, tells us that "though Christ had done so many miracles before them, yet they believed not on Him."

In Gehazi's sin and dreadful doom we have an eloquent lesson for modern times, and for members of the Church of Christ in this land where the Gospel is so widely known. Gehazi had lived for years in contact with the deep personal piety and with the repeated miracles of Elisha. No one could possibly have had in those days more spiritual advantages. If the priestly office were corrupt, the prophetic light burnt clear. He was in daily fellowship with a man of complete devotion, in daily union with a self-sacrificing man of God—a teacher of righteousness, whose prayers he doubtless often heard and joined in, whose miracles he beheld, whose teaching he knew by heart. Nevertheless, he was capable of resisting it all. How clearly it demonstrates that contact with holy things can never make a man holy; that being a member of a Christian family is not enough to make a man a true Christian.

May we speculate a little on the probable past course of thought in this servant of the prophet? There had been a time when, as a young man of promise, bright with intelligence, open to impressions, perhaps attractive in person and active in physical powers, he had arrested the attention of Elisha. Then did the heart of each go out to the other. The youth was full of reverence for the grave and holy servant of God, whom God had so honoured by transferring to him the gifts of Elijah. And the older man would lean on the younger when active youthful energy was demanded, or quick intelligence was required. For some years all had gone well; but by degrees the absence of growth and advance in religious character, the necessary marks of its reality, must have made anxious the soul of the prophet. By that time he, too, should have been full of faith, possibly even a worker of miracles; and when, on the one occasion named, Elisha ventured to put this to the test, how disappointed he must have been! How is it that one so long associated with the service of God makes no progress in the life of godliness?

Meanwhile, unseen by Elisha, the heaven of the world was working in Gehazi's heart. It is impossible to believe that all at once, under the pressure of a single temptation, the whole evil work could have been wrought. He must have yielded long before in spirit to a restless discontent with his lot. The action of those few minutes in the glow of that summer afternoon was but the fruit of a long-continued growth of worldly and covetous desires, and of an increasing hardening of heart against thoughts of God's requirements.

Did Gehazi himself suspect what he was all this time becoming? How long did he consider himself religious? When did the truth first with a shiver present itself to his mind—"I am a hypocrite. The trust of my master I repay with a life of pretence, and I know it"? We cannot tell. But this we know, that for a long time one who is surrounded with religious things may fail to discover his own lack of religion. You are a member of a Christian family, and there is daily family prayer, and daily good example. You are a member of a church choir, of the staff of a Sunday school. You are perhaps a communicant of long standing. These outward links to Christian things may long leave you in ignorance that you are no real Christian. Your childhood's faith may have become feebler and feebler, till it is but like the outward skin of the fruit, all the substance of which is decayed.

But there is a testing-time in the life of every one of us. One day will dawn like every other for us, and before its close a trial of faith or virtue may have passed our way too severe for us to survive, if we had not the soul's real hold on the sacred hand of Christ. The sceptical novel which we lightly carried home from the circulating library will find a joint in our harness through which the dart of unbelief will pierce, if we are not guarded by God's own shield of faith. Conventional goodness, such as is nourished and expected by society, will stand to us up to a certain degree. But each of us has his weak point. In every life the testing hour arrives and the truth is revealed. Well if it be not in the horror of a deathbed conviction of falseness!

Is there any way by which one may try beforehand whether he is likely to succumb at the crisis? There is. You may try yourself by observing your behaviour under slight and secret temptations. If, now and then, in money matters you swerve just a little (when no one can test you) from the absolutely straight line of honour, you may justly fear that circumstances may arise which would lead to gross dishonesty. And so of other temptations. Do you yield a little, when a little pressed, in matters of truth, of justice, of purity? Then I say with all solemnity, suspect your danger in time, and throw yourself on Christ, as a sinner whom He is permitting thus to be gently warned by slight temptations. Give up any hope you may have that close connection with sacred things or good people will keep you always safe. Do not think, because you are trusted and looked up to by the good, that your heart's religion must be sound or they would not repose in you this confidence. Blessed is the man who suspects himself in time; and still more blessed he who, thus suspecting himself, gives up all the self-confidence based upon the past, on his association with sacred things and persons, on the good opinion of the religious world, and throws himself with absolute humility and self-surrender on the almighty arm of Christ—the ever-accessible Refuge of penitents, the ever-present Helper of the helpless.

THE GLEANER: A HARVEST TEXT.

"When ye reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not make clean riddance of the corners of thy field when thou reapest, neither shalt thou gather any gleanings of thy harvest: thou shalt leave them unto the poor, and to the stranger."—LEVITICUS xxiii. 22.

EARTHLY PARADISES.—III.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "HOW TO BE HAPPY THOUGH MARRIED," ETC. ETC.

IN the correspondence of Daniel O'Connell, lately published, we find letter after letter of the most exquisite tenderness addressed through thirty-three years (1802—1835) to his wife. Here is a specimen:—

"My own and only love, it was Kate [his daughter] wrote the letter I got this morning, and I do most tenderly, tenderly love Kate. Yet, sweetest Mary, I could have wished to see one line also in that handwriting which gives me recollections of the happiest hours of my life, and still blesses one with inexpressible sweetness and comfort when we, darling, are separate. All the romance of my life envelopes you, and I am as romantic in my love this day as I was twenty-three years ago, when you dropped your not unwilling hand into mine. Darling, will you smile at the love-letters of your old husband? Oh no—my Mary—my own Mary will remember that she has had the fond and faithful affections of my youth, and that if years have rolled over they have given us no cause to respect or love each other less than we did in early life."

The great agitator had hard fighting out-of-doors, but there was no agitation in his home. It was a Paradise of rest and peace.

William Cowper, the first earl of his line, was reclaimed from dissipation and a disreputable connection by an early marriage, which he contracted a year before his call to the bar. Having lived happily with his good wife for twenty years, he married, in 1706—the year after her death, which occurred just before his elevation to the Woolsack—the beautiful Mary Clavering, lady of the bed-chamber to the Princess of Wales. Her diary and their published letters show the loving terms on which they lived. Here is one entry in the diary:—"After dinner we went to Sir Godfrey Kneller's to see a picture of my lord, which he is drawing, and is the best that ever was done for him; it is for my drawing-room, and in the same posture that he watched me so many weeks in my great illness."

On the 22nd of August, 1620, Oliver Cromwell married Elizabeth Bouchier, daughter of a knight and wealthy London merchant. He was twenty-one years and four months old on his wedding-day. She was a quiet, affectionate, sensible woman. She may not have had much character, but her husband never ceased to love her, and thirty years after their marriage he writes to her (the day after Dunbar):—"Truly, if I love you not too well, I think I err not on the other hand much. Thou art dearer to me than any creature; let that suffice." And she writes to him:—"Truly, my life is but half a life in your absence." They had nine children. Robert, the eldest son, died in his eighteenth year. Nineteen years afterwards, fresh from his daughter's death-bed, almost on his own death-bed, the broken-hearted father recurred again to this his first great loss. He had read to him those verses in St. Paul's Epistle to the Philippians which end, "I can do all things through Christ, which strengtheneth me"; and then he said, "This Scripture did once save my life, when my eldest son died, which went as a dagger to my heart; indeed it did." For the thirty-eight years of his married life Cromwell was all that a loving husband and father could be: overflowing with affection, even on the battle-field and in the stress of affairs; indulgent, but not weak; considerate, provident, just, counselling, reproving, exhorting; yearning to lead his children to feel his own intense sense of God's presence.

A lady friend once ventured to ask General Gordon why he never married. For some seconds the general remained in silence, and then speaking slowly, answered, "I never yet have met a woman who, for my sake, and perhaps at a moment's notice, would be prepared to sacrifice the comforts of home and the sweet society of loved ones, and accompany me whithersoever the demand of duty might lead—accompany me to the ends of the earth, perhaps: who would stand by me in times of danger and difficulty, and sustain me in times of hardship and perplexity. Such a woman I have never met, and such an one alone could be my wife!" This ideal of what a soldier's wife should be was realised by the wife of Sir Henry Lawrence. Soon after his marriage he had to survey a dense jungle at the foot of the Nepaul Mountains. The dews and fogs were so heavy that no tent could keep them out. Fires had to be lighted constantly to keep off tigers and wild elephants. It was in such a tract that the assistant of Sir Henry Lawrence found Mrs. Lawrence. "She was seated on the bank of a nullah, her feet overhanging the den of some wild animal. While she, with a portfolio in her lap, was writing overland letters, her husband, at no great distance, was laying his theodolite. A woman of a highly gifted mind, as well as of a most cheerful disposition, she helped her husband in his reports and other literary compositions even when undergoing roughings like those described. While easily falling into her husband's ways of unbounded liberality and hospitality, she cared nothing herself for luxury. She would be quite content with a tent some ten feet square, a suspended shawl separating her bed-room and dressing-room from the hospitable breakfast-table. Even in accommodation like this the well-matched couple found an earthly Paradise. The luxury of helping her husband to do good was the only one for which Lady Lawrence cared. It was one day when Sir Henry was on leave for the benefit of his health, that these two, in happy communion, were reclining on the side of the Sunawar Mountain, opposite Kussowlee, when the thought which occurred to one was responded to by the other, and taken up by both, that they would erect a sanatorium for children of European soldiers on that very spot. The result is well known, and the noble institution, now under the direction of Government, bears his honoured name.

That the scarcely less celebrated Lord John Lawrence also enjoyed an earthly Paradise in his home may be seen from the following anecdote. His lordship was sitting in his drawing-room at Southgate, with his sister and others of the family; all were engaged in reading. Looking up from his book, in which he had been engrossed, he discovered that his wife had left the room.

"Where's mother?" said he to one of the daughters.

"She's up-stairs," replied the girl.

He returned to his book, and looking up again, a few minutes later, put the same question to his daughter, and received the same answer. Once more he returned to his reading; once more he looked up, with the same question on his lips. His sister broke in—

"Why, really, John, it would seem as if you could not get on five minutes without your wife."

"That's why I married her," he replied.

It was to this admirable woman that Lawrence whispered, with his dying breath, "To the last gasp, my darling!"

In his domestic relations Lord Clive was singularly happy. He married a lady of great beauty and accomplishments. To her constant care much of the comfort of his life was due. He might have called her "my conscience, my memory, and my common sense," if he had thought of this description which another great, but very different, man applied to his wife after thirty years of married life.

Love at first sight is easy enough; what a girl wants is a man who can love her when he sees her every day. This sort of man the wife of Garibaldi did find. The great liberator fell in love with his future wife at first sight, and, what is more, at sight of her only through a telescope. The story is told in his 'Autobiography': "I had need of some human being who would love me. Without such an one near me, existence was becoming insupportable. Although not old, I knew men well enough to know how difficult it is to find a real friend. But a woman! Yes, a woman; for I had always considered them the most perfect of beings; and whatever men may say, it is infinitely easier to find a really loving heart among them. I was walking on the quarter-deck of the Itaparica, wrapped in my sad thoughts, and having reasoned the matter in all ways, I finally concluded to seek a wife for myself, who would draw me out of this depressing and insupportable state of things. My glance fell by chance upon the houses of the Barra, a little hill thus called at the entrance of the Laguna (of St. Catherine, in Brazil), on which are some simple but picturesque dwellings. With the aid of my glass, which I habitually held in my hand when on the quarter-deck, I saw a young girl. I ordered the men to row me ashore in that direction, and disembarked, and made for the house which contained the object of my voyage, but could not find it, when I encountered a person of the place whom I had known on my first arrival. He invited me to take coffee at his house. We entered, and the first person on whom my gaze fell was the one who had caused my coming on shore. It was Anita, the mother of my children: the companion of my life in good and evil fortune: the woman whose courage I have so often desired! We both remained in an ecstatic silence, gazing at each other, like two persons who do not meet for the first time, and who seek in each other's lineaments something which shall revive remembrance. At last I saluted her, and I said, 'You must be mine!' I spoke but little Portuguese, and I spoke these audacious words in Italian. However, I seemed to have some magnetic power in my insolence. I had tied a knot which death alone could break."

Anita was the ideal wife for a soldier such as General Gordon spoke of in the words already quoted. She loved adventure as much as her husband, though it often exposed her to great danger. At the time of the birth of their first child, Garibaldi says:—

"The poverty of our army was at that time so great that I could contribute nothing for my dear wife and the baby but one pocket-handkerchief. . . Twelve days afterwards she had to fly from the enemy with her baby before her on the saddle."

"Out of the strong came forth sweetness." It is pleasant to see this illustrated in the domestic lives of many soldiers besides those who have been mentioned. The letters of the great American general, Stonewall Jackson, run over with affection. He addresses his wife as his "pet," his "darling," his "sunshine," and his "little somebody," as if he would wrap her in a veil of mystery.

In 1842, Count Von Moltke married Miss Burt, an English lady. He lived in an earthly Paradise with her until her death, which took place on Christmas Eve, 1868. Very touching was his devotion to her memory. Upon his estate at Kreisau he built a mausoleum, situated on an eminence, embowered in foliage. In front of the altar of this little chapel was placed the simple oak coffin, always covered with leaves, in which the remains of his wife reposed. Sculptured in the apse was a finely carved figure of our Lord in an attitude of blessing. Above were inscribed the words: "Love is the fulfilment of the law." At the time of the general's bereavement, Mr. George Bancroft, the distinguished historian, then United States Ambassador at Berlin, met, when riding, Moltke also on horseback.

"My first impulse," said Mr. Bancroft, "was to trot into another lane. On second thoughts, however, I turned my horse alongside his, remembering that it was for him to talk or be silent. To my surprise, he forthwith began a lively conversation, describing the happiness with which Miss Burt had blessed her husband, and expatiating upon her manifold virtues. Then of a sudden he grew silent, as if a new current of thought had carried him away. 'Do you know,' he said, when his lips were again opened, 'it has just been brought home to me that, after all, perhaps it was better that this happened now than at another time? You see, I am convinced that a French invasion is impending; it will burst upon us sooner or later, whatever the plea may eventually be. Now think, if the fortune of war was to be adverse to our arms! Why, her grief over the country's adversities must have cut her life short. No, no; that would have been worse!'"

The way Moltke enjoyed the companionship of his wife when alive, and the way he mourned for her when dead, recalls the words of another great man, but of a very different kind. When a certain Mr. Edwards asked Dr. Johnson if he had ever known what it was to have a wife, Johnson replied:—"Sir, I have known what it was to have a wife, and" (in a solemn, tender, faltering tone) "I have known what it was to lose a wife. I had almost broken my heart." Let us appreciate the earthly Paradise in which some of us are living before we know what it is to lose a good wife or a good husband.

"Though fools spurn Hymen's gentle powers,
They who improve his golden hours
By sweet experience know
That marriage, rightly understood,
Gives to the tender and the good
A Paradise below."

BOTH SIDES OF A STORY.

BY MARY E. BELLARS.

I.—MRS. PIERSON'S SIDE.

HAVE been a happy wife and mother now for many years, and sometimes, especially when I realise how tall Edgar is and what a pretty girl Madge has grown, I feel quite old—pleasantly old, you know, not uncomfortably so—for my husband is as devoted to me as ever he was, and declares (though that, surely, cannot be true) that I am better-looking now than I was in the days when he made love to me first. I know I am more companionable than I was then; for though I tried very hard to interest myself in Harry's business, his studies, and, indeed, in all his pursuits, I blush to think what a little goose I was, and how often he must have laughed in his sleeve at my truly awful remarks. I have learnt so many things since then, and we have gone through so much together—joy and sorrow, sunshine and storm—that it would be strange indeed if we did not know one another thoroughly, and if we had not a fund of memories in common which makes us the best of friends and comrades as well as husband and wife. There was one time, long ago, when I was supremely interested in myself, and when I made up my mind that I was going to leave Harry all alone, with a little wailing baby in his charge. I prepared my last words; I arranged for the disposal of all my trinkets; I knew exactly what kind of a wreath my poor darling would place upon my coffin. I pictured him pale and wild as the earth fell with a dull thud: I heard the solemn words, "Earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust." Harry would have to go home—only it would be home no longer—and he would shut himself up in his room, rest his dear head upon his hands, and he would sob—poor boy, how he would sob! I had never heard a man relieve his feelings after this particular fashion, but when I arrived at that point, I used to sob myself in sympathy with the broken-hearted widower. One day I confided my sorrows to my sister-in-law, who, by-the-bye, was not at all the conventional sister-in-law, always trying to make mischief between her brother and his wife, but a very kind, very jolly little woman, the mother of a large family, and quite a good genius, as far as I was concerned. She listened to me with great patience, but with an odd twinkle in her merry brown eyes. Then she said to me—

"Don't you think that probably Harry would marry again?"

"Marry again!" I gasped. This was quite a new idea to me. I had pictured him going mourning all his days.

"Yes," she replied. "Men are like that, you know; and it is of no use grumbling at their little peculiarities. As George Meredith's Mrs. Berry says, 'We must take 'em somethin' like Providence—as they come.' Besides, it would be the most sensible thing he could do if he cared for his child. A child wants sunshine, not mourning."

I thought all this frightfully unkind at first; but when I began to reflect, I found a germ of truth in it. It did not seem worth while to die, if I could help it. I felt this especially after I had implored Harry, in case of my untimely decease, to marry my dearest friend, Edith Heron. She was such a splendid girl, and we loved one another so much, that I felt I could bear to think of her as Harry's wife and my poor baby's mother. But, to my surprise, he did not receive my request in a kindly spirit. And no tears sprang into his eyes, his voice did not falter in the least, and he made no protestations of everlasting constancy. He turned rather red, and he said quite emphatically—

"Please God, my darling, you won't die at all—there is no reason why you should. But if I am ever called upon to bear the pain of losing you, Miss Heron is the very last person in the world that I should marry."

I was immensely surprised, because I knew he thought most highly of Edith—it was through

Edith I had first met him, and it pleased me to believe that she had given us to each other. However, thanks first to Mrs. Armitage and then to my husband, I pulled myself together, and began to think of living, not dying. My trouble rolled away like a cloud, and I was—oh! such a happy little mother. I could think of nothing and no one but baby Madge. What a darling she was—so rosy, so dimpled, with such delightful little fingers and toes, and such lovely eyes! When she smiled at me—her mother—my heart almost stood still with awe and joy. After a time, it dawned upon me that I was rather neglecting Harry in this new and absorbing interest. I did not ask now about his daily doings; I forgot to practise the songs he liked best, and I never opened the books he was reading. Indeed, I used to wonder how he could even wish to glance at his newspaper when baby was in presence, and I felt quite aggrieved if he started any other subject but that never-failing one of our child's perfections. I was horribly ashamed of myself when I realised all this, and though I found it a difficult task—baby was so very fascinating—I tried to reform at once. I had my reward. Of course, in time I gained insight and experience, and gave up making such outrageous blunders. I kept my eyes and ears open, and I asked intelligent questions, so that at last, Harry not only liked to tell me things, but even to discuss doubtful points with me. I can't tell anyone how proud I was when one day he took my advice on a very important matter. There were two ways open to him, and one was quite the ordinary method of proceeding, so that it did not occur to him to act differently from what he knew others would do in his place. It was quite a matter of course in business, but I, who had not been brought up to business, and had only my woman's notions of right and wrong, felt that it was not quite straight and fair. I told him so, and, do you know, he came round to my way of thinking! For Harry is like that. If you put a thing before him and he sees there is something in it, he reasons it out, and finally adopts it, if he considers it the right thing to do. Now, I jump to a conclusion at once, and no amount of talking makes me alter my opinion. Is that one difference, I wonder, between a man and a woman, or only between Harry and me? I am not clever enough to answer the question.

Well, as I was saying, I sometimes feel quite old. The darling baby, whose sweet little toes it seems to me that I was counting and admiring only the other day, is now a tall, slim maiden—much more of a woman than I was at her age, though it was then I first met her dear father. She is so pretty and so sweet, that she might take any man's fancy, yet I don't think Madge will marry for a long time yet. I suppose her day will come—I hope so. I have been so happy myself that I should like my child to have a husband and children of her own. But she seems quite satisfied with her old home and with her father and mother; and her studies take up so much of her time, that there is no leisure for lovers and love-making. I think girls are rather different now from what they were when I was young. I don't mean that they are less attractive, but they seem more able to stand alone, and to be much more critical. Boys are just the same as ever—dear, noisy, blundering, careless creatures! I should like boys much better than girls if it were not for Madge. But she was my first child, and she is still my only girl—I could not even seem to put Madge in a second place.

Edgar—great tall fellow—is at Rugby, and doing very well; Lance is on the Britannia; Harold and Will go to a school close at hand. They are all bonnie boys, as bright as a sunshiny morning, and all like their dear father. Their characters are simple; there are no mysteries, no concealments there.

Harry sighed and looked rather queer when I told him that one day, but I am sure I am right. Who can read her own children so well as a mother?

But here I am, as usual, chattering about Madge and the boys when I meant to tell you something quite different. They are on my brain, Harry always says; I know they are in my heart.

I want to go back years and years ago, to my old schoolfellow, Edith Heron. I was a little girl of ten and she was sixteen when we first met, but from the very beginning of our acquaintance she took me under her wing. It was such a soft, ample, sheltering wing, too, and I was such a timid little creature. My mother was dead. What a sad thing that is to say about a girl! It means so much—such a loss, not only of tender caresses and sympathetic understanding, but of wise restraining and controlling influences, the value of which we realise when we see a character forming without them. My father was a student, who lived for Science. But at Miss Sumner's school I was under the care of a good woman, who knew what my home was; and I see now what I owe to her judicious training. It was she who commended me to Edith's love, and who made me Edith's special charge. When my friend left school, she did not forget me. She was one of three sisters, all beautiful and all rich, and she lived with the eldest, Mrs. Arundel. It was a childless house—not like this, full of merry voices and the sound of swift young feet. Edith was practically the mistress of it, for her sister was a very elegant and, I am bound to say, a rather selfish invalid, who left her housekeeping duties to others, and who was only civil to the pleasant persons of her acquaintance. Anyone who was in the least difficult to entertain or who was ever so little of a bore made her ill, she said. She never came down until luncheon-time, and then she was very listless and quiet; but I have seen her extremely lively in the evening, with a group of her intimates around her. They were always clever, amusing people—generally men, but sometimes women—and they spared neither friend nor foe in their brilliant war of words. I liked to listen to them when I was allowed to do so, which was not very often; and it was marvellous how the languid invalid of the morning would distinguish herself in these witty encounters.

Mr. Arundel was very quiet, not to say dull. I cannot imagine what brought those two together. They used to treat one another with ceremonious politeness, but they seemed to have nothing in common. Harry teases me when I speculate upon such matters, and asks me if I really suppose that every marriage implies such love as ours was, is, and always will be. I am afraid not. But surely that is wrong. Marriage is such a close union: it means so much. It seems to me that only love can justify it. And Edith, who is so much cleverer than I, and who looks at life so differently from me, agrees with me in this at least.

She has never married, and I cannot help regretting it. What a helpmeet she would have made for a clever man! When I tell her this, she laughs, and says that most probably, if she had had a husband at all, it would have been a rather stupid person, who had no ideas beyond his business and his dinner. She says people generally mate with their opposites, and that clever men carefully avoid clever girls when they are in search of a wife. Did Harry choose me on those principles, I wonder? He says he did not choose me at all, but that I took possession of his heart at once.

But Edith would have made a perfect mother. Perhaps she takes her own line too decidedly to be an ideal wife, but anyone who has once been gathered into her tender arms—as I was when I thought Harry did not care for me, and I trembled to find what I felt for him—well, I know at least what Edith would have been to children who had the good-fortune to call her by that sweetest name in the world. Now, that is all wasted. It seems a shame and a sin.

And hers is such a lonely life. The Arundels are both dead; and besides, there is nothing like having a home of your very own. I know she is liked and admired wherever she goes, but I don't believe that satisfies any woman's heart. It takes a man's love and the kisses of little children to do that. Edith says I argue from my own point of view, but that as for her, she wants some measure of freedom and a wider sphere than the four walls of a home. Then I reply that to make a man's happiness, and to bring up his children to be good citizens and God-fearing people, is a wide enough sphere for anybody; and that as for freedom, what a woman really wants is to be bound by the will of the man she loves, not to go her own way. And she laughs, and tells me that all I say and all she feels convinces her more than ever that things are very wisely ordered—that, in fact,

"There is a Providence which shapes our ends, Rough-hew them how we will."

I confess I don't quite know what she means.

We do not see one another very often—my friend and I. It was a long time before she came to me at all after I was married, though we had been together so much, and though she was a friend of Harry's as well as mine. I don't know how it happened, but it was so. She went abroad directly after our wedding, and somehow or another, we were separated in a way. We have never been quite the same since; but of course that is because I married. It is not because we love each other the less. When I had a bad illness, I called for her perpetually, and she came to me like the good angel she has always been. She nursed me and tended me—humanly speaking, I owe my life to her. And it is to her that I owe Harry, for she introduced us to each other.

How well I remember that evening! Edith was looking more beautiful than I had ever seen her. Something—I have often wondered what—had lent softness to her bright eyes, and made the colour come and go upon her cheeks. I had not seen her for two or three months, and at the first glance I was conscious of some change in her. She was as tender to me as ever, but she was slightly preoccupied. She was not so witty or so amusing as usual, yet she looked so quietly, so thoroughly happy. What could have happened? I wondered. As far as I know now, nothing had happened. At the time, I imagined a very good reason for this change in my friend; but it was quite a mistake. You will understand that, when I tell you I positively supposed that she was engaged to my Harry—who was not my Harry then, for we met for the first time that evening—and, unreasonable as it was, I did not rejoice in her happiness, but felt chilled and disappointed. I was disgusted with myself for such selfishness; but it was a fact, nevertheless. Perhaps coming events did indeed cast their shadows before.

Harry says he loved me from the first moment he saw me sitting in a quiet corner, in a white dress, and with a look of almost babyish wonder in my big eyes. I cannot understand it. He had known Edith Heron for a long time, though I had not seen him before; and for three months, while I had been visiting at a distance, he had met her nearly every day. She was beautiful, she was clever, she was fascinating. And he passed her by to fall in love with a childish, unformed creature like myself, hardly able to say "bo" to a goose! Love is indeed a wonderful thing. Edith seemed most anxious that Harry and I should take to one another. She took the trouble to explain to him that we had been schoolfellows, and that Miss Sumner had asked her to be kind to the little motherless girl placed under her care. And she told me that Harry was a great friend of hers, and that she wanted him to be a friend of mine too. And while she spoke to us, her beautiful eyes shone and her colour deepened. To me, everything seemed quite plain. Edith was engaged to this clever-looking Mr. Pierson; she was no longer my own exclusive possession, but had given herself—beautiful face, clear head, and warm heart—to another. What mistakes people make, to be sure!

"Am I lonely? I suppose I am."—p. 917.

For as time went on, and Mr. Pierson and I met very often, I began to think it was curious if he cared for Edith, and yet looked at me in the way he did. I was staying with the Arundels, and it happened that Mrs. Arundel was taken ill, and needed a good deal of Edith's attention. After all her elegant make-believe, the poor woman was really ill at last, and we were soon wrapped in the gloom of the Valley of the Shadow of Death. I stayed on, for my father had gone on an exploring expedition to some remote part of the earth, and there was nowhere for me to go. Harry and I saw a great deal of one another during that sad time, and—it is impossible to say how it all came about: how do such things come about?—I found out that I loved him, and it certainly seemed as if he loved me. Yet there was Edith.

Then came the dreadful night when Mrs. Arundel died. Oh, how frightened I felt as I sat alone in the drawing-room, where I had often seen the poor lady entertain her brilliant circle! Mr. Arundel, of whom I had thought so little, turned out to be the tenderest and most unselfish of nurses, and in her last illness his wife would scarcely permit him to leave her. They were much more to one another than I had ever dreamed. And on that night of nights he was with her, and Edith was with her, and I was alone—I, who knew nothing of death except as a vague and shadowy terror. When Harry came into the room, I almost screamed. I held out my hands to him, and he took them into his warm grasp. There was love in his eyes, and I saw it and suddenly rejoiced in it—I could not help it—though in the room above us a poor soul was slowly and painfully breaking through its earthly prison.

But he said nothing—then.

After that night I did not see him for some time. I know he came once to the house, and that he saw Edith; but he did not ask for me. I began to think I was mistaken, and that, after all, what I had read in his face was compassion, not love. I shall never forget the shame, the wretchedness of it all. What made things worse, Edith and I had very little conversation together. She was so busy, and for a few days she, too, was ill. But at last she held out her arms to me, and I sobbed upon her tender bosom. I could tell her nothing, of course—what had I to tell? But somehow, she strengthened and consoled me. She seemed to understand without a word.

Harry came the very next morning, and we were married three months after, when my father returned. How delighted he was to give me away, and to be able to devote himself to Science without a single distraction!

You do not wonder now that I look upon Edith Heron as my greatest friend, and that I cannot bear the idea of such a life being wasted.

II.—MISS HERON'S SIDE.

TO-DAY is my birthday. Little Nellie Pierson, who never forgets it, has set me thinking of times long gone by. Of course she has written to me; of course she has filled three large sheets with loving wishes, with grateful memories, with tender regrets. She cannot bear, so she says, to think of my lonely life. Am I lonely? I suppose I am. I suppose every thinking human being is lonely, so that mine is only the common lot, after all. I should have been a great deal more lonely, if— But then, that is just the point.

I always loved little Nellie. The maternal instinct must have been pretty strong in me, I fancy, for when dear old Miss Sumner—the wisest of teachers and the best of friends—brought the child to me, and asked me to be good to her, because she had no mother and no sisters, my heart leaped within me, and I felt a sudden rush of tenderness and affection that was almost overpowering in its intensity, and which has never yet exhausted itself. Yet little Nellie, with her fluffy hair and her great appealing eyes, has caused me keener suffering than any other creature—man or woman—on the face of this earth. There is no accounting for these things. I suppose the fluffy hair, the big, tearful eyes, and the trembling mouth, just shaped for kisses, had something to do with it in my case as well as Harold Pierson's. To me, she looked so like a baby; to him—well, I imagine she looked so like a woman! And to-day is my forty-second birthday, while she has been married just eighteen years. And she is so concerned that I am a spinster and that mine must be “such a lonely life!” In her secret heart, little Nellie thinks it is also a selfish life. She would not say so for worlds. Theoretically, she puts me on a pedestal and bows down before me. But practically, she thinks everything that I do—all that I am—is simple waste of good material.

Do I take an interest in politics? Do I appreciate books, pictures, music? Have I a keen sense of humour and some conversational powers? If I had married, my natural endowments and my acquired accomplishments would have been of use; I should have been “such a companion, such a help.” These things appear to give a little pleasure even now, but it is only to outsiders—to men who ought to have wives of their own, or, having them, ought to be contented with the attractions of the domestic circle. Friendship between men and women does not enter into Nellie's calculations. If she had her way, we should all be paired, like the animals in Noah's Ark.

I love children with almost passionate tenderness, and I can enter quickly into the feelings of the young. But what is the good of that? Nellie says I have no children of my own. The little ones belong to their mothers, and she does not understand that a girl or boy may be all the better occasionally for a little help or counsel from another woman. Nellie took away from me the only man I ever loved. She does not know it, I am thankful to say, and so my attitude towards matrimony is inexplicable to her.

Mr. Pierson was never handsome, but he is better-looking now than ever he was—time and experience have been kind to him. He was always clever and intellectual, but he has learnt—very much to his advantage—that there are other things in the world besides literature, besides science, besides knowledge. He has known what love is, and that is an education for any man or any woman, because I mean love in the real sense of the term—not fancy, not passion. He has not lived with such a good Christian as Nellie without being influenced by her faith and by her life: he stands now on a much higher spiritual level than he did eighteen years ago. He is a good husband, a tender father, a staunch friend. He is not devoted to me personally, because I remind him of one very humiliating passage in his life. But he is magnanimous. I was the one injured, and by him; and yet he forgives me. I think that is considerably more difficult than pardoning one who has merely wronged one's self. I acknowledge all this cheerfully, and yet I wonder now what I could possibly have seen in Mr. Pierson to make me care for him as I did. I suppose I loved him, for I meditated spending my life with him; and when he forsook me, that life for a time lost all savour. I would willingly have died then, yet I have lived to be thankful I escaped what would have been bondage to me, and what is happiness to little Nellie, who took him from me.

Don't mistake me. I don't undervalue married life. I still think it the more complete—the happier—if it is truly happy. But I don't think it is necessarily bliss, any more than I think spinsterhood is necessarily a pining misery. I think it tends to make people more unselfish; but not always. A selfish heart sometimes opens to admit her own husband and her own children, but closes most obstinately to the claims of others. I see nothing very ennobling in that.

There is one other thing that I wanted to say about this life of mine on which Mrs. Pierson wastes so much of her sweet compassion. I wonder whether it is purposeless. That, I acknowledge, cannot be right, and should be amended. It is a sacred trust committed to my keeping, and I ought to make the most of it. Truly the nome is the woman's kingdom, and if she supports one man in his passage along the thorny path of life, helps to keep him in the narrow way, and brings up children to respect their obligations to the good God, their parents, and their country, she is doing a great work. But it is one that is clearly marked out for her. She cannot mistake her duty. Now, my duties are much more indefinite. A single woman is supposed to have some Mission, I believe. If she does not make herself a slave to her nephews and nieces—I have none to slave for—if she has no parrot or poodle—I detest them both—she works for a Society. I have no Mission and I advocate the claims of no Society. I am not obliged to work for my living, and, so far as I can tell, I have no call to sell my goods and give them to the poor. I might, of course, go out to Africa, or to India, or to Japan, to teach the heathen. But I have not done so, and I cannot see my way to doing so. I have many friends, and somebody is always wanting me. I suppose I give some pleasure or some help, or I should be left to my own devices. And I fail so miserably in availing myself of what opportunities I have, that I hardly like ostentatiously to take up Work (with a capital W). There are already kindly words which I do not always speak, there are letters to lonely people far away that I do not always write, there are ways of brightening dull depressed lives which I pass by. Perhaps when at last I do all that lies close at hand, some other more lofty mission may present itself to me, and I may obey the call.

Long, long ago, I anticipated something very different. That was when I saw so much of Harold Pierson. We had known each other as children, and had had a profound contempt for one another. I despised the shy, awkward boy, who recognised the shallowness of my knowledge and the pertness of my speech though he was quite unable to retaliate in kind. But when we met again, all was changed. I see now that he was by no means remarkable—I have met a dozen men since then who were his superiors in every respect. At that time, however, he produced a great impression upon me. I was surprised to find him so much altered, to begin with. Of course, it was very stupid of me to expect the grown, experienced man to be like the raw, unformed boy, but I had lost count of time. Then he was thoroughly in earnest, and that appealed to me; for I was, too. My sister's friends did not suit me at all. Their brilliant talk palled upon me, though I enjoyed it at first. They had seen so much and done so much, and the end of it all was vanity. Life furnished material for a cynical jest or for an epigram, but it was not to be taken seriously. They played with everything—joy, sorrow, love, humanity—even God Himself. Harold had neither outgrown his faith nor lost his hope. He believed that it was possible to do some good in the world even yet, and that it was our duty to make strenuous efforts for the improvement of mankind. I agreed with him most enthusiastically, and we became close friends.

We were rather daring in our choice of subjects, for we both professed to despise conventionality. And so it came to pass that at last we talked about love and marriage, and found that there also we were in accord. Harold said that the ideal marriage was intellectual companionship, and when he made this profound remark, he gazed earnestly at me. I replied that I was sure of it; and I spoke in good faith, though my face flamed and my heart gave a great leap as I spoke. I have no doubt that when he went home, he slept the sleep of a quiet conscience and an untroubled breast, while I lay awake all night recalling his image, and murmuring anew the words he had spoken. For I loved him. I am quite sure that he thought he loved me, for he was absolutely sincere and truthful, and he told me so. Poor fellow! He soon found out his mistake.

I cannot remember now why I was so anxious that our engagement should not be made public at that particular time. I know I had a reason which seemed sufficiently good then, whatever it might do now. And Nellie Stansfield was coming to stay with me. She was such a sensitive little creature, and loved me with such jealous affection, that I wanted her to know and to like Harold before she was told he was to be my husband. I was only six years older than Nellie, but I felt as if I were her mother, poor little dear, and I always tried to spare her. It did not occur to me that I was placing her in an unfair position by keeping her in ignorance of my engagement. I made a false move, but it was in good faith.

"Harold had the courage to tell me the truth."—p. 920.

How pretty little Nellie looked that night! She had been listening to the talk of some of Julia's friends, and their airy trifling with great subjects had given her blue eyes a childish, questioning look, which was almost piteous in its bewilderment. Harold was talking to me with his usual eagerness, when he suddenly caught sight of the white-robed figure in the corner. He forgot what he was going to say, and seemed struck dumb.

"That argument is quite unanswerable," I said, going on with our talk.

"Yes, yes," he replied absently. "Who is that pretty little girl in the corner?"

"Is she not a darling?" I asked enthusiastically.

"It is Nellie Stansfield—you know I told you all about her. You must be very fond of her for my sake, and you must be very careful. She is so tender, so sensitive."

Harold promised to be very fond of her and very careful, and I introduced him to her. I don't think they spoke two words to one another. Nellie seldom talked to strangers, and Harold's conversational powers seemed to have deserted him.

I have since thought that he fell in love after the manner of Shakespeare's heroes—headlong, at once. But at the time I suspected nothing: I was so single-hearted and so confident of his affection for me. Had he not told me that I was the one woman in the world for him, that my companionship was perfect and soul-satisfying, that he loved me? He had told me all that, and I am sure he thought he was speaking the truth. Yet the first time that he saw Nellie Stansfield and met the appealing gaze of her blue eyes, he knew with fatal certainty that he had made a mistake, and that he had deceived himself and deceived me.

Julia began to be ill the very next day, and claimed all my attention. It was scarcely possible for Harold to keep away from the house, even if he had wished to do so. I begged him to come as much as he could, and to take Nellie out. Poor little thing! It was so dull for her to be alone; and we could not send her home, with that stupid father of hers hunting insects in South America when he ought to have been looking after his daughter. Why did the man marry, I wonder? I am sure he troubled more about the loss of a case of rare beetles than ever he did about the death of his wife, and I know he would willingly have exchanged Nellie for some coveted specimens of Lepidoptera. People like that have no business to entangle other lives with their own.

Julia's illness was a dreadful time. Poor creature! She had lived in such an atmosphere of airy trifling, that one could scarcely bear to see her confronted by so awful a reality as death. Whenever I am tempted now to think that life has no meaning, I remember Julia, lying back upon her pillows, with solemn eyes fixed upon her husband's face. If life is a vain show, then what is death?

When at last all was over, I gave way for the first time. I was utterly wearied out both in mind and body; I thought I could bear no more. I longed unutterably to see Harold once again; I hungered for the touch of his hand, for the sound of his voice. Perhaps in that warm human companionship I should forget the chill of death; and so, when they told me that Mr. Pierson wished to see me, I was ready to meet my lover.

The first glance told me something was wrong, but I was not kept in suspense very long. Harold had found out that not only had Nellie Stansfield stolen his heart away, but that he had won hers in return. It was characteristic of the man that when he had once realised those facts he felt impelled to acknowledge them to me. He was so honest, that he simply could not have pretended to continue our old relations for a single hour. He was very cruel, yet I know now he did me the greatest kindness in his power, and that in doing it he gauged my character truly. He told me that he had never loved me, and that he had only just found out what love was. He knew now, and could not, he said, insult a noble woman by marrying her without it. He dared not postpone his avowal, both on my account and Nellie's. Nellie! Yes, that was an added sting. She was mine own familiar friend: she had been to me as a daughter.

Thank God, Harold Pierson had the courage to tell me the truth! I have seen a good deal of married life since then, and I tremble to think what might have become of us, if he had imagined himself in honour bound to fulfil his engagement. And how glad I am that he did not allow me to remain in a fool's paradise any longer than he could help! The old Adam is still rampant within me, and I have had many an unpleasant quarter of an hour since, when I have recalled the fact of my engagement to a man who did not love me. But, at all events, he spared me unnecessary humiliation—he did not accept words and tokens of affection from me, when his heart belonged to another woman.

Everything has turned out entirely for the best. Not only are the Piersons thoroughly happy—as human creatures go—but I am afraid I should have been woefully disappointed in Harold if I had married him. It may be the old business of "sour grapes," but I really don't think it is. He is so very different from what I once imagined him to be, that I can't think how I contrived to get up so much feeling about him. It seems incredible now.

Perhaps I am not so much to be pitied as Nellie thinks. I get a great deal of love, after all. To my shame and grief, I don't do all the good I might do—I am not even sure that I do any—but I care. I am not wrapped up in myself and my own concerns. There are many little vacant corners which I try to fill, though not always with success. I almost think I was able to help Nellie's own Madge on one occasion, though she has such a devoted mother. But Madge is a modern maiden, and life is not such a simple affair to her as it is to that mother. The doubts, the questionings of this fin de siècle look out of the girl's eyes.

Nellie has never known that old story of mine. Mr. Pierson and I agreed that she must not be told. The poor child would have fretted herself into a fever if she had found out that she had innocently supplanted me.

She loved Harold well, but she loved me too. I knew that, and I made him promise to be silent. He has kept his word.

YOUNG AT EIGHTY-FIVE.

BY THE REV. MICHAEL EASTWOOD, BRIGHTON.

"Lo, I am this day fourscore and five years old. As yet I am as strong this day as I was in the day that Moses sent me [forty-five years before] . . . for war . . . to go out, and to come in."—JOSHUA xiv. 10, 11.

A BIRTHDAY speech from a hale octogenarian, who is not ashamed to own his age! And it is noticeable, by the way, how that Holy Scripture, while often telling us the age of a man, only once tells us the age of a woman. "Who?" No, no; you must search for this; and you will find many other good things en route.

The youthful orator has often declared that "the world's noblest work has been done by young men"—not, however, to the exclusion of octogenarians in days gone by, but more especially to-day, when longevity is on the increase, and when, indeed, under the régime of King JESUS, the oldest may keep a young heart, even should their years be as those of Methuselah.

At the outset, however, we do well to remember that life is not to be measured by years only:

"He liveth long who liveth well:
All other life is short and vain."

Still, one thinks of the words, "With long life will I satisfy him"; and we feel that usually a goodly life, full as to its years and ripe as a shock of corn, is eminently desirable. Was it not so at the beginning? Adam, fresh from the Creator's hand, lived 930 years; and many of the antediluvians attained as much, and even more. After the time of the Flood longevity decreased; and by the time of Abraham the duration of human life was again reduced; while, again, by the time of Moses man's lifetime was diminished by half, so that we find him lamenting, "The days of our life are threescore years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labour and sorrow" (Psalm xc.).

Yet Moses himself lived to 120 years, his eye undimmed, his natural vigour unimpaired. Thus he who is credited with the well-known Psalm fixing the limit of man's age, is a conspicuous exception; so that some have thought he was lamenting the short lives of the Israelites in the wilderness ("our lives") rather than the brevity of human life in general.

The subject of our meditation is another conspicuous exception; Caleb is young at eighty-five: as young as he was at forty. He and one other, Joshua, were the only two out of all the throng that left Egypt who entered the Promised Land. Hardness of heart, disobedience, querulous unthankfulness—these things cut down the hosts that came out of Egypt, and occasioned the mournful Psalm of Moses, "the man of God"; and the "our" derives sad emphasis as Moses looks round upon the camp of Israel, and knows that all are doomed.

Yet, even then, Caleb was an exception. And if he could be young at eighty-five, under Moses, what ought we to be to-day, under Christ? An American divine said not long ago that a man ought to be ashamed of himself nowadays to die under one hundred! And although he himself died soon after, at the age of seventy-five, there was much truth in his whimsical dictum; and never since the days of the patriarchs has there been such a chance of longevity—youthful, useful, happy longevity—as to-day, under the dispensation of the Lord Jesus, when the young man may be older than Methuselah, and the octogenarian younger than Abel.

I.

One cannot but be struck, on reading the paragraph (vv. 1—15) that the circumstance described really depends on another that happened long before. See Numb. xiii. 30, xiv. 6—10, 24, 30, 38, which we may epitomise thus: By God's command, Moses sent twelve spies to search the Land of Promise. These, after forty days' search, returned with grapes of Eshcol, pomegranates, and I know not what, together with the report that the land was flowing with milk and honey. So spake the two. Ten, however, interposed one of those "buts" that mar history: The people are to us like giants to grasshoppers; it is no use attempting their walled cities. Then they all cried, and wanted a captain to lead them back to Egypt and its bondage.

Caleb stilled the people for a time at least, and said, "We can do it, God helping us." But in vain, "for all the congregation bade them stone them with stones; though the glory of the Lord appeared in the Tabernacle, before all the children of Israel." Then came the Lord's word that none but Joshua and Caleb should live to enter the Promised Land. Every grumbler should perish.

It is this enables Caleb to cry, forty-five years later, ". . . My brethren that went up with me made the heart of the people melt: but I wholly followed the Lord my God; . . . and now, behold, the Lord hath kept me alive, as He said. . . . As yet I am as strong this day as I was in the day that Moses sent me . . . for war . . . to go out, and to come in . . . now, therefore, give me this mountain."

No wonder Joshua blessed him, and gave him Hebron, "because he wholly followed the Lord God of Israel."

So God thought him. And the past comes up again. As he sowed at forty, he is reaping at eighty-five. Thus Caleb is confronted with what happened nearly half a century before; and his story, indeed, lives to this day. So, perhaps, your attitude to-day, your praises and prayers, your gifts upon the altar, your perusal of this magazine, may meet you again: it may be after many years, it may be in another world.

Caleb's great joy is that he followed God wholly, and especially that he was not a murmurer, murmuring having slain more than the giant Canaanites ever could—having, indeed, slain all but two of those who left Egypt. Terrible thing, that perennial grumbling! It makes us think about the child expressing its wish not to go to heaven lest grandpapa should be there, always grumbling about "those boys." He had not a young heart, poor man!

Fretting is equally bad. Two gardeners, who were neighbours, had their crops of early peas killed by frost. One of them came to condole with the other on his misfortune.

"Ah!" cried he, "how unfortunate we have been, neighbour! Do you know, I have done nothing but fret ever since. But you seem to have a fine healthy crop coming up already. What are these?"

"These!" replied the gardener—"why, these are what I sowed immediately after my loss."

"What, coming up already?"

"Yes; while you were fretting I was working."

"What, don't you fret when you have a loss?"

"Yes; but I always put off the fretting until I have repaired the mischief."

"Why, then you have no need to fret at all."

"True," replied the industrious and cheerful gardener; "and that's the very reason why I put it off altogether."

He must have had something of the Caleb spirit: whence we learn that murmuring does no good; that it will "age" us, writing crooked wrinkles on the heart as well as the face. Caleb kept a young heart, a thoughtful heart, a willing heart; knowing that Satan has a bait for every age, and that a querulous old man (or a young one, either) is Satan's joy, Israel's danger, and a source of ruin and death. And at the last he is ready for work, knowing that complaining and unthankfulness would kill him sooner than work for God.

What a magnificent example! When the old man drew himself up like this, many a young man who had been contemplating rest and "resignation" would pull himself together, and follow the glorious example.

II.

It is instructive to note that Caleb was probably a Gentile—a foreigner. His name means "a dog," the designation given by Jews to Gentiles. The striking faith of the adopted children many times puts to shame the cowardice and inconstancy of the peculiar people. In fact, the first Hebrew and the father of the faithful was a Gentile. And to-day, could we bring in many an alien and tell him the ways of God, his heart would melt while often we are Gospel-hardened, and he would show forth a sublime and childlike faith. Caleb's trust in God's arm, forty-five years before, when all the multitudes of Israel would have turned their backs on the Promised Land and marched ignominiously to Egypt again, bids us to-day believe with heart and soul.

III.

Here, then, is the secret of perpetual youth: God keeps His people young; "The Lord hath kept me alive"—"young," we might well say. "Even the youths shall faint and be weary, and the young men shall utterly fail; but they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary, and they shall walk and not faint."

This was the secret of Caleb's prolonged youth: more than a good constitution; more than happy circumstances—these had not always been so (Numb. xiv. 10); more than a cheerful disposition, though that is a good thing; more than animal vitality. He followed God closely—"wholly"—with a heart undivided and undisturbed. Some people are blest with a wonderful development of the faculty of recuperativeness; their flesh heals quickly; they soon recover from illness; they attain to a "good old age." Yet we want something more than that—true godliness, full of faith and hope and love. The possession of vital force may give tenacity of life, conferring hardness in one case and pliability in another; but it cannot keep the heart young and childlike, and give that sweet sunshine that makes one young at eighty-five.

We ask again, If Caleb could attain this prolonged youth under the old dispensation, what ought we to attain? Christ is our Master. Whether Caleb derived any inspiration from his friend and leader Joshua, one can hardly say; but we have our Joshua—Jesus (the names are the same)—and He is a "Saviour" in every sense of the word. And He is a young Man. You cannot conceive of Him otherwise. True, He is represented in Revelation as the Ancient of Days, and His hair white as wool; still, even then, He is "venerable with eternal youth," and Christianity is to make us young; for the essence of Christianity is that Christ imparts Himself to us. We must therefore be like Him.

But how often it seems otherwise. What a wailing cry for rest and retirement we hear from the young and middle-aged; men who seem prematurely old and battered. It is not work, but worry; poverty alike of blood and spirit; a self-inflicted woe on him who hasteth to be rich (Prov. xxviii. 22). Would it be so if men followed Christ wholly? He is the Lord of life. He would give life "more abundantly," so that we should present the wondrous spectacle of men growing younger as they become older. Under Christ, indeed, we have no business to grow old; for the very entrance into His Kingdom means that we are "born again," and that we become "as little children," retaining the sparkle and exhilaration of children, in spite of advancing years and increasing cares.

It makes one think of octogenarian statesmen knocked down by passing cabs rising at once and running to take the number, but appearing in court in the spirit of Christian youthfulness and amiability to ask that offending cabbies may not be convicted.

It makes one think of John Wesley, consumptive when a young man, yet at eighty-six years of age rising at four in the morning, preaching two or three times a day, writing books, travelling on horseback thousands of miles over bad roads, and calling his fellow-labourers milksops.

It makes one think of "Paul the aged," yet in labours more abundant and in spirits more youthful than Timothy: buoyant, heroic, sunny, and genial to the last. "For me to live is Christ," said he; and this "life" means a great deal more than existence.

IV.

Thus the aged may claim the mountain, like Caleb. He wanted the highest last, the best last. In fact, he felt that he was only just beginning his career, that the past had been his apprenticeship, and that now he finds his place. So he seeks his true allotment in the Promised Land.

The mountain! It is high; it is difficult. Frowning Anakim keep guard, and will dispute your right. But it can be taken. You may conquer; you may claim your right. Did not Moltke begin a military career at sixty? Then, what should not the Christian soldier attempt? Think of his royal master retaining the full responsibilities of state till ninety-one; of Ranke, the German historian, labouring till the same age. Think of General Grant, laid aside at sixty-two, and beset with difficulties, but successfully climbing the literary mountain; of Mrs.

Trollope, with no book at fifty, and then writing 115 volumes, if not more; of Sir Moses Montefiore writing a book at ninety-two and living till one hundred. Think of Socrates learning music in extreme old age; Cato learning Greek at eighty; Plutarch learning Latin; Dr. Johnson learning Dutch; Sir Henry Spelman becoming an antiquarian and lawyer in the sixties; Ludovico Monaldesco writing history at one hundred and fifteen; Franklin beginning philosophy at fifty; and the pathetic picture of Robert Hall, at seventy, lying on the floor of his study, racked with pain, but clutching his Italian grammar, that he might learn to read Dante in the original.

Never let us, then, dare to say it is too late to mend, too late to conquer some difficulty, too late to climb higher, so long as the mountain confronts us with its solemn grandeur, and breathes "Excelsior!"

What is your allotment in the Promised Land, and which is your mountain? Let your claim be that of holy ambition; let your prayer be a large one. Then yours shall be those magnificent sixties that blend the forties and the twenties (so Emerson says the Indians say); or if you are an octogenarian, then those same splendid sixties shall but have added the twenties.

It depends on the now.

Morning and noon are no presage of the weather of evening. But it is so with you. And at evening time it shall be light; sweet and prolonged as our northern twilight. Then, when you pass away, whatever your age, we still may say, "Whom the gods love die young." And in eternity itself you will grow younger for ever.

I daresay you can find fault with Southey's poem. But it is worth reading, if you have never read it; and it has at least the merit of clinging to the memory. I quote the last verse only:

"I am cheerful, young man," Father William replied:
"Let the cause thy attention engage:
In the days of my youth I remembered my God,
And He hath not forgotten my age."

Then, no more like Roman Pagan, whose old age was a burden more grievous than Aetna; but like Caleb, young at eighty-five, entering the Promised Land, and claiming the mountain height: old age, even at the last, will be as a shock of corn, fully ripe, fragrant with concentrated sunshine, unlimited in its possibilities: a beginning, not an ending: every grain the promise of endless and beautiful repetition in a better country, and whose full fruition God alone can tell.

"THE WAY THAT FATHER COMES."

THE way that father comes each night,
Home-faring from the city,
Is scanned with eager glances bright
By Marjory and Kitty.
Twin sentries by the garden gate,
In spotless white, the sisters wait;
Two tiny maids with faces fair,
With deep blue eyes and soft brown hair.

The way that father comes they know
Must always be the right way,
Trodden a thousand times, and so
It always seems a bright way.
The quiet lane their eyes discern
Is known at every grassy turn,
And, hung with blossoms, arched with green,
It is the sweetest ever seen!

The way that father comes they deem Awaits his coming only;
Though crowds went by, the way would seem Without him sad and lonely!
It is his voice they long to hear,
His quick firm footsteps drawing near;
It is for him alone they wait
In loving patience at the gate!

The way that father comes we guess
Is where new joys will find him;
An Eden for the wilderness
Of toil and care behind him!
The troubles of the day forgot,
He hastens to a blissful spot,
Where, rosy twilight growing dim,
The children soon shall welcome him!

LOST CHURCH BELLS.

THE SQUARE TOWER OF ST. MARY'S CATHEDRAL, LIMERICK.

NUMEROUS stories, founded in many cases on fact, and in some instances belonging to the region of illusion or romance, relate to the mysterious disappearance of certain church bells. Leland, it may be remembered, in his poem of "The Lost Church"—supposed to have been based on an ancient tradition of the Sinaitic peninsula—refers to this subject—

" Oft in the forest far one hears
A passing sound of distant bells,
Nor legends old, nor human wit,
Can tell us whence the music swells.
From the Lost Church 'tis thought that soft
Faint ringing cometh on the wind.
Once many pilgrims trod the way,
But no one now the way can find."

And legendary lore, in most countries, has similar tales of exiles or pilgrims being occasionally cheered by the well-remembered sound of some church bell, with its thousand memories of the past, but whence that familiar music of the chime has come no one can ever tell, for the "time-worn tower" has long since vanished, and its bells, they "are perished and lost."

A pretty story is told of the cathedral bells of Limerick—originally cast, it is said, by an Italian founder for a monastery near his home, which was destroyed when his three sons fell together on the fatal field of Pavia. But years after—when those bells were supposed to have been lost—he came an exile to Ireland, and reaching the Shannon as the shades of evening were closing in, there suddenly burst forth from the square tower of St. Mary a rich peal of melody. One note was enough for him; for like the long-silent voices of the lost he recognised the sweet sound of his own dear bells to welcome him, a lonely exile.

But all lost bells cannot boast of the same romance, for occasionally their absence from the church-tower is attributed to their having been stolen. Thus, some years ago it was one day discovered that the second bell of Worcester Cathedral—weighing about 5 cwt.—was missing from the belfry, and in the year 1844 a bell was stolen from the church-steeple of the parish church of Glossop, Derbyshire. An occurrence, however, which created some excitement in the neighbourhood was the mysterious robbery of the fifth bell at Church Brampton, Derbyshire, which happened at the time to be unhung, and resting on the tower floor. It appears that the sacrilegious hands broke open the door, and rolled the bell down the churchyard into a cart, and from that day nothing has ever been heard of this bell. For a considerable time every effort was made to trace it, but without success.

Thefts of this kind, happily, have not always escaped detection; and tradition tells how, in several instances, such offenders have paid heavily for their acts of sacrilege. A curious case of theft occurred about the year 1830, when the treble bell at Cherington, Gloucestershire, disappeared; but some surprise was caused when it was discovered that the missing bell had actually been set up in Avening tower to make a ring of six. It seems that there had prevailed in the neighbourhood a popular idea that if a bell could be taken from one tower and put up in another without the offender being caught, there was no redress. This, of course, was a vulgar error based on ignorance, and the persons guilty of this wanton act, being discovered, were convicted and punished. But the event was long proverbial in the village of Cherington and its locality, and gave rise to a ballad which for many years preserved the memory of what was known as the "Adventure of Cherington Church Bell," the first stanza of which runs thus :

"Those Cherington bells, those Cherington bells,
What a sad tale their jingling tells!
Alas! their now imperfect chime
Proclaims our folly and our crime."

The stillatory at Canterbury is called Bell Jesus, from a legend that it was erected in memory of a bell of that size cast abroad and lost at sea. Henry VIII. gambled away the famous Jesus Campanile bell of St. Paul's, with the great folk-note bell which summoned the assemblies of the citizens, with a throw of the dice at hazard, to Sir Miles Partridge, who pulled it down. But, adds Spelman, in his "History of Sacrilege," "in the fifth year of King Edward VI. this gamester had worse fortune, when he lost his life, being executed on Tower Hill for matters concerning the Duke of Somerset." There is, too, an old tradition that one of the bells at Sturminster Marshall came originally from the chapel at Knolton, and that the shoes of the horses that brought it to Sturminster were reversed, that the track taken might not be followed in the snow; hence the rhyme current in the locality—

"Knolton bell is stole
And thrown into White Mill Hole.

Occasionally, it would seem, bells were sold to defray expenses, and thus lost to the parish. Strange stories are still told of the romantic adventures which happened to certain bells on their removal from the belfry. According to a local tradition, many years ago the twelve parish churches of Jersey possessed each a valuable peal of bells; but during a long civil war the bells were sold to provide for the wants of the troops. The bells accordingly were sent to France, but on the passage the ships foundered, and everything was lost. Since that hour, during a storm, these bells, they say, always ring at sea; and to this day the fishermen of St. Ouen's Bay before embarking on any journey go to the edge of the water to listen if they can hear the bells chiming from the deep; for if so, nothing will induce them to leave the shore. A sinister story is told of the bells of Whitby Abbey, which was suppressed in the year 1539. The bells, it is commonly said, were sold and placed on board to be conveyed to London. But as soon as the vessel had moved out into the bay with its sacred freight, it sank; and at times from beneath the waters "the mellow music peals," and, untired by flying years, "the bells no human fingers touch have sung their hidden chime." There are numerous legendary romances of this kind, showing, as it has been observed, how, when once bells have been consecrated to religious uses, they resent any profane act. But in the course of time many an old church bell has disappeared, and belfries now are silent which once, it is said, were noted for their melodious peals. In some instances certain parishes are reproached in local rhymes for having sold in past times their church bells; but, curious to say, the same reason is generally assigned for this act—to obtain money to build or repair a steeple. Thus LOSS OF THE BELLS OF WHITBY ABBEY IN 1539.

BERWICK CHURCH, SUSSEX.

of Rivington, Middlesex, it is recorded in a well-known couplet—

"Pious parson, pious people, Sold their bells to build the steeple."

With which may be compared a similar rhyme connected with the parish of Owersby, Lincolnshire—

"Owersby parish, wicked people,
Sold their bells to Kelsey to build the steeple."

At Berwick, Sussex, out of four bells existing in the year 1724, only one remains, for in 1811 three were sold: one to Alfriston, and two as old metal; and the same fate has no doubt befallen many other bells which have disappeared. Spelman tells us how, "in the year of our Lord 1541, Arthur Bulkley, Bishop of Bangor, sacrilegiously sold the first five bells belonging to the cathedral, and went to the seaside to see them shipped away, but at that instant he was stricken blind, and so continued to the day of his death." He further adds how "my lord of Canterbury" when he was in Scotland visited certain churches, but found the bells had disappeared from them. In Edinburgh, he remarked, "there was no bell in that city save only in the Church of St. Andrew, and inquiring what had become of the rest, it was told him that they were shipped to be carried into the Low Countries, but were drowned in Leith Haven."

Traditionary lore generally represents those guilty of desecrating church bells as punished for their sin. A pretty little legend is told of St. Goven's bell, in Pembrokeshire. It appears that the saint lived in a cell in the rock near the coast, a chapel being afterwards built near the spot, with a bell in its open belfry. But one night a pirate crew stole this bell, and they had no sooner put out to sea than a storm arose and wrecked their boat. In some unaccountable manner, the bell, it is said, was conveyed into the centre of a stone, at the brink of a well near the chapel, and is fabled to ring when the stone is struck. It may be noted also that there is an abundance of similar stories all over Europe. In the village of Moringen, near Göttingen, there is the "bell-pond," from whence the chimes of bells are heard at midnight. The story goes that the knights of the Temple once had a new bell cast and hung in the church tower, but they forgot before using it to have it consecrated to Divine Service; and on account of their negligence they forfeited their bell, which in a mysterious way disappeared, and sank into what has since been known as the bell-pond. A set of bells was stolen from Newkirk, but directly the robbers placed them on board, the vessel sank; and in a village in Southern Italy there is still current a legend which tells how the Saracens once pillaged the town and carried off a bell. But the impious act caused them to lose their boat, and the bell sank, being said to ring on the anniversary of that day. And after Port Royal, in the West Indies, was submerged, at the close of the seventeenth century, sailors in those parts had for many years stories of church bells ringing beneath the waters, agitated by the waves, or, as some supposed, by the spirits of the deep.

But returning to our own country: to this day the tower of Fowabury Church, Cornwall—or, as it has been called by Mr. Hawker, “the silent tower of Bottreaux”—remains without bells. The bells, it seems, were cast and duly shipped for Fowabury, but as the ship neared the shore the captain swore and used profane language, whereupon the vessel sank beneath a sudden swell of the ocean. But as it went down, the lost bells were distinctly heard tolling with a muffled peal; and ever since, when storms are at hand, their phantom sound is generally supposed to be still audible from beneath the waves.

“Still when the storm of Bottreaux’s waves
Is walking in his weedy caves,
Those bells, that sullen surges hide,
Peal their deep tones beneath the tide.
‘Come to thy God in time,’
Thus saith the ocean chime;
‘Storm, whirlpool, billow past,
Come to thy God at last.’”

Once more, there are all kinds of fanciful stories relating to lost church bells which are to be found were swallowed up, and on a Sunday morning the bells may be heard ringing a phantom peal by anyone who happens to put his ear to the ground. The Journal of the Sussex Archaeological Society (xiv. 227) quotes a singular tradition relating to the village of Etchingham, in Sussex. Originally, it is said, the church was enclosed by a moat—“a remarkable appendage to a sanctuary,” but reminding us of “the rude old times, when in seasons of war and civil commotion men turned the house of God into a fortress.” The tradition further adds that at the bottom of this moat there is a huge bell, but as to how it came there evidence has never been forthcoming. Nor will it ever be seen by mortal eyes till six yoke of oxen shall be brought to the spot to bring it again to daylight. Another piece of legendary lore current in the neighbourhood of Romford, Essex, affirms that the old Church of St. Andrew—pulled down nearly four centuries and a half ago—stood about half a mile from the town, on a site popularly known as “Old Church.” But every year, on St. Andrew’s Day, the bells were long said to be heard pealing merrily from beneath the ground.

Instances of similar stories might easily be multiplied, being scattered over the country; not to mention the tales told in different localities of among our country traditions. Thus, according to a story at Tunstall, in Norfolk, the parsons and churchwardens on one occasion disputed for the possession of some bells which had become useless because the tower had been burnt. But during their altercation the bells were suddenly marched away, and disappeared into a boggy pool of water, and even now-a-days are said to favour their native place with a ghostly peal. Similarly at Fisherty Brow, near Consdale, there is a sort of hollow where, as the legend runs, a church, parson, and congregation churches having in times past been overwhelmed and obliterated by the inroads of the sea, as is reported to have happened to the church of Kilgrimoe, near Blackpool, about two miles out at sea, long ago submerged. And even now the seafaring community inform us how in rough and tempestuous weather the melancholy chimes of those lost bells may be heard floating on the waters.

AT FIRST SIGHT.

BY KATHLEEN WATSON.

HE lodged for one swiftly flying month in the police-station of the little Highland village where she chose to make a brief sojourn from the turmoil of the city to which her duty chained her. She wondered, in the great fascination that possessed her, if any future life could hold more charm than the one she lived alone in those peaceful ever-to-be-remembered weeks. When her random thoughts strayed—as random thoughts sometimes will—to dreams of love, she checked them; having through all the romance of her nature a strong vein of common sense, which taught her to grasp the fact that many girls must shut their eyes to the things that come to crown the lives of many more: that they must look lifelong loneliness bravely, even sweetly, in the face, and never grow little because the largest falls not to their share.

In the city, she was wont to think of herself as a machine wound up in the early morning, and warranted to go on more or less regularly till bed-time; but in the country she felt that she lived of her own accord. Her days there were very simple, very gentle, very wholesome ones. To begin with, when she opened her happy, puzzled, waking eyes, she opened them on to a little shadowy room where the sunlight flickered in through the soft white blind and curtains, on which were traced the branches and wandering stems of the great white and the little crimson rose-trees planted on either side of the window. She was quite content to lie for hours and watch them slowly waving to and fro in the early morning breeze that swept down from the mountain—she used to say to herself, with the sober little smile that was peculiar to her, that she would ask nothing better than to be allowed to do so to the end of time.

In front of the window was the table at which she sometimes used to sit and write—only sometimes, not all day: and then only for sheer delight, not from weariest compulsion, as in the city. When the kind sympathetic woman who waited on her came in to draw the blind and open wide the window to the roses, and the sunshine, and the gentle wind that floated westwards from the mountains, she used to lie back on her pillows in a measureless content, and watch—for the police-station was a little, low, one-storey house—the village children pass up and down the street, the sunshine flashing on their milk-cans; the small, fat, ruddy-cheeked post-boy, his horn slung across his shoulder, on his way through the yellow broom and across the brown moor to the outlying cottages and farms; the turf- or peat-laden carts rumbling slowly down the brae, as often as not a bunch of crimson heather at the horses' heads. Very surely and sweetly she learnt how much pleasure may be found in the contemplation of simple things.

To her it was a rest beyond expression even to lie still, and quietly try to grasp the charm of the shadowy little room that looked on to the roses and the old brown road. On the wall were old line-engravings of Canadian views—a wedding-gift from her father to the policeman's wife. Over the bed was a Christ calling the little children to Him, and telling those about Him to forbid them not. On the mantelpiece were the medals that the husband had won at the village shows by his garden produce, also his certificate showing that he was qualified to render First Aid to the Injured by having attended so many ambulance lectures at the Dundee Institute; while in the space above the door there hung a vivid picture of Jephthah about to offer up his daughter—Jephthah wearing a kilt with the Colquhoun tartan, while his daughter resigned herself to the sacrifice in a rough short skirt of crimson wool, and a bright plaid shawl of undeniable Paisley manufacture. On the table in the window was always set a bowl of sweet firm roses, each rose resting primly on a little green leaf-spray, while the centre rose, which was rather larger than the surrounding ones, was quite embedded in a shower of leaves. The arrangement never varied. Not for worlds would she have touched it. Beside it, the studiously careless art of her own room in the city seemed almost a sham.

One evening, while she sat in the window-seat, watching the shadows grow long across the hills, and that tender faint light creep up into the evening sky—the light which speaks of peace unutterable—a man passed up the little road outside. He was walking very slowly, and his face was turned towards the hills. He seemed to be breathing the inspiring air with a great content, or else the light of some choice reflection was shining through his face and stamping it with a rare happiness. He was dressed in the ordinary sombre garb of the Church, with the exception of a broad-brimmed sailor-hat, which gave a certain boyishness to his otherwise matured appearance. As he passed the cottage his eyes chanced to fall on hers, where she sat at the open lattice with the roses all about it, and something in her face, its sadness, its gentleness, its strength, made him look at it a moment longer than etiquette allows. Under that steady look of interest, though her own did not falter, a slight flush crept up and stained the whiteness of her cheeks. Years of contact with all that is of necessity hard, literal, and not too reverent, in city life and work had not been able to rub the bloom off her nature, sensitive and delicate beyond the average.

When he had passed on, still with that faint flush lingering in her face she fell to thinking of him. There was about him that air of braveness and directness which is mostly quick to find its way to a woman's heart. From the glimpse she had of his face, she perceived in it that confidence which is born of thought and work: that sympathy which comes from a wide comprehension.

"That same dear face coming towards him."—p. 930.

It was, perhaps, rather much to have arrived at in so short a time; but a strange and happy instinct supplied what actual knowledge failed to tell.

That evening, when she went out for her usual twilight stroll, she did not take, according to her custom, the way that led towards the hills—the tender way whose pleasantnesses and graces she knew by heart. Instead, she went by the sober little road, across the village square, and over the railway bridge to the river, where it flows swiftly by from the forest-land which is its birthplace.

By the black swirling water she stood for a long time, lost in the mystery of the quiet world of paling after-glow and peeping star.

She did not know that she was at the ferry till the plash of oars burst on the silence, and the brown boat moved laboriously, slowly, across the swift deep stream, landing its freight of a heavily laden old woman and two privates dressed in the white spats, kilt, and tartan of the regiment of the brave Black Watch.

In a minute or two ten o'clock chimed faintly from an old tower in the distance.

"Last time across and back," sang out the old ferryman—"last time for the night! Coming, miss!"

She stood alone on the bank. She looked around, but saw no other passenger. The land was wrapped in gloom, the face of the water shone: it seemed to have absorbed all the light left in the world.

The delicious suddenness and newness of the idea pleased her—to row out from the shadows into the midst of that silent silver glory—yes, she would go; always supposing that the old boatman was not going solely on her account, as she did not wish to land, but would only go, well—with a little smile—for the sake of going.

"Then step in," he told her cheerily; for indeed he must be crossing once again for the last time, as he had said.

They struck out gently over the gleaming water. The current carried them along, the landing-place on the other side being some small way down the stream. The old brown oar-blades sparkled in the moonlight; the river mist, like a thin luminous veil, had risen, and hung opaquely before them, hiding the opposite bank from view.

So from the shadows into the strange white glory, gliding, as it were, down a stream of light into some unknown world of mystery and wordless song, then once more, for a little spell, through the shadows to the shore.

And on the shore waiting, alone, a man.

One who, in all that long moorland walk, under the brows of the mighty hills, by the road which crosses the river some three miles lower down its course, and back by the pine-woods on its bank, had seen constantly, hauntingly before him one little rose-encircled window and a face looking out of it—a face at once proud and gentle, high with resolve, patient with work: a little sad, perhaps, at thought of the sternness, the loneliness of life: a face instinct with infinite possibilities of tenderness and strength: a face that you might search the cities and the world in vain for, and only know in dreams to the end of days.

So that as he stood on the dusky moonlit bank, hot and tired from intensity of both physical and mental exertion, waiting for the ferry-boat to reach him, listening to the slow regular dip of the oars, and saw at last that same dear face coming towards him, up-turned through the mists and shadows to the beauty of the night: it was with no start or shock that he saw it, but rather as the consummation of some happy sequence, the warm and bright interpretation of something too delicate for analysis, too fine for utterance.

For a moment their eyes met and were lost in each other's: his radiantly, reverently, with a touch of questioning in them; hers startled, vaguely troubled, yet without faltering.

Into the silver mists they moved, then out to the span of great white light beyond, pulling slowly against the current; the night delicate, tremulous with inspiration, a subtle wordless affinity hovering like angels' wings about them.

As they landed she passed swiftly before him up the little path, so soft to the tread, with its carpet of pine-needles, and in the thickness of the gloom was soon lost to his sight.

Love sometimes shows itself a strange child indeed, growing great on little, thriving often gloriously on poorest fare. Not many are the things which can be written of those two who were rowed across the ferry alone, yet all unlonely, in the silence of the misty silver way. An introduction, one or two meetings, one or two clasps of hand, a rush of sympathy from one heart to the other, a mutual swift responsiveness—and in the unfolding of it their tale is told.

How it all precisely happened I can only guess, and you who love will be able, too, to guess with me. But there came a Sunday evening, a time of perfect peace and sweetness, when the cool air from the hills was surging in through the open door, the music of the larks and heather-linnets was blent with the sound of chant and psalm, the organ had just ceased from some soft voluntary, and as the chords were dying away he mounted the pulpit steps in the little hillside church where he was taking the service, and met again across the crowd of faces the eyes that had kept their own sweet counsel through the shadows and the silver gloom. He saw the swift rose-colour shoot up under her fair clear skin, and a sense of deep humility came over him, such as one would think must come over every true-hearted man when he has reason to believe that a woman's happiness lies in his keeping. With it, too, there came a sense of strong and blessed manfulness, of the responsibility that builds up character and makes men brave to do as they have not done before; and while they listened eagerly to his direct impassioned words that evening, many wondered at the light on his grave proud face.

When the service was over and the people gone away, he stood at the lych-gate for a few minutes, looking towards the hills. He watched her slim dark figure, standing out in sharp relief against the paling azure of the evening sky—he knew that she was climbing to a cairn from where it is a goodly sight indeed to watch the night fall slowly on the glorious world around. Then he turned suddenly away, for he remembered that an old dying villager had asked for him that day.

Half an hour later, when, with the blessing of the dying on his head, he turned to seek the living dearest one, he saw with consternation that the aspect of the land had changed. Often it is, in those northern latitudes, when the flush of the after-glow has faded from the sky, that great banks of cloud rise up with startling swiftness and shroud the hills in thick mist-mantles, so that, where the radiance and the gold have been, one only sees a stately cloud-procession hiding the high places of the world from view as it moves along. The thought of her alone on those heights in certain discomfort and possible danger filled him with dismay. Step by step he fought his way by the path which she had taken. It got very cold, very dark, and his clothes were saturated with the damp. He went on by a narrow sheep-track, which was the only path of any sort around, and on either side of which great boulders of rock rose at intervals. It was by means of these boulders that he felt his way. She herself had been listening to the dull thud of his stick against the stones, without knowing how to account for the sound. No fear had touched her, though she recognised the gravity of the situation, and remembered that she had heard how the mists sometimes stay for hours—even days—on the high hill-tops, and how perilous it then is to try to find one's way across them, because of the gulleys and chasms at their feet. The only thing was to wait patiently till the danger was over-past. For the rest, the joy of a new and not unhappy experience was hers. There was something not of the earth, as she had ever known or felt it, to sit there absolutely alone while that white shroud silently wove itself around her. She never knew how long it was till the sound of footsteps labouring through the heather made its way to her ears. Then, indeed, for a moment her eyes grew wide with alarm. She did not move, but her breath came and went with audible distinctness. This agony of suspense went on for about two minutes: within a dozen yards of her the stranger halted: she could see absolutely nothing of him nor he of her, yet suddenly she knew that he was aware of her presence—her quick short breathing had betrayed her.

Oh! that eloquent little pause on the mountain-side, when neither spoke nor saw the other, yet each asked voicelessly, half fearful, half afraid—

"Is it—you?"

In a moment he was beside her in the cloud, the outline of his figure all blurred and indistinct, like the letters of a word on which a tear has fallen, and he was saying—

"I have come, you see. You are not frightened, are you?"

"Oh no, thank you. But just a little—a little overwhelmed to think of your coming all this way for me—a stranger."

He thought her voice, with that nervous little quiver in it, was the dearest he had heard.

"Are we strangers?" he asked very comfortably, smilingly. "Are we? Even if we were, in any danger or distress the word is not allowed to stand: by which it sometimes happens that out of little pains come great pleasantries."

"In this case I'm afraid the pains were yours entirely."

"I was thinking it was just the other way. But if you will own to sharing ever so slightly in the pleasantness, you shall have it as you will. Are you very cold? Wet I see you are. Let me think what can be done."

Even whilst he spoke a long line of soft primrose light broke through the cloud which wrapped them round: it was only the slanting rays of the rising moon which had pierced through, and lay like a ladder of light between heaven and earth, but to those two standing alone together in that world of mist and moonlight it seemed the bravest sight their eyes had seen. Then slowly the great cloud swept away: they felt its soft cold breath like a farewell blessing passing over them: they did not speak, though he thought he heard the beating of her heart so near his own; but when the last bright edges of that glory-skirted gloom had moved across the mountain, they turned to one another, and when he saw the wistful sweetness of those blue eyes smiling through the shadows, his hands went out to hers, and he took heart of grace and held them fast, and called her "Dear!" and told her of his love.

Told her also of his life, whose lines were cast in the dark dull places of a teeming city, far away from the stars, the silences, the nameless graces of the mountain-world where they had met, among those whose daily drudgery was so heavy that it crowded out all sense of the divinity of work, asked her not to count the cost, but nevertheless, and none the less, to "Come!" and read his answer in the love-lit eyes which could not lie.

MEN OF SPLENDID ENDEAVOUR.

IT is a mistaken idea that the world crowns only success with the garland of fame. Beyond question, the worship of triumph, however temporary, has always been much in vogue. But there is an instinct in the human heart that recognises something that may easily be as true a patent of nobility as the loudest-resounding victory of them all. This competitor, downcast perhaps because of defeat, is the genius of splendid endeavour.

The Hungarians have this year celebrated the literary jubilee of their veteran novelist, M. Maurus Jókai. But the national affection has not merely acclaimed with a wonderful consent of enthusiasm a brilliant writer; it has also paid its tumultuous homage to a foiled patriot. When tides of conquest swept over a hapless land there were found heroes of hope and effort who saved a people's self-respect, though they failed to thwart Austria. These men were indomitable in their purpose. In freedom's name they bore arms, in freedom's name they penned appeals and delivered orations. The widest known are Louis Kossuth and Maurus Jókai, and one of them is happily watching still over the interests of the Magyar race. One passed from the battle-field to the study, to toil there in the sacred cause; the other roamed two hemispheres on a pilgrimage of passion, seeking active help for Hungary. Kossuth fired the listening crowds to shame and pity and vicarious anger; but he moved no Government to interfere. It seemed so much wasted work.

But it is a chapter in the great romance of splendid endeavour, and long ago the friends and foes of strict Hungarian independence have joined in praising the discomfited adventurers. They were unselfish, whole-hearted, full of faith in an idea: and these qualities glow and shine even in the darkness of abortive toil. Better fail with such a band of Quixotes than drift with the careless current into some harbour of ignoble ease.

On a June day twelve years ago, the weary veteran

Giuseppe Garibaldi died at Caprera. He, too, loved his native land passing well, if not always wisely in the jealous eye of statecraft. His story, first and last, is another witness to the deserved renown of forlorn but magnificent enterprise. Italy's great liberator had often to accept disappointment and chagrin as the personal payment of his devotion. He tasted again and again the bitterness of hope deferred. Diplomacy blunted his sword, or snatched from his volunteers the victory they had held as sure. His reverses were dramatic. Less than two years after entering Naples side by side with Victor Emmanuel he was shot down at Aspromonte as a rebel.

But when the end came to that life of vicissitude, it was not of Garibaldi's partial successes and half-fulfilled dreams that his countrymen thought. If the unification of Italy had not happened, she would still have mourned her foremost hero—her soldier-lover, who had spent himself in her service. The whole civilised world honoured the finished career of splendid endeavour. It was this that draped the public buildings of Rome in black, caused the legislative bodies to adjourn, and drew a sympathetic message of reverence and love from King Humbert.

Fame gloriously won belongs to the men who have pushed into icy seas in pursuit of a chimera in a workable North-west Passage or to reach the North Pole. It is a record largely of vain expenditure and repulse. But the defeat of these explorers is rightly held more honourable than the success of many with easier problems. The English passion for grappling with difficulties that seem insuperable, and the trait of never knowing when disaster is final, appear on every leaf of this golden book of endeavour. The hearts of Anglo-Saxons at least warm to the men whose thirst for knowledge cannot willingly leave a single secret of the world's surface unfathomed, and who cheerily seek a path to their goal through storm, and Arctic night, and the battering of ice-rams.

They are a large and still increasing company. Burly Martin Frobisher is one of the earliest rash ones. And Sir Humphrey Gilbert, of whose gallant figure sitting abaft on his derelict frigate, the records give us a moving glimpse: a man and a Christian at the moment of failure, for his last stimulating words to his dismayed sailors echo yet: "Courage, my lads! we are as near to heaven by sea as by land." And Henry Hudson, who suffered disaster from mutiny; and William Baffin, whose name was given to the great northern bay; and Sir Edward Parry, of four perilous and persevering ventures; and Sir John Ross; and Sir John Franklin and his companions, whose mysterious fate deeply impressed the popular mind, and made Polar adventure the subject even of cottage talk; and Sir Leopold McClintock, and the other leaders of Franklin search expeditions.

It reads like a catalogue, bare and incomplete. But to it must be added Dr. Kane, who sailed from New York; and Dr. Hayes, also an American; and Lieutenant Long, of the Jeannette, Mr. James Gordon Bennett's unfortunate venture; and Mr. Leigh Smith; and Sir George Nares and his colleagues, sent out by the British Government; and Professor Nordenskjöld, who managed in the Vega to navigate the North-east Passage, and to return to tell the tale.

Success has here and there been attained, and especially in aims aside of the one great lure that has led so many brave voyagers into the northern darkness. But the close-cherished riddle of those bleak seas is unread yet, and assuredly it is not because their hopes were translated into accomplished facts that this endless line of heroes is extolled. The narrative of their deeds is read and re-read for its inspiring influence on sluggish lives, for its help in the kindling of young manhood, for its romance of splendid endeavour.

The blood runs faster through the veins as the intrepid conduct of a Lieutenant Greely is reviewed, and as imagination brings up the scene. On a far-off desert of ice, face to face with starvation, all avenues of either escape or relief blocked, there yet remained patient endurance and the daily effort to hold despair down. All the men were story-tellers by turn, and marvellous yarns they spun. The leader lectured, his subjects taken from a varied programme, scientific to-day, historical to-morrow, then political or religious. There was a perpetual discussion class, and bits of curious lore were pieced together in each man's memory like a mosaic. Sometimes, for lighter fare, they wrote out tasty dishes, to be ordered when home was reached. It was beautiful, brave, pathetic; it brings a mist before the eyes.

There is always pathos as well as conspicuous courage and the sway of character in these vignettes of strenuous effort. The element comes, perhaps, more fully out when the activity of the worker is displayed in a different arena. The honour gained is as real and as large.

Reformers of their age have not invariably succeeded in the task to which they put their hands, though now a halo of reverence surrounds their name. Fra Girolamo Savonarola is an outstanding case in point. The Florentine monk was intensely in earnest, and would have purified State and commonalty. But he practically failed. Not only was his life a sacrifice in the cause of righteousness as he saw it—many martyrs have triumphed by the stake or the cord—but when Savonarola was burnt on a May morning in the Great Piazza, his mastery of his neighbours' actions was already a thing of the past; and soon it would have been hard to trace his influence anywhere amongst the gay crowds of Florence. His spell was broken. Where he had once ruled the daily lives of thousands he seemed forgotten.

But Savonarola's name rests securely on his prodigious attempt, and not on his dubious achievement. Splendid endeavour has made him one of the greatest of the later medieval figures. His preaching was a portent; and not less his stern strife with powers in the long run too strong for him. The hero of those stirring days secures notice and admiration; the failing, discomfited reformer, drawn in "Romola" by George Eliot's pen, asks for pity not unmixed with affection.

The same distinguishing sign is upon many modern careers in art, in literature, and in the whirl of nineteenth-century industry and commerce. It does not follow because praise waits at last upon a sturdy toiler that he has done what he intended with his energies, or that he has always escaped a final and overwhelming discouragement.

The extraordinary life-project of Henry Thomas Buckle was a monumental "History of Civilization in Very fine are the words used in this connection by Dr. J. G. Holland. Writing of Mr. Bowles, an American journalist, after his friend's death, he said: "As I think of my old associate, and the earnest exhausting work he was doing when I was with him, he seems to me like a great golden vessel, rich in colour and

"Courage, my lads! we are as near to heaven by sea as by land."—p. 932.

Europe." But he got no further than the introduction: in itself a sensation for the world of readers, by reason of its novel speculation and wonderful learning. The historian died of fever at Damascus, and the sharp pang at his heart was that of failure. His work was unfinished—fragmentary. "My book! My book!" he wailed. Yet, if Buckle sought renown, he reached it. The proof of his skill, his insight, and his passion for knowledge, had been given; and the observer and the student saw more beyond. They realised the cost of such a beginning. The tribute of fame was paid to the magic of stupendous effort.

Such endeavour is the pouring out of the best wine of manhood without stint, without considering the gift.

roughly embossed, filled with the elixir of life, which he poured out for the consumption of this people." The career of Bowles was one of costly and unflagging effort, and his work, terrible in its drain upon him, was, nevertheless, his one satisfying joy.

Many names occur of recent illustrations of honour's recompense falling less to a clearly defined triumph than to splendid endeavour. John Ericsson succeeded with the Monitor and with similar inventions in America; but perhaps not the least of his claims to remembrance is the long and weary struggle that went before—a struggle to obtain recognition and practical assistance for his schemes in England. He ran George Stephenson close for the fame of the first successful steam locomotive. He was a man of boundless effort, undismayed by defeat. The same words can be used of Robert Browning, a poet who slowly came to his own; of Thorwaldsen, the sculptor; and of Michelet, the historian. The story of their gallant effort is precious to the world.

Only a year or two ago Christian missions lost a leader of this high and constraining type. James Gilmour, of Mongolia, may have dreamed of ripe sheaves gathered in. He did not survive to see them. When he laid his stewardship down it may be doubted if he had half a dozen native converts, after many years of devoted toil. But his life was one of magnificent Christian endeavour, and the fruit of that hard sowing and sparse reaping is still to be seen. It may come in new workers kindled in love and purpose at the fire of his example. The sacrifice is not lost.

Good work may fail of its first end, but not of result. It is much to have attempted well; defeat may be borne with the equanimity, not of the Stoic, but of the man who knows that true endeavour is an educational, uplifting force. Triumph is not the only reward.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

OCTOBER 21ST. A SABBATH IN CAPERNAUM.

To read—St. Mark i. 21—34. Golden Text—verse 22.

INTRODUCTION. Christ is still in Galilee. On the Sabbath day He always attended the Jewish synagogues. On other days He went about teaching and healing, and training His disciples. To-day's lesson finds Him at Capernaum.

I. A SABBATH SERVICE. (21—28.) Where?

At Capernaum, on west side of the Sea of Galilee. Called Christ's "own city," because He stayed long there, probably at St. Peter's house.

Was much favoured—the scene of many miracles. Received much teaching—parables and discourses. Afterwards condemned because it did not repent. Now Christ is present at a service in the synagogue. Psalms recited or sung—Law and Prophets read.

(Acts xiii. 15.)

Christ invited to teach (as at Nazareth). (St. Luke iv. 17.)

Expounds with authority as a Jewish Rabbi.

Service suddenly interrupted—man in a fit.

Possessed of an evil (unclean) spirit—screams out.

Believes in Christ's power; trembles. (James ii. 19.)

Has Jesus come to destroy them? No! only their works, being works of the devil. (1 John iii. 8.)

So Christ bade evil spirit leave this man in peace.

No wonder all amazed. A new and strange power.

Evil spirits have found their Master, and obey Him.

LESSON. Jesus Christ still the same in power.

Other evil spirits abound—envy, pride, self-will.

He can cast them out. Will we not seek His help?

II. A SABBATH EVENING. (29—34.) Service over.

Christ and four apostles enter St. Peter's house.

They went to seek needed rest and refreshment.

What do they find? The mistress of the house ill.

She is down with fever—common then as now.

Christ told of her illness—at once goes to her room.

He has cured evil spirit—can cure evil disease.

All sickness and suffering the result of man's sin.

But all power is given Him in earth and heaven.

How does He heal her? Is not afraid of infection.

He touches her, takes her by the hand, lifts her up.

The fever immediately departs—she is cured.

At once resumes her place as head of the house.

Shows gratitude by ministering to Christ's needs.

The news spreads. Many sick are brought to Him.

Those diseased in body, mind, and soul.

Christ heals all alike, but does not allow the devils to say that they know Him. He bids them be still.

LESSONS. 1. For this cause was the Son of God manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil.

2. "What shall I render to the Lord for all His benefits unto me?"

OCTOBER 28TH. A PARALYTIC HEALED.

To read—St. Mark ii. 1—12. Golden Text—verse 10.

INTRODUCTION. To make this lesson clear, a model, or at least a picture, of an Eastern house should be shown. Point out how the house was built in a square, with a courtyard inside. The front to the street a blank wall, with a low door of entrance. The roof flat, and formed by layers of branches, twigs, matting and earth laid over the flat rafters and trodden down. An outer staircase connects the roof with the ground.

Christ was still travelling through Galilee, visiting numerous towns and villages. Now visits Capernaum again.

I. THE PARALYTIC BROUGHT. (1—4.) Notice: The place—Capernaum. The house—i.e. St. Peter's. The crowd. What had brought them together?

Perhaps the fame of Christ's great miracles.

Perhaps a longing to hear His "gracious words."

He seized the opportunity to preach "the word."
What word? Perhaps "Come unto Me, all ye that are weary and heavy-laden, and I will give you rest."

Perhaps "God so loved the world." (St. John iii. 16.)
Now a litter is seen approaching. What is it?
A paralytic, carried on mattress by four friends.
Crowd too great to get in. What can they do?

Pass up outer staircase, take off part of roof, let the man down by ropes to the room where Christ is.
Notice:

1. Their faith in Christ's power and willingness to heal.
2. Their earnestness—in overcoming all difficulties.
3. Their reward—their friend shall be healed.

II. THE PARALYTIC HEALED. (5—12.) The man.
Had two parts diseased: his soul and his body.
The soul by sin—the body by paralysis.

Which was healed first? Soul—most important.
Christ knew his state, his sorrow, his desire for pardon. Therefore cheered and forgave him at once.
The Scribes. What did they think in their hearts?
Christ knew their thoughts as much as paralytic's.
Answered by a question—"Which is easier to say, Thy sins forgiven, or Arise and walk?"

The former—because not see if result followed.
But He showed He had right to say and do both.
He healed the man by the Divine power of God.
Therefore had power also to forgive his sins.
All could see at once that the man was cured.
He took up his bed, walked, returned to his home.
The crowd. Amazed, rejoiced, and glorified God.

LESSONS. 1. The friends. Teach care for sick.
2. The man. Earnestness in seeking salvation.
What shall a man give in exchange for his soul?

3. Christ. Shows His nature as God and man.
As God—knew thoughts, healed disease, forgave sin.

As man—gave sympathy, love, and help.
4. The crowd. Praised God, from whom all blessings flow.

NOVEMBER 4. JESUS LORD OF THE SABBATH.

To read—St. Mark ii. 23—iii. 5. Golden Text—ii. 28.

INTRODUCTION. After healing the paralytic, Christ taught by the sea-shore. Found Matthew the publican, and called him to be a disciple. Then sat at meat in his house, with many publicans and sinners. The Pharisees were surprised at His mixing with ungodly persons, but Christ told how He came to call sinners to repentance. In to-day's lesson shall see another lesson Christ taught the Pharisees as to the keeping of the Sabbath day.

I. WORKS OF NECESSITY. (23—28.) The story.
The time. The morning of the Sabbath day.

Christ and His disciples walk through corn-fields. They, being hungry, gather and eat some corn.
This allowed by Law of Moses. (Deut. xxiii. 24, 25.)

Now condemned by Pharisees as breaking the Sabbath, did work on that day.

Christ shows from Scriptures how necessity overrides law.

David, pressed by hunger, ate hallowed shewbread. Only allowed to be eaten by priests. (1 Sam. xxi. 6; Ex. xxix. 32.)

Also priests do needful work in the Temple. (St. Matt. xii. 5.)

Therefore works of necessity may be done.
Sabbath made for man's use, rest, and refreshment. Also for regular weekly time for worship of God. Meant as a privilege and blessing, not as a burden. Son of Man, who ordained it, may relax its rules. Man's good is to be preferred to slavish obedience to outward ordinances.

LESSON. "I will have mercy, and not sacrifice."

II. WORKS OF MERCY. (iii. 1—5.) Another Sabbath.

Christ's enemies watched Him in cornfields. Now they watch Him again in synagogue. Christ notices a man with a withered hand. Bids him stand forth in the midst before all. Has silenced Pharisees as to works of necessity. Questions them as to works of mercy on Sabbath. To heal is to do good—not to do so is to do evil. They are silent. Christ looks round in anger. Why? He is angry at their sin—showing unholy temper. He is grieved with them for their hard hearts.

He also (St. Matt. xii. 11) asks what they would do if a sheep fell into a pit. A man is better than a sheep.

Then He bids the man put forth his hand. He believes, tries, finds power to do so come back. His hand is restored whole as the other.

Therefore works of mercy may be done on Sabbath.
LESSONS. What may be done on the Sabbath?

1. Food prepared and eaten. (Ex. xii. 16.)
2. A quiet walk with friends, as Christ and disciples.

3. Worship in God's house.
4. Works absolutely necessary for ourselves.
5. Works of kindness and love for others.

But, in all, "remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy."

NOVEMBER 11. THE TWELVE CHOSEN.

To read—St. Mark iii. 6—19. Golden Text—St. John xv. 16.

INTRODUCTION. The Pharisees, baffled by Christ's answers about the Sabbath, take counsel with the Herodians—partisans of Herod, the Tetrarch, or Governor, of Galilee—how to destroy Jesus. But His hour was not yet come. He had work still to do—a Church to establish, apostles to train, etc.

I. VARIOUS MIRACLES. (6—12.) What a contrast! Pharisees and Herodians plan how to kill Christ. Multitudes crowd around to hear Him and see Him. Where did they all come from?

Jerusalem, the capital, sent its well-to-do citizens. Idumæa, in the south, its wandering Edomites. Beyond Jordan, on the East, came men of Peræa.

Tyre and Sidon, in the north, sent Gentile Canaanites.

What brought them all together?

Fame of miracles, healing all manner of sickness.

Fame of His gracious words—never man so spake.

They crushed round Christ, preventing His addressing them.

So a boat is chartered that He may preach from it (St. Luke v. 2–3), the people sitting on the shore.

Sickness of body yields to His almighty power.

Unclean spirits own Him as the Son of God.

LESSONS. 1. "No weapon formed against Thee shall prosper."

2. "Come unto Me, all ye that are weary and heavy-laden: and I will give you rest."

II. APOSTLES CALLED. (13–19.) Notice:

Christ went up into a mountain. Why?

He continued all night in prayer. (St. Luke vi. 12.)

Thus prepared for the choice of the apostles.

They had already been disciples or learners.

Now to be apostles ("sent out")—missionaries.

They were to preach to all nations the Gospel.

They received new and great power for their work.

Were able to heal the sick and cast out devils.

Notice the names, surnames, and order:—

Simon, called Peter, or "stone," and Andrew his brother.

James and John—"Boanerges," because of fiery nature.

Philip and Bartholomew or Nathanael. (St. John i. 45.)

Matthew, a publican; Thomas, or Didymus ("the twin").

James the Less, and Thaddæus (or Jude) brother of James.

Simon the Canaanite, and Judas Iscariot (or "man Kerioth"), the traitor, always placed last.

Three pairs of brothers and one of friends.

All had same calling, training, knowledge of Christ.

All called to do the same work for their Master.

All watched over and prayed for by Christ.

All lived with Him till His crucifixion.

LESSONS. 1. "Thou shalt guide me with Thy counsel."

2. "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?"

DANIEL AND THE DEN OF LIONS.

WHAT MUST IT HAVE BEEN?

BY SURGEON-GENERAL R. F. HUTCHINSON, M.D.

W<sup>R</sup>ITERS, prose and poetic, and artists, have, in all ages, devoted their pens or brushes to this wonderful theme, and it is strange how their imaginations have run riot in describing or depicting the surroundings of this great miracle. Thus, I have before me the photograph of a picture representing Daniel standing on the rugged floor of a stalactitic cave, and surrounded by five lions, one of which, with Daniel, is gazing at an illumined rift in the right-hand top of the cave, through which, presumably, the "lamentable voice" of Darius is passing into this "antre vaste and wilde." It is strange, moreover, that Daniel and the lions make no attempt to walk out at the mouth of the cave into which you are gazing.

Now, it is evident from the alluvial surroundings of Babylon, e.g., "The plain of Dura" (Dan. iii. 1), that a natural cave or den could not have existed in the immediate vicinity of the royal palace, as required by the sacred narrative. Moreover, the word used by the LXX. wholly contraindicates the idea of a natural cavern; they read here "ton lakkon ton leonton"—lakkos meaning any hollow, a hole, pit, cistern, tank, cellar, storehouse. Further, we are told: "so Daniel was taken up out of the den" (vi. 23); this could not have been out of a cavern (from which he would have had only to walk out easily), but "out of the den" in the royal menagerie.

What then may, nay, must have been the true character of this "den of lions"? During a service of thirty-four years in the Bengal Presidency, I have seen a great deal of all parts of India, and these dens by the score, the lion being represented by the royal Bengal tiger. But on the Bombay side the Guzerat lion (Felis Gonzvattensis) takes the place of the Bengal feline in the menageries of the nobles; and it has this peculiarity, which distinguishes it from the African species—it possesses a bare, cartilaginous termination to the end of its tail, which I have seen and handled.

The natives declare that the lion can convert this cartilaginous termination into a hook wherewith to scratch itself! This assertion must be taken cum grano. When, years ago, Layard published the result of his Assyrian excavations, a cry of incredulity was raised at the so-called claws in the ends of the lions' tails, the existence of which is now fully recognised; and, as just noted, I have seen and handled it, and its difference from the tuft of hair in the African lion is at once apparent.

Return we now to "the den of lions;" every prince, noble, or rich man in India has a paradise (fāradūs), more or less pretentious, attached to his palace, which, in addition to its cypress avenue, groves of choice mangoes (Mangifera Indica), and litchis (Nephelium Litchi), and plantains (Musa Paradisiaca)—"the tree of life" of Scripture—has, almost always, a menagerie of some sort in it; the Royal Bengal Tiger (Tigris regalis) being generally present, single or in pairs.

Reverting to the history of our own kingdom, it will be remembered that royalty long centred in our venerable Tower of London, which, before the removal of its menagerie to the Zoological Gardens, sheltered as well the British lion. Further, we know that our royal standard exhibits in its left upper and right lower compartments the six lions of England, yellow on a scarlet ground; in its left lower compartment, yellow on a blue ground, the harp of Ireland; and in the right upper corner, the red rampant lion of Scotland, upon a yellow ground, and inside (as it were) a double red-barred cage. On the authority of the late Charlotte Elizabeth, in her charming work "Judah's Lion," this lion is supposed to represent our blessed Lord as "The Lion of the tribe of Judah." (Rev. v. 5.)

GROUND PLAN OF AN INDIAN PALACE COURTYARD.

Let us revert to our typical paradise as seen in India. Entering the Sublime Porte (S. on the plan), guarded by a rag-tag native guard, who fall in and present arms in curious fashion, you quickly meet the lower end of a long, nozzle-fountain tank, bordered on each side by cypresses; perhaps five hundred yards up, the tank is succeeded by a basin fountain, and that, again, by a nozzle tank running up to the northern gate. The palace stands, say, on the eastern face of the enclosure, with an entrance into it; on each side of the path are the dens. These are all of the same height, and on a three to four feet plinth; their roof is about twenty feet above the ground, and, built of stout masonry, forms a spacious promenade, reached by masonry steps at either end, and adorned with flowering shrubs in large earthen or half-cask pots. The dens are faced with one- to one-and-a-half-inch iron rods, about three inches apart from one another, and may be fifteen feet high above the plinth, which is often arched for free ventilation below.

The animals, muffled in sacks, are almost invariably lowered through a locked trapdoor in the roof above, three feet square, and flush with the roof, through which the food of the animals is passed.

This trap, being flush with the flat roof, can easily be locked, or, as in the narrative, sealed as well with the signet ring (daktulios, LXX.) of the king and his lords (megistanōn, nobles, LXX.).

Such was the den into which the faithful Daniel was lowered in the evening, and left to his fate, and the parting words of the heathen king were as full of faith as was the non-resistance of Daniel—

"Thy God whom thou servest continually,
He will deliver thee."

Reluctantly

"The king went to his palace,
And passed the night fasting:
Neither were instruments of music brought before him:
And his sleep went from him."

Anticipating the dawn,

"The king arose very early in the morning,
And went in haste unto the den of lions," and finds all dark and silent; in an agony of anxiety he cries out with a "lamentable voice" (vi. 20) ("shouted with a strong voice," LXX.)—

"O Daniel, servant of the living God,
Is thy God, whom thou servest continually,
Able to deliver thee from the lions?"

Immediately the welcome reply in the affirmative reaches the king's ears through the gloom, and quickly he commands the lifting up of Daniel through the trap by two rope slings, one under each arm, and the miraculous non-interference of the lions continues until Daniel is landed safe on the roof, and then the trap is closed, to be reopened shortly for a more fearful tragedy, involving the two presidents (taktikos, LXX., Dan. vi. 2) and the satraps, and their innocent wives and children, and, one by one, all are dropped into the den:—

"And the lions had the mastery of them,
And brake all their bones in pieces
Or ever they came at the bottom of the den."

That is, the hungry lions, springing up, would seize and maul each individual, as he or she passed through the fatal trap, and then devour at leisure.

The cries of the victims must have reached the ears of Darius the Mede in his palace. I do not think Daniel was aware of the execution, or he would have interceded at once for the innocent women and children.

A GOOD-FOR-NOTHING COUSIN.

BY MARGARET S. FAILL.

CHAPTER XVII.

RACHEL'S SUCCESSES.

IT was Saturday afternoon, and Jack, who had arrived by the boat, was walking up the glen with his two sisters. Rachel was smiling and animated. "It was so nice to have a brother," she remarked; but Ruth, who was suffering from the loss of one, was abstracted and silent. Jack suggested that they should strike through the fields and go home by the river, as Rachel had never been by that way yet.

They had barely reached the tree-covered banks when Ruth started slightly on hearing voices approaching. Instinctively she guessed to whom they belonged, and the next minute Mr. Matthew and Gordon appeared.

The eye of the former fell on Ruth at once, and for one dreadful moment the girl wondered if he really meant to cut her dead before them all. In reality, however, the artist did not hesitate. He lifted his hat, and held out his hand instantly.

"How do you do?" he said, in rather a low tone; but the grasp of his hand was quite like old times. "We were going up to see you."

The sudden relief from her apprehension brought a rush of colour into Ruth's face, but she managed to respond without otherwise betraying her feelings. The greetings of the others and the introduction of Rachel covered any awkwardness which might have been apparent; and then the whole party strolled along the river-bank together.

Rachel's lively chatter made it unnecessary for anyone else to speak much; but when they reached a shallow part of the river, where the trees grew so close to the edge that there was no way of proceeding but by the stones in the stream, the group was obliged to break up. Ruth jumped on to an insecure-looking stone, and from thence to one more steady, with the ease and agility of custom; but Rachel stood on the bank, regarding the water apprehensively.

"Oh, Jack, help me!" she cried, as her brother was preparing to stride on. "I never could get out there alone."

Jack turned back, and held out his hand indulgently. "It is quite easy," he said. "See, the stones are perfectly firm."

Still Rachel hesitated. She put one little hand in her brother's, but did not offer to jump.

"Suppose my foot should slip?" she suggested fearfully.

"Let me take your other hand," said Gordon

"Rachel, thus supported, consented to brave the dangers of the stream."—p. 939.

eagerly, offering his; and then Rachel, thus supported, consented to leave the bank and brave the dangers of the stream.

Mr. Matthew, who had already started, turned to point out which were the steadiest stones, so that Ruth, from a good way in advance, glancing over her shoulder to see what had become of everybody, got a full view of the little group. Rachel was clinging to the sustaining hands which were carefully guiding her, while Mr. Matthew indicated the safest route. The three men were all smiling indulgently, and reassuring Rachel, who emitted little frightened exclamations.

It struck Ruth that they all looked rather silly; and surely Rachel was making a ridiculous fuss about crossing shallow water!—which could not have covered more than her ankles, even if she had stepped in.

"Are you quite sure that you tried this stone?" she was calling to the artist: "it looks so slippery.—Oh, Mr. Gordon, hold my hand tightly, or I shall fall."

But it made Ruth feel lonely to see how completely they had forgotten her. More than ever she missed Lance, who might have been counted upon to be at her side although all the others deserted her.

When Rachel and her attendant cavaliers at last reached the bank, the former declared that she was thankful to be on firm ground again, and that nothing would tempt her to repeat the same journey.

They all went up to the house together, and Mrs. Lennox invited the two men to wait for tea—to Rachel's unconcealed satisfaction. It slightly irritated Ruth to see how delighted her sister was at the prospect of their society. The young lady even took more pains with her toilet than usual—if that was possible. She picked up a box of soft white feathers, and knotting it loosely in front, surveyed the effect in the mirror.

"I don't really need it," she explained to Ruth, "but as I'm half an invalid yet, I'll wear it. It relieves this horrid black, you see."

Down-stairs in the evening it was the same as it had been in the afternoon; Rachel made herself the centre of everything. She looked wonderfully pretty, with her sparkling eyes and smiling lips, from which issued such gay laughter and saucy speeches.

"You might play something, Rachel," her aunt said, after some time.

"Oh, not yet, auntie—ask Ruth," returned Rachel, who was talking to Gordon at the moment.

"Nonsense!" declared the old lady energetically. "You know that you are fond of playing. Why don't you do it without needing persuasion?"

"Well, auntie, you don't leave anybody time to persuade me," Rachel said, rising with a little pout, which was, however, clearly put on.

She sat down willingly enough on the piano-stool which the artist pulled out for her, and, running her fingers over the keys, she dashed off a brilliant waltz. She played beautifully: everyone sat still and listened; and when she had finished, Mr. Matthew went over to the piano to ask if she could play something from one of his favourite operas. It appeared that she could, and soon the room was filled with melody. Gradually the three men gathered round the piano—even Jack, who had never before been known to care for music, asked Rachel to play something which he especially fancied.

It seemed as if she could play anything. She acceded to first one request, and then another, her pretty white fingers, with their sparkling rings, skimming over the notes, to the great wonder and admiration of Katie, who had joined the admiring circle.

Ruth sat apart on the distant sofa, undergoing a new experience. She was not accustomed to be thus left alone. Formerly she had been first with these same people, who now seemed totally to forget her. She could appreciate poor Katie's feeling which had made her remark that she did not like to walk with Rachel. Surely this could not be unworthy jealousy? Hitherto Ruth had never suffered from this tormenting pain.

Just then Rachel, who was preparing to sing a duet with Mr. Matthew—the only musical one among the men—looked over her shoulder at Miss Douglas.

"You know who sings 'Don Giovanni' so well, auntie?" she said, with a smile.

"I suppose he does," Miss Douglas returned; "but then, you think he sings everything well."

"So he does," Rachel declared, beginning to play again.

They meant Archie: Ruth was sure of it—he sang beautifully.

And so he sang duets with Rachel! If he were here, he too would be hanging over the piano; and by the sudden pang which this thought gave her, Ruth could no longer disguise her feeling from herself—it was jealousy. All the others might go, if only Archie could be left. But she was ashamed of this feeling, and tried to fight against it. She could sympathise now with Mr. Matthew's anger, which had made him accuse her of loving someone else. Her own suffering, which was something similar, enabled her to see how much he had been a subject for pity. She bent over her work, with tears not far from her eyes, and did not notice that one of the group had left the piano, and was approaching her. The song was over, but the music kept rippling on, with no meaning now to Ruth's ears.

It was with a sudden start that she looked up as a shadow fell between her and the light, and a voice addressed her.

It was Mr. Matthew who stood in front of her.

"I am afraid we have been very selfish," he was saying, in a low tone. "All this music and noise seems like forgetting poor Lance."

"Oh, it is I who am selfish," Ruth said hurriedly, brushing away a tear. "I can't expect people to mourn for ever." Mr. Matthew sat down on the sofa beside her, but for a minute he said nothing. At last, with apparently an effort, he began—

"Miss Ruth, I wonder if I may ask your pardon?"

"My pardon!" Ruth said hastily. "Oh, Mr. Matthew, I ought to ask yours. I have been so sorry ever since."

"We made a mistake," the artist assented sadly; "but I was too hard and unforgiving—even that Saturday morning I saw Lance start in the boat, but would not notice him, because of my quarrel with you. When I came to that poor boy's funeral I felt ashamed to think of my conduct, and realised that life is too short to harbour such bitter, unforgiving feelings."

His voice expressed deep contrition; and Ruth, looking at him, seemed to see her old friend again, whom she thought she had lost for ever.

"Mr. Matthew," she said impulsively, holding out her hand, "let us say no more about it. We are friends now, and have forgiven one another."

The artist took the offered hand, and held it for a few minutes in a warm clasp.

"Yes," he said, looking at the girl half sadly—"always friends, after this. Let us forgive and forget."

CHAPTER XVIII.

A FAMILY PARTY.

RACHEL'S expected visitor, who proved to be Major Webster, had come and gone. He had promised to return this afternoon to take the girls for a drive, and Ruth was hurrying home in order to be in time. She had rather liked the little major, who was very clearly in love with her sister. Some words of his, however, which she had accidentally overheard, haunted her memory unpleasantly. She had been passing Miss Douglas and Major Webster, who were deep in conversation, when the latter said quite distinctly, apparently in answer to a question: "Yes, Douglas was staying with me last autumn; but I'm sorry to say the poor fellow didn't behave any better. I'm afraid it will come to—" But Ruth had resolutely shut the door, and heard no more. This was quite sufficient, though. It corroborated too distinctly the former tale she had heard.

She was thinking of this as she hurried home from the farm, and entered by the back door, which was the quickest way. A hum of voices, amongst which a masculine tone was discernible, proceeded from the parlour, and proclaimed to Ruth that the visitor had arrived—not the expected visitor, though, she discovered at once. The figure which she beheld through the half-open door was a tall one. It was Archie Douglas, who stood bending his head, with a smile, to listen to what some unseen occupant of the room was saying. The sun streamed in through the window and shone on his fair curly hair and bright face, while Rachel's voice, in its gayest tones, was distinctly audible. The moment had come at last when Ruth could see those two together; but a strange unwillingness to witness any more took possession of her. But she could not stand at the door looking in. She might be seen; so, after a scarcely perceptible pause, and with a beating heart, she entered the room. Archie looked up at once, and saw her. He came forward quickly, holding out his hand.

"How do you do, Cousin Ruth?" he said. "You see, I am back again, as I told you. Did you expect me so soon?"

Ruth did not know what answer she made, or whether she was blushing, or behaving naturally.

"What!" she heard Miss Douglas's voice exclaim, breaking sharply through her momentary confusion, "did Ruth know you were coming? She never said a word about it to any of us."

"Perhaps she didn't think I should come," said the young man, still looking at the girl. "I'm afraid she doesn't always trust to my word."

"I didn't know when to expect you," Ruth murmured, moving away to a seat.

"And so it is 'Cousin Ruth,' but not 'Cousin Rachel,'" said Miss Douglas, still with the same note of sharpness in her voice. "How does that happen?"

"Well, Aunt Douglas, I think you have informed me that Rachel was not my cousin," said the young man gravely. "As for Ruth"—and his lips broke into a smile again—"I introduced myself as a cousin at once, as she had never heard of me. It made me so much more welcome; and since then no one has ever shown any desire to repudiate me."

As he spoke, he looked, with a half-mischievous twinkle in his eyes, into the clouded face of the old lady, who, on her part, showed a momentary embarrassment; and then said hastily—"Ah, I don't doubt that you consider they are honoured by having such a fine young man as yourself for a relation. Perhaps if they knew you as well as I do their opinion might be different. I have a few words to say to you, my young gentleman."

"Is it about any recent offence?" Archie asked, with a shade of anxiety in his tone; "or is it an old story?"

"Your own guilty conscience can tell you," Miss Douglas replied, giving him a sharp look. "If you had been behaving well lately, you wouldn't ask."

"Then it isn't new?" he said, with evident relief. "I was only going to point out," he went on politely, "that unless it was a very recent sin, I am sure you must have spoken about it before. I can't remember any you ever omitted. I know you have always done your duty by such a thankless subject as myself"—and his eyes gleamed with suppressed merriment. "But"—and he approached the old lady with a coaxing face, and changed his tone to a persuasive one—"must it be an open court-martial? Won't a private admonition do instead?"

Miss Douglas looked up into the face of this engaging sinner, but evidently found herself unable to resist him, for her lips relaxed into a half-unwilling smile. Rachel jumped up and ran to her aunt, throwing a caressing arm about her neck.

"Now, auntie," she cried, "you mustn't begin to scold him the minute he arrives. I won't allow you to be so cross."

"Ah!" said Archie, "now I am safe, for you never refuse my advocate anything."

Ruth looked quickly at Rachel as she hung over her aunt's chair, looking prettier than she had ever done before. Her whole face shone with a soft radiance, which it certainly had not done for Major Webster. This could have but one meaning. Ruth felt a tightening at her heart as she turned her eyes in Archie's direction, to see if her fears would be confirmed. The young man was seating himself, with the smile still hovering on his lips; but before Ruth could observe anything farther, the door opened, and Major Webster was shown into the room.

"Hulloa, Webster!" said Archie, when it came to his turn to greet his brother-officer. "What brings you to these regions?"

"Well, Douglas," returned the other, "I didn't expect to find you here;" and they eyed one another for a minute in silence, when Archie burst out laughing.

"I had to run over here on business," Major Webster declared hastily; "but what brings you?"

"Now, Ruth"—and he turned expectantly to her—"haven't you a remark to contribute too?"

"What is the use?" she asked, with a slight smile. "The treat is so obvious."

"I call that very ambiguous," Archie declared, shaking his head. "I shall ask for an explanation later on.—But what's the matter with you, Webster, old fellow? You look as if you had something on your mind. Is it a bouquet outside? Have it in, and don't mind me."

"Even took more pains than usual with her toilet."—p. 339.

"I might say business too," Archie said meaningly; "but we needn't give the same excuse for the same—hem!" and he coughed and interrupted himself. "No; I am here on pleasure," he went on. "I'm used up, and require change of air."

"Ah!" said his friend, regarding him with some suspicion; "you look pretty well."

"Well, the truth is," Archie went on undauntedly, "I came to visit my relatives, and give them a treat." And he looked blandly round, as if for confirmation of his words.

"We are always pleased to see you," Mrs. Lennox murmured.

"Oh, what conceit!" cried Rachel. "What fishing for compliments!"

"You are a nice, modest young man, to be sure!" said Miss Douglas; "and we ought to be grateful to you for your treat;" but she smiled as she spoke, for it was impossible to take offence at Archie's manner.

One would have thought that Archie was the superior officer of the two, from the way in which he patronised the other, and remained master of the situation. Ruth wondered, with slight amusement, if he always managed to carry things before him in this easy fashion. But the major roused up at this chaffing.

"No," he replied; "I have left something larger than a bouquet outside; it is my horse and trap. The young ladies kindly promised to come for a drive—not expecting your arrival, I suppose."

"Hulloa! your horse and trap!" exclaimed Archie. "Then your business is on this side of the loch? I thought you were over at your own place;" and he gave the other man an amused look. "I suppose," he added, "there isn't a seat for me, as nobody invites me?"

"There are four places," began the owner of the dog-cart; but at this, poor Katie, who had been listening anxiously, started up hurriedly.

"Oh, but I was going!" she exclaimed. "Rachel said I might."

"Well, that's settled, then," said Archie, putting out his hand and drawing the little girl to him. "Don't be afraid, Katie; I wouldn't for the world be so selfish as to take your place now;" and with an arm round Katie, he looked over at the sofa where the other girls sat. "Does anyone wish to stay at home with me?"

He asked the question most invitingly, and looked so smiling and handsome that perhaps both girls in their hearts would have liked to wait; yet neither spoke. Which of them did he wish? Ruth wondered. She knew very well that the other man desired Rachel for his companion; but suppose Archie did also? But while she hesitated, Major Webster solved the difficulty.

"We might all go for a walk instead," he suggested good-naturedly. "I could take my horse to the nearest farm, and put him up there."

This proposal seemed to meet with general approval, and was agreed to at once.

"Now, if that isn't like Archie Douglas!" declared Miss Douglas emphatically. "No matter what the arrangements are, they are always changed to suit him. In all his life I don't believe he ever wanted anything without getting it."

"Perhaps I hold my tongue when I don't get my own way," suggested the young man; "and it is only the people who cry out who get any sympathy."

"Sympathy, indeed!" scoffed the old lady. "You are a likely person to require sympathy. In all my experience of you, you either took your own way or wheedled someone else into letting you have it. I'm sure I don't know what you have done to deserve such luck."

"Oh, you frighten me," said Archie, in mock alarm. "If I ever had any luck you'll chase it away by talking like that; and the next thing that will happen will be a crushing disappointment to me at the most important crisis in my life."

"Oh, I don't believe you're afraid," laughed Rachel, as they went out of the room.

It had indeed struck Ruth also that Archie was too confident. The other man seemed doubtful of himself at times, and occasionally regarded his junior with a shade of apprehension in his look; but Archie's ease and tranquillity were complete.

"Suppose you take Katie to the farm with you," he suggested, as Major Webster was unfastening his horse from the gate to which it was tied. "She has been disappointed of her drive; and we can stroll down after you."

So Katie—much to her delight—was lifted up, and the dog-cart drove off. Archie walked between the two sisters; but it was Rachel who had most to say.

"How was it that you didn't see Major Webster at the hotel?" she asked. "He is staying there just now."

"I didn't go to the hotel," Archie replied. "I came straight here from the boat, and sent my things there. May I be allowed to smoke a cigar?"

"Yes, of course," Rachel said pleasantly; "you know I like it."

"Perhaps Ruth doesn't," the young man said, as she did not speak.

"Oh yes, I do," Ruth replied, but feeling aware that her speech did not sound so gracious as Rachel's.

Something seemed to prevent her from saying pleasant things; and the gayer her sister was the more silent she became. They soon encountered Katie and Major Webster returning; and when they all set off on their walk, Ruth found that somehow or other this gentleman was her companion. It was clearly the fault of neither; yet there they were, and had to make the best of the arrangement. If the other pair had desired any private conversation together, they were in no better condition, as Katie elected to take hold of her cousin's hand, and nothing short of a plain dismissal could possibly have dislodged her. When the two men were taking their departure, about six o'clock in the evening, Archie approached Ruth, and spoke a few words in a low tone.

"At what hour do you go for the letters, Ruth?" he asked.

"Oh, at any hour," she replied. "We are very irregular."

"Shall you go to-morrow afternoon?" he suggested hurriedly; for Miss Douglas was looking over in his direction, and waiting to shake hands with him.

"Perhaps, I don't know," was all Ruth could say; and then he had to drop her hand and move on to the others.

CHAPTER XIX.

IN DISGRACE.

It was three o'clock in the afternoon, and although Ruth had received her letters, she seemed inclined to linger about the post-office. She accepted a seat which commanded a view of the village street, right up to the hotel door. She sat looking out for fully ten minutes; but the whole place might have been asleep for any sign of life that was visible.

Uninteresting as her post had been, Ruth rose from it at length, with some reluctance, and moved rather slowly down the street. When she reached the turn where her road branched off, she paused for a moment, and glanced once more behind her, when someone striding rapidly down the hill almost ran into her. She turned hastily, and found herself facing Archie. At the first glance she had time to observe that his face was clouded over, and his lips firmly set, as if in anger; but when he caught sight of her, he smiled and held out his hand.

"I beg your pardon, Ruth," he said, "for nearly knocking you down."

"Was I invisible, then?" Ruth asked, hoping her blush was not too apparent.

"You were round the corner, you know," he said; "but the truth is, I was in a bad temper, and wasn't looking where I was going. Couldn't you walk along the loch a little way with me? I wish to speak to you."

"Not about the bad temper, I hope?" Ruth said, completely recovering her composure as she noted his expression.

"Well, partly"—and a sudden gleam of fun shone momentarily through his clouded countenance. But it was only a flash, and vanished immediately. "Perhaps, though," he went on, "you won't have anything to do with me either, as I'm in disgrace."

"In disgrace?"

A chill feeling of apprehension seized on Ruth at this announcement, but Archie went on speaking.

"Confound Webster and his long tongue!" he burst out vigorously. "Why couldn't the fellow leave my affairs alone? But he must needs go talking about me."

"What did he say?" Ruth asked hurriedly.

"Then you haven't heard?" Archie said, turning round. "I thought Aunt Douglas would have proclaimed my misdemeanours at once."

"I haven't seen her since Major Webster called," Ruth said. "I left the house while he was in."

"Well, I suppose you are wondering what has put me into such a beastly bad temper?" and the young man's cane energetically dashed every unoffending stone out of the way, as if the exercise relieved his angry feelings; "but if you had been shown the door as I was, you might excuse me. To my mind it would put any fellow out."

Even in the midst of her excitement and fears, Ruth was seized with a sudden desire to laugh at these words. That Archie—Archie, who was always received with open arms—should be dismissed; the idea seemed too absurd to be true. He looked at her, and catching sight of the irrepressible mirth in her eyes, said reproachfully—

"Oh, Ruth! you are laughing at me. I call that unkind of you. It wasn't at all a pleasant experience, I assure you."

"I couldn't help it, Archie," Ruth said penitently, dropping her eyes, in which still lurked a smile. "I am sorry for you; but when you spoke in such a tone, it was too much for me. Won't you tell me all about it? and then I can sympathise."

"Let us go down here, then," he said; and slipping his hand through Ruth's arm, turned her steps in the direction of a little bay on the shore.

The trees grew down to the water's edge, and formed a sheltered nook, quite hidden from view of the road. The leaves were opening out into the tenderest green, while the grass at their feet was dotted with primroses and white anemones. It was an ideal spring day. Ruth sat down on a fallen tree, while Archie placed himself opposite to her.

"When I went up to your house this afternoon," he began, "I saw at once I was in for something, for Aunt Douglas didn't take the trouble even to be decently civil. I tried to be extra polite; but it was no use. She fell upon me almost immediately; and I knew that Webster had been wagging his tongue. The texts and epithets that were flung at my head ('good-for-nothing' was one of them) were quite wonderful. I couldn't get in a word for myself anyhow; so I thought I would wait until my aunt's breath gave out. However"—and he smiled grimly—"she was too clever for me, and took care to have the last word. When she had fully relieved her mind, she rose up, and said, 'Now, Archie Douglas, I wash my hands of you'; and with that, she marched out of the room. Naturally, there was nothing left for me to do but to follow her example, so I took my departure—if I may so describe it, after being pretty well kicked out."

"Did you know what Miss Douglas meant?" Ruth asked, not much enlightened by Archie's tale. "What had Major Webster said?"

"That I thought of leaving the army, for one thing."

"Leaving the army!" and Ruth started. "Why?"

"That was what I have been wishing to tell you," Archie replied, in a slightly uncertain tone; "but Aunt Douglas has rather spoilt my story, and made me begin in the wrong place."

He stopped speaking, and vigorously poked a hole in the ground with his cane; and for several minutes there was no sound but the twitter of the birds and the gentle murmur of the water. What had become of Archie's self-confident ease? His eyes were on the ground, and he seemed to find some difficulty in speaking. Was he about to make his confession?

"I have made a bad start," he said at length, lifting his eyes, "and had intended to begin very differently; but I think you know, Ruth, what I am going to say."

Ruth shook her head; but suddenly, as she met the soft gleam of his blue eyes, the colour rushed into her face. It was not shame, but a very different emotion, which shone in the young man's glance. He rose and came over beside her. "Ruth"—and his voice was soft and tender—"I think you do know. You remember when I was here in winter I tried to tell you, but the artist prevented me. When I sang to you I thought you would understand. You knew that I loved you, and I hoped—Ruth," and his voice was very low, "is it Yes or No?"

His voice thrilled through her. He loved her, and had done so all along. Had she not, in truth, known it, as he said? She could not have told what answer she made, or what happened during the next few minutes. She was vaguely conscious of her happiness, and that Archie was holding her hand.

"I had almost despaired of telling you," he was saying. "Everything seemed to conspire against me; and last time I came you were in too much trouble about Lance for me to speak of other things. Even yesterday I had to ask Webster what he meant by walking off with you; and the fellow actually told me that I had walked off with Rachel. It was then that I told him about my hopes."

"Do you know, Archie," said Ruth, "I made the same mistake as Major Webster."

"What!" he exclaimed incredulously, "you thought that I came to see Rachel? What could possibly make you think that?"

"Several things," Ruth replied, and then stopped. She was not going to tell that her opinion had been helped by what her sister had said. "One reason was," she began again, "I accidentally heard somebody talking about you, and he said you were engaged—or almost engaged—to Rachel. Then"—and she hesitated slightly—"when you told Aunt Lennox that Rachel was much prettier than I am—"

"I never said so," interrupted Archie, "or thought it either," he declared emphatically. "Your aunt asked me if Rachel was good-looking, and I said somebody considered her the prettiest girl in England. I might have said two people—herself and her aunt."

"Oh, Archie!"

"Well, I shouldn't say so, perhaps; but you know it is true." Then he went on, after a pause: "And I suppose Aunt Douglas helped that opinion of yours, and expatiated on my extravagance at the same time?"

"Yes," Ruth assented; but she was not yet thoroughly reassured on the subject. "But surely," she persisted, "there was something in it!—some flirtation, at least?"

"Now, Ruth," he remonstrated, "you look as grave as if it were a serious affair. I don't say a word about that fellow Gordon, who's always hanging about you."

Ruth thought of Mr. Matthew, and blushed. Archie saw the blush, and smiled. "Oh, I'm not going to complain now," he said; "but if I ever flirted with Rachel—mind, I don't admit it—it was before I knew you. Since then, I give you my word, Ruth, I've thought only of you. Perhaps, though, as I don't know what Aunt Douglas has been saying, I had better explain all about it."

"You've heard of all the money which has been spent on me? No? Then I must begin at the beginning. When I was a youngster Aunt Douglas quarrelled with your father, and announced that I was to be her heir. I spent most of my time with her; and then she sent me to Rugby. It was over the holidays that she quarrelled with my mother, who naturally wished to have me at home occasionally. Aunt Douglas, however, objected, and said she must have the entire disposal of me, or none at all; so in the end I was packed off and Rachel sent for. This time she stipulated that not a creature was to have anything to do with Rachel but herself."

"Some time after, the quarrel was patched up, and Aunt Douglas still went on paying for my education (I certainly owe her that), and she intimated that I was to go into the army, and she would eventually do something for me. No doubt she was fond of me, and has been very kind in her own way—but everything must be exactly her way. Afterwards it occurred to her that Rachel and I might marry, and so keep all the money together. My mother agreed to this plan, and I used often to be invited there; and then—" The young man paused reflectively for a moment, and then looked at Ruth with the bright sunny look which she knew so well. "And then, Ruth," he said softly, pressing her hand, "I met you, and you know the rest."

"Ah, Archie!" she said, "I am afraid I have interfered with everybody's plans."

"Not with mine, dearest," he assured her smilingly. "There, I've been lucky again, and got what I wanted. But I must tell you about my prospects," he proceeded, with more gravity. "My father knew about my hopes and wishes, and he advised me either to leave the army and go into his business or exchange into a regiment going to India, and he would give me a sufficient allowance to live upon. The former plan would make us richer; so what do you say, Ruth?"

"Oh, Archie!" she cried, "I don't care about being rich myself; it is what you would like. I think you are fond of your profession, so I shouldn't like you to give it up for me."

For a long time they sat discussing their plans and other things of less importance, but which seemed of great moment to them, and then they relapsed into silence. To Ruth the whole world seemed glorified by her own happiness. The sky was clear and the air soft and balmy, while the very birds sang more joyously than usual. Suddenly Archie's voice roused her from her dreams.

"Ruth," he said, "I have always wished to know why you were so changed?—that day I arrived in winter."

Ruth started slightly, and felt her face change.

"Was I changed?" she said evasively, as Archie was looking straight at her, awaiting a reply.

"Yes. At first I thought you were vexed because I hadn't come when I promised. Was that the reason?"

Ruth would have given anything to be able to say "Yes"; but she could not tell an untruth. She shook her head and said nothing.

"But you had some reason, Ruth?" he persisted.

"I had just been overhearing that conversation about you and Rachel," she said hurriedly, hoping he would ask no more.

"And what did they say: that I was paying attention to Rachel?" he asked, seeing that she had stopped. "Was that all?" But he saw from her face that there was more, and went on. "Perhaps they gave a summary of my character and faults at the same time?"

"Yes," Ruth admitted reluctantly.

"Well, and what were they? Extravagance? vanity? love of pleasure?—come, let's have the worst at once."

He spoke playfully, and with a smile; but as he saw by Ruth's still averted face and downcast eyes that this was not all, he became grave, and dropped his bantering tone.

"What!" he said, "worse still? What other crime was I accused of?"

"I wish you wouldn't ask me, Archie," she said desperately. "It doesn't matter now."

"Yes, Ruth, I think it does," he declared gravely. "I think you ought to tell me, as you evidently believed it."

How hard, how very hard, it was to put into words. Ruth grew hot, and then cold, but could not bring herself to speak. Archie waited patiently, but with his eyes fixed on her face in a way which did not help her embarrassment.

"Come, Ruth," he said at last: "surely it is very dreadful when you are afraid to tell me?"

There was no help for it now; she must speak. Archie was not to be put off.

"They said," she began hesitatingly, "that you—you—" but she could find no suitable words, and came to a stop.

Then she gathered courage, and rushed desperately at her subject.

"They said you took too much champagne one day, and made a scene over Rachel, and had to leave the place."

Her own words, in spite of her efforts to soften them, sounded so offensive in her ears, that she stopped. For some seconds after there was a dreadful pause. Ruth shivered; but from Archie there came not the slightest sound. At last she ventured to glance at him, and met his eye fixed sternly on her.

"Did you believe it?"

The tone was hard, and sounded unlike Archie's voice.

"I did not know what to think," she said faintly.

"But you believed it?"

Ruth did not speak. She kept her eyes fixed on the ground, but was aware that Archie's steady glance never left her face.

"Then I am answered," he said, in the same hard tone. "Might I ask if you made quite sure that they were speaking of me before you judged?"

"I don't think I judged," she said, casting a look of entreaty at him; "but they certainly spoke of you. They mentioned your name, and said you were a relation of Rachel's, and were in the Seaforths."

"And was that all?"

"Oh, Archie! please don't speak like that," she said imploringly. "I didn't wish to repeat it, but you insisted."

He waited in silence for her to proceed.

"Then," went on Ruth, seeing no sign of softening in his inflexible face, "I heard Miss Douglas and Rachel refer to it; and Major Webster said that when you were staying with him last autumn——"

"I was assisted up-stairs every other night?" Archie finished grimly. "So you collected plenty of evidence, I see;" and he rose up.

"I didn't collect it," declared Ruth indignantly. "Nobody said a word to me, and I couldn't help overhearing."

"No; nor believing. So you have had a fine opinion of me all along—a fellow who makes a row in public, and a fool of himself in his friend's house! I wonder you weren't afraid to have anything to do with me."

Archie's tone was bitter, and he stood looking down at her with an expression of angry sarcasm, which disturbed her greatly. Had she misunderstood what was said? or what was the mistake? But he offered no explanation.

"Then it was all a mistake, I suppose?" she said, looking up at him.

"You suppose!" he cried, and his eyes flashed angrily. "Hadh't you better ask me to swear it isn't true?—it only wants that! How often must I say no? No, I'm not a saint, but I don't behave like that. Hang it! I stood being badgered by Aunt Douglas, but I didn't expect this from you," and with that he turned on his heel and strode away.

"Quite hidden from view of the road."—p. 943

For a few minutes Ruth's predominant feeling was one of dismay. Had Archie really gone in anger? But she was relieved, too. It was impossible to doubt his indignant denial. Whatever the mistake had been, it was clear that Archie was not guilty. Had she ever in her heart quite believed him so? Surely she would not have accepted him so willingly if there had not been always a lingering hope in her mind that the words of the others might be explained away.

Poor Archie! he had had a bad time to-day: it was no wonder he was angry. Ruth hoped that he would return soon, and then she might try to make up for all he had gone through. But Archie did not come back.

The sun got low and it became quite chilly before Ruth finally gave him up, and rose from the spot which had looked so radiant but a short time since, and now was dull and desolate.

CHAPTER XX.

THE TRUTH.

HALF-WAY up the glen Ruth met Gordon. As they shook hands, it struck her that he looked rather gloomy, which was the more noticeable as lately he had appeared almost bright.

"Have you been up at the house?" she asked, wondering if Miss Douglas could possibly have given him a bad reception also.

He was not a relative, and could hardly, one would think, have been treated to the same freedom of speech as Archie.

"No," Gordon replied, and then added, with an evident effort, "I met your sister and Major Webster on the hill."

A certain hardness in his tone caught Ruth's ear, and instantly she guessed what had taken place. Gordon must have been made to feel de trop, or, at all events, received some wound to his self-love. It had not escaped Ruth's notice that her old admirer had deserted her for Rachel—indeed, his devotion to the latter young lady had been obvious to everybody; but Ruth had always suspected that he had been misled by her sister's delightfully gushing manner into thinking himself more favoured than was the case.

Possibly an interview with the object of his admiration and one of her most eligible admirers had opened Gordon's eyes to the truth—he certainly looked as if he had been having a bad quarter of an hour, and when he spoke, the abrupt announcement he made did not tend to lessen the impression.

"I go back to town to-morrow, Miss Douglas," he said solemnly, "so I am glad to have met you, as I find I have not time to call before leaving."

"To-morrow—so soon?" Ruth murmured, and he noticed a lovely blush suffusing her cheeks.

Did she care, then? he wondered, with quickened interest, and a sudden return of his former admiration. How pretty she looked, with her long dark lashes lowered over her brilliant eyes! How much more expressive was her face than that of her little flirt of a sister!

But at the sound of a step he turned from the contemplation of his companion, and his vanity received another shock as he beheld the tall figure of Archie Douglas, which explained the reason of Ruth's blush.

Gordon's brows contracted into a frown, but the younger man did not return his angry look; indeed, he scarcely seemed to see him. He raised his cap, but his eyes travelled on to Ruth.

"I have been hurrying after you, Ruth," he said, in a penitent tone of voice, "and was afraid I should be too late to overtake you."

"I thought you would come, Archie: I waited for you;" and the soft light in her eyes was a revelation to Gordon, who stood and looked at the pair.

He might have been a stick or a stone, for all the notice they took of him. They seemed to have completely forgotten his presence—he was not even in the way.

"I shall walk up with you, Ruth—I wish to speak to you," said Archie; and Gordon thought they were going to move on without another glance at him.

But Ruth remembered his existence.

"Good-bye, Mr. Gordon," she said, holding out her hand; and Archie, again lifting his cap, saluted him quite pleasantly—evidently he had nothing to fear from him now.

Before Gordon had fairly turned away, he saw the young man bend towards Ruth and begin talking eagerly.

"Ruth," he commenced at once, "I beg your pardon for losing my temper, and going off in a rage as I did; but, you see, Aunt Douglas had put me out already."

"I was so sorry, Archie," she interrupted quickly. "I don't know how I ever believed it."

"Well, never mind now, dear," he said, without any reproach in his tone. "I don't see how you could have helped thinking they were all talking about me; but they weren't, really. Of course, you didn't know we had another Douglas in our regiment—Arthur Douglas—and unfortunately we sometimes get mixed up. It's rather rough on me, as what they said about him was quite true. He was gone on Rachel, too, and did make a bit of a row at the sports. I suppose the man you heard talking must have mistaken us, for Douglas is no relation of ours at all."

How simple the explanation was! Ruth wondered that this solution had never occurred to her as possible.

"I never thought of there being another man of the same name," she said; "but at least, Archie, I accepted you without any question, so you can't say I had a bad opinion of you."

"Yes, that's true;" and Archie gave her an answering smile; "and I'll be bound you didn't hear much to my credit from Aunt Douglas. She always talks about me as if I were still a naughty boy;" and the tall young man laughed easily. "By the way," he said, with animation, "did she warn you against me?"

"No," Ruth replied; and added, with a slight blush, "I don't think she ever imagined we cared for one another."

"Oh well, of course I haven't been to see her since last summer, so I daresay she wouldn't know. I quite expected to catch it for presuming to fall in love without permission. It must have been some other misdemeanour that was referred to yesterday—there always is one which my aunt is good enough to correct me for," he finished tranquilly.

When they reached the gate, Archie held it open for Ruth, and remarked, with a smile, as he walked in after her—

"It doesn't seem very dignified to sneak back to the house after having been kicked out, does it? However, Aunt Douglas isn't the mistress of the establishment; so she must just put up with me."

As they entered the room, Miss Douglas, who was its only occupant, looked up at them, and if the young man did not feel dignified, he certainly appeared so, as he marched in with a stately air.

"Oh, so you've come back, Archie Douglas," remarked the old lady grimly, as she surveyed him through her spectacles.

"Yes, I have come back," he responded gravely. "I am sorry to intrude again, but I came to announce my engagement to Ruth to her Aunt Lennox."

Miss Douglas glared at the audacious speaker for some minutes in silence, and then said shortly—

"Well, I hope you won't both live to regret it."

"You don't speak very hopefully, Aunt Douglas," Archie said. "Are you afraid that we shall?"

The old lady tossed her head and made some inbefore Archie said, with a shade of emotion in his tone—

"Well, does anybody wish us joy?"

"I do, my dear fellow," promptly responded Major Webster, grasping his comrade's hand warmly.

After that, Ruth could never clearly remember "Does anybody wish us joy?"

articulate sound as she clinked her knitting-needles together with unnecessary vigour.

"I can only say that Ruth isn't getting such a prize as she thinks," she declared, with some emphasis, after a few minutes' preoccupation with her work.

"That is quite true," admitted Archie, with unexpected humility; "but"—and he took the girl's hand—"Ruth is willing to risk it, and I'll do my best to make her happy."

Miss Douglas glanced up sharply, but as her eye fell on Ruth's face her gaze remained fixed in astonishment. Never before had she seen the girl look like that. Her face was positively radiant—her eyes shining, and her cheeks glowing, while a half-tremulous smile played about her lips. It was this picture of the two young people standing hand-in-hand that, as the door opened, presented itself to the view of the new-comers. Mrs. Lennox and Katie, followed by Rachel and Major Webster, all stared mutely at the couple; but probably even Katie grasped the truth what happened. She knew her hand was taken and she was kissed several times, but the whole scene was vague and confused to her mind, even at the time. It must be confessed that Rachel behaved very well. She embraced her sister, and shook hands with Archie very prettily; and if her own hopes had received a disappointment, nothing in her manner betrayed it. If she were quieter than usual, it was not observed in the general commotion over the lovers. Ruth was the one who, in reality, divined her sister's feelings best, and she, naturally, was precluded from offering any sympathy. Possibly, however, she over-rated them or, at least, their durability; for, some time afterwards, Rachel—then Mrs. Webster, and a very fashionable lady indeed—confided to a friend that at one time she had very nearly been foolish enough to throw herself away on a penniless young man, who had only his handsome face to recommend him. But that was some years later.

Perhaps Miss Douglas felt reproved by Rachel's behaviour, or she may have repented of her extreme anger; at all events, as Archie was taking his departure he approached the old lady, and said in his old persuasive voice—"Won't you even wish me happiness, Aunt Douglas?" She did not repulse him, but said—"Yes, yes: if my wishes will do you any good, you're welcome to them."

Several years later, Gordon, on his way to visit his friend the artist, stepped on board the little steamer on a cold March day. Something in the cutting wind which blew down the loch seemed to bring back to his memory the long-past day of the accident. It was the same season of the year, which perhaps accounted for his thinking of it. Suddenly, as his eye travelled along the deck, he beheld Ruth. It was curious that he should have been thinking of her at this moment, for as the house in the glen had long been shut up, he certainly did not expect to see her here. He had heard from Jack that Captain Douglas and his wife were home from India on leave, but he had not supposed them to be in Scotland. What was Ruth doing there alone? he wondered. Her figure was as slim and graceful as ever; and as Gordon looked at the pretty girl in the sealskin, he thought the intervening five years had left her quite unchanged. She sat with her eyes fixed pensively on the water, and while Gordon studied her he became aware that her expression was sad. Had her marriage with that conceited young puppy turned out unhappy, then? But at that moment, before Gordon could go forward and greet her, Archie Douglas emerged from the cabin with a bundle of rugs, and went up to his wife. As he bent down and carefully wrapped one of the rugs round her, Gordon caught the smile which she turned upon her husband, and which completely put the theory of unhappiness to flight, so full was it of affection and confidence. Many people besides Gordon looked at the handsome couple, and no doubt the others put them down for a pair on their honeymoon. For a moment Gordon hesitated, and then he stepped forward and accosted them. They were charmed to see him, they said; and when he looked at the two smiling faces, he wondered what could have made him think of sadness in connection with Ruth. Archie was bronzed and a little thin, and his face was perhaps graver in repose than formerly; otherwise he was little changed. They talked of old times and old friends; but it was not until Ruth had gone below, just before they reached the pier, that Gordon learned the reason of their visit.

"To-day is an anniversary," Archie remarked; "so Ruth thought she would like to come back and see the old spot again."

"Oh," said Gordon, "I had been thinking of the accident, but had forgotten the exact day."

"Yes; poor Lance was drowned exactly five years ago," Archie said gravely; "and on the same day last year our little daughter died."

Before Gordon could make any rejoinder, Ruth reappeared, and her husband went over and relieved her of her hand-bag.

"Mr. Gordon," she said brightly, "you don't ask for my little boy. We left him with Miss Douglas and quite a family party. I only hope they won't spoil him;" and her face was lit up by a smile, which was reflected in Archie's as he said, with a twinkle in his eyes—

"I'm afraid Aunt Douglas will do her best, any way."

THE END.

SHORT ARROWS.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

A CHRISTIAN'S PRIVILEGE

IS "to possess God in all things while we have them, and all things in God when they are taken from us." In this way we enjoy the things of the world without being worldly, and resist the temptations of adversity. A lady was asked in the presence of the writer lately who was the happiest person she had ever known. She replied, "A missionary in China who wears the same sort of clothes as the poorest of the natives, and eats the same sort of food. Often he is in a place far from any European, but from his letters to me he would seem never to be lonely, and never sad." "Then," continued the lady, "I know a mother who, without any warning, heard by telegram at different times last year of the death, in different parts of the world, of two sons and a daughter, but the more she is crushed the sweeter she is. Indeed, she seems to me to be far happier than those who have never had losses of the kind, for she always thinks of her loved ones as being kept safely in a Heavenly Father's arms until the time comes for her to meet them."

A BISHOP'S WIFE: MRS. BOYD CARPENTER.

"Work only cannot satisfy the heart, nor irradiate the face." So writes Mrs. Boyd Carpenter in her little volume, "Fragments in Baskets," a work, by-the-bye, largely produced in the sick-room. She explains that "Work only brings satisfaction when we can lose ourselves in it—when in it we can bury our whole heart, wide and warm, so that it throbs in unison with all creation." Mrs. Carpenter herself seems to have plenty of work. As wife of the Bishop of Ripon, she has a large correspondence, while some time since she took interest in the practical training of young girls. She discovered that many women were ignorant of cookery, and so she instituted cookery classes, and wrote a "cook-book"—as we believe the Americans call it—in which are set forth the principles of that useful art, rather than a number of recipes merely collected together. Mrs. Carpenter holds that when a woman marries she should find scope for her activities within the charmed circle of her home life, but, should a woman not enter the state matrimonial, she should engage in the work most suitable to her capacities; yet she must realise that special training is often necessary, as, for instance, for work on the Press—a view we venture strongly to endorse. After all, does not this question find suggestion of an answer in the old truth that, whether man or woman, we should do the work that really lies nearest to us as well as we possibly can?

FALSE ESTIMATES OF STRENGTH.

We often make very false estimates of strength; and the reason is that we look only at the seen, and measure by the seen. The strong man, in our eyes, is the man who can do something great with his muscles. And yet (poor creatures as we are) we are very weak in comparison with a multitude of God's creatures, who have strength according to their size out of all proportion to ours. God's estimate of strength lies not in the direction of the natural, but of the moral and the spiritual. "He that ruleth his own spirit is greater than he that taketh a city." "Be strong in the Lord, and in the power of His might." In God's eyes many a weak woman, many a little boy or girl, is stronger than Goliath of Gath. There was a little boy, who was very small for his years, who worked as an errand-boy for four gentlemen. One day they were chaffing him a little about his being so small, and said to him, "You never will amount to much—you never can do much business—you are too small." The little fellow looked at them and said, "Well, small as I am, I can do something which none of you four men can do."—"Ah! what is that?" they said. "I don't know as I ought to tell you," he replied. But they were anxious to know, and urged him to tell what he could do that none of them were able to do. "I can keep from swearing," said the little fellow. The four men got red in the face, and did not pursue their inquiries any further. That boy was in the eyes of God stronger than those four men put together.

"ALL TOGETHER!"

"All together there, lads! all together! Why, one would think you were a lot of cockneys born and bred!" The cry of the coxswain was quite sufficient, and the oars dipped and rose in the sea as one blade. The boat felt the united impulse at once, and flew over the water with her companions. "Time now to shoot the seine, isn't it?" cried one of the men; and, the coxswain agreeing, two men desisted from rowing and began to heave over the huge net called the seine. It was shot from the boat in a huge semicircle, and hauled ashore by means of the lines at either end. But even the interest of the "catch" could not divert from the old coxswain's mind the straggling rowing of his crew at first. "Why, what is a crew worth," said he to the writer, "if they don't pull together? I should ha' thought they knew it by heart!"—"Yes," was the reply; "it shows how men sometimes forget or neglect the simplest and most obvious truths."—"Yes, and they have to pay for it, I spex," he said; "just as we should, if I hadn't a' pulled 'em up sharp."

"All together!"

GIVE WHAT YOU CAN.

The blacksmith of an Australian village went to his clergyman and said, "Sir, I can't give much money, but I will shoe four of your horses for a year for nothing, if you will send the money to the Missionary Association."

SOME NEW BOOKS.

"The Bells of Is" are the subject of Breton legend, but it is of subjects nearer home, and of greater moment, that the Rev. F. B. Meyer writes under this title. He uses the legendary music of the lost bells, only to be heard in the swirl and surge of the great storm-waves, as an illustration of the "voices of human need and sorrow," crying for better things from the depths of the "submerged tenth" in sin and poverty. And in these chapters which Messrs. Morgan and Scott have gathered into a pleasing volume, Mr. Meyer shows how he has endeavoured to point to the one and only sufficient answer to these voices.—There is nothing fresh to be said of a volume of the "Expositor's Bible" when space will not permit of detailed criticism. Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton have just sent us the volume on the "Book of Numbers," whose commentator is the Rev. R. A. Watson, D.D., who has already contributed two useful volumes to this same ever-helpful series. The homiletical value of Numbers is much greater than the casual reader would suppose, but perhaps one does not realise its full value until one sees it subject to the critical analysis and arrangement of so skilled a guide as Dr. Watson.—Messrs. Longman send us one of the most recent of their "Elementary Science Manuals," in which the subject of Hygiene, in all its principal developments, is most usefully and practically discussed in such a way as to make the book an invaluable addition to any library, and, above all, a helpful guide to teachers.—From Messrs. Longmans comes also a volume of "Practical Reflections on every verse of the Prophet Isaiah," by an anonymous author, whose spiritual tone is high, and who has previously issued works of a similar nature dealing with other Books of Scripture.—Under the title of "Eve—Noah—Abraham," Messrs. Cassell have issued a layman's "Study in Genesis," which has the double merit of sincerity and simplicity.—We have also to acknowledge the receipt of a volume of poems by E. E. Gillett, collected and edited by his sons, under the title of "A Christmas Tale." Mr. Elliot Stock is the publisher.

RECKONING LIFE.

People for the most part form a different estimate of things, according to the various standards by which they measure, and the various points from which they view them. A philosopher came to a ferry, and got into the boat which was to take him across a Highland lake. The talk between him and the boatman was pleasant at first in the calm. As the boat went further, the wind increased and the waves splashed. Yet the philosopher heeded not. He kept on talking, and said to the boatman, "Do you know ontology?" and the answer was, "No."—"Well," said the wiseacre, "you have lost half your existence." The wind blew stronger, and the boat tossed higher, and at length the boatman said to the wiseacre, "Will you let me ask you one question? Can you swim?"—"No," said the philosopher.—"Then," was the reply, "you have lost the whole of your existence, for this boat is going to sink in five minutes." An old man, when asked how old he was, replied that he was four years old. He had been born into the world seventy years before, but during nearly all that time he had been dead in trespasses and sins; now he had been born again, had been made a new creature in Christ Jesus, old things had passed away, all things had become new. And in truth a man has only really lived for those years in which he has lived to God. Our Lord speaks of a man's being born again, and he cannot live before he is born. According to this method of computation, how old, good reader, are you?

NEGLECT OF GOD'S HOUSE.

"Next Sunday," said a minister to his congregation, "the funeral of — will be held in this church. I shall preach a funeral sermon on the occasion; and the man himself will be here, the first time in twenty years." Some date their last churchgoing to the time of their baptism; and some, to that of their marriage; some particular occasion brought them there, but not their personal desire to worship Almighty God. Another minister, speaking to one of his parishioners about his neglect of public worship, was told that he always went to church when there was a charity sermon. "Ah," said the minister, "you will go to heaven under certain conditions."—"And what are they?"—"If the church is taken up into heaven when a charity sermon is being preached; and you are there." With the neglect of God's house generally comes the neglect of one's soul, and all one's spiritual concerns. It is a habit that soon grows on a man, until at last he becomes shy of being seen going to church. The dead body of which that minister spoke, it is much to be feared belonged to a dead soul.

FEELING LOVE AND SHOWING LOVE.

If we feel love to Christ, let us show it in any way we can. It may be that we can do so only in some very small ways, but "a feather shows how the wind blows," as the proverb says. Even the smoke from the chimney will show in what direction and with what force the wind is blowing. One Sunday on an island in the Indian Ocean, a missionary was studying a sermon to preach in the language of the people. A little boy, about half clad, came in and said, "Oh I do so love my Jesus! may I do something for His house?"—"And what can you do?" said the missionary. Blushing and stammering as if afraid to say anything, he replied, "I will be always there; I will do it loud. Please let me ring the bell." While he was a boy he rang the bell that invited the people to church; and when he became a man, he preached to his people the same glad news that he commenced calling the people to hear when he rang the Sabbath bell. Our blessed Lord Himself showed His love to His Father by His works; to the poor woman who cast in the two mites He gave His commendation. Beginning with small things, such as lie immediately within our reach, God will promote us to greater; the boy who first called with the bell was afterwards promoted to call with the voice.

MAKING THE BEST OF IT: A PARABLE.

"It is old, but it must serve," said Mrs. Bodgers, wearily handing her son Joe a worn and broken umbrella.—"Oh, yes, mother, we'll make it do. It will keep us dry a bit."—"And better than sitting in school in wet clothes," chimed in Jack Clements, who lived in the next flat in a big block of model dwellings. "Father says there's nothing but what you can't make the best, or the worst, of it; and we will make the best of the old umbrella."—"Bless the boy! you're right," exclaimed Mrs. Bodgers; "and I'll see and mend it myself against the next rainy day." And, as the widow saw the two merry-faced lads go off together under the old umbrella, she realised indeed that cheerfulness is one of the best of medicines, and she turned to her day's work with a lighter heart, resolved, like the boys, to make the best of it.

UNBELIEF.

There is an old rhyme, "Convince a woman against her will, She's of the same opinion still." Whether this be true of woman or not, it is certainly true of many in their unbelief in God and as regards Divine things. There was a patient in a lunatic asylum who imagined himself dead. Nothing could drive this delusion out of the man's brain. One day his physician said to him, "Did you ever see a dead man bleed?"—"No," he replied.—"Did you ever hear of a dead man's bleeding?"—"No."—"Well, if you'll allow me, I will try an experiment with you, and see whether you bleed or not." The patient gave his consent, and in a moment the doctor drew a little blood. "There," said he, "you see that you bleed; that proves that you are not dead."—"Not at all," the patient instantly replied; "that only proves that dead men bleed." Thus it is with unbelief. It often starts with unreasonableness; it will believe nothing but what it likes itself; professing to be guided by reason, and to be amenable to reason, it will not listen to reason at all. It is obstinate in its own opinion; it doesn't intend to be convinced. And very often it is dishonest. It will not admit of any evidence that is unfavourable to it. And it is often absurd—anything, everything, rather than believe. Argument can do nothing with minds set to unbelief. As long as the mind is insane, it will refuse evidence. It is only the Spirit of God that can penetrate the recesses in which infidelity lie; not only the great unbelief itself, but unbelief in many of the lesser forms which are continually developing in the heart.

A SOUND ARGUMENT.

The following we commend to those who say that they have no influence, nor any power to diminish the sin and sorrow of the world. It should make us all Christian workers:—"I am but one; but I can do something. What I can do I ought to do, and what I ought to do, by the grace of God I will!"

"THE POOR SHALL TASTE OF IT."

When Sir Francis Crossley gave large and beautiful recreation grounds for the poor of Halifax, he said on the opening day that he attributed his prosperity in business very largely to the fact that, when he first commenced it, his mother had said, "If the Lord prosper us in this place, the poor shall taste of it."

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

(A NEW SERIES OF QUESTIONS BASED ON THE INTERNATIONAL SCRIPTURE LESSONS.)

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 880.

121. Sychar was anciently called Shechem, and was situate at the foot of Mount Gerizim. It was the first place in the land of Canaan where Abraham settled, and was the burial-place of Joseph. (Gen. xii. 6, 7; Josh. xxiv. 32; St. John iv. 5, 6.)

122. Jacob built an altar on Mount Gerizim, and a temple was erected there by Sanballat 330 B.C., wherein the worship of God was regularly carried on. (Gen. xxxiii. 19, 20; 2 Macc. vi. 2.)

123. In reply to the woman's statement, "I know that Messiah cometh," our Lord answered, "I that speak unto thee am He." (St. John iv. 26.)

124. By representing wild beasts and serpents as hurting no one, and all living together in perfect harmony. (Is. xi. 6—10.)

125. St. Mark says, "Jesus came into Galilee preaching, 'The time is fulfilled, and the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand.'" (Gal. iv. 4; St. Mark i. 15.)

126. That all events of the world are arranged by God to be carried out in their due season. (St. Mark i. 15.)

127. That our blessed Lord's preaching was received with great gladness, and that His fame rapidly spread abroad. (St. Luke iv. 14, 15.)

128. The people of Nazareth tried to kill Jesus, because, while claiming to be the Messiah, He refused to perform any miracle. (St. Luke iv. 21, 23; 28—30.)

129. "He came unto His own, and His own received Him not." (St. John i. 11.)

130. The duty of attending public worship regularly, which is distinctly stated to have been our Lord's "custom." (St. Luke iv. 16.)

131. It caused St. Peter to acknowledge Jesus as God and influenced him and the two sons of Zebedee to follow Christ. (St. Luke v. 8—11.)

132. Because it is said the boat which Jesus used belonged to St. Peter, and St. James and St. John were partners with him; and in all ancient paintings he is represented as an old man. (St. Luke v. 3, 10.)
